THE firſt thing after the battle Gelon did was, amply to reward all thoſe who had ſignalized themſelves in the action, eſpecially the body of horſe to whom the victory was chiefly owing. The greateſt part of the ſpoils, which were of an immenſe value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuſe and Himera; what remained, together with the captives, he diſtributed amongſt his ſoldiers, in proportion to the degree of bravery and valour they had ſhewn. Many of the laſt, to whatever city's ſhare they fell, were employed in public works for the common good; and ſo many were taken, that all Africa ſeemed to have been tranſplanted into Sicily. Some of the citizens of Agrigentum, in particular, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves above the reſt, had five hundred a-piece. The fugitives, upon the defeat of their army, being in the utmoſt conſternation, fled into the inland provinces of Sicily, eſpecially the territory of Agrigantum, where being taken alive, that city was in a manner filled with priſoners. The greateſt part of them were put in irons, and ſet apart for the public ſervice. The work they were chiefly employed in at firſt was, cutting and hewing of ſtone; of which afterwards they built the largeſt of the temples at Agrigentum, and made thoſe conduits or aqueducts to convey water from the city, which were ſo much admired by the antients, and called Pheaces, from one Pheax, who was the overſeer of the work. The Agrigentines likewiſe, by their labour, ſunk a fiſh-pond at great expence, ſeven ſtadia in circumference and twenty cubits deep [r] (B). Gelon rewards his ſoldiers for their bravery

By the late victory, which was complete both in itſelf and its conſequences, Gelon acquired great glory, and was juſtly celebrated by foreigners as well as his own ſubjects, as one of the moſt renowned and experienced generals any age or nation ever produced. The ſtratagem by which the Carthaginian army was overthrown he himſelf contrived, and conducted throughout, being the life and ſoul of the army in the execution of it. Some authors have not ſcrupled to prefer him to Themiſtocles, and the advantage accruing to the Greek nation in general from this action to that gained by the battle of Platæa. However this may be, it is certain we find no account in hiſtory of any engagement, wherein the like carnage was made, and ſuch a number of priſoners taken. Neither did the Carthaginian fleet, conſiſting of that vaſt number of ſhips of war and tranſports above-mentioned, meet with a much better fate than their land-forces had done. Only twenty long ſhips or galleys, which Hamilcar had occaſionally drawn out for neceſſary ſervices, happened to be out at ſea, when the camp of the marines was taken, and conſequently eſcaped the general conflagration. Theſe ſailed directly for Carthage; but meeting with contrary winds and tempeſts, before they reached that place, they were all caſt away, a few men only being ſaved in a ſmall boat. Theſe arriving at Carthage brought the diſmal news of the entire defeat of their army, and the loſs of their fleet. The Carthaginians, little expecting to hear of ſuch a ſignal diſaſter, but on the contrary pleaſing themſelves with the imagination of reducing the whole iſland of Sicily almoſt without ſtriking a ſtroke, were moſt ſtrangely ſhocked at receiving this melancholy advice. As in all great reverſes of fortune the nation we are diſcourſing of ever loſt their courage, and abandoned themſelves to deſpair, ſo in the preſent caſe they gave every thing up for loſt. Nothing but outcries and lamentations were to be heard throughout the whole city; the enemy was already imagined to be at their gates, and all orders and for food and pleaſure. Great numbers of ſwans likewiſe reſted upon it, which afforded a moſt pleaſant proſpect to the eye. By the negligence of ſucceeding ages, it was gradually filled up with mud, and at laſt became wholly dry ground. The ſoil was ſo rich in Diodorus's time, that the Agrigentines planted vines and all kinds of trees there, which brought them in a very conſiderable revenue (1).

and degrees of people amongſt them were overwhelmed with inexpreſſible grief, deſpondency, and conſternation.

The Carthaginians apply to Gelon for a peace.

In this deplorable ſituation, the Carthaginians thought they could have recourſe to nothing but Gelon's clemency; and therefore immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to Sicily, enjoining them to ſtrike up a peace with him upon any terms.

His moderation and humanity.

Upon the arrival of theſe embaſſadors at Syracuſe, Gelon afforded them an inſtance of great moderation and humanity. Notwithſtanding by the late victory he was become the arbiter of peace and war, and had the Carthaginians entirely at his mercy, he received theſe miniſters in a moſt affable and courteous manner. His proſperity had not in the leaſt elated him, nor rendered him at all haughty or untractable. On the other hand, tho' this deputation conſiſted of perſons the moſt famed of any in Carthage for their merit and abilities, yet they behaved in a moſt mean and abject manner. They threw themſelves at Gelon's feet, with tears begged him to receive their city into favour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he ſhould think proper to preſcribe. This plainly ſhews how void the Carthaginians then were of that true reſolution and magnanimity, which ſupported the old Romans in all adverſity, and carried them through all dangers; that reſolution and magnanimity, which enabled them to lay the foundations of an almoſt univerſal empire, and even to deſtroy the dangerous rival of theirs we are now writing the hiſtory of; though it muſt be owned this heroic virtue and greatneſs of ſoul was much tarniſhed in their poſterity, to ſay no worſe, by ſome actions they were guilty of towards the decline of the Carthaginian ſtate.

The terms on which he grants them a peace.

Gelon, like a good-natured prince, being touched with compaſſion for the miſeries of the Carthaginians, granted them a peace upon the following eaſy conditions: Firſt, that they ſhould pay two thouſand talents of ſilver towards defraying the expences of the war. Secondly, that they ſhould build two temples, where this treaty of peace ſhould be depoſited, and at all times be expoſed to public view. Thirdly, that for the future they ſhould abſtain from offering human ſacrifices. This laſt article ſhews the great humanity of Gelon's temper, and is a proof, that the people of Carthage were obliged a ſecond time to aboliſh that barbarous practice for a certain period, at leaſt in appearance; for it cannot be doubted, but they ratified this treaty, it being ſo advantageous to them, at a juncture when they were upon the very brink of deſtruction.

THE Carthaginians, having recovered their ſpirits, by the happy turn their affairs had taken, through the conqueror's great clemency and moderation, thought proper now to ſhew their gratitude to Damareta, Gelon's wife, who had forwarded an accommodation betwixt the two powers, and been chiefly inſtrumental in bringing it to an happy concluſion. They therefore, immediately after the peace, ſent her a crown of gold, valued at an hundred talents of that metal. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces, called from his wife's name Damaretia, each of them being worth ten Attic drachmas. The Sicilians gave them the name of Pentecontalitra, from their being fifty pounds in weight [s] (C).

An inſtance of Gelon's military capacity.

WE muſt not omit one circumſtance, which may ſerve as a further inſtance of Gelon's military capacity. Upon his firſt approach to Himera, to ſuccour the beſieged, a detachment of his forces defeated many of the Carthaginian parties ſent to forage in different parts of the iſland. Beſides what they killed, they took ten thouſand priſoners, as above related. Theſe probably were the worſt troops in the

(C) Theſe pieces ſeem to have been rather medals ſtruck on occaſion of Gelon's victory over the Carthaginians, than common coins. The ſize of them ſupplies us with an argument in favour of this notion. The braſs litra of Sicily was at firſt a pound weight, as the libra or As was amongſt the Romans; and ſixty ſuch litræ made a talent. According to Pollux, Damareta and the other Syracuſan ladies of diſtinction brought all their ſilver utenſils to the mint, and the coin formed from thence was called νόμισμα Δημαρέτειον. But Diodorus's relation is more probable; ſince, if Gelon had been in great want of money, he would undoubtedly have ſtamped it in the ſmalleſt ſpecies, and not in pieces of ſuch a magnitude, which ſeemed to allude to the great victory obtained over the Carthaginians, as well as the immenſe booty found in their camp (z).

(z) Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. Jul. Pol. p. 437, & alib. Vide & ſchol. Pind. olym. ii.

the Carthaginian army; and therefore a ſtratagem Frontinus relates Gelon to have been the author of ſeems to bid fair for this particular period of time. This prince, having a large number of priſoners, picked out the weakeſt of them, who were auxiliaries, moſtly tawny, and of a very deſpicable appearance; and expoſed them quite naked before his ſoldiers, that they might have the moſt contemptible notion of the enemy [t]. Something like this happened, if we miſtake not, in the late war between the Turks and the Ruſſians, when the former, to give their people at Conſtantinople the meaner opinion of the latter, led the moſt miſerable of the captives they had taken from that nation in triumph through their capital.

What uſe Gelon made of the Carthaginian ſpoils.

BESIDES the public works above-mentioned, the Carthaginian ſpoils enabled Gelon to build two noble temples, the one to Ceres, and the other to Proſerpina. A tripod of gold likewiſe, of ſixteen talents, he cauſed to be made out of them, and ſent it as a donation to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, as an acknowledgment of his gratitude to that deity. If an inſcription given us by the ſcholiaſt on Pindar may be depended upon as genuine, there were more tripods than one ſent thither on this occaſion in the name of Gelon and his brothers, who had all of them a great ſhare in the ſucceſſes they gave thanks for (D).

(D) We are further aſſured by Pauſanias, that Gelon ſent ſeveral valuable preſents to the temple of Jupiter Olympius at Olympia, as a grateful return to that pagan divinity for the good ſucceſs that attended his arms, with which he was furniſhed from the booty found in the Carthaginian camp. Among the reſt there were three curious veſtments of fine Carthaginian linen, each of them repreſenting a coat of mail, which undoubtedly were looked upon as ſomething particularly rare, ſince Xenophon intimates the Carthaginian flax to have been of a very fine nature. A ſtatue of Jupiter alſo, of a prodigious ſize, was ſent to the ſame place in the name of Gelon and the Syracuſans, when they were full of the moſt grateful ſentiments for the ſignal victory obtained over the Carthaginians both by ſea and land. The cell or apartment, in which theſe donations were depoſited, was of exquiſite workmanſhip, being made by thoſe celebrated artificers Pothæus, Antiphilus, and Megacles, at Gelon's order. Beſides the golden tripod above-mentioned, Gelon ſent a golden ſtatue of Victory to Delphi, Giſco, the ſon of Hamilcar, baniſhed Carthage.

THE Carthaginians, incenſed at Hamilcar, as imputing the late diſaſter entirely to his conduct, notwithſtanding the great ſervices he had done the ſtate on other occaſions, reſolved, that his family ſhould feel the effects of their reſentment; and therefore baniſhed his ſon Giſco, who, being thus obliged to leave his native country, retired to Selinus, where he died for want of neceſſaries. The Sicilian cities, that ſided with the Carthaginians, upon their firſt application to Gelon, were received into favour, and had a confirmation of all their antient privileges granted them, though the conqueror, with a very good grace, might have treated them in a far different manner [u].

Little ſaid of the Carthaginians for ſeventy years.

FROM this time for full ſeventy years, that is to ſay, till towards the cloſe of the ninety-ſecond, or the beginning of the ninety-third olympiad, we ſcarce find any mention of the Carthaginians, or their affairs, in the Sicilian hiſtory. The laſt blow they received in Sicily was ſo terrible, that a peace of ſome duration was abſolutely neceſſary for the re-eſtabliſhment of their affairs; and it is natural to ſuppoſe, that, of all places in the world, Sicily would be the laſt they would, for a conſiderable period of time, chuſe for the ſcene of action. However, a fair opportunity offering at the time above-mentioned, moved by their ambition, they embarqued in another war there, which, though pretty bloody and expenſive, ended with much better ſucceſs to them than the former.

The Carthaginians render themſelves independent in Africa.

HOWEVER, in ſome part of this interval, ſeveral remarkable incidents, mentioned by Juſtin, Salluſt, and Valerius Maximus, ſeem to have happened. The Carthaginians carried their arms againſt the Moors, Numidians, and other African nations, and greatly extended their frontiers in [u] Diod. Sic. l. xiii. Ælian. var. hiſt. l. vi. c. 11.

Delphi, which ſeems to have been the third offering of that metal ever brought thither. This we learn from Phanias Ereſius and Theopompus, as cited by Athenæus, who inform us, that before the days of Gyges and Crœſus, kings of Lydia, all the votive gifts ſent to Delphi conſiſted of braſs, and theſe not ſtatues, but chaldrons and tripods. As this obſervation ſeemed to us curious, we could not prevail upon ourſelves to omit it (4).

in Africa. They likewiſe ſhook off the tribute, which, for a long time, had given them ſo much uneaſineſs, and rendered themſelves abſolutely independent.

THEY had warm diſputes with the people of Cyrene, a Mediterranean city, the capital of Cyrenaica, built by the Theræans under Battus, who were a colony of the Lacedæmonians, which aroſe from the want of a regulation of limits between the two ſtates. As the Cyreneans were very powerful, much blood was ſhed on this occaſion; but at laſt the two nations, after having almoſt exhauſted each other by a long and expenſive war, accommodated their differences in the following manner[x].

Have warm diſputes with the Cyrenians, on account of a regulation of limits.

BEING ſo weakened, that they were both afraid of becoming a prey to ſome foreign invader, they conſented firſt to a ceſſation of arms, in order to a pacification. Afterwards it was agreed, that each city ſhould appoint two commiſſaries, who ſhould ſet out from their reſpective towns upon the ſame day, and that the ſpot they met upon ſhould be the common boundary to both ſtates. Upon this, two brothers, called Philæni, were diſpatched from Carthage, who advanced with great celerity, whilſt the Cyreneans proceeded more ſlowly. Whether this was to be imputed to the lazineſs of the latter, or to ſome accident intervening, is not certain. However, the laſt is not improbable, ſince in thoſe ſandy regions, at certain ſeaſons of the year, there are as violent ſtorms and tempeſts as upon the ſea; which is not to be wondered at, conſidering that, in ſuch countries, which are open and level, aud have not ſo much as a ſhrub to break the force of the wind, ſometimes boiſterous weather muſt almoſt neceſſarily happen; and then the ſand, being put into a violent commotion, is blown up into the air in great quantities, fills the eyes, mouths, noſtrils, &c. of travellers, and by that means greatly retards at leaſt, if it does not put an entire ſtop to, their journey. Valerius Maximus intimates, that the Philæni acted perfidiouſly, by ſetting out before the appointed time, and thereby impoſed upon the others. Be this as it will, the Cyreneans, finding themſelves too tardy, and fearing to be called to an account for their conduct at their return home, accuſed the Carthaginians of breach of faith, by beginning their journey before the ſtipulated time; inſiſted, that the convention agreed upon between their principals was broken; and declared they would ſuffer all extremities, rather than ſubmit to ſuch a baſe and ignominious treatment. On the other hand, the Philæni, with much ſeeming calmneſs and moderation, deſired the Cyreneans not to talk in ſo lofty a ſtrain, but themſelves to propoſe ſome expedient whereby their differences might be terminated, promiſing at the ſame time to ſubmit to it, whatever it might be. The latter then propoſed to them, either to retire from the place they had fixed upon for the limit of their dominions, or ſuffer themſelves to be buried alive there, not in the leaſt imagining they would comply with ſo hard a condition. But herein they were diſappointed; for the Carthaginian brothers without heſitation, conſented to it, laid down their lives, and gained a large extent of territory by that means to their country. The Carthaginians ever afterwards celebrated this as a moſt brave and heroic action, paid them divine honours, and endeavoured to immortalize their names, by erecting there two altars, with ſuitable inſcriptions upon them. Strabo informs us, that no traces of theſe were to be ſeen in his days, though the place ſtill retained the name of the altars of the Philæni. However 'tis not to be doubted, but the ſtate of Carthage, as long as it exiſted, kept them up, this being ever their boundary on the ſide of Cyrenaica. Salluſt relates, that there was a ſandy tract of ground betwixt the territories of Carthage and Cyrene, without hill, river, or ſpot in it, whereby to aſcertain the borders of the two nations; ſo that they were obliged to have recourſe to the method aforeſaid. The love of one's country is certainly a moſt amiable virtue; but that any civilized nation ſhould carry this ſo far, as to allow the building of it upon fraud, perfidy, and a violation of public faith, is very ſtrange; yet this the Carthaginians did, if Valerius Maximus may be credited, by paying ſo high a regard to the memory of the Philæni. That author, however, runs out into a wild and frantic encomium upon them, and thereby diſcovers much of the Punic diſpoſition. In ſhort, this piece of hiſtory gives us a lively idea of the Carthaginian notion of bravery and heroiſm, as do ſeveral other incidents to be found in the courſe of this hiſtory [u].

The Philæni ſuffer themſelves to be buried alive, in order to enlarge the dominions of their ſtate.

The Egeſtines occaſion another war between the Carthaginians and Syracuſans.

THE Egeſtines, allies of the Athenians, after the concluſion of the Syracuſan war, of which they had been the principal occaſion, by inviting the Athenians into Sicily, entertained ſtrong apprehenſions of being called to an account by the Syracuſans for all the acts of hoſtility they had committed againſt them. About this time alſo the Egeſtines had ſome diſputes with the Selinuntines about a regulation of limits, which at laſt broke out into an open rupture betwixt the two ſtates; but the former dreading the reſentment of the Syracuſans, and believing they would aſſiſt their enemy with a large body of forces, clapped up a peace with the latter upon their own terms. Though by this peace the Egeſtines gave up all the points in diſpute, the Selinuntines, not contented herewith, made farther encroachments upon them; which greatly irritating the Egeſtines, they had recourſe to the Carthaginians, imploring their protection, both againſt the Selinuntines, and their confederates the Syracuſans. The affair meeting with great difficulties, it was for ſome time debated at Carthage what courſe it would be proper to take. On the one hand, the Carthaginians were very deſirous to poſſeſs themſelves of Egeſta, a city which lay ſo convenient for them, and which would much facilitate the reduction of the whole iſland of Sicily, the favourite project that ſtate always had in view. On the other, they dreaded the power and forces of Syracuſe, which had ſo lately cut to pieces a numerous army of the Athenians, and was become, by ſo ſhining a victory more formidable than ever. At laſt their thirſt after empire prevailed, and through the deſire of getting the city into their hands, they promiſed the Egeſtines ſuccours.

Hannibal appointed to command in the Sicilian expedition.

THE general appointed to command in this war, if matters came to the laſt extremity, was Hannibal, the grandſon of Hamilcar, killed at the battle of Himera, and ſon of Giſco, the exile above-mentioned. He was at this time inveſted with the higheſt dignity of the ſtate, being one of the ſuffetes, and a perſon of very great conſideration. As he bore a natural hatred to the Greeks, and was deſirous to wipe off, by his own valour, the diſgrace of that defeat, which he conſidered as a ſtain upon his family, he ſought, by all means poſſible, to diſtinguiſh himſelf on this occaſion for the ſervice of his country. He was indefatigable, all that ſummer and the enſuing winter, in raiſing forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making the other neceſſary preparations; inſomuch that, in the beginning of the ſpring, he had an incredible number of ſoldiers of different nations liſted under his ſtandard. But, before he came to an open rupture with the Selinuntines, he had recourſe to Punic policy, endeavouring, by a trick of his, to over-reach both them and the Syracuſans their allies. Being appriſed, that the Selinuntines were not ſatisfied with the tract of land ceded them by the Egeſtines in the laſt treaty of peace, but laid further claim to a great part of their territories, he deſired the Syracuſans to act as mediators in this affair, and endeavour to accommodate the differences betwixt the contending parties in an amicable manner. His view in this was, to ſow the ſeeds of diſſenſion betwixt the Syracuſans and the Selinuntines, imagining, that if the latter ſhould reject the mediation of the former, the confederacy betwixt them would of courſe be diſſolved, and conſequently that each of them would more eaſily fall a prey to the Carthaginians. But his ſcheme proved abortive; for though the Syracuſans interpoſed their good offices, in order to bring about an accommodation betwixt the Selinuntines and Egeſtines, yet finding theſe ineffectual, they did not think proper to make uſe of any compulſive methods, nor to renounce the alliance they had entered into with the former. The Carthaginians, finding their artifices thus eluded, upon the return of their embaſſadors, openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the Egeſtines, and ſent a ſupply of five thouſand Africans, and eight hundred Campanians, to their aſſiſtance. The latter had been hired by the Chalcidians to aſſiſt the Athenians againſt the Syracuſans; but, after their overthrow, ſailing back into Campania, ſtaid there, in hopes that ſome ſtate might ſoon ſtand in need of their aſſiſtance. Accordingly, the Carthaginians took them into their ſervice, bought them horſes, and placed them in garriſon at Egeſta; which place, at all events, they were determined to make themſelves maſters of. Notwithſtanding this powerful body of Carthaginian auxiliaries, the Selinuntines, being both rich and numerous, held the Egeſtines in great contempt [w].

The Selinuntines, having drawn together a ſtrong body of regular troops, ravaged all the country about Egeſta, and deſpiſing the enemy, who were far inferior to them in number, ber, diſperſed themſelves in parties, without order or diſcipline, all over the territory of the Egeſtines, for the ſake of plunder. The Carthaginians and Campanians in garriſon, obſerving this, took the firſt opportunity that offered, in conjunction with the Egeſtines, of ſurpriſing them; which they did ſo effectually, that they put them to flight, killed a thouſand on the ſpot, and carried off all their bagage. Immediately after this action, both cities diſpatched embaſſadors to ſolicit ſuccours from their reſpective confederates, the Selinuntines from the Syracuſans, and the Egeſtines from the Carthaginians; which being readily agreed to on both ſides, a moſt dreadful war broke out between the Egeſtines and Carthaginians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracuſans on the other.

The Carthaginians and Campanians ſurpriſe the Selinuntines and cut off a thouſand of them.

THE Carthaginians, before they directly engaged in this war took care to make an eſtimate of the prodigious ſums neceſſary to ſupport it, and the numerous body of forces requiſite to carry it on with vigour; and having impowered their general Hannibal to raiſe an army equal to the undertaking, as above-mentioned, and to equip a ſuitable fleet, they appropriated certain funds to the defraying all the expences of the war, intending to attack the iſland of Sicily with their whole power the beginning of the following ſpring.

The Carthaginians make great preparations for a war with the Selinuntines

HANNIBAL, at the time appointed, put his army on board ſixty long galleys, and fifteen hundred tranſports, together with an immenſe quantity of proviſions he had amaſſed for their ſubſiſtence, military engines, arms, and all other things neceſſary for a ſiege. Setting ſail with theſe as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, he croſſed the African ſea, and arrived at Lilybæum, a promontory of Sicily, oppoſite to the coaſt of Africa. Before he landed his troops, he was diſcovered by a party of Selinuntine horſe, who poſted away with great expedition, to give their countrymen intelligence of the approach of the enemy. Upon this the Selinuntines diſpatched couriers to Syracuſe for immediate relief. Hannibal in the mean time, landing his army, marked out a camp, beginning at a place called The well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybæum was afterwards built. Here he ſtaid a ſhort time to refreſh his troops, before he entered upon the operations of the campaign.

Hannibal lands his forces in Sicily.

ACCORDING

Ephorus and Timæus Siculus differ in their relations of the ſtrength of the Carthaginian army.

ACCORDING to Ephorus the hiſtorian (E), the Carthaginian army conſiſted of two hundred thouſand foot, and four

(E) Ephorus, an orator and hiſtorian, was born in the city (1) of Cumæ or Cyme in Æolia, and one of Iſocrates's (2) ſcholars. His hiſtory contained chiefly the tranſactions of his countrymen the Greeks for the ſpace of ſeven hundred and fifty years; that is, from the return of the Heraclidæ, to the twentieth year of Philip king of Macedon (3), in which year he beſieged Perinthus. Plutarch intimates (4), that he wrote a particular hiſtory of Cumæ. He was a writer of ſlow parts, according to Tully, and much inferior, in point of genius (5), to his ſchool-fellow Theopompus. Seneca ſays (6), he had little regard to veracity; which ſeems confirmed by moſt of the paſſages taken from him by Diodorus. His ignorance in geography is very apparent, from his making all the Iberians inhabitants of the ſame city; from whence Joſephus rightly infers (7), that the knowledge of the weſtern parts of the world came very late to the Greeks. Notwithſtanding what has been ſaid, Diodorus informs us (8), that he wrote with great accuracy, and in an elegant ſtyle; tho' in the laſt article he is contradicted by Duris Samius (9) and Dion Chryſoſtomus, whoſe teſtimony is of great weight in this particular. His grand hiſtory he divided into thirty books (10), to each of which he added a preface. Beſides the performances above-mentioned, he compoſed a treatiſe de rebus inventis, of which Strabo (11) takes notice; another de bonis & malis, divided (12) into twenty-four books; another de rebus paſſim admirabilibus (13), divided into fifteen books; another de civitatibus Thraciæ, of which Harpocration quotes (14) the fourth book. Father Harduin aſcribes to him a particular treatiſe (15) of the origin of cities, and another of the encreaſe of the Nile; but, according to M. Bayle (16), the authors alledged by him prove no ſuch thing; and indeed this he makes out very clearly. Ephorus is complimented (17) by Polybius, bius and Strabo; but notwithſtanding Diodorus ſeems ſo fond of him, yet, in another paſſage, that writer tells us, he related ſo many falſities (18) of Egypt, that we muſt not expect to meet with any thing of truth in him. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (19), as well as Diodorus, ſpeaks favourably of his ſtyle. The two other hiſtorians this laſt author ranks with him, are Theopompus (20) and Calliſthenes. We find a valuable fragment of Porphyry preſerved by Euſebius, from which it appears, that Ephorus was accuſed of being a plagiary; nay, of ſtealing three thouſand lines (21), word for word, from Daimachus, Anaximenes, and Calliſthenes. Lyſimachus is ſaid to have written a piece, containing all his plagiariſms; and Alcæus, (22) a ſatyrical poet, is affirmed by Porphyry likewiſe to have expoſed them. He is ridiculed by Strabo (23) for the mention he makes of his native country. A ſon, called Demophilus, ſurvived him, who, (24) being a ſcholar, was thought by ſome to have put the finiſhing hand to what his father left imperfect. A fuller account of him may be ſeen in Voſſius (25) and M. Bayle, to whom we refer our readers.

(F) Timæus Siculus, a Greek hiſtorian of good note (26), the ſon of Andromachus, a noble Sicilian, who, according to Diodorus (27), aſſembling the fugitives of Naxus, ſettled with them on a hill called Taurus, to which ſettlement the city of Taurominium owed its origin. Timæus flouriſhed in the time of Agathocles, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. Suidas and Heſychius will not allow him to have been a judicious compiler of hiſtory; and Polybius accuſes him of betraying too great credulity, a want of judgment, and a trifling genius, on ſeveral occaſions (28). He was a perſon of violent paſſions, as appeared both from his ſhameful calumnies, and impious flattery, which prejudiced many writers, and ſome of theſe even too much, againſt him. Becauſe he was baniſhed by Agathocles, he gave that tyrant no quarter after his death drawn ashore, for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracusans, and then, being joined by the Egestines, marched to Selinus, death, not only describing his crimes and ill qualities in the blackest manner, but loading him with fabulous calumnies. He was acted so much by a spirit of revenge on this occasion, that he contradicted himself in a most flagrant manner; for which (29) reason the five last books of his history, which treated of the actions of Agathocles, were undoubtedly very deficient in point of veracity. On the other hand, if we may believe Suidas, he exalted his hero Timoleon (30) to a superiority above the highest divinities; to which that author adds, that for this he deserved a greater punishment than Callisthenes, who suffered death for designing to deify Alexander, a prince infinitely more illustrious than Timoleon. He composed several pieces; one consisting of three books, de Syria, & ejus urbibus regibusque; another divided into sixty-eight books, de argumentis rhetoricæ; another intitled olympionicæ, seu acta chronica; two more, whose titles were, Ἰταλικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ, consisting of eight books; and Ἑλληνικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ, whose number of books is not known. In the former of these two last works he wrote the history of Sicily, as far as it was coincident with the Roman history; and in the other he gave an account of the Sicilian transactions, as they were intermixed with those of the Greeks. His history of Pyrrhus was a distinct piece, as we are informed by Dionysius Halicarnasseus and Cicero (31). Diogenes Laertius quoted no book of his history beyond the eighteenth, though Athæneus (32) cited the twenty-eighth; which is a proof, that those authors paid no great regard to the division of his Greek, Roman, and Sicilian history, as given us by Vossius. Notwithstanding what has been offered by Suidas to invalidate the authority of Timæus in the five last books of his history, yet this author himself allows (33), that, in all other parts of it, he adhered strictly to truth; and even according to Polybius, though he blames our historian in several respects, particularly for trusting too much to the reports of others, he laid it down as a maxim (34), that truth was the life and soul of history. However he might be imposed upon in what related to Africa, Corsica, and other countries that he was a stranger to, as Polybius intimates he was (35), yet we cannot help being of opinion, that he was an excellent and most faithful historian as to the Sicilian affairs, except when he discharged all the impetuous torrents rents of his rage againſt Agathocles, which indeed could never be vindicated. In moſt of thoſe paſſages of Diodorus, wherein Timæus and Ephorus are cited as differing in their relations, the former has apparently a much greater degree of probability on his ſide, of which we ſhall at preſent only give one inſtance, not having time to produce all the reſt: Ephorus informs us, that the Carthaginian army, which reduced Selinus, conſiſted of two hundred thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe; but, according to Timæus, it could not well have conſiſted of above an hundred and ten or an hundred and twenty thouſand men. Now, it is evident from Diodorus, that upon Hannibal's marching to Himera, immediately after the reduction of Selinus, his army conſiſted but of an hundred thouſand men; for he was joined by twenty thouſand Sicani on his march, and, upon his arrival before Himera, his army, including both camps, amounted but to an hundred and twenty thouſand men. Since therefore we cannot well ſuppoſe the Carthaginians to have loſt above ten or twenty thouſand men before Selinus, becauſe the ſiege of that place was a very ſhort one, it will follow, that when Hannibal firſt inveſted Selinus, his army, in all probability, conſiſted of about an hundred and ten or an hundred and twenty thouſand men, nearly as Timæus related. It is certain Diodorus very well agrees with this hiſtorian; for that author tells us, Hannibal's army, upon his laying ſiege to Himera, amounted to an hundred and twenty thouſand men, as above-mentioned. However therefore in words he may have extolled Ephorus, and depreciated Timæus, yet, in fact and reality, he, in this place, as well as ſeveral others that might be recited, preferred the latter to the former. Both Diodorus and Cicero (36) celebrated his learning and eloquence, the laſt of which was of the Aſiatic kind. Plutarch (37) entertained different ſentiments of his ſtyle; and Longinus cenſures him for his affectation and puerility therein, as well as the eager deſire he ſhews to reprehend the vices of others, while he is blind to his own. However, Mr. Bayle has plainly proved, that the inſtances (38) produced by Longinus, in ſupport of his criticiſm, do not come up to the point, and that he deſerved cenſure in this particular, rather than Timæus. Longinus owned, that ſometimes he came up to the lofty and ſublime ſtyle, had a great ſhare of knowledge, and expreſſed himſelf very judiciouſly; but ſtill he ſeems to us to have been ſo much prejudiced againſt our hiſtorian, on he took Emporium, a town ſeated on the river Mazara (G), by ſtorm; and having cloſely begirt Selinus with his army; which he divided into two parts, he formed the ſiege of that city. In order to puſh this on with the greater vigour, he erected ſix high towers, and brought as many battering-rams to the town. His ſlingers and darters likewiſe greatly annoyed on account of the numerous inſtances of ill-nature viſible in the latter part of his work, that he had rather too ſtrong a diſpoſition to diſcover blemiſhes in him; which made him copy after Cæcilius in finding imaginary faults, and thereby fall into the very ſame crime he condemned Timæus for. He lived to a very old age (39), ſome ſay, ninety-ſix years. According to Polybius (40), he lived a ſedentary life, which, in the opinion of that hiſtorian, muſt have diſqualified him for writing hiſtory. Plutarch informs us (41), that he fell into the follies of Xenarchus in ſeveral parts of his works, in drawing good or bad omens from the moſt minute, and even ridiculous, circumſtances. Cicero (42) puts him on a level with Herodotus, Thucydides, Philiſtus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Calliſthenes. That he was ſuperior, in point of authority, to Ephorus, when he treated of the affairs of Sicily, we think pretty evident from what we have juſt advanced, which we remember not to have ſeen taken notice of by any other author.

(G) Rhodomanus, in his Latin verſion of Diodorus, calls this river Mazarus; but we chuſe rather to follow Ptolemy, Pliny, and Diodorus himſelf, who give it a feminine termination. Some believe the word emporium here not to be a proper, but a common, name; and we are inclined to come into this opinion. The name of this town, we believe, was Mazara; for Stephanus tells us, Mazara was a caſtle or fortreſs of the Selinuntines. Nothing was more common than to give rivers, and the fortreſſes ſeated on them, the ſame names, and that even in Sicily itſelf. To wave all other inſtances at preſent, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that Gela, a city of great note in this iſland, had a river of the ſame name running cloſe by its walls. On or near this ſpot there is a fine city, called Mazara, at this day, but no monuments of antiquity, according to Fazellus, are found near it. However, as it retains the old name of the river, and of Stephanus's Selinuntine caſtle, it ſeems to point out the true name of the town Hannibal took by ſtorm on his march to Selinus.

noyed the beſieged, by forcing them from many fortified poſts. The Selinuntines, little expecting ſuch a viſit from the Carthaginians, as having been the only people of Sicily who ſided with them againſt Gelon, and having long been diſuſed to ſieges, were ſtruck with great terror at the approach of ſo formidable an army, and the reſolution with which they carried on their attacks. However, as they had good reaſon to expect, that the Syracuſans and their other confederates would ſend them ſpeedy ſuccours, they defended themſelves with great bravery. They all joined together as one man in their efforts to repel ſo barbarous and ungrateful an enemy; even the men worn out with age, women and children, regardleſs of danger, appeared on the ramparts, ready to ſacrifice their lives in the defence of their country [x].

And takes it.

In order to inſpire his troops with courage, Hannibal promiſed them the plunder of the place, by which they were greatly animated. The walls being inceſſantly battered day and night by the rams and other warlike engines, a breach was ſoon made, and the firſt who entered it were the Campanians, out of an ambition of diſtinguiſhing themſelves above the reſt; but they were repulſed with great loſs, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal ſent to ſupport them. The fight laſted from noon to night, when Hannibal ſounded the retreat. In the mean time the Selinuntines ſent expreſſes to Agrigentum, Gela, and Sycacuſe, acquainting them, that, without ſpeedy aſſiſtance, it would be impoſſible for the garriſon of Selinus to defend itſelf againſt ſo numerous an army, provided with ſuch a train of battering engines. The Agrigentines and Geleans held themſelves in readineſs to march; but, however, thought it proper to wait for the Syracuſan auxiliaries, that they might more ſucceſsfully fall upon the enemy with their united forces. The Syracuſans alſo, having certain advice, that Selinus was beſieged, immediately ſtruck up a peace with the Chalcideans, with whom they were then at war, and drew together what forces they could; but as they did not think them ſufficient to relieve effectually the beſieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for ſome days, till they had got together a ſtronger force. In the mean time, the Carthaginians preſſed ed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour. Hannibal, as ſoon as it was light, renewing the aſſault, poſſeſſed himſelf of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another, which his rams had opened near it; and, after removing the rubbiſh, with the flower of his troops charged the Selinuntines with ſuch fury, that he obliged them to give ground; but could not put them in diſorder, nor enter the city, they fighting like men in deſpair. Many fell on both ſides; but the Carthaginians were conſtantly ſupplied with freſh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to reinforce them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. Thus the aſſault was daily renewed for the ſpace of nine days with great courage and reſolution, and with incredible ſlaughter on both ſides. At length the beſieged being quite tired out, the Iberians, after a ſharp diſpute, lodged themſelves on the ramparts, and from thence advanced into the body of the town; upon which the women from the tops of the houſes filled all places with cries and lamentations. The Selinuntines, now giving up every thing for loſt, barricaded all the ſtreets and paſſages, being determined to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of blood; which occaſioned a long and bloody conteſt. The women alſo, notwithſtanding their firſt panic, ſorely galled the Carthaginians with ſhowers of tiles and ſtones thrown by them from the tops of the houſes, which kept the fate of this city for ſome time in ſuſpenſe; but the Carthaginians returning to the charge with inexpreſſible ardor, and continually pouring freſh men into the town, the poor Selinuntines were at length forced to give way, and having abandoned the narrow ſtreets, were purſued by the conquerors into the market-place, where making a ſtand, they were all to a man cut in pieces.

An inſtance of the Carthaginian barbarity.

SELINUS being thus taken by ſtorm, and the plunder of it given up to the ſoldiers, it is impoſſible to expreſs the miſery to which the poor inhabitants were reduced, and the cruelties exerciſed upon them by the Carthaginians, who, it muſt be owned, on ſuch melancholy occaſions as theſe, generally ſhewed themſelves to be moſt ſavage barbarians. They raged in all parts of the town without reſtraint, rifled the houſes and then ſet fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children they found in them, or dragging them into the ſtreets, put them all, without diſtinction, to the ſword.

Nei-

Neither did their inhumanity reſt here; they carried it ſo far as to mangle in a barbarous manner even the dead bodies, ſome of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others, out of oſtentation, bearing the heads of the ſlain on the points of their ſwords and ſpears. The women indeed, who fled with their children to the temples, eſcaped the common deſtruction; but this was owing to the avarice, not compaſſion, of the victors; for believing that theſe poor wretches would, if excluded all hopes of mercy, ſet fire to the temples, and by that means conſume all the treaſure and valuable effects they expected to find in thoſe places, they did not judge it proper to drive them to a ſtate of deſperation. The ravages in the city continued moſt part of the night, inſomuch, that every place was full of blood, horror, and confuſion. The ſurviving matrons had the mortification to ſee their daughters forced to be ſubſervient to the brutal luſt of the barbarians, which, with a ſenſe of the diſmal ſervitude prepared for them in Africa, made them wiſh they had not ſurvived their friends and relations. In fine, after ſixteen thouſand miſerable wretches had been cruelly maſſacred, and two thouſand ſix hundred eſcaped to Agrigentum, the city was razed, two hundred and fifty years after its foundation. The women and children, about five thouſand in number, who outlived this fatal day, were carried away captives [y].

A body of Selinuntines eſcapes to Agrigentum.

THE body of Selinuntines that retired to Agrigentum, made their eſcape by the favour of the night, having found an opportunity of abandoning the city, before the enemy had forced the narrow paſſes. Upon their arrival at Agrigentum, they were received with great humanity and tenderneſs; corn was diſtributed to them out of the public ſtores; and every private perſon, out of his own generous diſpoſition, liberally ſupplied them with all kinds of neceſſaries for their ſubſiſtence.

The Carthaginians plunder the temples at Selinus.

A few days after the city was taken, three thouſand Syracuſans arrived at Agrigentum, on their march to Selinus; but underſtanding that the city was taken, they ſent embaſſadors to Hannibal, to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg of him, that he would at leaſt ſpare the temples. Hannibal returned anſwer, that ſince the Selin-untines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deſerved to be treated like ſlaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedneſs, had forſaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no ſacrilege to ſtrip them of their ornaments. This anſwer is a clear demonſtration of the Punic genius at that time, and exactly correſponds with what Diodorus has related of the Carthaginians in this particular: "Theſe barbarians" ſays that author, "exceed "all men in impiety; for whereas other nations ſpare thoſe "who fly into temples, out of a principle of religion, not "daring to be guilty of any act of violence there, leſt they "ſhould offend the deity; the Carthaginians, on the con-"trary, moderate their cruelty to theſe perſons, that they "may have a better opportunity of pillaging the temples "themſelves." The Syracuſans however, not acquieſcing in this anſwer, ſent an other embaſſy, and at the head of it one Empediones, a Selinuntine, who had always been in the intereſt of the Carthaginians, and even adviſed his countrymen to open their gates to Hannibal at his firſt appearing before the town. The Carthaginian general received him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, reſtored to him his eſtate, pardoned all the priſoners related to him, and even permitted the Selinuntines, who had fled to Agrigentum, to rebuild and repeople their city, and manure their lands, upon paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians [z].

Hannibal attacks Himera.

AFTER the reduction of Selinus, Hannibal marched with his army to attack Himera, which above all things he deſired, in order to revenge the death of his grandfather Hamilcar, who had been ſlain there by Gelon, with above an hundred and fifty thouſand Carthaginians, and almoſt as many taken priſoners. Beſides, as he had already puniſhed the Selinuntines for the inſults they had offered his father Giſco in his baniſhment, he now reſolved to take vengeance of the Himereans, for being the occaſion of that baniſhment. On his march he was joined by twenty thouſand Siculi and Sicani, whom he ſent, with the main body of the army, to lay ſiege to the city, while he, with a body of forty thouſand men, encamped on a riſing ground at a ſmall diſtance from it. His troops being fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, he puſhed on the ſiege with the utmoſt vigor, battering the wall with his engines in ſeveral places at once; but finding this not fully to

to anſwer his intention, he undermined it, and by ſupporting it with large pieces of timber, which were afterwards ſet on fire, laid great part of it flat on the ground. Upon this a warm diſpute enſued, the Carthaginians making all poſſible efforts to enter the town; and the Himereans, having the fate of the Selinuntines always before their eyes, their parents, children, country, and every thing dear to them, to defend, and being moreover reinforced by four thouſand Syracuſan auxiliaries, with ſome troops from their other allies under the command of Diocles, diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion in a moſt extraordinary manner; and repulſing the enemy with great bravery, immediately repaired the wall. In fine, the Carthaginians, having been conſtantly repulſed in their attacks for ſeveral days ſucceſſively, were obliged for the preſent to deſiſt from all further attempts to ſtorm the town; which mortified them extremely, eſpecially as they had not hitherto been able to gain an inch of ground [a].

The Himereans make a vigorous ſally upon the Carthaginians.

THE Himereans, animated by this advantage, reſolved not to be any longer cooped up in the city, as the Selinuntines had been, but to endeavour, by one ſtrenuous effort, entirely to diſlodge the enemy. Having therefore poſted detachments of their garriſon at proper diſtances on the wall, to repel any aſſault that might be given, they made a ſally on the beſiegers with their whole remaining force, conſiſting of ten thouſand men. The Carthaginians, little dreaming that the beſieged were capable of ſuch an attempt, at firſt imagined, that the confederates of the Himereans had drawn together all their forces, to oblige them to raiſe the ſiege; which throwing them into a very great panic, the Himereans for ſome time eaſily bore down all that oppoſed them; and tho' the Carthaginians afterwards not only rallied, but collected their whole force before the town, to make head againſt them, yet their great number, an impediment to them at the preſent juncture, throwing them into diſorder, they incommoded one another more than the enemy. The beſieged, taking advantage of this, and being moreover inſpired with freſh courage at the ſight of their parents, children, and friends, who, for this purpoſe, expoſed themſelves on the ramparts, charged them with ſuch intrepidity, that they put their whole army to flight, purſuing them to the very hill where Hannibal was encamped. That general, ſeeing his army in confuſion, haſtened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for ſome hours, victory inclining to neither ſide. At length the Himereans being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thouſand of them kept their poſts, and covered the retreat of their companions, ſuſtaining the ſhock of the whole Carthaginian army, till they all died upon the ſpot[b].

But are repulſed.

The Carthaginians ſuſtain a great loſs in this action.

THE Carthaginian army, though victorious, was yet rudely handled, the Himerean troops being much more active, and better diſciplined (H), and, by reaſon of the cruel treatment they expected from the enemies, if conquered, inſpired with a much greater degree of reſolution. Ephorus ſays, the Carthaginians loſt twenty thouſand men in the firſt action, before they were purſued to Hannibal's camp; though Timæus Siculus reduces this number to ſix thouſand. As there was a very ſharp engagement afterwards betwixt the Himereans and Hannibal, many more muſt undoubtedly have periſhed, though the preciſe number of them is not given us by any hiſtorian. According to Diodorus Siculus, the Carthaginian army, that laid ſiege to the town, excluſive of Hannibal's camp, conſiſted of eighty thouſand effective men[c].

AFTER this action, five-and-twenty galleys, which had been ſent by the Siculi ſome time before to the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, and were now returning home, appeared

[b] Diod. Sic. ubi ſupra. [c] Idem ibid.

(H) Though the native Carthaginians were well armed and good troops, yet the Africans and Numidians were, for the moſt part, a diſorderly rabble, very little acquainted with military diſcipline. Theſe laſt troops always made up a conſiderable part of the Carthaginian armies, and frequently permitted themſelves to be ſurpriſed by the enemy; which ſometimes produced diſmal effects. Plutarch, in his life of Timoleon, ſhews us how they were poſted, and the order they obſerved, when the Carthaginian forces were in full motion to attack the enemy, and even when they engaged them. It is probable, a great part of the army beſieging Himera, conſiſted of theſe troops, whilſt that under the command of Hannibal, which covered the ſiege, was compoſed of the national forces (20).

(20) Plut. in Timol. Polyb. l. xiv. Liv. l. xxx. c. 3. & l. xxv. c. 13. & l. xxviii. c. 1. Hendr. l. ii. ſect. 2. memb. 1. c. 7.

ed off of Himera; upon which a report was ſpread all over the city, and the enemy's camp, that the Syracuſans, with all their forces and allies, were coming to the relief of the city. This was ſo far from diſcouraging the Carthaginians, that it put Hannibal upon a new enterprize; for imagining that the Syracuſans had ſent all their ſtrength to ſupport their confederates, he doubted not but the city muſt be left in a manner defenceleſs; and therefore, immediately embarquing with the flower of his troops in the galleys which lay at Motya, prepared to ſail for Syracuſe, in order to ſurpriſe that city. In the mean time, Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracuſan troops in Himera, a man of great foreſight and penetration, adviſed the captains of the Sicilian veſſels to ſail with all poſſible expedition to Syracuſe, leſt Hannibal ſhould make an attempt upon it; and this he was the more ſtrongly induced to, ſince, if in another action the beſiegers ſhould cut off the beſt of his men, he plainly perceived, that their own city muſt of courſe fall a prey to the Carthaginians. He therefore thought it adviſeable to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuſe on board the galleys, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought ſufficient to hold out, till he, after putting his own city in a ſtate of defence, ſhould return. This the beſieged took very ill; but not being able to prevail upon Diocles to alter his meaſures, the greateſt part of their wives, children, and other effects, they took care to ſend on board the galleys by night, in order to have them tranſported to Meſſana[d].

Diocles embarques part of his troops for the defence of Syracuſe.

As Diocles and his men embarqued in a great hurry, they were obliged to leave the bodies of their companions ſlain in the ſiege uninterred. However, they carried off with them many of the Himereans, with their wives and children, who could not find room in the other veſſels. Upon his departure, the Carthaginians redoubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermiſſion. On the other hand, the beſieged, believing the ſhips would return ſpeedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulſing the enemy. Thus they held out againſt the repeated aſſaults and utmoſt efforts of above an hundred thouſand men, till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, ſummoning all their courage and reſolution, gave a general aſſault, and with their numbers bearing down all before them, drove the garriſon from the ramparts, and, in spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. The Iberians signalized themselves greatly on this occasion, being the first that forced the besieged from the walls, and entered with them pell-mell into the town. There is no sort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians and Iberians did not practise on their carrying the place; all they met, without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered, till the general himself put a stop to the slaughter. The houses were plundered, the temples pillaged and burnt, after they had taken out of them those wretches who had fled thither for refuge; and the city itself levelled with the ground. Hannibal caused the women and children, that survived the first fury of the soldiers, to be preserved; neither durst any one offer the least injury to them: but the men, to the number of three thousand, he commanded to be carried to an eminence near the city, where his grandfather Hamilcar had been defeated and killed by Gelon's cavalry, and there first exposed them to the insults of his barbarians, and then caused them to be cruelly massacred.

THUS ended this campaign, one of the most prosperous the Carthaginians had ever met with in Sicily; after which Hannibal, dismissing the Siculi and confederates, and disbanding the Campanians, embarqued with the rest of his forces, and set sail for Africa. The Siculi, upon their dismission, went home, as did likewise the Campanians; but the latter complained bitterly of the Carthaginians, because they looked upon themselves as slighted by that nation, tho' they had remarkably distinguished themselves in their service at the siege of Selinus, and indeed through the whole course of the campaign. Himera had stood, at the time it was razed by Hannibal, two hundred and forty years [e].

Hannibal at his departure from Sicily, leaves some troops to protect his confederates there.

HANNIBAL, upon his quitting Sicily, left a small body of troops with his confederates, that they might not be too much exposed to the resentment or ambition of their neighbours. After a short passage, he arrived safe at Carthage, loaden with the plunder he had carried off from Selinus and Himera. The whole city went out to meet him on his arrival, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a general that had performed greater things, in so short a time, than any ever before him [f].

ANIMATED by the late success in Sicily, the Carthaginians resolved now in earnest to pursue the design which they

they had ever entertained of reducing the whole iſland. With this view they began to make new preparations, and raiſe another army, committing the whole management of the war to the fame Hannibal. But as by reaſon of his great age he endeavoured to get himſelf excuſed from taking upon him the command in this new expedition, they joined in commiſſion with him Imilcar the ſon of Hanno, one of the ſame family. Theſe two generals being plentifully ſupplied with money, and impowered to raiſe what forces they thought neceſſary for ſo great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but ſent officers with large ſums into Spain, Libya, Sardinia (I), and the Balearic iſlands, to hire numerous bodies of mercenaries. They received likewiſe large ſuccours from the princes and ſtates with whom they were in alliance, viz. from the Mauritanians, Numidians, and even the nations bordering on Cyrenaica. Beſides all which, they took a body of Campanians out of Italy into their pay, which by experience they had found to be good troops, and ſuch as they could entirely depend upon, eſpecially when intermixed with thoſe of other nations. When all their forces were muſtered at Carthage, the army was found to conſiſt of three hundred thouſand effective men, as Ephorus informs us; but Timæus Siculus, with more probability, ſays, that

The Carthaginians make preparations for another campaign in Sicily.

(I) Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian armies were generally made up of a great variety of barbarous nations, of different habits, different laws, different religions, and different languages, inſomuch, that they did not underſtand one another. As the Carthaginians applied themſelves wholly to naval affairs, they employed moſt of their own hands on board their ſhips; and the moſt opulent citizens did not care to expoſe their perſons in the wars, but contented themſelves with enabling the ſtate to hire foreigners in their room. They might likewiſe have ſome political views in this conduct; for by it they might imagine their ſtate to be rendered more ſecure, than if their armies conſiſted wholly of Carthaginian citizens, ſince theſe could not be ſo entirely truſted, on account of the different powerful factions prevailing at Carthage; beſides, ſuch an army as we have mentioned could not eaſily mutiny, or revolt, ſince 'tis impoſſible ſo many different nations ſhould act in concert, or form any dangerous ſcheme againſt their principals. However, Polybius condemns this practice, and not without reaſon, ſince it not a little contributed to the decline of the Carthaginian ſtate, and once brought it to the very brink of deſtruction (2).

that they did not much exceed an hundred and twenty thousand: a force, however, sufficient, as it should seem, to ever-run Sicily in one campaign.

They people a new city in that island called by the Greeks, from its situation, Therma.

THE Carthaginians, in the interval betwixt the first beginning of their preparations and their embarquing for the Sicilian expedition, drew together, out of Carthage and other cities in Africa, all persons who were willing to transplant themselves, and with them peopled a new city they had built near the hot-baths in Sicily, which was from thence called by the Greeks Therma.

BEFORE the grand fleet, which was composed of a thousand transports, besides a numerous squadron of galleys, with the forces on board, set sail for Sicily, Hannibal sent forty galleys to reconnoitre the coasts, and get intelligence of the enemy. These fell in with a Syracusan squadron of equal force off of Eryx, and immediately engaged them. The dispute was long and obstinate, but at last victory inclined to the Syracusans. Of the Carthaginian galleys, fifteen were sunk, and the rest, by the favour of the night, made their escape. When the news of this unexpected defeat reached Carthage, Hannibal sailed immediately with fifty galleys, designing both to prevent any ill consequences from thence to the Carthaginians, and to secure the passage and landing of the army [g].

The Syracusans defeat the Carthaginians by sea.

Hannibal lands his troops in Sicily, and advances to Agrigentum.

UPON Hannibal's arrival, the whole island was alarmed, and every city of consequence, having been before apprised of the great preparations of the Carthaginians, expected to be attacked first. Soon after, the whole fleet arriving safe in Sicily, the troops landed on the coast of Agrigentum, and marched strait to that city.

THE Syracusans, and their confederates, had sent embassadors to Carthage to complain of the late hostilities practised upon them by Hannibal, and persuade the senate to forbear sending any more troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful answer to this embassy, the Syracusans had put themselves in a posture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. They had sent to the Greeks of Italy and the Lacedæmonians to solicit succours, and dispatched expresses to all the Sicilian cities in their interest, desiring them to unite their forces in defence of the common cause. But of all the people of Sicily, none

none were under ſuch apprehenſions as the Agrigentines; they ſeemed fully ſatisfied, that this great ſtorm would firſt diſcharge itſelf upon them, and had therefore carefully provided all things neceſſary for the ſuſtaining of a long ſiege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, an officer of great courage and experience. The Carthaginians, upon their inveſting Agrigentum, divided their army into two bodies, one of which, conſiſting of forty thouſand Africans and Iberians, encamped on certain eminences at ſome diſtance from the town; the other carried on the ſiege, and fortified their camp with a wall and an intrenchment, that they might be the better enabled to repulſe the ſallies of the beſieged. When they firſt ſat down before the town, they invited the Agrigentines either to join them or ſtand neuter, declaring they would be well ſatisfied with either point of conduct, and forbear all hoſtilities, if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendſhip. Both propoſals being rejected, they attacked the town in form, expecting to meet with a vigorous reſiſtance. And this indeed was not without reaſon; for the Agrigentines had obliged all who were capable of bearing arms, to aſſiſt in the defence of the place, and had moreover received a reinforcement of five hundred men from Gela, under the conduct of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, who was in high eſteem at that time, on account of his country, according to Timæus Siculus. Eight hundred Campanians alſo, who had formerly ſerved under Imilcar, were taken into the ſervice of the Agrigentines, and defended the hill Athenæum, which commanded the city, and was therefore a poſt of the utmoſt conſequence. But notwithſtanding theſe precautions, Imilcar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury. The machines chiefly made uſe of on this occaſion were of ſurpriſing force; and two towers (K) were brought againſt the city of a monſtrous

Which city he beſieges, but meets with a warm reception.

(K) Soon after the Carthaginians had inveſted a town, they raiſed a mount of equal height with the walls, if not ſuperior to them; and thereon erected moveable towers, which overtopped the higheſt battlements and towers of ſtone, either upon the walls or within the town. Theſe moved upon wheels, and with them the beſiegers gradually made their approaches towards the body of the place. They were very large, and capable of containing con-

ſtrous ſize. The firſt day out of theſe they made an aſſault; and after having cut off many of the beſieged, ſounded a retreat. However, the next night the Agrigentines made a ſally, burnt the engines, deſtroyed the towers raiſed againſt them, and, after having made a great ſlaughter, retired in good order into the town. Hereupon Hannibal, intending to ſtorm the place in different parts at once, commanded all the tombs and ſtately monuments, ſtanding round the city to be demoliſhed, and mounts to be raiſed with the rubbiſh as high as the walls. But whilſt they were executing the general's orders, a religious panic ſeized the army, occaſioned by Theron's monument being deſtroyed by a thunderbolt, which, by the advice of the ſoothſayers preſent, put a ſtop to the deſign. Soon after, the plague broke out in the army, and in a ſhort time carried off a great number of the ſoldiers, and the general Hannibal himſelf. The Carthaginian ſoothſayers above mentioned interpreted this diſaſter as a puniſhment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead. Nay, ſome of the ſoldiers upon guard affirmed, that they ſaw in the night-time the ghoſts of the deceaſed. Wherefore Imilcar, in whom the whole power was now veſted, ordered ſupplications to be made, according to the practice of Carthage, and the demolition of the tombs to be entirely diſcontinued. A boy was alſo ſacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a cuſtom which had from remote antiquity prevailed amongſt the Carthaginians: by his orders Neptune likewiſe was appeaſed, and ſeveral prieſts thrown into the ſea, as the moſt pleaſing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by theſe cruelties atoned for the ſacrileges of Hannibal, and pacified the gods, renewed the aſſaults with more vigour than ever, filled the river with rubbiſh cloſe to the walls, by which means he brought up his engines nearer the place, and played with them conſiderable numbers of men, and ſome of the ſmaller engines of battery, whereby the beſieged were greatly annoyed. From theſe towers they made their aſſaults, and frequently ſtormed towns, or at leaſt opened breaches in the walls, in order to facilitate that operation. Juſtus Lipſius gives us a minute and particular account of them (3).

In the mean time, the Syracuſans taking into conſideration the deplorable condition of Agrigentum, and fearing it would undergo the ſame fate that Himera and Selinus had done, began to think in earneſt of marching to its relief. Having therefore drawn together the forces of their confederates from Italy and Meſſana, and being joined by the Camarineans, Geleans, and others out of the heart of the country, upon a review of their troops, they found them to amount to above thirty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe. Theſe judging ſufficient for their purpoſe, they gave orders to Daphneus, their general, to advance at the head of them immediately into the territory of the Agrigentines, a fleet of thirty galleys, which ſailed cloſe by the ſhore, at the ſame time keeping pace with him. Imilcar, upon intelligence of their approach, detached all the Iberians and Campanians, with forty thouſand Carthaginians, enjoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Purſuant to his orders, the Syracuſans were attacked a few hours after they had paſſed the river, as they were advancing in good order towards Agrigentum. The diſpute was ſharp, and the victory a long time doubtful, the enemy being far ſuperior in number to the Syracuſans. But at length the latter carried the day, and purſued the Carthaginians to the very walls of Agrigentum. Daphneus fearing, leſt Imilcar ſhould take advantage of the confuſion his troops were thrown into by their eagerneſs in the purſuit, and thereby wreſt the victory out of his hands, as had formerly happened to the Himerians on the like occaſion, rallied them, and marched after the fugitives in good order to the ſpot they were before encamped upon, which he took immediate poſſeſſion of. The Carthaginians loſt ſix thouſand men in this action [i] (L).

[h] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. [i] Idem ibid.

(L) We are told by Polyænus, that Daphneus defeated the Carthaginians by the following ſtratagem: The armies being engaged, the general heard a great noiſe in the left wing, where the Italian forces were poſted; and haſtening thither, he found them almoſt defeated: upon which immediately repairing to the right wing, compoſed of Syracuſans, he told them, that the Italians had routed

THE Carthaginians eſcaped a total defeat, either through the fear or corruption, as it ſhould ſeem, of the Agrigentine commanders. For the beſieged, ſeeing them fly to that part of their camp that lay next to the town in the utmoſt confuſion, immediately concluded, that they were routed; and therefore preſſed their officers to ſally out upon them without loſs of time, that they might complete their ruin. They were, however, deaf to theſe ſolicitations, and would not permit a man to ſtir out of the town. To what motive ſuch an unaccountable procedure was to be attributed, is hard to ſay; however, the fugitives were hereby ſaved, and arrived ſafe in their other camp. This fatal ſtep could never afterwards be retrieved, but was followed by the loſs of the city [k].

The Agrigentine commanders gnilty of a a falſe ſtep, which occaſions theloſs of the place.

UPON Daphneus's arrival, a great part of the garriſon, with Dexippus at the head of them, waited upon him, and a council of war was immediately held. Every one here ſhewed himſelf highly diſſatisfied, that ſo fair an opportunity had been loſt of taking a full revenge of the enemy, and deſtroying ſo many myriads of them. Hereupon great diſputes aroſe, inſomuch, that four of the Agrigentine commanders, at the inſtigation of one Menes, a Camarinean, were ſtoned by the enraged multitude, and a fifth, called Argeus, only by reaſon of his youth, eſcaped. Dexippus himſelf was highly reflected upon, and loſt much of the reputation he had before acquired, by concurring with the reſt. After the council broke up, Daphneus formed a deſign to attack Imilcar's camp; but finding it ſtrongly fortified, he altered his reſolution. However, he guarded all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, intending by that means either to oblige the enemy to periſh with famine, or come out of their lines and venture an engagement. Accordingly, all the paſſages being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was ſoon brought to ſuch ſtreights, that the Cam-routed the enemy; and therefore, to render the victory complete, entreated them to exert themſelves on the preſent occaſion. Animated by this good news, they immediately cryed out, Let us fall upon the enemy with the utmoſt fury. Upon which, charging them with incredible bravery, they ſoon put them to flight (4).

Campanians and other mercenaries began to mutiny; and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy, if they had not their uſual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their preſent want for a few days, aſſuring them they ſhould be very ſoon plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſions, and in the mean time pawned to them the drinking veſſels of the Carthaginian ſoldiers. He had been informed, that the Syracuſans were then loading many ſhips with corn, to be ſent to Agrigentum, and did not in the leaſt doubt but he ſhould intercept the convoy, the Syracuſans not ſuſpecting, that he would attempt any thing by ſea. Accordingly, he diſpatched meſſengers to Panormus and Motya, where his fleet lay, enjoining the commanders to man the galleys with all poſſible expedition, and lie in wait, at an appointed place, for the ſhips that were to bring the proviſions. His orders were put in execution; and forty galleys being ſpeedily equipped, the Syracuſan fleet, conſiſting of threeſcore tranſports, laden with corn and all ſorts of proviſions, was intercepted. Of their convoy, eight ſhips were ſunk, and the reſt driven on ſhore. This changed the face of affairs on both ſides; for as ſuch an unexpected relief gave the Carthaginians freſh courage, ſo it greatly diſheartened the Agrigentines, who, having already held out for the ſpace of eight months, were in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved ſo quickly as their preſent neceſſity required. Beſides, at the beginning of the ſiege, when bad ſucceſs attended the Carthaginians, they had ſquandered away their corn and other proviſions in a very profuſe manner, by which they were now reduced to the greater diſtreſs. The Campanians in the ſervice of the Agrigentines, obſerving the deſperate condition the city was in, upon receiving fifteen talents from Imilcar, went all over in a body to the Carthaginians. Dexippus the Lacedæmonian alſo, according to Diodorus, was ſaid to have been bribed with the ſame ſum; for he on a ſudden adviſed the Italian commanders to withdraw their troops out of the town, inſinuating, that they were likely to be ſtarved there, without the leaſt proſpect of rendering any ſervice to thoſe who had hired them: whereas, by retiring in time, they might carry on the war to greater advantage in some other part: with which advice complying, they left the Agrigentines to shift for themselves [1] (M).

THE mercenaries thus falling off, and the inhabitants despondingfor want of necessaries,a council of war was summoned, when it was judged absolutely impossible to hold out any longer, there not being provisions enough in the public stores to support the soldiery and people two days. It was therefore resolved, that the city should be abandoned, and the inhabitants conveyed to some place of safety; and the following night was fixed upon for their departure. The people, being apprised of this resolution, were thereby thrown into the utmost consternation. Lamentable outcries were heard in every house; and the grief and dread they were all seized with in seeing themselves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods and estates, or else expose themselves to the fury of a merciless enemy, were inexpressible. However, though their riches were immense, yet they esteemed life still more valuable; and therefore, as they expected no mercy from such cruel barbarians, the greatest part of them gave way to unavoidable necessity. We shall not here expatiate upon the scene of horror now before us, Diodorus Siculus having done this in a most affecting manner, but only observe, that the place appointed for these miserable wretches to retire to was Gela, where, when they arrived, they were received with great kindness and humanity;

Upon which the Agrigentines resolve to leave their city to the enemy.

[1] Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

(M) Polyænus tells us, that Imilcar (whom he calls Himilco) gave private orders to his men to fly before the besieged whenever they made a sally, in order to draw them into an ambuscade. There happened to be a wood just before the town, in which he posted a detachment of his troops, with orders to set this on fire as soon as the enemy were got a considerable distance from the town. This stratagem had the desired effect; for the Agrigentines pursued the Carthaginians with great ardor for some time; but at last looking back towards the city, they perceived the wood all in a blaze; which they imagined was a fire issuing out of the city itself. Upon this they retired with great precipitation towards the town; but falling into the ambuscade, and being hotly pursued by the party that drew them out, they were all either killed or taken prisoners (3).

humanity, and plentifully supplied with all necessaries at the expence of the public. What happened to them afterwards may be seen in a former part of this history [m].

THE garrison was no sooner withdrawn, and the Syracusan army retired, but Imilcar, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without some fear and jealousy, and put all those he found in it to the sword, not sparing even such as had fled to the temples. Among these was Gellias (M), a citizen famous for his wealth and integrity, who seeing that the Carthaginians, without respecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered those who had taken sanctuary in them, set fire to the temple of Minerva, and con-

Imilcar enters the city, where he commits great cruelties.

[m] Idem ibid. Univers. hist. vol. vii. p. 222. & seq.

(M) The munificence of Gellias may be learned not only from Diodorus Siculus, but Valerius Maximus and Athenæus (1). He entertained the people with spectacles and feasts, and, during a famine, prevented the citizens of Agrigentum from perishing with hunger. He gave portions to poor maidens, and rescued the unfortunate from want and despair. He had built houses in the city and country, purposely for the accommodation of strangers, whom he usually dismissed with handsome presents. In short, Gillias's riches, immense as they were, were surpassed by his greatness of soul, his treasures being, as it were, to use Valerius Maximus's phrase, the patrimony of the public. No wonder then that the inhabitants of Agrigentum, and all the neighbouring provinces, should so ardently pray for his health and prosperity. No greater loss could have happened to that part of Sicily than the fatal end of so excellent a person, but the death and destruction of all those poor wretches, who should have regretted him. Athenæus, in all the present MSS. calls him Tellias; but Nicolaus Sturio has discovered this to be a fault of the transcribers, though it must have been a very antient one, since Eustathius oftener than once calls him likewise Tellias. What Athenæus has concerning him is taken almost word for word out of the eleventh book of Timæus's history, and possibly Diodorus's may have been deduced from the same source. The great resemblance betwixt the capital tau (T) and gamma (Γ) might possibly occasion the mistake above-mentioned; for that it is a mistake, the printed copies and MSS. of Diodorus Siculus and Valerius Maximus sufficiently evince.

conſumed in the flames both himſelf and the immenſe riches of that ſtately edifice. Gellias, according to Diodorus, was induced to this action in order to prevent three evils: firſt, the impiety of the enemy to the gods; ſecondly, the ſacrilegious carrying off of the vaſt treaſure lodged there; and, thirdly, the abuſe of his own body [n].

And pillages every part of it.

IMILCAR having pillaged every part of the city, both ſacred and profane, found himſelf maſter of an immenſe treaſure. Nothing leſs could be expected from the ſpoils of a city, which was one of the moſt opulent in Sicily, containing two hundred thouſand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even beſieged. An infinite number of pictures, vaſes, and ſtatues, done by the greateſt maſters of thoſe times, fell into the enemies hands, the Agrigentines having an exquiſite taſte for the polite arts. To give our readers ſome idea of Agrigentum, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that the very ſepulchral monuments ſhewed the luxury and magnificence of this city, they being adorned with ſtatues of birds and horſes, famous for their elegance. Empedocles, the philoſopher, born in Agrigentum, has a memorable ſaying concerning his fellow-citizens; "That the "Agrigentines ſquandered away their money ſo exceſſively "every day, as if they expected it could never be exhauſted; "and built with ſuch ſolidity and magnificence, as if they "thought they ſhould live for ever". The moſt valuable part of the plunder Imilcar ſent to Carthage; every thing elſe he cauſed to be ſold under the ſpear. Among other curioſities, the famous bull of Phalaris was ſent to Carthage [o].

Empedocles's ſaying of the Agrigentines.

THE people of Syracuſe, being prodigiouſly alarmed at the reduction of Agrigentum, had a decree paſſed for the raiſing a numerous body of troops to oppoſe the progreſs of the Carthaginians, who with a mighty army hovered over the frontiers. Imilcar, having gained the city, after eight months ſiege, a little before the winter ſolſtice, did not preſently raze it, but there took up his winter-quarters, to give his army the neceſſary refreſhment. The Sicilians in general, as well as the inhabitants of Syracuſe were ſtruck with terror at the Carthaginian conqueſts, and many of them fled to Syracuſe for protection, whilſt others tranſported themſelves, with all their effects, to the continent of Italy. Thoſe

Thoſe who took ſanctuary in Syracuſe, were treated with extraordinary kindneſs, and the chief men among them made free of the city. Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints againſt the Syracuſan commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the enemies hands. This raiſed ſuch diſturbances in Syracuſe as at laſt gave Dionyſius an opportunity of ſeizing upon the ſovereign power. Imilcar, after laying it entirely in ruins, towards the beginning of the ſpring, left Agrigentum [P].

THE Geleans, receiving intelligence that the Carthaginians intended to open the campaign with the ſiege of their city, and in the mean time falling out among themſelves, implored the protection of Syracuſe; upon which Dionyſius immediately marched to their aſſiſtance with two thouſand foot and four hundred horſe. The Geleans were ſo well ſatisfied with his conduct, that they treated him with the higheſt marks of diſtinction, and even ſent embaſſadors to Syracuſe to return their thanks for the important ſervices that city had done them in ſending him thither. Soon after, he was appointed generaliſſimo of the Syracuſan forces, and thoſe of their allies, againſt the Carthaginians. This enabled him to give many proofs of his great capacity both in civil and military affairs, as has been already ſhewn, and will further appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

The Syracuſans ſend Dionyſius to aſſiſt the people of Gela.

THE Carthaginian forces under the command of Imilcar, having, on the return of the ſpring, razed the city of Agrigentum, made an incurſion into the territories of Gela and Camarina; and, after having ravaged them in a dreadful manner, carried off ſuch an immenſe quantity of plunder from thence as filled their camp. Imilcar, then marching with his whole army againſt Gela, took poſt on the banks of the river Gela, and ordering his men to cut down all the trees about the town, fortified his camp with a ditch and a wall (N), not doubting, but Dionyſius would come to the relief

[P] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

(N) It will be proper in this note to mention ſome particulars relating to the Carthaginian camps. which we have hitherto not had an opportunity of doing. When the Carthaginians were apprehenſive, that the enemy would attempt to raiſe the ſiege of any place they had formed, they fortified their camp with a ditch and relief of the beſieged with a powerful army. The Geleans, in the beginning of the ſiege, were determined to ſend away their wives and children to Syracuſe, as a place of greater ſafety; but they all, running to the altars in the forum, could not be prevailed upon to retire, but proteſted that they would undergo the ſame fate as their huſbands and parents. This reſolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themſelves in the defence of perſons ſo dear to them, and to whom they were ſo dear. They made ſeveral ſallies with good ſucceſs, cutting great numbers of the enemy in pieces, and bringing many of them priſoners into the town. No ſooner was a breach opened in the wall by the Carthaginian rams (O), but the

and a wall, as we learn here from Diodorus. Their camps ſeem to have been formed in a regular manner, reſembling a town, and had gates to them. The Numidian camp was always ſeparated from the Carthaginian; the reaſons of which ſeem to have been, that the Carthaginians were generally foot, but the Numidians horſe, and that the latter could not permit themſelves to be confined to the rules of military diſcipline ſo eaſily as the former. The general's tent was, for the moſt part, fixed on an eminence in the middle of the camp, being much more magnificent and ſuperb than the others. Hither the officers repaired to receive their reſpective orders; and a ſtrong guard, Polybius intimates a thouſand horſe and as many foot, were generally poſted before it. Near this ſtood the ſacred tabernacle, and the altar, where the general, and officers of diſtinction, performed their devotions. The Carthaginian tents ſeem to have been raiſed in a regular manner of wood, faſcines, &c. reſembling ſo many cottages; but the Numidian were the reverſe, conſiſting only of reeds, ſtraw, ſtubble, and other ſuch-like ſlight materials (z.)

(O) The ram was a battering engine uſed in ſieges by the antients. Pliny tells us it was found out by Epeus, a Greek, at the ſiege of Troy; but this is not very probable, becauſe we find no mention made of it in Homer, who, if ſuch a wonderful machine had been then known, could not poſſibly have omitted taking notice of it. 'Tis therefore much more likely, that the Carthaginians invented it, as Vitruvius and Tertullian believe, with whom Lipſius agrees. The ram was a large beam, equal to the maſt of a ſhip, the citizens repaired it, being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children chearfully ſhared with them the labour and danger. The young men were continually in arms, and engaged with the enemy, and the reſt employed in working and other neceſſary ſervices. a ſhip, with an head of ſolid iron, reſembling that of a ram, from whence it derived its name. This was faſtened in the middle to another beam, ſupported by a large piece of timber on each ſide, by ropes, in ſuch a manner as to be pendulous like a balance. This being drawn backwarks by a great number of hands as far as poſſible, was then puſhed forwards with as great an impetus as they could give it, ſo that the iron head beating againſt the walls of a city with inconceivable force, eaſily ſhook them; neither was there any wall or tower but what this, by repeated blows, was capable of battering down. As theſe blows, in ſome reſpect, reſembled the buttings of a ram, this was a further reaſon for giving the machine the name of that animal. Appian relates, that the Romans battered the walls of Carthage with two rams of an immenſe ſize, one of which was played by a body of ſix thouſand foot, and the other by a vaſt number of rowers, which may ſerve to give us ſome idea of this terrible engine. 'Tis mentioned by the prophet Ezekiel in two paſſages, and Nebuchadnezzar made uſe of it at the ſiege of Jeruſalem. Whether the Carthaginians, or their anceſtors the Tyrians, (for both ſometimes went by the ſame name) firſt diſcovered it, cannot be certainly determined, nor at what time the diſcovery was made; but we take Ezekiel to be the earlieſt author in whom any mention of it is to be ſeen. Our learned readers will find a particular and full deſcription of the various kinds of this machine in Vitruvius and Lipſius, whom at their leiſure they may conſult (2).

Now we are upon this ſubject, we ſhall here, once for all, give a ſhort account of the catapulta and the baliſta, two other engines frequently taken notice of by the antient hiſtorians. The catapulta was a machine out of which the Carthaginians, and other nations, ſent vollies of darts and large arrows, made on purpoſe, upon the enemy, particularly upon thoſe parties of garriſons poſted on army, without receiving the leaſt aſſiſtance from their allies [q].

Dionyſius advances to the relief of Gela.

In the mean time Dionyſius, by the junction of his mercenaries, and ſuccours from Magna Græcia with the Syracuſans, almoſt every one of whom capable of bearing arms he obliged to liſt under his ſtandard, formed an army of fifty thouſand foot, according to ſome, though Timæus Siculus makes them only thirty thouſand, and a thouſand horſe; with which, and fifty ſail of ſhips, he advanced to the relief of Gela. Upon his arrival before the city, he encamped near the ſea, that his fleet and army might act in concert. With his light-armed troops he propoſed to prevent the enemy from foraging, whilſt his horſe and ſhipping ſhould intercept all proviſions coming to their camp from any part of the Carthaginian dominions; which he doubted not would greatly diſtreſs them. However, for twenty days he effected nothing; which much chagrining him, he reſolved to attack the enemy's camp, and, in order to this, made the following diſpoſition of his forces: The Sicilian foot had orders on the ramparts, to prevent the enemy entering the breaches made by the rams. Diodorus intimates, that this engine was but of late invention at the ſiege of Motya. Some authors confound this with the baliſta, which was an engine out of which ſtones of a vaſt weight were diſcharged; for Diodorus writes, that the Carthaginians filled Lilybæum with catapults, out of which they threw ſtones; and Appian relates the ſame of the Roman catapults. But Lipſius (and he has reaſon on his ſide) makes them different machines, though he allows, that the catapulta diſcharged both ſtones and arrows. That author ſays, there were two ſorts of catapults, the majores catapultæ, and the minores; the firſt ſent forth ſhowers of darts and arrows of three cubits long, the other thoſe of half that length. At the taking of new Carthage in Spain, an hundred and twenty large catapults were found there, and two hundred and eighty one of the ſmaller ſize. The Carthaginians always abounded with theſe engines: when Pyrrhus attacked Lilybæum, there was ſuch an abundance of them at that place, that the walls would ſcarce contain them; and, a little before the deſtruction of their city, they delivered up to the Romans two thouſand of them, according to Appian, or, as Strabo will have it, three thouſand. The baliſta, as juſt hinted, was an engine out of which the antients threw ſtones of a prodigious magnitude; ders to move towards the left, and attack the enemy's trenches; the troops of the confederates were to file off to the right, and marching to the ſhore, attempt the camp in the weakeſt place; the mercenaries, under his conduct, were to advance through the town, to the ſpot where the Carthaginian engines were placed, in order to deſtroy them; the horſe he commanded to paſs the Gela, upon a ſignal given by the foot, to join them, if ſuperior to the enemy, or, if repulſed, to ſupport them; and laſtly, the ſea-officers received orders to approach as near the enemy's camp as poſſible with the ſhips, when the Italian troops came up. As Imilcar had ſent a ſtrong detachment towards the ſhore, to oppoſe the enemy's landing, and defend that part of the camp which lay moſt expoſed, the Italian auxiliaries met with a great reſiſtance. However, they behaved with ſuch bravery, that they routed this body of troops, cut a great number of them in pieces, and advanced to the Carthaginian camp in good order, which they attacked with incredible fury. Had they been duly ſupported, they muſt have carried it, and thereby totally ruined the enemy. But Dionyſius, at the head of the mercenaries, not finding himſelf able to advance with ſufficient expedition through the ſtreets of the city to their relief, the Siculi being too remote to afford them timely ſuccour, and the garriſon tude: this was alſo uſed at ſieges, and in many reſpects anſwered to the battering cannon of the moderns, only the baliſta, if we may depend upon the relations of the antients, ſeems to have been a machine of much greater force. According to Lipſius, the baliſta likewiſe was either major or minor; the major threw ſtones of three hundred and ſixty pound weight, and the minor thoſe of an hundred. Hegeſippus relates ſeveral ſurpriſing effects of this engine, which we have not time to take notice of. Livy tells us, that the Romans found at Carthage twenty-two of the larger baliſtæ, and of the ſmaller fifty-two. Ammianus Marcellinus, as explained and illuſtrated by Lipſius, gives an accurate account of the antiquity, uſe, form, and, in ſhort, of every thing relating to theſe terrible engines, to which authors, for their further ſatisfaction, we muſt beg leave to refer our curious readers (3).

riſon not daring to make an effectual ſally by way of diverſion, leſt they ſhould leave the walls too naked; the Carthaginians reſuming their courage, and being relieved by a powerful ſupply of freſh troops, ſoon broke them, killed a thouſand on the ſpot, and forced the reſt into a narrow paſs within the lines. Here they muſt all have been inevitably cut off, had not a ſhower of darts, and other miſſive weapons from the fleet, favoured their retreat. The Sicilian foot, in the mean time, charged a large body of Africans with ſuch reſolution, that they put them to flight, and purſued them to their very trenches with great ſlaughter; but theſe Africans being ſoon reinforced by the Campanians, Iberians, and Carthaginians, who had routed the Italians, and thereby were at liberty to march this way, returned to the charge with greater fury than ever, and overpowering the Siculi, drove them back to the town, with the loſs of ſix hundred men. The horſe finding the foot not able to withſtand the efforts of the enemy, and ſeeing theſe advance on all ſides in order to ſurround them, retired likewiſe to the city with precipitation. Dionyſius, with his mercenaries, perceiving the greateſt part of his army thus rudely handled, thought proper alſo to retreat, and take ſhelter within the walls. After this unſucceſsful attempt he ſummoned a council of war, conſiſting of his particular friends, the reſult of whoſe deliberations was that, ſince the enemy was ſo much ſuperior to them in ſtrength, it would be highly imprudent to put all to the iſſue of a battle; and therefore, that the inhabitants ſhould be perſuaded to abandon their country, as the only means to ſave their lives. In conſequence of this, a trumpet was ſent to Imilcar, to deſire a ceſſation of arms till the next day, in order as was pretended, to bury the dead, but in reality to give the people of Gela an opportunity of making their eſcape. Towards the beginning of the night, the bulk of the citizens left the place, and he himſelf, with the army, followed them about midnight. To amuſe the enemy, he left two thouſand men of his light-armed troops behind him, commanding them to make fires all night, and ſet up loud ſhouts, as though the army remained ſtill in the town. At day-break, theſe took the ſame rout as their companions, and purſued their march with great celerity. By theſe ſtratagems, Dionyſius preſerved the inhabitants of Gela from all inſults, and ſecured the retreat of his army [r].

IMIL-

IMILCAR finding the city deſerted by the greateſt part of the citizens, the garriſon, and Syracuſan army, immediately entered it, and either put to the ſword or crucified all he met with in it. He likewiſe thoroughly plundered it in the ſame manner as Agrigentum, and then moved with his forces towards Camarina. Dionyſius had before drawn off the Camarineans with their wives and children to Syracuſe, by apriſing them of Imilcar's ſpeedy approach. Their city underwent the ſame fate with that of Gela. The manner in which it was abandoned, Diodorus Siculus deſcribes in a moſt moving manner, but this, as well as what happened to Dionyſius hereupon, may be ſeen at large in a former part of this hiſtory [s].

Imilcar plunders Gela, and then moves towards Camarina, which undergoes the ſame fate.

IMILCAR, in the mean time, finding his army extremely weakened, partly by the caſualies of war, and partly by a plague broken out in it, and not thinking himſelf in a condition to continue the war, ſent an herald to Syracuſe to offer terms of peace to the conquered. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionyſius, and a treaty of peace was immediately concluded with the Carthaginians. The articles of it were; that the Carthaginians, beſides their antient acquiſitions in Sicily, ſhould ſtill poſſeſs the countries of the Sicania the Selinuntines, the Himereans, and Agrigentines; that the people of Gela and Camarina ſhould be permitted to reſide in their reſpective cities, which yet ſhould be diſmantled, upon their paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontini, Meſſanians, and all the other Sicilians, ſhould live according to their own laws, and preſerve their own liberty and independency, except the Syracuſans, who ſhould continue in ſubjection to Dionyſius. Theſe articles being ratified by both parties, Imilcar returned to Carthage, having loſt above half of his army. The plague afterwards made dreadful havock in Africa, carrying off vaſt numbers both of the Carthaginians and their allies [t].

A peace concluded betwixt the Carthaginians and Dionyſius.

BEFORE the Carthaginian army retired from Sicily, Imilcar ſeparated the Campanians from the other troops, and left them to defend his conqueſts in that iſland. It happened ſoon after, that Dionyſius was reduced to ſuch extremities by his ſubjects the Syracuſans, that he was adviſed by his moſt intimate friends either to kill himſelf, or by one deſperate effort fort force his way through the enemy's camp, and eſcape to thoſe places which were ſubject to the Carthaginians. But Philiſtus (E) the hiſtorian, who, for a conſiderable time had ſupport-

(E) This Philiſtus was, according to Suidas (1), the ſon of Archonides, or, as Pauſanias calls him, Archomenidas, and ſcholar to the elegiac poet Euenus. He was particularly intimate with Dionyſius, and above any other perſon inſtrumental in eſtabliſhing that tyrant's power at Syracuſe; for which reaſon he obtained the government of the citadel there. It is ſuggeſted by ſome, that he enjoyed too great a degree of familiarity with Dionyſius's mother, tho' with his privity. However this may be, upon his marrying the daughter of Leptines, brother to Dionyſius, without imparting his deſign to that prince, he was baniſhed by him, and retired to Adria. He was not permitted to return as long as the tyrant lived; but in the time of Dionyſius the younger, thoſe who oppoſed Dion had him recalled; for they were afraid, leſt Plato, by his eloquence and philoſophy, ſhould change the tyrant's mind, which they believed (2) ſo learned a man as Philiſtus would be able to prevent, eſpecially as he was perfectly well acquainted with the manner of adapting himſelf to the tyrant's diſpoſition. He anſwered their expectations; for, as ſoon as he was in favour, he oppoſed Plato, and perſuaded Dionyſius to expel Dion. Soon after, Dion made war upon Dionyſius, and beſieged him in the caſtle of Syracuſe. Philiſtus haſtened to his aſſiſtance from Iapygia, with a ſtrong ſquadron of (3) galleys, but had the misfortune to be defeated. Ephorus ſays, he fell by his own hands, and is followed herein by Diodorus Siculus. But Timonides, who lived with Dion from the beginning of theſe commotions, informs us, that he was taken priſoner, and put to death; with whom Timæus Siculus in the main agrees. Diodorus Siculus ſays, he was denied burial. He may juſtly be eſteemed to have been a man of merit, if we conſider his wit, his learning, his writings, and even his bravery, which will, in ſome meaſure, appear from the account of him in the hiſtory of Syracuſe. Suidas (4) aſcribes to him a treatiſe concerning oratory; Ægyptiaca, or the hiſtory of Egypt, in twelve books; res Siculæ, or the Sicilian hiſtory, in eleven books; ſome orations, and one amongſt the reſt againſt Tricaranus, concerning the city of Naucratis; the hiſtory of Dionyſius the tyrant; three books about the theology of the Egyptians; and a treatiſe concerning Libya and Syria. Cicero (5) highly celebrates his learning and diligence. His Sicilian hiſtory ſupported Dionyſius, oppoſed this advice, telling him, that he ought to reſume his courage, and either maintain himſelf on the throne, or die in the attempt. The tyrant, falling in with the ſentiments of Philiſtus, reſolved to part with his life, raſtory was the work in greateſt eſteem, of which, acccording to Diodorus Siculus (6), there where two parts. The firſt conſiſted of ſeven books, including the tranſactions of eight hundred years, and concluding with the third year of the ninety-third olympiad, when the Carthaginians took Agrigentum. The other begins where the firſt left off, that is, at the time when Dionyſius the elder began his reign over the Syracuſans, which was the year after the taking of Agrigentum. According to Cicero (7), he took great pleaſure in imitating Thucydides; and, if Quintilian (8) may be credited, exceeded him in perſpicuity. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (9) made him too much inferior to Thucydides. However, all are agreed, that he much reſembled him in the conciſeneſs of his ſtyle. He affected this ſo much, that, if Theon (10) may be believed, he avoided digreſſions to an exceſs. Timæus abuſed him; but Ephorus extolled him up to the ſkies; for which they are both cenſured by Plutarch (11). His works, as well as thoſe of Ephorus and Timæus Siculus, are all entirely loſt. Had Philiſtus's Sicilian hiſtory, and his treatiſe concerning Libya, been extant, we ſhould undoubtedly have met with many curious particulars relating to the building of Carthage, the firſt formation, growth, and decay of the Carthaginian ſtate; in ſhort, of all the principal tranſactions in which it was concerned, from its earlieſt ages to his time. This is not only probable from the titles of thoſe pieces, but likewiſe from an hint given us by (12) Euſebius and Appian. Notwithſtanding he wrote an hiſtory during his baniſhment, he did not ſhew any reſentment againſt Dionyſius in it, but, on the contrary, flattered him, and concealed his vices. This conduct Pauſanias (13) endeavours to excuſe, or at leaſt to palliate, by ſaying, that the motive to it was a deſire to be recalled to Syracuſe. Some believe Philiſtus to have been born at Naucratis, others at Syracuſe, and laſtly, others believe there were two hiſtorians of that name, one of whom was born at Naucratis, and the other at Syracuſe. It is not very material which of theſe is in the right.

panians, and by large offers prevailed upon them to march to his relief. By their aſſiſtance he ſoon extricated himſelf out of the difficulties in which he was before involved, and afterwards became a ſcourge both to his own ſubjects and the Carthaginians [u].

He makes preparations for a new war with the Carthaginians.

HAVING diſarmed the inhabitants of Syracuſe, and by that ſtep fixed his ſovereignty there, he began to make the neceſſary preparations for renewing the war with the Carthaginians; for he had ſtruck up the late peace with Imilcar ſo ſuddenly, with no other view, than to amuſe him till he had eſtabliſhed his authority, and found himſelf in a condition to attack the Carthaginian conqueſts in Sicily with a powerful army. The motives, that ſeem immediately to have prompted him to this war, were two: Firſt, to prevent the future deſertion of his ſubjects, many of whom retired every day with all their effects to the Carthaginian garriſons, as well as to recover thoſe he had loſt, ſince he imagined, that, upon the breaking out of a rupture, the cruel treatment of the Carthaginians would drive them from thence. And ſecondly, the great proſpect of ſucceſs he had at that particular juncture, by reaſon of the deplorable ravages the plague then made in the Carthaginian territories. As he knew the Carthagians to be the moſt potent nation in the weſt, and that, if an opportunity offered, they would moſt certainly beſiege Syracuſe, he thought proper, by way of precaution, to fortify the hill Epipolæ, which commanded the town. This he did at a vaſt expence, with the aſſiſtance of ſixty thouſand freed-men and ſix thouſand yoke of oxen. Diodorus tells us, that on this occaſion the tyrant did not only ſuperintend every part of the work, but frequently worked himſelf, enduring as much hardſhip and fatigue as the pooreſt labourer; by which means the workmen were inſpired with ſuch a ſpirit of emulation and alacrity, that they laboured all day and part of the night, and, which is almoſt incredible, in twenty days finiſhed a wall thirty furlongs in length, and of a proportionable height, which being flanked with high towers, placed at proper diſtances, and built of hewn ſtone, rendered the place almoſt impregnable [w].

HAVING

HAVING thus put his own city in a ſtate of defence, he made preparations ſuitable to the undertaking he was going upon, being very ſenſible with how formidable a power he was ſoon to cope. His firſt care was to bring to Syracuſe from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all ſorts of arms. As he found, that mercenaries came flocking in to him from all parts, his intention was to have them all armed after the manner of their reſpective countries, imagining that by this means they would be more capable of diſtinguiſhing themſelves, and of ſtriking a terror into the enemy. Not only the porches of the temples, but the ſchools, walks, piazzas about the forum, and every public place, nay even private houſes, were filled with workmen. The great wages which Dionyſius paid them, induced the beſt artificers every-where to offer him their ſervice. He himſelf directed them in every thing relating to the form of the weapons they were to forge, and appointed the chief of the citizens to ſuperintend them, with orders to promiſe great rewards to the diligent for their future encouragement. The art of making engines to batter walls was, according to Diodorus, now firſt brought to Syracuſe; but the artificer's name to whom Dionyſius was obliged for this, is no where told us. As he was ambitious of being ſuperior to the Carthaginians by ſea, he cauſed a vaſt quantity of timber for building his galleys to be brought from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the ſea-ſide, and then ſhipped for Syracuſe. Mount Ætna alſo ſupplied him with many fir and pitch trees, with which it then abounded. Having provided the neceſſary materials, he employed ſuch a prodigious number of hands, that a fleet of two hundred ſail was ſoon ready to put to ſea; to which he added an hundred and ten old galleys, that were refitted. He likewiſe cauſed an hundred and ſixty diſtinct receptacles to be made round the harbour, for ſheltering his fleet from the weather, which would contain two ſhips a-piece; and after he had repaired an hundred and fifty old uſeleſs veſſels covered them with planks. The Syracuſans themſelves manned half of the long ſhips, and the foreigners, who had entered into Dionyſius's ſervice, the reſt. In order to have his troops completely armed as ſoon as poſſible, Dionyſius animated the artificers by his preſence, by the applauſes he gave them, and by his bounty, in which all the diligent part of them ſhared. But his popular and winning behaviour excited more ſtrongly, than any other circumſtance, the induſtry and ardor of theſe people; for thoſe who diſtinguiſhed themſelves, either by their ingenuity or application, were not only ſure of receiving ſome particular marks of his favour, but even ſometimes had the honour to dine or ſup with him. It is no wonder therefore, that in a ſhorter time than can eaſily be conceived, beſides an immenſe quantity of other arms, he had got ready an hundred and forty thouſand bucklers, the ſame number of ſwords and helmets, and fourteen thouſand cuiraſſes, all of excellent workmanſhip. He had alſo prepared for ſervice a large train of battering engines of all kinds, and an infinity of darts. As for land-forces, beſides his own ſubjects, many ſoldiers came from Italy, Greece, and other countries, to liſt in his ſervice. We muſt not omit obſerving here, that Dionyſius is ſaid by Diodorus to have invented the quinqueremes about this time, to which he was induced chiefly out of a deſire, that the Syracuſans ſhould be thought to rival their anceſtors in ingenuity; for being appriſed, that the triremes, or three-oared veſſels, were firſt made at Corinth, he was deſirous the number of oars ſhould be firſt enlarged by the Syracuſans, a colony of the Corinthians[x].

He acquaints the Syracuſans with his deſign.

THE tyrant having finiſhed his military preparations both by ſea and land, and finding his army in a condition to take the field, thought proper now to open his deſign to the Syracuſans. In order to which he convened the ſenate, and communicated his intention to them of attacking the Carthaginian territories inſtantly, and even without any previous declaration of war. In vindication of his conduct on this occaſion, and to ſpirit up the aſſembly, he urged, that the Carthaginians were of all others the moſt implacable enemies to the Greek nation; that they had then nothing leſs in view than the conqueſt of Sicily, and conſequently the ruin of all the Greek cities therein; that they would have even been at the gates of Syracuſe before that time, had not the plague obliged them to continue in a ſtate of inaction; that as they were then in a moſt deplorable condition, no finer opportunity could ever offer itſelf to the Syracuſans of driving them out of the iſland than the preſent; and that laſtly, if this was let ſlip, upon their recovering themſelves, they would moſt certainly put their favourite ſcheme in execution, and deprive the Syracuſans, as well as their neighbours, of every thing that was dear and valuable valuable to them. The aſſembly, moved by ſo pathetic a ſpeech, and influenced by the views of policy more than the dictates of juſtice, readily concurred in his opinion. The antient hatred they bore the Carthaginians, their rage againſt them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding ſome opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their ſuffrages, and war was unanimouſly reſolved on. If they were victorious, they doubted not carrying their point; and if worſted, the tyrant would be ſo much afraid of a foreign enemy, that he would learn to treat his ſubjects at home with more moderation. In ſhort, as they fancied themſelves to have a proſpect of bettering their condition, however the war might turn out, they were for puſhing matters to extremity without delay [y].

Who approve of it.

UPON the breaking up of the aſſembly, Dionyſius, in conformity to the diſpoſition of the Syracuſans, gave up to the fury of the populace the perſons and poſſeſſions of the Carthaginians, who then reſided in Syracuſe, and there traded on the faith of treaties. As there were many of their ſhips at that time in the harbour, laden with cargoes of great value, the people immediately plundered them, and, not contented with this, ranſacked all their houſes in a moſt outrageous manner: and this horrid example of perfidiouſneſs and inhumanity was followed throughout the whole iſland of Sicily; nay, the Greeks inhabiting the cities under the juriſdiction of the Carthaginians, not ſatisfied with ſtripping them of their effects, thought themſelves ſufficiently authorized to treat the bodies of thoſe miſerable wretches with the utmoſt ignominy and barbarity, to inflict every kind of puniſhment upon them, in return for the cruelties they had formerly exerciſed on the natives of the country. This was the bloody ſignal of the war that Dionyſius now entered into with the Carthaginians [z].

He falls upon the Carthaginians in Sicily, without any previous declaration of war.

IT has been above obſerved, that great numbers of mercenaries flocked to Dionyſius from Greece, Italy, and ſeveral other countries. The great pay he offered, drew them over in crouds; but no foreign power contributed ſo much to his ſupport as the Lacedæmonians. From Sparta he received as many recruits as were neceſſary for the completing of his troops, which, becauſe he apprehended the war with with Carthage would be long and bloody, he reſolved ſhould be very numerous. That he might be entirely at liberty to act againſt the common enemy with all his forces, he concluded a peace with the Rhegians and Meſſanians. To engage the latter the more firmly in his intereſts, he ceded to them a large extent of territory. This he judged not ill beſtowed at ſuch a critical juncture; for the Meſſanians, being a ſea-faring people, and pretty powerful, would have given no ſmall diverſion to his arms, had they joined with the Carthaginians [a].

He concludes a peace with the Rhegians and Meſſanians.

DIONYSIUS, thus backed by his ſubjects, mercenaries, and confederates, and finding the vaſt project he had formed now ripe for execution, diſpatched an herald to Carthage, with a letter to the ſenate and people, notifying to them, that if they did not forthwith withdraw their garriſons from all the Greek cities in Sicily, the people of Syracuſe would treat them as enemies. This letter being read firſt in the ſenate, and afterwards in the aſſembly of the people, occaſioned a general alarm at Carthage, which the plague had reduced to a miſerable condition. However, though in want of all neceſſaries, they were not diſmayed, but ſent officers into Europe, with conſiderable ſums, to raiſe troops with the utmoſt diligence. In the mean time, they diſpatched orders to their garriſons in Sicily, to obſerve the motions of the Syracuſan army; and appointed Himilco commander in chief of all their forces [b].

The Carthaginians levy forces to oppoſe Dionyſius.

DIONYSIUS, without waiting for the anſwer of the Carthaginians, agreeably to the plan he had laid down, advanced with his army towards mount Eryx, near which ſtood the city of Motya, a Carthaginian colony of great eminence. This town was defended by a citadel of great ſtrength, and might be juſtly looked upon as the key of Sicily. The reduction of it therefore, the tyrant very well knew, would be a conſiderable blow given to the Carthaginians. He was joined on his march by the Greeks of Gela, Camarina, Agrigentum, Himera, and Selinus, out of the ardent deſire they had to recover their liberties, and ſhake off the Carthaginian yoke. With this acceſſion of ſtrength, his army amounted to eighty thouſand foot and above three thouſand horſe. The fleet conſiſted of two hundred long gallies, and five hundred tranſports, laden with warlike warlike engines and all sorts of provisions, The Motyans, by reason of their attachment to the Carthaginians, expected the storm would fall upon them; but, in hopes of relief from Carthage, they were resolved to defend themselves to the last drop of blood. The city stood on a small island, about half a league from shore, to which it was joined by a small neck of land, which the Motyans cut off, to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side. In it the Carthaginians kept all their stores and provisions. Dionysius therefore opened the campaign with the siege of this place; and after having taken a view of it with his engineers, commanded the canal between the city and the shore to be filled up with rubbish, and his gallies to anchor at the mouth of the harbour. Having given these orders, he left his brother Leptines, commander in chief of the fleet, to carry on the siege, while he with the land-forces went to reduce the cities in alliance with the Carthaginians, which terrified at the approach of so formidable an army, all submitted, except five, viz. Ancyra, Solas, Egesta, Panormus, and Entella. The territories of the Solantines, Panormitans, and Ancyreans, he destroyed with fire and sword, and cut down all their trees. Egesta and Entella he besieged, endeavouring, by repeated attacks, to take them both by storm; but not being able to reduce them in so short a time as he expected, he returned with his whole army to Motya, not doubting, but all other places would fall of course, as soon as he had made himself master of this.

Dionysius invests Motya.

In the mean time, Himilco (F), who was busy in raising men and making other preparations for the war in Sicily, ordered his admiral to set sail from Carthage with ten galleys, and making strait to Syracuse, to destroy all the vessels

Himilco sends ten gallies from Carthage, to destroy the vessels in the harbour of Syracuse.

(F) This general we have constantly called Imilcar in the history of Syracuse, through mistake; for we are now convinced, that his true name was Himilco. This appears not only from Diodorus Siculus, but likewise from Livy, Polyænus, Frontinus, and Orosius. In some editions of Justin he is called Amilco; in other Imilcos; but that author is certainly guilty of a mistake, when he makes him the son of Hamilcar, who was killed by Gelon, and skips over a long interval of time, when he will have the destruction of this general's army by the plague immediately to have succeeded the death of Hamilcar above-mentioned. Besides veſſels he ſhould find in that harbour. What he propoſed by this was, to divide the enemy's forces, and oblige Dionyſius to ſend part of his fleet to the defence of Syracuſe. The admiral, purſuant to his orders, entered the harbour in the night, without being diſcerned by the enemy; and having ſunk moſt of the ſhips he found there, returned to Carthage without the loſs of a ſingle man [c] (G).

DIONYSIUS, on his return to Motya, having ſet more hands at work, ſpeedily filled up the canal with heaps of ſtone and rubbiſh, ſo that he could make his approaches as on dry land. He then perfected the rampart, brought forward his engines, battered the place with his rams, advanced to the walls towers ſix ſtories high, rolled upon wheels, of equal height with their houſes, and from thence galled the beſieged with continual vollies of arrows and ſtones diſcharged from his catapults (H), an engine at that time of late invention. The place was attacked and defended with the ſides, that this was not the ſame Imilcar who commanded in the preceding war, is probable from hence, that Imilcar there imagined his collegue Hannibal to have brought the plague into the Carthaginian army, by demoliſhing the tombs and monuments of the dead, which he conſidered as an impious action, and therefore diſcontinued that demolition; whereas we find, that this Himilco beat down the tombs which ſtood round the city, in order to fortify his camp, and facilitate his approaches. They were therefore probably different perſons from this circumſtance; but the authorities produced, without this, put the point beyond diſpute (1).

(G) Polyænus tells us, that the admiral ordered the lights to be all placed abaft, or in the ſterns of the ſhips, that no ſuſpicion might be given of their approach; by which means he entered the port in the night undiſcovered by the enemy, and eaſily deſtroyed the veſſels he found there (2).

(H) To what has been lately obſerved of the catapultæ and baliſtæ may be added, that from the latter ſtones of a prodigious ſize were generally thrown; that the Greek word πέλτη, of which with the prepoſition κατὰ, the word καταπέλτης or catapulta i compoſed, ſignifies, according to Heſychius, a dart, a ſpear, o javelin

the utmoſt vigor. The Motyans, tho' deſpairing of any relief, reſolved to ſell their lives at as dear a rate as poſſible, knowing they had no quarter to expect from ſo incenſed an enemy; and therefore oppoſed the beſiegers, notwithſtanding the imminent danger they were in, with incredible bravery. They poſted ſoldiers armed in coats of mail upon the maſts of their ſhips, having hoiſted up their main-yards, who threw down burning firebrands, and tow dipped in pitch upon the engines, which immediatly ſet them on fire; but the Sicilians, preſently advancing, not only extinguiſhed the flames, but opened ſeveral large breaches in the walls, and made a general aſſault upon the town with ſuch fury, that they bore down all before them. The conteſt now was extremely bloody; for the beſiegers thinking themſelves ſure of carrying the place, and being vaſtly deſirous of taking vengeance of the enemy for the barbarous treatment their nation had formerly received from them, fought like lions; and on the other hand, the beſieged, knowing they muſt fall victims to an implacable and enraged enemy, if the town was taken by ſtorm, reſolved to die valiantly in the defence of the place, and therefore behaved like men in deſperation. At laſt, however, the Sicilians prevailed, and entered the city ſword in hand, thinking they ſhould now ſpeedily accompliſh their deſign; but herein they found themſelves deceived, for the Motyans had finiſhed a fortification at the foot of the walls, of equal ſtrength with the walls themſelves, which there was a neceſſity of carrying, before Dionyſius could make himſelf maſter of the place. The beſieged therefore, javelin; and conſequently gives us to underſtand, that theſe were the miſſive weapons diſcharged moſt frequently out of that machine. This is confirmed by an alluſion to be found in Plautus. Both the catapultæ and baliſtæ were of Syrian or Phœnician invention, and from thoſe nations the Jews had them, as may be learned from Pliny, in conjunction with ſcripture. The Sicilians introduced them into Greece, in the time of Ageſilaus. Upon the firſt ſight of the telum catapultarium, Archidamus, the ſon of that prince, is ſaid to have cried out, 'O ye gods, all valour is now deſtroyed' (3).

after having been obliged to abandon the walls, betook themſelves to the defence of this, and gave the Sicilians a warmer reception here than they had met with before, deſtroying vaſt numbers of them from the top of the fortification, and the roofs of the houſes adjoining to it. However, the Sicilian towers being of a vaſt height, by their aſſiſtance the beſiegers advanced their ſcaling ladders to the neighbouring houſes, and by this means fought hand to hand with the beſieged. The diſpute now was extremely ſharp and obſtinate; for the Motyans having new life and vigor infuſed into them by the ſight of their wives and children, who, in caſe of any diſaſter, they knew would be treated in the ſame barbarous manner, as their countrymen taken priſoners by the Greeks had already been, reſolved either to conquer or die. They ruſhed therefore with a fury little inferior to madneſs into the midſt of their enemies, threw infinite numbers of them headlong from the ſcaffolds they had erected, and, in fine, repulſed Dionyſius with ſuch ſlaughter, that he was at laſt obliged to ſound a retreat [d].

But is vigorouſly repulſed.

But at laſt takes the town.

THE attack was repeated for ſeveral days ſucceſſively in the ſame manner, but without any effect; for the Motyans, being accuſtomed to this way of fighting, conſtantly repulſed Dionyſius, obliging him every evening to draw off. At laſt Archylus the Thurian, at the head of a choice detachment, in the dead of the night, getting over the ſhattered houſes without noiſe, poſſeſſed himſelf of a very commodious poſt, where he made a lodgment, till Dionyſius ſent another ſtrong body of troops to ſupport him. The Motyans, ſeeing themſelves ſurpriſed, made their utmoſt efforts to diſlodge the enemy, ſo that a fierce encounter enſued. But at laſt the Sicilians, overpowering them with numbers, gave Dionyſius an opportunity of breaking into the city like a torrent with his whole army. Every part of the town was in a moment covered with dead bodies; for the Sicilians, enraged at the obſtinate defence of the beſieged, and to retaliate the former cruelties of the Carthaginians, put all the inhabitants to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age, thoſe only excepted who took ſanctuary in the Greek temples. For Dionyſius, being deſirous of ſelling them for ſlaves, in order to bring money into his coffers, and not being able to reſtrain the violence of his ſoldiery, ordered the public crier by proclamation to declare,

immenſe quantity of wealth and treaſure. This Dionyſius thought proper to permit, that he might ingratiate himſelf with the troops, and that they might hereby be the more readily induced to ſignalize themſelves on all future occaſions.

As many therefore of the Motyans as were left alive, he ſold for ſlaves, but commanded Diamenes and all the Greeks, who had joined the Carthaginians, to be crucified. As for Archylus, to whoſe bravery and conduct the taking of the place was in a great meaſure owing, he rewarded him with an hundred minas, and all the reſt in proportion to their merit. Having thus reduced the ſtrongeſt city in Sicily ſubject to Carthage, he placed a numerous garriſon in it, under the command of one Bito a Syracuſan. Afterwards ordering Leptines, with an hundred and twenty galleys, to watch the Carthaginians at ſea, and to make incurſions into the territories of Entella and Egeſta, which it was his intention to have done himſelf, would the ſeaſon and the exigence of his affairs have permitted, ſummer now drawing to an end, he returned with his army to Syracuſe [e]. Leaves a garriſon there, and returns to Syracuſe.

THE Carthaginians having been ſurpriſed by Dionyſius, in contempt of the faith of treaties, as above related, found it impoſſible to oblige him to raiſe the ſiege of Motya; however, they were willing to attempt, not only this, but even to carry the war to Syracuſe. In order to which, Himilco, receiving advice, that Dionyſius with his fleet was entered into the harbour, gave orders to have an hundred of his beſt galleys manned without delay; with which, as the Syracuſans had no ſquadron out at ſea to obſtruct his deſign, he entertained hopes either of deſtroying or making himſelf maſter of the tyrant's whole naval force by ſurpriſe at one ſingle blow. Could this have been effected, he would not only have relieved the place, but likewiſe changed the ſeat of the war.

SETTING ſail therefore from Carthage, after a ſhort paſſage, he arrived in the night on the coaſt of Selinus, and the next morning by break of day, at the port of Motya, where the Syracuſan galleys were then riding at anchor. Theſe he immediately attacked, burning and ſinking ſeveral of them.

Himilco makes an attempt to surprise Dionysius's squadron in the harbour of Syracuse.

Dionysius, not a little alarmed at this unexpected visit of the enemy, and seeing, by the dispositions they were making, his whole fleet in danger of being destroyed, advanced with his army to the mouth of the harbour; but finding the Carthaginians had possessed themselves of the passage, he looked upon it as too hazardous an attempt to bring his ships out of port, because the mouth being strait and narrow, a few galleys there might engage a much superior number with great advantage. Commanding his land-forces therefore to draw them over land into the sea, at a farther distance from the harbour, he by this means preserved them.

In the mean time, Himilco, pressing upon those galleys that lay next to him, made all possible efforts to take or destroy them; but was vigorously repulsed, and lost many of his men by showers of darts thrown from the decks. The Syracusan army likewise greatly annoyed him by repeated vollies of arrows from their engines of battery; which being a new kind of weapon, and doing considerable execution, struck a great terror into the enemy. Himilco therefore, finding that he could not bring his enterprise to bear, as judging it by no means advisable to venture an engagement with a squadron so much superior to him in strength, left the Motyans (I) to themselves, and returned to Africa [f].

But is obliged to sheer off.

Dionysius makes an inroad into the Carthaginian territories.

The following spring, Dionysius, drawing his forces out of Syracuse, made an inroad into the Carthaginian pro-

(I) Polyænus intimates, that, upon the approach of the Carthaginian fleet, Dionysius drew off his forces from before the town, and advanced at the head of them to the shore, as near the enemy's vessels as possible. By this motion he endeavoured to encourage his soldiers and mariners. Under the promontory that formed the port, there was a tract of twenty stadia in breadth, perfectly level, and full of mud. Over this his soldiers and mariners drew eighty triremes in one day, which threw the Carthaginians into a great consternation. The admiral therefore, fearing the Syracusans would first block up his fleet in the mouth of the harbour, and then destroy it, immediately set sail, and left the Motyans to the mercy of the enemy (4).

provinces, ravaging and deſtroying the country in a dreadful manner. The Halicyæans, terrified by this irruption, ſent embaſſadors to his camp to implore his protection; but the inhabitants of Egeſta, remaining firm in their fidelity to Carthage, ſet him at defiance. Upon this, advancing with his army, he laid ſiege to the place; but the Egeſtines making a vigorous and unexpected ſally upon the beſiegers, put the advanced guards in diſorder, and ſet fire to their tents, which occaſioned a great conſternation throughout the whole camp. Several ſoldiers, in endeavouring to quench the flames, loſt their lives, and many horſes were burnt. Dionyſius, ſoon after, raiſing the ſiege, roved about the country in the ſame hoſtile manner as before, and whilſt Leptines was obſerving the motions of the enemy by ſea, continued his depredations without oppoſition.

Soon after the reduction of Motya, the news of that melancholy event arrived at Carthage; and the year following Himilco was appointed one of the ſuffetes there. The progreſs of Dionyſius alarming the ſenate, they reſolved to ſurpaſs him in number both of men and ſhips; to which end they diſpatched officers into all parts of Africa and Spain to raiſe forces. When the preparations were completed, the Carthaginian army amounted to above three hundred thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and four hundred armed chariots. The fleet, under the command of Mago, conſiſted of three hundred galleys, and upwards of ſix hundred ſhips of burden laden with proviſions and engines of war. This is the account given by Ephorus; but Timæus Siculus affirms, that not above an hundred thouſand men were tranſported from Africa into Sicily, who, upon their landing there, were joined by three thouſand Sicilians. The troops being embarqued, and the fleet ready to ſet ſail, Himilco delivered his orders to the commanders of the fleet ſealed up, enjoining them not to open them till they were out at ſea, and then to obſerve them with all ſtrictneſs. This precaution he took (and it is the firſt time we find it uſed) to prevent ſpies from informing the enemy of his deſigns. The orders were, that they ſhould make ſtrait to Panormus, which was appointed the place of the general rendezvous, and thither they ſteered their courſe with a fair wind. The tranſports, getting out into the open ſea, outſailed the galleys, which kept cloſe to the coaſt of Africa; but being deſtitute of a convoy, were attacked off of Panormus by Leptines, whom Dionyſius had ſent out with thirty ſail againſt them. After a ſhort diſpute, he ſunk fifty of them, in which five thouſand men and two hundred chariots were loſt; the reſt, tacking about, had the good luck to eſcape. As ſoon as the galleys appeared, Leptines retired; and Himilco, having landed his troops at Panormus, marched directly againſt the enemy, commanding the fleet to ſail along the coaſt near the army. On his march he took Eryx by treachery; and haſtening from thence to Motya, reduced that important place before Dionyſius, who was then beſieging Egeſta, could ſend any forces to its relief [g].

Leptines defeats the enemy by ſea

The Carthaginians retake Motya.

THE Sicilian troops were very eager for venturing a battle with the Carthaginians, in order to decide the fate of Sicily as ſoon as poſſible; but Dionyſius thought it more adviſeable to abandon the open country to the enemy, becauſe he was at a great diſtance from his confederates, and began to be in want of proviſions. He exhorted the Sicani to leave their cities, and join the army, promiſing them, after the concluſion of the war, a richer and more fertile country than their own, and to permit as many of them as would chuſe it, to return to their former habitations. Some few, for fear of being plundered, liſtened to this propoſal; but the greateſt part of them deſerted to the enemy, together with the Halicyæans, who ſent embaſſadors to Carthage, to renew their antient alliance with that ſtate. Dionyſius, not meeting with a ſufficient reinforcement, and in conſequence of the reſolution he had taken, marched with great precipitation to Syracuſe, plundering and laying waſte the country all along as he paſſed. Himilco, flushed with his ſucceſs, advanced towards Meſſana, of which city he was very deſirous to poſſeſs himſelf, on account of its ſituation; for being once maſter of it, he could eaſily intercept all ſuccours ſent to the enemy, either from Italy or Greece; and beſides, the haven was capable of receiving his whole fleet, which conſiſted of ſix hundred ſail and upwards. Before he inveſted the city, he concluded a treaty with the people of Himera and Cephalœdium, and reduced acted from the inhabitants thirty talents. From thence moving with his forces towards Meſſana, his fleet at the ſame time attending him, he encamped upon the promontory of Peloris, now the Capo di Faro, about an hundred ſtadia from that city. When the inhabitants heard of the approach of the enemy, they could not agree among themſelves about the meaſures to be taken on that occaſion. Some, alarmed at the great ſtrength of the Carthaginians, ſeeing themſelves deſerted by their confederates, as well as in great want of their horſe, which were then at Syracuſe, and knowing that the walls were in a ruinous condition, and that they had not time then to make the neceſſary preparations for their defence, were for ſubmitting to the enemy. Others were reſolved to hold out to the laſt, and chearfully ſacrifice their lives in the maintenance of their liberties. They were encouraged to this reſolution by an antient propheſy, whereby it was foretold, That the Carthaginians ſhould be one day carriers of water in that city. This they interpreted, as if the Carthaginians ſhould be ſlaves in Meſſana; and being thereby greatly animated, were determined to undergo all extremities, rather than ſurrender themſelves to the common enemy. Their wives and children, with all their treaſures, they ſent to the neighbouring towns before the place was inveſted [h].

(K) Lipara was the principal of the Æolian iſlands, in number ſeven, not far from the north coaſt of Sicily. The names of theſe iſlands were Strongyle, Evonymos, Didyme, Phœnicuſa Hiera, Vulcania, and Lipara (1). According to Diodorus, both the iſland Lipara and its capital city received their name, from Liparus, the ſon of Auſon (2). king of theſe iſlands, who built the city Lipara, and cultivated all of them. The Lipareſe were antiently formidable, had a good fleet, and grew very rich, by reaſon of the great revenue brought them in by alom, with which mineral their iſland (3) abounded. Their capital city, according to Diodorus, was beautified with large and fair harbours, and famous for the baths in its neighbourbood, which were medicinal, and of ſingular ſervice to the people of Sicily, when ſeized with any ſtrange and unuſual diſeaſe. Pliny makes Æolus to have preceded Liparus in this iſland; but Diodorus tells us, that Æolus married Carne, the daughter of Liparus, and, in right of his wife, ſucceeded that prince. About the fiftieth olympiad, a colony of Cnidians (4), under their captains Gorgus, Theſtor, and Epitherſides, entered into a league with the antient inhabitants, and incorporated themſelves with them. Lipara was noted amongſt the antients for the great quantity of delicious fruit it produced, and is at this day remarkable for the excellent raiſins it ſupplies ſeveral parts of Europe with, particularly England. That the inhabitants were pretty opulent in the times we are now ſpeaking of, is evident from the contributions which Dionyſius exacted of them, amounting to about five thouſand four hundred pounds ſterling. It muſt be obſerved, that Diodorus, not only here, but in other paſſages, where he mentions a talent, means the Attic talent, which was worth about an hundred and eighty pounds (5) of our money, and not the Sicilian, amounting not to above three Roman denarii, or a two thouſandth part (6) of the Attic. The iſland is now called Lipari, and has its capital ſo fortified, that it ſtood a ſhort ſiege in the year 1719, when it was taken by an imperial detachment under the command of general Seckendorf; as was likewiſe the caſtle, whoſe garriſon of four hundred men thought proper to ſurrender the next day at diſcretion.

Which place Himilco inveſts.

In order to prevent any incurſions of the enemy, they ſent a ſtrong detachment of the flower of their troops towards the promontory of Peloris, who for ſome time defended the frontiers. But Himilco, rightly concluding, that the garriſon muſt be greatly weakened by the abſence of this detachment, and that the city was thereby left ſo very much expoſed on the ſea-ſide, that it would be no difficult matter for his fleet to enter, commanded two hundred galleys to advance towards the town. His orders were inſtantly obeyed, and, a north wind at that time blowing freſh, they were carried with a full gale directly into the harbour. The Meſſanians, being now ſenſible of their miſtake, recalled their detachment; but it was too late, for the fleet had already entered, and having a great number of engines on board, battered down the walls on that ſide; upon which the inhabitants haſtened in crouds thither to defend the breaches, leaving the other parts of the wall quite quite unguarded. Himilco took advantage of this confuſion, and attacking the city on the land-ſide, entered it without oppoſition. All thoſe who were on the ramparts died valiantly on the ſpot; the others either fled to the neighbouring cities, or fell into the hands of the enemy, or, getting into narrow creeks about the harbour, threw themſelves into the ſea, imagining they could reach the oppoſite ſhore; of which, however, not above a fourth part made their eſcape to the coaſt of Italy. Himilco entered Meſſana with his whole army, and, in order to render his conqueſt complete, propoſed reducing all the forts and caſtles in the neighbourhood of that city; but upon taking a view of them, and finding them extremely ſtrong, he altered his meaſures, and returned back to Meſſana. Here he halted a ſhort time to refreſh and recruit his army, and then marched at the head of all his forces againſt Syracuſe. And takes it

HIMILCO, conſidering that Meſſana was very remote from the cities held by the Carthaginians, and the moſt commodious port in Sicily on account of its ſituation, had, before his departure, ordered it to be razed, that it might be of no advantage to the enemy. His orders were executed with the utmoſt ſeverity, inſomuch, that there was not left one houſe ſtanding in the whole city; nay, Diodorus tells us, that ſcarce any traces of it remained, the very rubbiſh being carried away, and thrown into the ſea; which ſufficiently diſcovered the implacable hatred Himilco, as well as the whole Carthaginian nation, bore to the Greeks [i]. He orders it to be razed.

THE Siculi having Dionyſius in perfect deteſtation, and a fair opportunity now offering of ſhaking off their allegiance to him, all of them, except the Aſſarines, revolted to the Carthaginians. Dionyſius, being hereby deprived of the means of raiſing recruits, was obliged to preſent all the ſlaves and ſervants of the Syracuſans with their liberty, and with them he manned ſixty galleys. He received likewiſe a ſupply of a thouſand men from the Lacedæmonians, his antient and faithful allies. Expecting that the enemy would advance into his territories, he took care to fortify the caſtles and forts of the Syracuſans, and the cities in their dependence, and to ſtore them with proviſions. of the Leontini, which were his principal magazines, he rendered extremely ſtrong, and perſuaded the Campanians to leave Catana, the place he had given them to reſide in, and remove to the city of Ætna, a fortreſs of great ſtrength, for their farther ſecurity [k].

Notwithſtanding which he advances towards the Carthaginians.

DIONYSIUS, upon a review of his land-forces, found them to amount to thirty thouſand foot, and above three thouſand horſe. With theſe he took the field, and encamped near a place called Taurus (L), about an hundred and [k] Idem ibid.

(L) This Taurus was undoubtedly the mountain of that name, upon the declivity of which ſtood the famous city of Tauromi-nium. According to Diodorus (1), a great number of Sicilians had fixed their habitations here before the time of this war. Dionyſius had given the country of the Naxians to theſe Sicilians; but they, induced by the promiſes of Himilco, now dwelt upon this hill, which was naturally fortified. The ſame author adds, that, as they had ſettled here in times antecedent to this war, ſo they continued there after it, and inhabited the city called Tauromi-nium, from its ſituation upon mount Taurus. We learn farther from this hiſtorian (2), that Andromachus, the father of Timæus Siculus, about forty years after the commencement of this war, aſſembled all the fugitives of Naxos, a city which Dionyſius the tyrant had deſtroyed, and ſettled them on this hill, and that this was the origin of Taurominium. Theſe two accounts ſeem to claſh, ſince the firſt makes the foundation of Taurominium to have happened in the firſt year of the ninety-ſixth olympiad, whereas the latter fixes it in the third of the hundred and ſixth. The learned Dr. Bentley (3) takes the former to be nearer the truth, though he endeavours to make them both conſiſtent with one another. Cluverius indeed prefers the latter, but in this he ſeems to have Diodorus againſt him; for that author calls the place Taurominium three ſeveral times, before he makes the leaſt mention of Andromachus, viz. at olymp. XCVI. an. 1. (4) olymp. XCVI. an. 3. (5) and olymp. XCVII. an. 1. (6) However this may be, that the Taurominites were deſcended from the Naxians, cannot be diſputed. Pliny and Solinus ſay expreſly, that Taurominium was the city which was formerly called Naxos. The and ſixty ſtadia from Syracuſe. His fleet by the acceſſion of the ſixty galleys above-mentioned, conſiſted of an hundred and eighty galleys. Himilco, upon advice of his march, advanced to meet him, his land army being attended by the fleet, which kept near the coaſt. When the Carthaginians arrived at Naxos, they could not continue any longer their march by the ſea-ſide, but were obliged to take a long compaſs round mount Ætna, which by a violent eruption, had covered all the neighbouring country with burning aſhes, and rendered the roads impaſſable by its flaming

The medals of the Taurominites clearly evince the ſame thing; for there are five ſeveral pieces in Paruta, that have on one ſide ΤΑΥΡΟΜΕΝΙΤΑΝ, and on the reverſe Apollo's head with this inſcription, ΑΡΧΑΓΕΤΑ, and that Apollo Ἀρχαγέτας was a deity of the Naxians, we are informed by Thucydides (7) and Appian (8). To conclude, our author Diodorus himſelf, in the place we are now upon, juſt after mentioning the city Taurominium, obſerves that "Himilco marched with great expedition to the aforeſaid "place of Naxia." Probably Naxia here is a corruption of Naxos, ſince, if we remember right, Naxia, as the name of a place, is not to be met with in any other author, nor any-where elſe in Diodorus but here. This paſſage ſeems fully to prove, not only that the Naxians were the progenitors of the Taurominites, but likewiſe that, in the firſt year of the ninety-ſixth Olympiad, the city, or ſpot where it afterwards ſtood, was called Naxos or Naxia. As therefore it appears from another place (9) in Diodorus, that the city was but juſt built in the third year of the ſame olympiad, it ſeems clearly to follow, that Taurominium was founded in the firſt year of the ninety-ſixth olympiad. This is an additional argument in favour of what Dr. Bently has advanced, and, to all appearance, entirely fixes the point. We muſt not omit obſerving, that Taurominium ſtood at a conſiderable diſtance from the antient Naxos, the one being ſituated either on the declivity or top of the hill, and the other much lower towards the ſouthern foot of it (10). 'Tis likely there might have been a town of the ſame name with the hill, either upon it, or ſomewhere near the foot of it, as we find Ætna was the name both of a mountain and a town in its neighbourhood. If Dionyſius did not aſcend any part of the mountain, we may ſuppoſe him to have encamped near this town, flaming inundations. Himilco therefore ordered Mago to ſail to Catana, and there wait, till he, marching through the heart of the country, ſhould rejoin him with the land-forces. Dionyſius, appriſed of this, haſtened with all ſpeed to Catana, with a deſign to attack Mago, before Himilco's army came up; he hoped that his land-forces drawn up on the ſhore would greatly encourage his own mariners, and diſcourage the enemy's: beſides, if his fleet were worſted, both ſhips and men had a place of ſafety to retire to. This was what Himilco had foreſeen, when for the reaſon above-mentioned, his fleet and land forces were obliged to ſeparate [1].

DIONYSIUS, having therefore drawn up his army on the ſhore, ſent out Leptines with the whole fleet againſt the enemy, commanding him to engage in cloſe order, and not to break his line upon any account whatſoever. And indeed ſuch a ſalutary order could not have been too punctually obeyed at that juncture, on account of Mago's great ſuperiority; for his fleet was compoſed of no leſs than five hundred ſhips of burden, beſides a vaſt number of galleys with brazen beaks. The Carthaginians, ſeeing the Greek troops drawn up on the ſhore, and the navy advancing in good order againſt them, were ſtruck with terror, and tacking about, began to make to the ſhore, with a deſign to ſave themſelves over land, and join Himilco; but recollecting that this was equally, if not more, dangerous, they reſolved to try their fortune by ſea; and accordingly drawing themſelves up in a line, they waited for the enemy. Leptines, inconſiderately advancing with thirty of his beſt galleys, contrary to the expreſs command of Dionyſius, fell upon Mago's firſt ſquadron, and, after a briſk action, ſunk ſeveral of the ſhips of which it was compoſed; but Mago, coming up with the whole fleet, immediately ſurrounded him, upon which, notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, a moſt ſharp and bloody engagement enſued.

THE Carthaginian and Syracuſan galleys grappling with one another, (for they were ſo cloſe together, that there was no room for them to ſtrike with their beaks) the forces on board fought hand to hand, as if in a battle on land. On both ſides they made the utmoſt efforts to board their enemies, and conſequently on both ſides many were thrown over-over-board and ſlain. In fine, Leptines, though for ſeveral hours he defended himſelf perfectly well, being at laſt overpowered, was obliged to fly, valour being forced to give way to numbers. The flight of the admiral diſheartened the Syracuſans, and gave the enemy freſh courage; the former therefore fled to the ſhore, where their land-forces were drawn up, but were cloſely purſued by the Carthaginians. Many, abandoning their ſhips, threw themſelves into the ſea, hoping to ſave their lives by ſwimming to the ſhore; but the Carthaginian tranſports, which lay near the ſhore, having manned their boats, made a dreadful havock of thoſe unhappy men, when they were not in a condition to make any reſiſtance; ſo that the land-army ſaw them periſh, without being able to give them the leaſt relief. The Carthaginians ſuſtained great loſs in this action; but above an hundred of the Syracuſan galleys were either ſunk or taken, and more than twenty thouſand of their men killed in the battle or purſuit. After the action was over, the Carthaginian fleet anchored at Catana, where they refitted the Syracuſan ſhips they had taken. This was done to regale the eyes and ears of the Carthaginians and their confederates, who could not but be highly delighted with ſuch a trophy, as enabled them to form ſome ſort of an idea of the great victory they had obtained [m]. And is defeated.

Upon this misfortune, the Sicilians apprehending they ſhould be reduced to great ſtreights by returning to Syracuſe and there ſuſtaining a ſiege, ſollicited Dionyſius to fight Himilco, alledging that an unexpected attack at the preſent juncture would ſtrike terror into the Carthaginians, and give them a fair opportunity of retrieving their late loſs. This project ſeemed the more feaſible, as the enemy could not but be extremely fatigued with their long and haſty march; and therefore Dionyſius at firſt not only liſtened to it, but ordered his forces to be ready to march at a minute's warning. But when he was juſt upon the point of putting it in execution, ſome of his friends remonſtrating to him, that Mago in the mean time with his victorious fleet might poſſeſs himſelf of Syracuſe, he altered his reſolution, and haſtened with his whole army to the defence of that Metropolis. To this he was likewiſe ſtrongly induced duced by the fate of Meſſana, which had lately been loſt by ſuch a point of falſe conduct as the Sicilians propoſed to him. However, many of theſe, being diſpleaſed at his not falling into their meaſures, deſerted, and either retired to the neighbouring garriſons of the Carthaginians, or withdrew to their reſpective homes [n].

Himilco endeavours to excite the Campanians of Ætna to a revolt.

HIMILCO, in two days march, arriving at Catana, ordered his ſhips there to be drawn into the harbour, that they might be ſheltered from the weather, which was then very boiſterous and ſtormy. Here he halted ſome time to refreſh his troops, and ſent embaſſadors to the Campanians at Ætna to excite them to a revolt, promiſing them large poſſeſſions, and that they ſhould be equal ſharers in all the ſpoils taken from the Sicilians. That his promiſes might make the deeper impreſſion, he took care to inform them, that the Campanians of Entella had declared for the Carthaginians, and joined them with a conſiderable body of forces. In fine, he deſired them to conſider, that the Greeks of every denomination bore an implacable hatred to all other nations whatſoever. The Campanians were not a little moved by theſe promiſes and ſuggeſtions; but as they had given hoſtages to Dionyſius, and ſent the flower of their troops to Syracuſe, they were obliged, contrary to their inclination, to adhere to the treaty concluded with them [o].

He inveſts Syracuſe, and takes up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter.

THE Carthaginian general, animated with the good ſucceſs that attended his arms, marched ſtrait to Syracuſe, with a deſign to beſiege it; while his fleet under the command of Mago, ſailed along the coaſt, carrying great plenty of proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of ſo numerous an army. The arrival of the enemy threw the city into the utmoſt conſternation. Two hundred and eight galleys laden, and richly adorned, with the ſpoils of the enemy, and advancing in good order, entered in a ſort of triumph the great haven of Syracuſe, and were followed by above a thouſand tranſports with more than five hundred ſoldiers on board †; ſo that the harbour, capacious as it was, could hardly contain ſo great a navy, conſiſting in the whole of near two thouſand ſail. The fleet had ſcarce caſt anchor, when the army appeared on the other ſide, amounting, according to ſome authors, to three hundred thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, beſides an additional ſquadron, of two hundred long ſhips,

† That there is a miſtake in the numbers in this place is manifeſt. How few are 500 ſoldiers on board 1000 tranſports? Nay, the words "more than" ſeem to intimate, that the number following was very conſiderable. But as this error is alſo in the preſent copies of Diodorus, we know not how to amend it.

ſhips, attending them. Himilco took up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter, and the reſt of the army encamped round it, above twelve ſtadia from the city [P].

BEFORE he directly formed the ſiege, he advanced with his army in battalia to the very walls of the city, and offered the Syracuſans battle. But finding they were prudent enough to decline accepting the challenge, he returned to his camp, well ſatisfied at his having extorted from them a tacit confeſſion of their own weakneſs, and his ſuperiority. At the ſame time he ordered an hundred of his beſt galleys to enter the two other harbours, viz. the little port and that of Trogilus, to ſtrike more terror into the enemy, and convince them, that the Carthaginians were likewiſe maſters at ſea. In order to gain the affection of his troops, as well as to diſtreſs the enemy, he ravaged and laid waſte the country many miles round for thirty days together, cutting down their groves, and doing infinite damage to the inhabitants. He took by aſſault the quarter, or ſuburb, of the town called Acradina, where he plundered the rich temples of Ceres and Proſerpina, and, in ſhort, ſucceeded in every meaſure he purſued for ſtreightening the beſieged. Elated with this run of good-fortune, he looked upon himſelf in effect as maſter of the place, though he was apprehenſive, that the entire reduction of it would be the work of a conſiderable time. He erected therefore three forts near the ſea, at equal diſtances from each other, one at Plemmyrium, another about the middle of the port, and the third near the temple of Jupiter, in which he laid up vaſt ſtores of proviſion, and all other neceſſaries, that might enable him to puſh on the ſiege. In order to facilitate his approaches, and fortify his camp in the moſt commodious manner, he ordered all the tombs, which ſtood round the city, to be demoliſhed, and amongſt others that of Gelon and his wife Damareta, which was a monument of great magnificence. Being very intent on the preſervation of his troops, he took care they ſhould want nothing that was proper for their ſubſiſtence, and therefore ſent tranſports to Sardinia and Africa for a freſh ſupply of corn and other proviſions. In the mean time, the Syracuſans, though greatly dejected by their late misfortunes, did not deſpond, Diony-

The Carthaginians are worſted in an action by ſea.

BEFORE the ſtorm fell upon Syracuſe, Dionyſius had ſent his (M) kinſman Polyxenus to implore the aſſiſtance of the Italians, Corinthians, and Lacedæmonians, againſt the power of Carthage, which alone he found himſelf unable to withſtand. He likewiſe had diſpatched ſeveral officers with large ſums to Peloponneſus, to raiſe a body of mercenaries there. All theſe, returning ſome time after Himilco had ſat down before Syracuſe, brought with them, beſides ſome land-forces, a ſupply of thirty galleys under the command of Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian. Soon after Dionyſius and Leptines went out upon a cruiſe, intending, if poſſible, to intercept ſome of the Carthaginian tranſports laden with proviſions, of which the city then ſtood in great need. They were ſcarce out of port, when the Syracuſans from the city ſpied one of the tranſports coming up to Himilco's camp, upon which venturing out with five galleys they took it. As they were ſailing away with their prize, the Carthaginians gave them chaſe with forty ſail, againſt which they advanced with their whole fleet, and engaging them with great reſolution, took the admiral galley, beſides ſeveral others, and ſunk

(M) The Greek word κηδεστὴς, which Rhodomanus has falſly tranſlated ſocer or father-in-law, is a general term, and denotes any perſon who is related to another by marriage. Sometimes, however, it is equivalent to the Latin ſocer, and ſometimes to gener, as we learn from Stephanus and Budæus, who produce inſtances of both thoſe ſignifications. But that it is to be uſed in a general ſenſe here, is evident from Diodorus himſelf, who tells us elſewhere, that Polyxenus was uncle to Dionyſius's wife, and that that tyrant gave him his own ſiſter in marriage. Such a complex relation as this cannot be expreſſed by any one particular word in our language, and therefore we have rendered it by the general term kinſman. We mention this only to have an opportunity of ſuggeſting to our readers, that many faults and inaccuracies are to be found in Rhodomanus's edition of Diodorus Siculus, which yet is the beſt we at preſent have: ſo that it were to be wiſhed ſome able hand would give us a new edition of that uſeful and entertaining hiſtorian (1).

ſunk or damaged twenty more. The reſt they purſued to the place where their whole fleet rode, offering them battle a ſecond time. The Carthaginians, terrified with this unexpected diſaſter, kept within the harbour, though their fleet was three times more numerous than the enemy's who challenged them. The Syracuſans, faſtening the galleys they had taken to the poops of their ſhips, brought them off triumphantly to the town [r].

WHAT happened now to the Carthaginians verified the obſervation, that misfortunes ſeldom come alone. Himilco who, from his firſt arrival in the iſland to this time, had been ſucceſsful in every meaſure, and the conſtant favourite of fortune in all his undertakings, was ſoon to be reduced to the loweſt degree of ignominy and diſgrace, and his people to the extremeſt miſery. All the ſplendor of his anticipated triumph vaniſhed in a moment, and ſerved only to enhance his future misfortunes. This, according to the judicious reflection of our hiſtorian, may ſerve as a lively leſſon to mankind, to teach them, that the proudeſt mortal, how great ſoever he may be, is but an inconſiderable creature, and may be blaſted in an inſtant by a ſuperior power. Here we may behold the Carthaginians from the ſummit of human felicity hurled down into the abyſs of calamity and woe; from the moſt potent and formidable ſtate in all the weſtern parts of the world, become the moſt weak and contemptible of all nations, and that, as it were, in an inſtant. However, Providence did not ſo far favour the perfidious Syracuſans, but that their enemies, though treacherous and cruel in many reſpects, recovered themſelves, and came off with reputation at the concluſion of this war [s].

HIMILCO, now maſter of almoſt the whole iſland of Sicily, and expecting with great impatience to crown his other conqueſts with the reduction of Syracuſe, was obliged to deſiſt from all further operations againſt that city by the plague, which, breaking out in the camp, made great havock amongſt his ſoldiers. This infection was looked upon as a puniſhment inflicted upon them by the gods for plundering the temples, particularly thoſe of Ceres and Proſerpina above-mentioned, and demoliſhing the tombs round the city, which was conſidered as a violence offered to the dead. But, without having recourſe to the extraordinary interpoſition of the gods, they might have aſcribed it, as Diodorus inſinuates, to natural cauſes; for the heats that ſummer, in the midſt of which that peſtilential diſtemper firſt broke out, were more exceſſive than they had ever been known in the memory of man; and the adjacent country abounded with fens and marſhes, whoſe unwholſome exhalations, eſpecially at that hot ſeaſon, which of itſelf was almoſt ſufficient to have occaſioned the plague, muſt have had a very ill effect upon the camp, where ſuch an infinite number of people were crouded together: and that theſe in fact were the two principal concurring cauſes of that dire malady, is apparent from hence, that the Athenians, who ſpared both temples and tombs, had been, not long before, afflicted with the ſame calamity. It began among the Africans, and ſoon ſpread through the whole army. As this plague was attended with ſome uncommon ſymptoms, carried off above an hundred and fifty thouſand men in a very ſhort time, and may be looked upon as one of the moſt malignant diſtempers to be met with in hiſtory, we ſhall beg leave here to give a brief account of it, believing that ſuch a ſhort digreſſion will not be unaceptable to our curious readers [t].

A deſcription of this moſt malignant peſtilence.

BEFORE ſun-riſing, the patients were ſeized with a convulſive ſhuddering, pretty nearly reſembling that attending the rigor or cold fit in agues, which happens in the beginning of the paroxyſm. This was in part occaſioned by the freſh breezes coming off from the ſea, which at that time of the morning were very piercing. As the ſun advanced nearer the meridan, the cold remitted and the heat grew more intenſe; ſo that by noon they found themſelves almoſt ſuffocated with heat; which made them exceſſively weak and faint, but gave freſh force and malignity to the diſeaſe. The ſouth wind moreover greatly encreaſing the infection, they died in ſuch numbers, that, after ſome time it was impoſſible to inter them; nay, the perſons attending the ſick were cut off in ſuch a manner, that no one durſt approach the infected. In the firſt ſtage of the diſtemper, they were afflicted with catarrhs, ſwellings of the throat, &c. Theſe were ſucceeded by violent dyſenteries, raging fevers, acute pains in all parts of the body, loathſome ulcers, cers, &c. Some were even ſeized with madneſs and fury, falling upon all thoſe that came in their way, and tearing them to pieces. No relief could be had from the phyſician (A), this terrible malady eluding all his art; ſo that thoſe infected with it expired the fifth or ſixth day in exquiſite torture. Juſtin ſeems to intimate, that almoſt the whole Carthaginian army periſhed by it, and that in a manner all at once, as it were in an inſtant; which may ſerve to give us an idea of the great malignity of it. Diodorus, however, informs us, that a conſiderable body of Africans and Iberians ſurvived this dreadful calamity; though he at the ſame time affirms, that an hundred and fifty thouſand carcaſſes of thoſe who periſhed did not meet with any interment, and conſequently inſinuates, that a greater number died, ſince, according to the ſame author, the dead were buried for ſome time after the breaking out of the infection. It is worthy obſervation, that not a ſingle perſon of thoſe who attended the ſick eſcaped [u].

DIONYSIUS, being appriſed of the deplorable condition to which the Carthaginians were reduced, reſolved not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of attacking them. Having therefore manned eighty galleys, he ordered Pharacidas and

Dionyſius attacks the enemy, and defeats them

[u] Juſtin. l. xix. Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. Oroſ. l. iv.

(A) It appears from the antient hiſtorians, that the plague raged pretty frequently amongſt the Carthaginians, eſpecially in their African dominions: and it is worthy obſervation, that thoſe parts are ſtill often viſited by that terrible malady, particularly Algiers, Tunis, &c. It is probable, that the Carthaginians brought the ſeeds of the diſtemper with them out of Africa, ſince the peſtilence had made great havock there juſt before the breaking out of this war; which Dionyſius (1) urged as a reaſon to the Syracuſans for his attacking the Carthaginians, whom he ſuppoſed to have been thereby extremely weakened. It may be inferred from this paſſage, that the Carthaginians had phyſicians with them in their camps, and conſequently that the art of phyſic was not unknown to that people. This likewiſe in ſome meaſure appears from the worſhip of Æſculapius (2), which prevailed in the territories ſubject to the ſtate of Carthage, though at what degree of perfection herein the ſtudents arrived, we cannot pretend to ſay.

and Leptines to fall upon the enemy's fleet at break of day, while he attacked the land forces in the camp. With this view, having aſſembled his troops before the moon was up, he advanced to the temple of Cyane, and ſetting out from thence about midnight, without being diſcovered, arrived at the enemy's camp by the time appointed. He then detached a ſtrong body of cavalry, and a thouſand of the mercenary foot, with orders to fall upon that part of the camp, which lay at the greateſt diſtance, pretending, that the enemy there kept no guard; but his real deſign was to get rid of that body of mercenaries, they having a great averſion to him, and being ready to mutiny on all occaſions. Accordingly he gave private inſtructions to the officers of the horſe to retire as ſoon as the infantry was engaged. His orders were obeyed, and the mercenaries, being ſurrounded on all ſides, were cut off to a man. Dionyſius, upon the return of the cavalry, at the ſame time attacked the enemy's camp, and the forts in their poſſeſſion. The ſuddenneſs of the attack ſo ſurpriſed the Carthaginians, that they were ſome time before they could put themſelves into a poſture of defence, which gave them an opportunity of taking the fort called Polichna by ſtorm; and the horſe at the ſame time advancing in good order, with ſome galleys, to that near Daſcon, likewiſe carried it. By the reduction of theſe forts, the Syracuſans were enabled to enter the great haven with all their fleet, and to fall furiouſly on the enemy's galleys anchored there. The Carthaginians in the camp for ſome time defended themſelves with great bravery; but ſeeing their navy now in imminent danger of being utterly deſtroyed, many of them, abandoning the defence of the camp, haſtened to the ſhore, to the relief of their companions on board the veſſels. But all their endeavours were ineffectual; for the Carthaginian ſhips, not being able to ſuſtain the ſhock of the Syracuſan galleys, many of them were ſunk at the firſt attack, others quite diſabled, and a great number burnt and taken. The ſlaughter on this occaſion was ſo dreadful, that the ſhore was covered with dead bodies; which afforded a melancholy ſpectacle to Himilco, and filled all the Carthaginians with great horror, who, bewailing their unhappy fate, were now reduced to a ſtate of deſperation. In the mean time, the camp, being deſerted by the body of troops above-mentioned, was left very much expoſed; which Dionyſius taking advantage of, redoubled his efforts, and finding but a feeble reſiſtance, ſoon ſoon broke into it, putting all to the ſword who oppoſed him. After this, he moved with his forces towards the gulf of Daſcon, where finding forty Carthaginian ſhips of fifty oars a-piece, with a great number of tranſports, and ſome galleys, he immediately ſet fire to them. This completed the deſtruction of the enemy's fleet; for the wind being at that time very high, and the cables of many of the ſhips burnt, they were all, excepting a few that were afterwards taken, either conſumed by the violence of the flames, or falling foul one upon another, broken to pieces. Diodorus ſays, that when the ſhips were all in a blaze, and the flames aſcending above the maſts, a moſt dreadful ſcene was exhibited, the gods themſelves ſeeming to deſtroy the enemy with lightning from heaven; which puniſhment, he inſinuates, they deſerved, on account of their great impiety. Such a ſpirit of joy and gladneſs diffuſed itſelf over the whole city on this happy occaſion, that old and young, women and children, in fine, almoſt all the inhabitants of Syracuſe, poſted to the walls and eminencies in the greateſt hurry, to be ſpectators of ſo glorious a victory: at the ſight of which, lifting up their hands to heaven, they thanked the tutelary gods of the city, for revenging in ſo ſignal a manner the many ſacrileges, which the Carthaginians had committed ſince their arrival in Sicily. Night putting an end to this action, Dionyſius, with his troops, retired, and encamped near the enemy at the temple of Jupiter, with a deſign to renew the fight early the next morning [w] (B).

[w] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

(B) Polyænus ſeems to intimate, that Dionyſius amuſed the Carthaginians with ſome propoſals for an accommodation, and at the ſame time offered to deliver into their hands a great number of caſtles and fortreſſes, if they would put garriſons into them. The Carthaginians, cloſing with this offer, poſted great numbers of their troops, according to our author, in thoſe places; but hereby ſo weakened their army, that Dionyſius found himſelf ſtrong enough to attack them; which he did, and gained a complete victory. If we admit this ſtory to be true, which perhaps our readers may ſcruple doing, ſince Diodorus Siculus, Juſtin, and Oroſius, have paſſed it over in ſilence, it is probable the ſtratagem was made uſe of after the plague had made great havock in Himilco with great difficulty eſcapes to Africa.

THOUGH Dionyſius penetrated into the Carthaginian camp, put great numbers of the enemy there to the ſword, and even entirely ruined their fleet, yet he could not, by this laſt effort, oblige them abſolutely to raiſe the ſiege: this he reſerved to the day following. But Himilco, taking the opportunity of this ſhort reſpite, ſent embaſſadors privately to him, offering him three hundred talents (C), all the ready caſh he had then with him, if he would permit the remains of his ſhattered army to return to Africa. Dionyſius was unwilling utterly to deſtroy the Carthaginians, leſt the Syracuſans, when free from the apprehenſions of ſo formidable an enemy, ſhould ſeek to regain their antient liberty, and thereby give him freſh diſturbance; but, on the other ſide, he knew, that neither the Syracuſans, nor their confederates, would ſuffer him to grant the enemy ſuch terms: he therefore replied, that it was not in his power to permit them all to retire; but that he would allow Himilco, with all the citizens of Carthage, to depart in the night, upon his paying three hundred talents. This being agreed to, Dionyſius retired with his forces into the city, whither Himilco privately ſent him the promiſed ſum, and then began to make the neceſſary preparations for his departure. The fourth night after the agreement, Himilco, with forty galleys full of the citizens of Carthage, was ready to ſet ſail, leaving the reſt of the army behind him. But the Corinthians, who ſerved under Dionyſius, diſcovering, from the noiſe and motion of the veſſels, that Himilco and his friends were making off, ſent to acquaint the tyrant with their flight, who immediately ordered ſome galleys to be manned, as if he deſigned to prevent their retreat;

in the Carthaginian camp; for Himilco's forces were at firſt ſo vaſtly ſuperior in ſtrength to Dionyſius's army, even according to Polyænus himſelf, that he might have garriſoned all the fortreſſes belonging to the Syracuſans, and yet have been much more than a match for Dionyſius (1).

(C) According to what we have lately obſerved, that was about fifty-four thouſand pounds ſterling; which was no extraordinary ſum for the military cheſt, conſidering what a numerous army Himilco commanded.

treat; but as his orders were but ſlowly executed, they grew impatient, and, without his permiſſion, gave them chace; and coming up with the rear, by piercing them with the beaks of their veſſels, ſunk ſeveral of them. Upon the defeat of the Carthaginians, the Siculi, who joined them, diſperſed, and, flying through the heart of the country, retired to their reſpective homes. In the mean time, Dionyſius poſted detachments at all the avenues leading to the enemy's camp, that none of thoſe left behind might make their eſcape; and marching by night with his forces, took poſſeſſion of it. This he met with no oppoſition in doing; for the Africans, finding themſelves betrayed by Himilco and the Carthaginians, and that the Sicilians had deſerted them, were thrown into ſuch a conſternation, that they immediately diſperſed, taking a great variety of routs. Being therefore incapable of making any reſiſtance, they either fell into the hands of the above-mentioned detachments, or ſurrendred to Dionyſius himſelf at diſcretion. But the Iberians, keeping together in a body, ſent an herald to capitulate with Dionyſius, who took them into his ſervice. All the enemy's baggage and valuable effects left in the camp were delivered up as plunder to the ſoldiery [x].

THIS victory was the more extraordinary, inaſmuch as, before the plague broke out in the Carthaginian camp, Dionyſius found himſelf reduced to the laſt extremity, and actually conſulted with his friends about the moſt proper method of making his eſcape. In this melancholy ſituation, his friend Ellopides adviſed him to reſume his courage, and by no means to renounce the ſovereignty, telling him, that the royal title would be the greateſt ornament of his ſepulchre. The tyrant cloſed with this advice, and, notwithſtanding the Siculi had joined the enemy, by the incident abovementioned, became victorious. Diodorus and Plutarch both omit this circumſtance, though the former of thoſe hiſtorians mentions ſomething of this nature to have happened to the tyrant upon the revolt of the Syracuſan army, when he was ſhut up in his capital city. However, Iſocrates, an author of undoubted credit, who lived at the time of the tranſaction, has furniſhed us with this fragment of hiſtory, which has likewiſe been tranſcribed by Ælian; ſo that we ſhall make no ſcruple to inſert it here.

THUS

[x] Idem ibid. c. 7.

THUS ended this campaign, one of the moſt remarkable, for the variety of incidents and viciſſitudes of fortune obſervable in it, to be met with in hiſtory. A large field for reflections here opens itſelf; but as theſe have been already in ſome meaſure anticipated, and as our province is chiefly confined to facts, we ſhall be obliged at preſent to ſuperſede them. In general, however, we may remark, that all human grandeur is vanity; that Providence frequently makes uſe of ſome wicked men as its inſtruments in ſcourging others, and conſequently that villainy muſt be frequently triumphant; and laſtly, that a ſtrict attachment to the dictates of juſtice and humanity is not only laudable, but politic, in all ſtates, how elevated ſoever, ſince a deviation from theſe cannot be ſecured by the moſt formidable and extenſive power from a retaliation.

The Carthiginians are in the utmoſt conſternation upon receiving the melancholy news of the total ruin of both their land and ſea forces.

ADVICE being brought to Carthage of the terrible fate that both the land and ſea-forces of the republic had met with in Sicily, the whole city was overwhelmed with ſorrow. Every part of it was filled with outcries and lamentations, and the people were under the ſame diſmal apprehenſions, as if the enemy had actually made themſelves maſters of the town. All the houſes in the city, as well as the temples, being ſhut up, an entire ſtop was put to every kind of buſineſs, and even to their religious worſhip. This happened when the Carthaginians were ſeized with the firſt impreſſions of terror; for ſoon after, recovering themſelves, they began to entertain hopes, that, upon the general's arrival, things might poſſibly turn out better than they had been repreſented. They did not, however, continue long in a ſtate of ſuſpenſe; for in a little time the poor remains of their ſhattered troops landed near Carthage, and confirmed the melancholy account they had before received. Upon this, all the wretched inhabitants abandoned themſelves entirely to deſpair, and, giving a full vent to their grief, made the ſhore ring with their groans and lamentations. In ſhort, a greater ſcene of horror, except the ſpot of ground where the Carthaginian army encamped before Syracuſe, than Carthage now was, cannot well be conceived [y].

Himilco, not being able to ſurvive his misfortunes, kills himſelf.

HIMILCO in the mean time, landing at Carthage, appeared in mean and ſordid attire. He was immediately met met by a vaſt concourſe of people, bemoaning their ſad and inauſpicious fortune. Joining with theſe forlorn wretches, and lifting up his hands to heaven, he bitterly bewailed his own hard fate, but moſt of all that of his country. Afterwards impiouſly taxing the gods with partiality, and making them the ſole authors of his misfortune, he told his countrymen, they ought to eſteem it as a ſingular happineſs, that their preſent calamitous condition was not brought upon them by their own ill conduct, and that the enemy could aſſume to themſelves no merit from it: "The enemy," ſaid he, "may indeed rejoice at our "miſery, but have no reaſon to glory in it. The troops "we have loſt did not fall by their valour, nor did they "oblige thoſe that are now arrived ſafe here to abandon "their iſland by force. We return victorious over the Sy-"racuſans, and are only defeated by the plague. As for "the baggage found in our camp, this ought not to be "looked upon as the ſpoils of a conquered enemy, but "as moveables, which the caſual death of the owners has "left the Syracuſans in poſſeſſion of. No part of the di-"ſaſter, continued he, touches me ſo much, as my ſurvi-"ving ſo many gallant men, and my being reſerved, not "for the comforts of life, but to be the ſport of ſo dire a "calamity. Since therefore I have brought back to Car-"thage the remaining part of the army under my conduct, "I ſhall ſpeedily follow thoſe brave men, who periſhed in "Sicily, and thereby demonſtrate to my country, that it "was not out of a fondneſs for life, but merely to pre-"ſerve the troops, which had eſcaped the plague, from the "fury of the enemy, to which, by my more early death, "they would have been expoſed, that I ſurvived them." After this going directly to his houſe, and ſhutting the doors againſt the citizens, and even his own children, he gave himſelf the fatal ſtroke. This violent death Diodorus interprets as a ſignal puniſhment inflicted upon him, for his having ſo frequently violated the ſanctity of temples and tombs at Syracuſe, which, according to our author, was a crime of a moſt flagrant and enormous nature [z].

THE fame of Dionyſius's ſucceſs being ſpread all over the Carthaginian dominions, and thoſe of their confederates in Africa, the affairs of this ſtate there were ſoon almoſt in as

as bad a situation as in Sicily. The Africans bore a natural hatred to the Carthaginians, and this was much heightened, when it came to be publicly known in Africa, that Himilco had saved only the citizens of Carthage, leaving the confederates behind to the mercy of the enemy. Incensed therefore to the last degree, and moved with a thorough contempt of the Carthaginians, who now were become despicable to all their neighbours, the cities and states, which had sent them auxiliaries, took up arms, intending to take signal vengeance of them, for the late affront offered them in the persons of their countrymen. They dispatched expresses into all parts notifying the ill usage they had met with in the most aggravating terms; by which means, supplies coming from every quarter, they soon assembled a considerable body of troops, with which they encamped in the fields. And now their design being publicly known, and that they had forces likewise to put it in execution, the whole country rose; so that their army in a short time amounted to above two hundred thousand effective men. With this formidable body they immediately took their rout towards Carthage [a].

The Africans revolt from the Cathaginians.

On their march, they took Tunis, a city in the neighbourhood of Carthage, which surrendered at the first summons. This gave a dreadful alarm to the citizens of Carthage, who now gave up every thing for lost. However, upon the approach of the enemy, they engaged them, but were defeated in a pitched battle, and obliged to retire within their walls. As the Carthaginians, in all public calamities, carried their superstition to a very great excess, their first care was to appease the offended gods, particularly Ceres and Proserpina, whose temples they had violated at Syracuse, and therefore considered this fresh melancholy incident as the effect of their resentment. Before, these deities had never been heard of in Africa; but now, to atone for the outrage that had been offered them, magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priests selected from amongst the most distinguished families of the city for their services; and all their sacrifices ordered to be offered after the Greek manner, those Greeks amongst them, who were versed in the rites and ceremonies peculiar to the worship of these goddesses, being appointed to officiate in this service.

They take Tunis, and advance into the neighbourhood of Carthage.

ſervice. Having by this means ſufficiently, as they apprehended, atoned for paſt offences to theſe deities, they equipped a fleet, and made all neceſſary preparations to reduce the rebels, and thoſe who ſupported them, to reaſon [b].

THOUGH the African forces were very numerous, yet, happily for the Carthaginians, they wanted a general, as well as ſubordinate officers, of experience, and neither had warlike engines to carry on a ſiege, nor proviſions to ſupport ſo vaſt a multitude; whereas the Carthaginians being maſters of the ſea, were ſupplied with every thing in great plenty from Sardinia. Such an army as this was like a body uninformed with a ſoul. As there was no diſcipline or ſubordination in it, every perſon might ſet up himſelf for a general, and claim an independence on the reſt; which would ſoon cauſe numberleſs factions and diviſions amongſt them, and conſequently ſoon diſſolve the whole. Thus in fact it happened with this rabble of an army; for diſſenſions ariſing therein, the famine daily encreaſing, and many of their leaders being bribed by the Carthaginians to deſert, the individuals of it withdrew to their reſpective homes, and by this means delivered Carthage from one of the moſt imminent dangers that had ever threatened it [c].

But are obliged at laſt to diſperſe.

AFTER the late diſaſter in Sicily, Himilco had left Mago to take care of the Carthaginian intereſt there, and ſettle their broken affairs in the beſt manner poſſible. In order to this, he treated all the Sicilians ſubject to Carthage with great mildneſs and humanity, and granted his protection to all thoſe who were perſecuted by Dionyſius. He alſo entered into alliances with ſeveral Sicilian cities, which had an averſion to that tyrant. Strengthened by theſe alliances, and receiving great reinforcements from Carthage, he formed an army, and made an incurſion into the territory of Meſſana. Having ravaged this in a dreadful manner, he carried off the plunder, and retired to Abacænum, a city of his confederates, where he encamped. Dionyſius, advancing to Abacænum with his army, offered him battle; which challenge Mago accepted, but was driven out of the field, with the loſs of above eight hundred men. Upon this defeat, the Carthaginian general, with his broken troops, entered Abacænum; and Dionyſius returned to Syracuſe [d].

Dionyſius routs Mago at Abacænum.

NOTWITH-

The Carthaginians, notwithstanding their losses, meditate a fresh attempt upon the island of Sicily.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great losses the Carthaginians had sustained in the course of this war, they could not forbear making new attempts upon the island of Sicily. Their officers were therefore sent, as usual, to levy forces in Africa, Sardinia, and some of those parts of Italy not inhabited by Greeks. As they had hitherto had such bad success with their fleet, they proposed determining the fate of Sicily by a decisive battle in the field; for which reason they fitted out a much weaker squadron of long ships, than in any of the former expeditions. The Carthaginians armed all their troops on this occasion in the completest manner, and appointed Mago, who was defeated the year before at Abacænum, commander in chief, hoping the face of affairs in the island above-mentioned would soon receive a very considerable alteration.

MAGO, assembling his land-forces, found them to amount to eighty thousand fighting men, with which he landed in Sicily. On his march through the territories of the Siculi, many cities fell to him; which gave him great encouragement. At last he encamped on the river Chrysas in the country of the Agyrinæans, and attempted to bring over that people to his party; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, and receiving intelligence, that Dionysius was advancing against him at the head of twenty thousand men, he thought proper to continue some time in his camp, and put himself there into a posture to receive the enemy. In the mean time the tyrant, being arrived in the neighbourhood of the Carthaginian camp, sent to Agyris, prince of the Agyrinæans, to join him with all his forces, and supply his troops with some provisions. This tyrant was next to Dionysius in power of all others in the island, his city containing no less than twenty thousand inhabitants. His coffers at that time were full of treasure; for he had lately put to death some of his principal subjects, and confiscated their estates. Dionysius therefore making him a visit, with some of his particular friends, prevailed upon Agyris to come into his measures; in consequence of which he received a supply of provisions and a strong reinforcement of troops. What induced Agyris to fall in so readily with the Syracusan tyrant's views was, the promise of a large extent of territory adjoining to his own, in case their arms were attended with success in this war [e].

Dionysius wins Agyris, tyrant of the Agyrinæans, over to his interest;

In the mean time, Mago, finding himſelf in an enemy's country, and reduced to great ſtreights for want of proviſions, began to be very uneaſy. The Syracuſans were for coming to a battle immediately with him; but this Dionyſius oppoſed, telling them, they might ruin the enemy's whole army without ſtriking a ſtroke, by ſtarving them to a ſurrender. And indeed he had good reaſon for what he advanced; for the Agyrinæans, being well acquainted with all the paſſes and by-ways of the country, every day ſurpriſed the Carthaginian parties, and, after cutting them to pieces, intercepted all the proviſions they were carrying to their camp. However, the Syracuſans, being diſguſted at Dionyſius's refuſal to comply with their motion, directly quitted his camp. This threw the tyrant into a great conſternation, and obliged him to manumit all the ſlaves, as he had done once before. Soon after, the Carthaginians, moved by the dreadful proſpect of a famine, thought proper to ſend embaſſadors to him, to propoſe an accommodation. This being as neceſſary for Dionyſius in his preſent circumſtances as the Carthaginians, a peace was concluded to the ſatisfaction of both parties, without any further effuſion of blood. The new treaty agreed in all particulars with the former; only by an additional article the city of Tauromínium was given up to Dionyſius, who, driving from thence the Siculi, placed the choiceſt of his mercenaries in their room. As for Mago, as ſoon as the treaty was ſigned, he returned to Carthage, leaving his allies in Sicily to ſhift for themſelves. Thus this war ended, notwithſtanding the terrible blow they received before Syracuſe, very little to the diſadvantage of the Carthaginians[f].

From this time, for nine years, the Carthaginians enjoyed an uninterrupted repoſe, at leaſt hiſtory is ſilent as to any military tranſactions they were concerned in during that interval. But, in the ſecond year of the ninety-ninth olympiad, Dionyſius, meditating a war againſt them, formed a project of putting his finances upon (A) ſuch a footing,

(A) Ariſtotle and Polyænus affirm, that Dionyſius, in his expedition to Etruria, had an hundred galleys, as likewiſe a large ſhip with a body of horſe on board, with which making a deſcent, he plundered the temple of Leucothea, from whence carrying off

The ſame authors relate, that, upon his re-embarquing, he was informed, that the ſoldiers and ſeamen had privately conveyed on board the fleet a thouſand talents of ſilver; whereupon he iſſued out an order before he landed in Sicily, requiring every perſon to bring to him half of his treaſure, upon pain of death, promiſing each of them the other half for his own uſe, in caſe of a compliance herewith. When the landmen and mariners brought him in their reſpective halves, he knew what riches remained ſtill in their poſſeſſion, and obliged them to refund thoſe likewiſe (1). Ælian takes notice of this expedition, telling us (2), that Dionyſius impiouſly carried off all the treaſures of Apollo and Leucothea, and amongſt other valuable moveables a ſilver table, placed near the ſtatue of Apollo; and that the men who took it out of the temple, at the ſame time drank, or offered, to the god, the cup of the good Genius; which they did by way of joke or ridicule, that cup or health going round the company amongſt the antients, after the concluſion of their meals, when the tables were taken away. We muſt not omit obſerving, that the learned Perizonius imagines Ariſtotle's text here to have been corrupted, and thinks it may be corrected by Ælian, viz. by inſerting Τροιζηνίδα or Τροιζηνίαν inſtead of Τυρρηνίαν, and this in contradiction to the manuſcripts. But we muſt beg leave to diſſent from that great man in this particular; for that this very paſſage of Ælian is corrupted, he himſelf allows; nay, ſo corrupted, that it has embaraſſed moſt, if not all, of thoſe learned men, who have endeavoured to tranſlate and explain that author, particularly Geſner, Scheffer, and Juſtus Vulteius, none of whom have been able to come at his meaning. Beſides, all the manuſcripts of Polyænus, an author who did not occur to Perizonius, and who lived within a very few years of Ælian, if he was not cotemporary with him, in the paſſage referred to, which was moſt certainly taken from Ariſtotle, have Τυρρηνίαν. This authority is of much greater weight than the teſtimony of Pauſanias, in proof of there having been in antient times a temple ſacred to Apollo at Trœzene; which, we cannot help thinking, is little, if any thing at all, to the purpoſe.

that time, he easily put in execution. Having fitted out sixty galleys, under colour of clearing the seas of pyrates, he made a descent in Etruria, and plundered a rich temple in the suburbs of Agylla, carrying away, besides the rich moveables and furniture, above a thousand talents in money. Five hundred talents more he raised by the sale of the spoils, and with this money, set on foot a numerous army. He now wanted nothing but a plausible pretence to break with the Carthaginians, for which he was not long at a loss. Observing, that the Carthaginian subjects in Sicily were inclined to a revolt, he took as many of them under his protection as would accept of it, and entered into a league with them; the consequence of which was an admission of his troops into their cities. The Carthaginians, being apprised of this, first remonstrated against such a proceeding, as a manifest infraction of the treaties then subsisting between them, by ministers sent to the tyrant for that purpose; but this not avail, they declared war against him [g].

Dionysius plunders a rich temple in Etruria,

And breaks again with the Carthaginians.

THE people of Carthage, suspecting his design against their state, upon the first notice they received of his extraordinary preparations, had strengthened themselves by alliances with their neighbours, and taken all other necessary measures to secure themselves against the impending storm. Expecting to be attacked by the tyrant's whole power, they formed an army out of the flower of their citizens, which was joined by a strong body of foreign mercenaries they had engaged in their service. To give a greater diversion to the tyrant, they divided their army into two bodies, one of which they sent to Italy, and the other to Sicily; and this obliged Dionysius likewise to divide his forces. The main army, however, was to act in Sicily, under the command of Mago, who, soon after his arrival, was attacked by Dionysius at a place called Cabala. The encounter was rude and bloody; but at last the Carthaginians were overthrown, and forced to fly to a neighbouring hill, that was indeed strong by its situation, but destitute of water. In the battle they had ten thousand men killed upon the spot, together with Mago their general, who behaved with great bravery and resolution, and five thousand taken prisoners. The Carthaginians, terrified by this defeat, and finding themselves blocked

ed up by Dionyſius on the hill, where they were like to die of thirſt, were forced to ſue for a peace. Dionyſius anſwered the embaſſadors they ſent him with great haughtineſs, that there was only one way left for them to make peace with him, and that was, forthwith to evacuate Sicily, and to defray all the expences of the war. Theſe hard terms they pretended to comply with; but at the ſame time repreſenting that it was not in their power to deliver up the cities they poſſeſſed in Sicily (B), without the expreſs orders of their republic, they obtained a truce, which was to laſt till the return of an expreſs ſent to Carthage. In the mean time, they buried Mago, who, at the time of his death, was one of their ſuffetes, with as much pomp and magnificence, as the preſent melancholy ſituation of their affairs would permit, and appointed his ſon Mago to command the troops in his room [h].

Dionysius, much elated with his good ſucceſs, now looked upon himſelf as ſovereign of all Sicily, not doubting, but he ſhould ſoon be in a capacity of giving laws to all his neighbours. But in this he was greatly miſtaken; for the Carthaginians intended nothing leſs than in reality to accept of the conditions offered them. As their whole conduct on this occaſion was calculated only to amuſe the tyrant, till they had an opportunity of re-eſtabliſhing their affairs, in the time of the truce Mago their new general raiſed and diſciplined freſh troops, and improved that ſhort interval allowed him ſo well, that, at the return of the expreſs ſent to Carthage, he took the field with a powerful army. As Mago, though young, had, on many occaſions, given proofs of an extraordinary valour and prudence, the forces under his conduct ſhewed great impatience to come to blows with the enemy. Obſerving therefore their ardor, immediate'y upon the expiration of the truce, he gave Dionyſius battle not far from Cronion, and entirely defeated him (C), killing fourteen thouſand Syracuſans on the ſpot, and among the reſt Leptines (D) his brother, a gallant officer, who was greatly regretted, even by thoſe who hated the tyrant. In the beginning of the engagement, Dionyſius had the advantage, repulſing thoſe that charged him with great bravery; but when he heard of the death of Leptines, and that the body he commanded was broke and diſperſed, he immediately betook himſelf to flight, and was hotly purſued by the Carthaginians. A dreadful ſlaughter was made of the run-aways in the purſuit; and as the enemy gave no quarter, the reſt muſt all have been cut off to a man, had they not, by the favour of the night, found means to eſcape. This made the Carthagians ample amends for the blow they received at Cabala, and left them in full poſſeſſion, not only of their own towns, but alſo of a good part of the Syracuſan territories. Dionyſius, with the remains of his ſhattered army, fled to Syracuſe, where he expected ſoon to be beſieged by the victorious enemy. But the Carthaginian general uſed his victory with

(B) Polyænus relates this in a manner ſomething different from Diodorus. He ſays, that the Carthaginians pretended they had not the power of concluding a peace with Dionyſius, without the conſent of their admiral; and therefore begged they might be permitted to remove their camp into the neighbourhood of their fleet, which would enable them to comply with the conditions preſcribed them. The tyrant granted this requeſt, though againſt the advice of Leptines; which brought upon him the diſaſter here mentioned (3).

But is overthrown at Cronion.

(C) According to Polyænus, the Carthaginians had a ſtrong party in the city of Cronion, who were deſirous of opening the gates to them. The Carthaginian general, being appriſed of this, when the wind favoured his project, ſet a wood on fire, which grew cloſe by the town, the ſmoke of which being driven by the wind into the face of the enemy, who lay encamped over-againſt him, prevented them from diſcovering any motion he might make. Taking advantage of this, he approached the place, and was admitted by the Cronians in his intereſt into the town (4).

(D) Frontinus relates, that this Leptines was the author of the following ſtratagem: he ordered a detachment of his troops to lay waſte his own lands, and burn ſeveral Syracuſan caſtles and villages in the neighbourhood of the Carthaginian camp in the night-time. The Carthaginians, imagining this to have been done by their own men, ſent a ſtrong body of troops out of the camp to ſupport them; but theſe falling into an ambuſcade, which Leptines had laid for them, were entirely defeated, and driven back to their camp with great ſlaughter (5).

great moderation, and, inſtead of purſuing the routed enemy, retired to Panormus, whence he ſent embaſſadors to Dionyſius, offering him terms of peace, which he readily embraced; and a treaty was concluded on the following conditions, viz. that both parties ſhould keep what they had at the breaking out of the war, ſave only that Dionyſius ſhould deliver up to the Carthaginians the city and territory of Selinus, and that part of the territory of Agrigentum adjoining to it, which extended as far as the river Halycus, and beſides pay a thouſand talents, to defray the expences of the war. In other reſpects, all former treaties betwixt the two powers were to ſubſiſt in their fulleſt extent [i].

The Carthaginians make an expedition to Italy, in favour of the people of Hippo, who are their confederates.

ABOUT three years after the concluſion of this laſt war, the Carthaginians landed an army in Italy, and reſtored the inhabitants of Hippo, or, as Strabo calls it, Hipponium, to their city, from whence they had for ſome time been expelled. This city was very antient, as being mentioned by Scylax, and was, according to Strabo, built by the people of Locri. The Romans called it Vibo, Valentia, and Vibo Valentia; but Ptolemy made uſe of the old name, following herein Scylax and Strabo. If the laſt author may be credited, the country about it was extremely beautiful, being covered with flowers of various kinds, of which the matrons of the place made chaplets or garlands, and wore them in honour of Proſerpina, who, according to an antient tradition prevailing amongſt the natives, came thither on purpoſe to gather flowers. The citizens were undoubtedly in alliance with the Carthaginians, who made this expedition purely with a deſign to reinſtate them in the poſſeſſion of their native country; which after they had effected, by recalling the exiles from all parts, and treating them with great kindneſs, they returned to Africa.

IMMEDIATELY after the arrival of the troops from Italy, Carthage had a moſt terrible calamity to ſtruggle with: the plague broke out afreſh there, and ſwept away an infinite number of the inhabitants. This ſeems to have raged with greater violence than any diſtemper the city was ever viſited with before; for ſuch vaſt multitudes were carried off by it, that the whole country was in a manner depopulated. The Africans and Sardi, encouraged by the extreme treme weakneſs to which that ſtate was hereby reduced, attempted to ſhake off the Carthaginian yoke; but were at laſt, not without ſome effuſion of blood, reduced to their former obedience. The peſtilence we are now ſpeaking of, was of a very ſingular nature; for panic terrors and violent fits of frenſy ſeized on a ſudden the heads of thoſe afflicted with it, who ſallying ſword in hand out of their houſes, as if the enemy had taken the city, killed or wounded all who unhappily came in their way. Juſtin ſeems to intimate, that the Carthaginians laboured under ſuch a grievous ſickneſs as this ſeveral years, with little or no intermiſſion; for it appears from a hint he has given us, that they were delivered from the plague not long before the death of Dionyſius [k].

The Africans and Sardi rebel; but are at laſt reduced to their former obedience.

TOWARDS the beginning of the hundred and third olympiad, Dionyſius, aſſembling a great number of forces, reſolved to fall upon the Carthaginians, who were then in a very bad ſituation, on account of the ravages the plague had made, and the war with the Africans and Sardi, which had not been long finiſhed. As he had not the leaſt colour or pretext for ſuch an open violation of treaties, he was obliged to have recourſe to a downright falſity, viz. that the Carthaginians made incurſions into his dominions. Without putting himſelf to the trouble therefore of making a formal declaration of war, he advanced into the Carthaginian territories, with an army of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, attended by a navy of three hundred ſail. With this formidable force he ſoon reduced the cities of Selinus and Entella, plundering and laying waſte all the adjacent country. Then he made himſelf maſter of Eryx, and laid ſiege to Lilybæum; which, being defended by a numerous garriſon, baffled his efforts in ſuch a manner, that he was obliged to riſe from before it. Being informed, that the arſenal at Carthage was conſumed by fire, he concluded, that this ſtate would find it impoſſible to equip a fleet, and therefore laid up thirty of his beſt galleys in the haven at Eryx, and ſent back all the reſt to Syracuſe. The Carthaginians, being appriſed how little the tyrant was upon his guard, immediately manned two hundred galleys, and unexpectedly entering the port of Eryx, ſurpriſed that part of

of his fleet laid up there, and carried moſt of it off. After this, a truce was agreed upon by both parties, and the troops retired into winter-quarters. Dionyſius did not long ſurvive this event: having reigned thirty-eight years, he was ſucceeded by a ſon of the ſame name in the government of Syracuſe [l].

The Greek language is expelled Carthage, on account of a treaſonable correſpondence carried on in it between a Carthaginian and Dionyſius.

THOUGH Diodorus does not ſay expreſly, that the Carthaginians, upon the laſt rupture, ſent a body of troops to Sicily, yet Juſtin gives us ſome reaſon to believe, that they either did, or deſigned it, and that the commander's name was Hanno. The ſame author farther informs us, that Suniator, or Suniates, a perſon of great authority in the city, bore an implacable hatred to Hanno, and, in order to do him a prejudice, endeavoured to give the enemy intelligence of his motions. This he did by writing in Greek to Dionyſius; but his letter, wherein he made very free with Hanno's character, was intercepted, and he thereupon found guilty of treaſon by the ſenate. This occaſioned the paſſing of a law at Carthage, whereby all the inhabitants were forbid learning either to write or ſpeak the Greek language, that they might be deprived of all means of correſponding with the enemy [m].

WE are told by Oroſius, that the Carthaginians concluded their firſt treaty with the Romans in the four hundred and ſecond year of Rome, which was not far from the time we are now ſpeaking of. But this we muſt by no means give credit to, becauſe it is contradicted by Polybius, an author infinitely ſuperior in point of authority to Oroſius, who affirms, that the firſt treaty the Carthaginians entered into with the Romans happened in the year after the regifuge; and that this was the ſecond. And here we cannot forbear expreſſing our ſurpriſe at M. Rollin, who quotes Oroſius as affirming this to have been the ſecond treaty concluded between the two republics; whereas that author expreſsly aſſerts it to have been the firſt. The articles of this treaty may be ſeen in a former part of this work, and therefore we ſhall not here repeat them. However, it may be proper to obſerve, that the people of Utica and Tyre, according to Polybius, were compriſed in the treaty, and that the Romans were not permitted to build towns, or ravage the country, in any part beyond the Fair Promontory, Maſtia, and Tarſeium. The Car-

Carthaginians, being at this time in full poſſeſſion of Sardinia and a great part of Africa, thought it conſiſtent with juſtice, and even policy, to prevent all intercourſe betwixt the Romans and theſe countries. From the treaty here mentioned it farther appears, that both the Romans and Carthaginians applied themſelves with great diligence at this time to commerce. Soon after this event, the Romans gained a ſignal victory over the Samnites; upon which the Carthaginians ſent to compliment the republic on her ſucceſs, and made a preſent of a crown (E) of gold of twenty-five pounds weight to Jupiter Capitolinus, by way of thankſgiving for ſo glorious an action [n]. But to return to the affairs of Sicily.

Dionyſius the ſecond comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians

THE prince now upon the throne was of quite a different character from his father, being as peaceable and calm in his temper, as the other was active and enterpriſing; but this mildneſs and moderation being rather the effect of a ſlothful and indolent diſpoſition, than of a wiſe and judicious underſtanding, his ſubjects from hence reaped no great benefit. Soon after his taking upon himſelf the government of Syracuſe, he changed the truce with the Carthaginians into a perpetual peace, and made it his endeavour to cultivate a good underſtanding with that neighbouring ſtate. As Diodorus aſcribes this peace to his indolence and ſloth, and conſequently, in ſome meaſure, ſeems to upbraid him for it, we have ſome reaſon from hence to believe, that the terms of it were not very advantageous to the Syracuſans [o].

(E) This muſt have been a mere compliment, proceeding from ſome political motive to us unknown; for it was by no means the intereſt of the Carthaginians, that the Samnites ſhould be ſubdued by the Romans. The latter, at this time, began to rival the Carthaginians in trade; whereas the former ſeem to have been their good and faithful allies; at leaſt it is certain they ſometimes ſupplied them with bodies of auxiliaries or mercenary troops, as we ſhall find towards the cloſe of this ſection. This paſſage ſeems to intimate, that Jupiter was a deity well known at Carthage, and that

A war commences between the Syracuſans and the Corinthians on the one hand and Dionyſius and the Carthaginians on the other.

SOME years after, the people of Syracuſe, being agitated by civil diſſenſions, were involved in the greateſt miſeries (F). Dionyſius was obliged to quit his throne, and continued an exile for ten years; but at laſt, the city being rent into parties and factions upon the death of Dion, he found means to reinſtate himſelf in his dominions. His paſt misfortunes greatly inflamed his temper, and rendered him very ſavage and brutal. In ſhort, the better ſort of the citizens, not being able to brook ſo cruel a ſervitude, implored the aid of Icetas, who was by deſcent a Syracuſan, and at that time tyrant of the Leontini; they created him general of all their forces, abandoning themſelves to his conduct; not that they had any great opinion of his virtue, but becauſe they had no other reſource. Beſides, they entertained ſome hopes of his being both able and willing to protect them, as he was in ſome reſpect their countryman, and had an army able to cope with that of Dionyſius. The Carthaginians, thinking this a proper opportunity to make themſelves abſolute maſters of Sicily, fitted out a great fleet, and for ſome time hovered about the coaſts of that iſland, not being at firſt determined where to make a deſcent. This ſo alarmed the Syracuſans, that they apprehended themſelves upon the brink of ruin, and in this extremity reſolved to have recourſe to the Corinthians, from whom they were originally deſcended, and whoſe aſſiſtance had ſeveral times extricated them out of great difficulties. The Corinthians, being the moſt famed of all the Greek nations that his image there was adorned with a crown of gold, agreeably to what has been before obſerved of Baal in the Phœnician hiſtory (6).

(F) It appears from Diodorus, that the Carthaginians were at the bottom of theſe civil diſſenſions at Syracuſe; for Dionyſius had never been dethroned by Dion, had not Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, a city in the territory of Agrigentum, ſuppoſed to have been built by Minos, given the latter a kind reception there, permitted him to land five thouſand arms, and ſupplied him with carriages to convey them to Syracuſe. This was certainly good policy in the Carthaginians, whoſe intereſt it was to endeavour rending the city of Syracuſe into as many factions as poſſible, that the inhabitants might deſtroy one another, and thereby become a more eaſy prey to the ſtate of Carthage (7).

nations for their profeſſed averſion to tyranny in every ſhape, readily granted their requeſt, and gave their embaſſadors a moſt kind reception. Icetas, whoſe only view was to make himſelf maſter of Syracuſe, in the mean time ſeemed to concur with theſe meaſures, though he had actually entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians. He was in hopes ſome domeſtic broils or other would prevent the Corinthians from aſſiſting their relations, and then, by his complying with this motion, he doubted not he ſhould win over to his intereſt thoſe very perſons who made it, which would enable him the more eaſily to accompliſh his deſign. He therefore diſpatched deputies himſelf along with the Syracuſan miniſters; but in the mean time was contriving how he could prevent the Corinthians from ſending any forces into the iſland, which, according to his laſt treaty with the Carthaginians, was, after the expulſion of Dionyſius, to be divided between him and them. However, the Corinthians, then enjoying a profound tranquillity, were at leiſure to ſend a body of troops to Syracuſe, which, in a general aſſembly, it was reſolved ſhould be done. As the Syracuſans in particular deſired they would ſend them an able and experienced general, they appointed Timoleon, the ſon of Timodemus and Demariſte, a perſon of diſtinguiſhed merit, to take upon him the command of the Syracuſan army, in conjunction with their forces, and with theſe he was to act againſt Dionyſius and the Carthaginians [p].

Icetas endeavours to diſſuade the Corinthians from ſending any forces to Syracuſe.

THE Syracuſan embaſſadors were ſcarce ſet out for Corinth, when Icetas took off the maſk, and openly joined the Carthaginians, intending, by their aſſiſtance, to poſſeſs himſelf of Syracuſe, and that under colour of aſſiſting the inhabitants againſt Dionyſius. But being apprehenſive, that a body of forces from Corinth, under the conduct of a ſkilful general, would defeat his meaſures, he diſpatched an expreſs to the Corinthians, acquainting them, that the Carthaginians, appriſed of their deſign, were waiting to intercept their ſquadron with a ſtrong fleet; and that their ſlowneſs in ſending him ſuccours had obliged him to call in even the Carthaginians to his aid, and employ them againſt the tyrant; wherefore they might forbear making any further levies, or exhauſting their treaſures by great, but uſeleſs, expences, ſince he could, without the aſſiſtance of his allies the Carthaginians, drive out Dionyſius, and reſtore Syracuſe to to its antient liberty. The Corinthians, hereby plainly discovering, that the tyrant aspired to the sovereignty of Syracuse, and being justly at that time celebrated for the generous notions they entertained in behalf of liberty, were incensed to the last degree at such a perfidious conduct; and therefore those who had before either opposed the expedition, or been cold and languid in promoting it, now readily concurred with the rest, and all the necessary dispositions were made for Timoleon's sudden departure [q].

Timoleon, encouraged by several good omens, sets sail for Sicily.

PLUTARCH tells us, that when the troops were ready to embarque, the goddess Proserpina, attended by her mother Ceres, both in travelling habits, appeared to her female priests in a dream or vision; and that both these deities declared they would sail with Timoleon to Sicily, an island in a peculiar manner sacred to them. This greatly encouraged Timoleon, who, consecrating the best trireme of his squadron to the goddesses, called it the sacred ship of Ceres and Proserpina. The same author likewise relates, that Timoleon going to Delphi, in order to sacrifice there to Apollo, and descending into the place where the responses of the oracle were received, a wreath or garland, interwoven with crowns and trophies, slipping from among the consecrated gifts, that were hung up in the temple, fell directly upon his head; which he interpreted as an happy omen, Apollo thereby seeming to crown him with success, and to assure him of a triumph over Icetas and the Carthaginians. He set sail from Corinth with seven galleys of his own nation, two of Corcyra, and a tenth, which was sent him by the Leucadians, with only a thousand soldiers on board; a very small force, considering the enterprize he was going upon. Our author farther informs us, that Timoleon, getting out of port by night, was carried by a prosperous gale into the ocean, and preceded in the night by a flame, resembling those torches that were used in the sacred mysteries of Ceres and Proserpina, which conducted him to that part of Italy where he intended to land; and that this being interpreted by his soothsayers as a confirmation of what those two goddesses had before declared, he looked upon it as a sure token of victory. Pursuing his voyage therefore over the Ionian sea with great alacrity, he soon arrived safe with his small fleet at Metapontum, now Torre di Mare, on the coaſt of Italy [r].

THE firſt advice he received here was, that Icetas had defeated Dionyſius, and having made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of the city, had obliged the tyrant to ſhut himſelf up in the citadel. At the ſame time he was informed, that the Carthaginians had, by the treaty with Icetas, engaged themſelves to hinder the Corinthian ſquadron from putting in at any of the Sicilian ports, that being by this means obliged to return home, they might from thence meet with no farther obſtruction in dividing the iſland between them. This gave him great uneaſineſs; however, he advanced with his ſmall fleet to Rhegium, where he found embaſſadors from Icetas, who were charged to acquaint him, that if he thought proper, he might come to Syracuſe, and aſſiſt him with his advice; and that he ſhould meet with a kind reception there, and even be a partaker of his good fortune, provided he would diſmiſs his troops; but otherwiſe the Syracuſans, who were jealous of foreign forces, would not admit him into the city. Theſe miniſters were convoyed to Rhegium by twenty Carthaginian galleys, who had orders to block up the road, and oppoſe Timoleon, if he offered to approach Syracuſe. That general, finding himſelf unable to force his way, by reaſon of the ſuperior ſtrength of the enemy, and that, even provided he could land at Syracuſe, his handful of troops would not be able to engage thoſe of Icetas, flushed with victory and ſupported by a numerous Carthaginian army, was reſolved to have recourſe to artifice at this critical conjuncture. He therefore demanded a conference with the embaſſadors and the chief commanders of the Carthaginian ſquadron, in the preſence of the people of Rhegium. He pretended to liſten to the propoſal offered him; but inſiſted, that as the Rhegians were Greeks, and common friends to both parties, he ought firſt to hear what they had to ſay, and act, if poſſible, by their advice, that he might on his return to Corinth, have wherewithal to juſtify his conduct; alledging further, that the Carthaginians themſelves would more ſcrupulouſly obſerve the articles of a treaty they had ſigned before ſo many witneſſes. The Rhegians were privy to the deſign, and dreaded nothing more than the conſequence of having ſo formidable a nation in their neighbourhood as the Carthaginians. They ſummoned therefore an aſſembly, and ſhut the gates of the city, under pretence of preventing the citizens from going abroad, that they might apply themſelves ſolely to the affair in hand. In the mean time, the Carthaginians, being amuſed, and verily believing, that Timoleon would be perſuaded to return home, had not made the leaſt preparation to attack him, in caſe he ſhould attempt ſteering his courſe towards the coaſt of Sicily.

And lands his forces in Sicily by a ſtratagem.

TIMOLEON, that he might not give the Carthaginians the leaſt room to ſuſpect his deſign, did not offer for a conſiderable time to ſtir out of the aſſembly, which being met, long ſpeeches were made, and debates carried on, in appearance with great warmth, though without coming to a point, on purpoſe to gain time; nay, Timoleon, farther to prevent any ground for ſuſpicion, frequently made ſigns, as though he was going to begin a ſpeech in ſupport of the reſolution he had ſeemingly formed. But while the Carthaginian commanders were buſy in the council, nine Corinthian galleys, according to the orders they had received from Timoleon, ſet ſail, and paſſed in ſight of the Carthaginian fleet, unable at that time to act, by reaſon of the abſence of its captains, and moreover believing, that their departure had been agreed on between the officers of both parties, who, it was ſuppoſed, were then in the city. When Timoleon was privately informed, that his galleys were at ſea, by the aſſiſtance of the Rhegians about his chair, he ſlipped through the croud, and making to the galley that was left, embarqued, and rejoined the reſt of his ſquadron. The Carthaginians, being thus deluded, were extremely chagrined, making bitter complaints of the Rhegian perfidiouſneſs and fraud. The Rhegians, on the other hand, greatly rejoiced to ſee the Carthaginians overcome at their own weapons, and could not forbear rallying them thereupon. The aſſembly not having broke up till it was dark, the Carthaginians could not come up with Timoleon, ſo far was he got before them, though they gave him chace for ſome time. He arrived therefore ſafe with his whole fleet at Taurominium [s].

THE Carthaginian general, appriſed of Timoleon's landing at Taurominium, diſpatched an expreſs on board one of his galleys thither, threatening Andromachus, tyrant of that that city, with his reſentment, if he did not immediately drive away the Corinthians from thence. The form of the menace, according to Plutarch, was this: The barbarian, ſtretching out his hand with the inſide upward, and then turning it down again, threatened to turn the city topſy-turvy juſt ſo, in as little time, and with as much eaſe. Andromachus, laughing, made no other reply to this inſolence, than by repeating the ſame motion with an air of contempt, and ordering him to be gone immediately, upon pain of having that trial of dexterity exerciſed firſt upon the veſſel which brought him thither. This ſingle circumſtance, ſlight as it is, ſeems clearly to point out the Carthaginian original, ſuch kind of inſolent denunciations having been common in the eaſt, as may be learned from ſcripture, to omit what may be collected on this head from profane authors [t].

Icetas no ſooner received intelligence of Timoleon's arrival in Sicily, than he was thrown into a great conſternation, and deſired the Carthaginians to ſend a ſquadron of galleys with all poſſible expedition to guard the coaſts. Soon after, he put the Carthaginian fleet, conſiſting of an hundred and fifty galleys, in poſſeſſion of the harbour of Syracuſe, and diſpatched an expreſs to Mago, the Carthaginian general, preſſing him to advance with his whole army to the gates of the city. In the mean time, Timoleon, drawing his forces out of Taurominium, which in the whole did not amount to above a thouſand or twelve hundred men, began his march towards the duſk of the evening, and arrived the next day at Adranum, a place to which Icetas had advanced a little before at the head of a Carthaginian detachment of five thouſand men. Theſe he ſurprized at ſupper, and therefore meeting with but a faint reſiſtance, eaſily made himſelf maſter of their camp, putting three hundred of them to the ſword, and taking ſix hundred priſoners. In order to follow his blow, and ſtrike the greater terror into the enemy, he flew like lightning to Syracuſe, and even broke into one part of the town, before any thing of his march was known. Here he immediately took poſt with his troops, and defended himſelf with that intrepid reſolution, that the whole united power of Icetas and the Carthaginians found it impoſſible to diſlodge him [u].

The situation of affairs in Sicily, when Timoleon broke into Syracuse.

THE Carthaginians, being informed, some time before this war broke out, that the whole island of Sicily was soon like to be in a flame, greatly caressed all those cities with whom they were in alliance, to which many other neighbouring states were invited to accede, particularly Icetas, tyrant of the Leontini, the Syracusan general, with whom a treaty offensive and defensive was concluded, as above-mentioned. In order therefore to make good their engagements, and support their confederates, especially Icetas, they raised a great number of forces both by sea and land, and transported them to Sicily, under the command of Hanno their general. Upon a general muster here, the army was found to consist of fifty thousand men, and three hundred chariots. These were attended with two thousand carriages drawn by two horses a-piece, an immense quantity of provisions, besides a prodigious number of arms, engines of battery, and all sorts of warlike stores. The fleet, destined to concur with these land-forces in the operations of the campaign, was composed of an hundred and fifty long ships or galleys, as related above. Hanno, with his forces, moved first towards Entella; which city he caused to be blocked up, having before ravaged and destroyed the country all round it. The Campanians, however, then in garrison, found means to notify their distress to the neighbouring cities, and to desire their assistance; but none of them durst stir, except Galeria, which sent them a reinforcement of a thousand men, who, being intercepted by the Carthaginians, were all cut to pieces. The Campanians indeed, who inhabited Ætna, seemed at first, on account of their consanguinity, disposed to assist them; but receiving advice of the terrible fate the Galerians had met with, they judged it more convenient to lie still. In the mean time, Icetas, moving from Leontium with his army, encamped at Olympus, fortifying his camp with a trench and a parapet, that he might be the better enabled to receive Dionysius, in case he should think proper to attack him. Provisions failing him, he was obliged to return to Leontium for a fresh supply. This Dionysius interpreting as a flight, fell directly upon his rear; which brought on a general engagement. But, after a sharp conflict, Icetas routed him, killing three thousand of his men upon the spot, and pursuing the rest with so much ardor, that he entered with them pell-mell into the town of Syracuse; by which means he possessed himself of the whole city, city, except the iſland on which the citadel ſtood. This was the ſituation of affairs in Syracuſe, when Timoleon broke into the city, and gave Icetas the defeat abovementioned [w].

The Sicilians at firſt not diſpoſed to join Timoleon.

BEFORE the action at Adranum, the Sicilians in general were ſo far from being diſpoſed to join Timoleon, that they were prejudiced againſt him as a foreign commander; which was chiefly owing to the calamities they had formerly ſuffered by the treachery of Calippus an Athenian, and Pharax a Lacedæmonian general; for theſe perſons, under the ſpecious pretext of delivering them from tyranny, had treated them in a more rigorous and oppreſſive manner than the worſt and moſt deſpotic of their own tyrants. The people of Adranum only were divided in their ſentiments, ſome preferring the Carthaginians and Icetas, and others the Corinthians. Hence it came to paſs, that both partiers were ſolicited for ſuccours by their reſpective confederates; and both ſides accordingly advancing to the relief of their friends much about the ſame time, engaged in the manner above related. The Corinthians, being victorious, entirely through the valour and conduct of Timoleon, according to Plutarch, were received with open arms by the people of Adranum, and, after their example, other cities opened their gates to Timoleon, and joined him with all their forces. In the mean time, Dionyſius, as we have already obſerved, poſſeſſed the iſland of Ortygia, Icetas Neapolis and Acradina, Timoleon all the reſt of the city, and the Carthaginians the port, having moreover their army encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the town. This deplorable ſituation threw Timoleon into great perplexities, ſo that he was at a loſs what courſe to take. Whilſt he remained in a ſtate of ſuſpenſe, he was reinforced by a body of the Adranitæ and Tynderitæ; Marcus or Mamercus alſo, prince of Catana, an able warrior, and maſter of an immenſe treaſure, advanced at the head of a powerful army to his relief. Upon ſuch an unexpected flow of ſucceſs, many forts and caſtles ſurrendered to him; and laſtly, to crown all, he received advice, that the Corinthians had ſent him a farther ſupply of ſoldiers on board ten galleys, which were happily arrived at Thurium, together with money to pay all their troops at Syracuſe [x].

DIONY-

[w] Plut. & Diodor. ibid. [x] Idem ibid.

Dionyſius ſurrenders the citadel of Syracuſe to Timoleon.

DIONYSIUS, ſeeing himſelf beſieged on all ſides, without any hopes of relief, ſent privately embaſſadors to Timoleon, offering to put the citadel, which he could no longer defend, into his hands, upon condition he would ſuffer him to retire unmoleſted. Timoleon, immediately cloſing with ſo advantageous an offer, readily agreed to what the tyrant deſired, and detached Euclid and Telemachus, two Corinthian officers, with four hundred men, to take poſſeſſion of that important place. As the Carthaginians had a ſtrong guard upon the haven, and conſequently were maſters of that part of the town adjoining to it, where Icetas was poſted, the Corinthians could not march in a body to the citadel, and therefore they entered it in ſmall parties. Dionyſius received them within the walls, and delivered up to them not only all his warlike ſtores and proviſions, but even the rich moveables of his palace, with a vaſt number of horſes, darts, military engines, all the old magazine, containing ſeventy thouſand complete ſuits of armour, and two thouſand regular troops, which Timoleon incorporated among his own. After this, Dionyſius was ſent to Corinth by Timoleon in a ſingle galley, without any convoy, where he arrived ſafe, notwithſtanding the Carthaginians, being appriſed of his departure, had laid ſeveral veſſels in wait for him. The Carthaginians were ſo diſheartened at theſe misfortunes, coming as it were one upon the neck of another, (for Plutarch tells us they happened all in the ſpace of fifty days) that they did not offer to make the leaſt movement, either with their fleet or land-forces, tho' the latter were above ten times as numerous as the Corinthians [y].

ACCORDING to Diodorus, the firſt treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians was ſigned this year, which was the firſt of the hundred and ninth olympiad. As this correſponded with the four hundred and fourth or four hundred and fifth year of Rome, (if, with Fabius Pictor, we place the foundation of that city in the firſt year of the eighth olympiad) it is not improbable, that Oroſius, in the paſſage abovecited, followed Diodorus Siculus. But neither of them, in the point before us, deſerves any conſideration; for though we do not pretend to deny, that there might have been a treaty concluded this year between the two republics aforeſaid, yet, that it was the firſt, we can by no means allow; ſince

ſince Polybius, who undoubtedly conſulted both the Roman and Carthaginian archives, does not only aſſure us, that they entered into a treaty above an hundred and ſixty years before this time, but likewiſe gives us the expreſs words of that treaty. His authority therefore, in this caſe, as well as in all others relating to the Roman and Carthaginian affairs, as interwoven, muſt be looked upon as inconteſtable [z].

The Corinthian garriſon in the citadel defends itſelf againſt the united forces of Icetas and the Carthaginians.

BUT to return to the Carthaginian tranſactions in Sicily: Towards the concluſion of this, and the beginning of the following year, the Carthaginian forces, that were to act in favour of Icetas received a ſtrong reinforcement, and Mago was appointed to command them. Upon the retreat of Dionyſius, Icetas, laid ſiege to the citadel of Syracuſe, which was defended only by four hundred Corinthians left there by Timoleon, under the conduct of one Leon, an experienced and brave officer. Timoleon, who had withdrawn to Catana, ſent the garriſon frequent ſupplies of proviſions; but they were for the moſt part intercepted by Icetas, who kept the place cloſely blocked up on all ſides. When they were reduced to the laſt extremity, Timoleon found means to relieve them, by conveying into the place, in ſpite of all oppoſition, a great quantity of corn. This he did by the aſſiſtance of ſmall fiſher-boats and ſkiffs, which got a paſſage through the Carthaginian fleet in the moſt tempeſtuous weather, ſliding over the waves and billows up to the citadel, when the enemy's galleys were either beat one againſt another, or diſperſed by the violence of the wind. Whilſt theſe things happened, Icetas formed a deſign to aſſaſſinate Timoleon at Adranum, to which place he had for a ſhort time retired, and employed two foreigners, probably Carthaginians, for that purpoſe; but they were prevented from executing their execrable deſign in a very providential manner, a full and minute account of which remarkable event may be ſeen in Plutarch. Timoleon, after his eſcape, returned to Catana, and continued ſupplying his troops in the citadel with proviſions, as often as an opportunity offered. The beſieged were, however, greatly fatigued, by being obliged to be continually under arms, in order to repel the enemy's aſſault, assaults, which were frequent and vigorous, and to repair the breaches made by their battering engines. Nevertheless they defended themselves with incredible bravery, and, having their renowned general himself so near at hand, despised all the efforts of the enemy [a].

Icetas introduces the Carthaginian army into Syracuse.

ICETAS, being much chagrined at this late disappointment, and finding his soldiers desert in great numbers to the enemy, dispatched an express to Mago, the Carthaginian general, desiring him to advance with his troops to the gates of the city. As soon as he arrived, Icetas, without any scruple, admitted him at the head of the whole Punic army, consisting of sixty thousand men, into the town; which was a point the Carthaginians, in all their struggles with the Siculo-Greeks, could never gain before. As Mago's fleet of an hundred and fifty sail at the same time rode in the harbour, the city seemed to be entirely in the enemy's hands. Timoleon, being informed of this, kept his troops together, but for the present remained at Catana, that he might be at hand to encourage and succour the Corinthian troops in the citadel; which he did so effectually, by continuing to supply them with corn and other provisions, in the manner above-related, as well as by giving them hopes of obliging the enemy to raise the siege, that they were not under the least apprehension for the safety of the place [b].

The Corinthian garrison in the citadel in a sally take Acradina.

MAGO and Icetas, finding it impossible to reduce the citadel, as long as Timoleon was in that neighbourhood, resolved to leave part of the army in Syracuse, and with the rest either drive Timoleon from Catana, or block him up in that city. Tho' they knew his forces were very inconsiderable in comparison of those with which they intended to attack him, yet, having a great opinion of the abilities of that general, they picked out the very flower of their troops on this occasion. They were scarce gone, when Leon who commanded in the citadel, observing that those who were left to continue the siege were very remiss in their duty, made a sudden sally, killed a great number of them, put the rest to flight, and having possessed himself of the quarter of the city called Acradina, fortified it, and, by works of communication, joined it to the citadel. As Acradina was the best and most opulent part of Syracuse, consisting, as it were, of several towns united, Leon found vast vaſt ſums of ready money and great plenty of proviſions in it; which, at that time, were of ſignal ſervice to him. A courier was immediately ſent away with this melancholy news to Mago and Icetas, who, upon receiving it, returned in great haſte to Syracuſe, though they were then but a ſmall diſtance from Catana; but could not, upon their arrival, diſlodge the enemy from the poſt they had gained.

In the mean time, a ſupply of two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe from Corinth landed ſafe in Sicily, having been detained a conſiderable time at Thurium by tempeſtuous weather, and found means to elude the vigilance of the Carthaginian ſquadron under Hanno, poſted to intercept them. That commander, not imagining the Corinthians would attempt a paſſage to Sicily in ſuch a ſtormy ſeaſon, left his ſtation at Thurium, and, ordering his ſeamen to crown themſelves with garlands, and adorn their veſſels with bucklers of both the Greek and Carthaginian form, ſailed to Syracuſe in a triumphant manner, where he gave the troops in the citadel to underſtand, that he had taken the ſuccours Timoleon expected, thinking by this means to intimidate them to a ſurrender. But whilſt he ſpent his time in ſuch trifling amuſements, the Corinthians marched with great expedition through the territories of the Brutii to Rhegium, and taking the advantage of a gentle breeze, were eaſily wafted over to Sicily. This capital error in Hanno proved the total ruin of Icetas, and, in its conſequences, was of infinite prejudice to the Carthaginians [c].

Timoleon receives a freſh ſupply of troops from Corinth.

TIMOLEON, greatly animated by this new reinforcement, marched againſt Meſſana, which he ſoon made himſelf maſter of, and then advanced in good order to Syracuſe. Mago was ſeized with a panic upon the news of his approach, inſomuch, that he ſeemed only to want a pretence to quit the iſland, tho' the new Corinthian ſuccours, in conjunction with all Timoleon's other troops, did not form a corps of above four thouſand men. Soon after, ſome of Icetas and Timoleon's Greek mercenaries mixing together in converſation, whilſt they were fiſhing for eels in the marſhes above Syracuſe, one of the Corinthian party addreſſed himſelf to thoſe of the other ſide in the following terms: "Is it poſſible for Greeks to attempt reducing ſo noble a city "as this to the obedience of barbarians, nay, of the moſt cru-

" el and bloody barbarians breathing? Is it not much more " for their intereſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould be remo- " ved at the greateſt diſtance from Greece, than that they " ſhould be put into poſſeſſion of a moſt rich and fertile " iſland in its neighbourhood? Can any perſon be ſo ſtu- " pid as to imagine, that they have drawn their forces from " the ſtreights of Hercules and the Atlantic ocean, purely " to ſupport Icetas, who, if he had acted like an able ge- " neral, would never have introduced his country's impla- " cable enemies into its bowels? Was it politic conduct in " him to treat his anceſtors and natural friends, as the bit- " tereſt enemies, which had he not done, he might have " enjoyed his high dignity, without giving the leaſt offence " to Timoleon and the Corinthians?" Theſe diſcourſes being ſpread through the whole camp, and even reaching Mago's ears, whoſe army was moſtly compoſed of mercenary Greeks, he pretended to be afraid of a general defection of his troops; and therefore, without hearkening to the entreaties and warm remonſtrances of Icetas, who plainly demonſtrated to him the weakneſs of the enemy, he weighed anchor, and ſet ſail for Africa, ſhamefully abandoning the conqueſt of Sicily. No other reaſon can be aſſigned for this unaccountable conduct, but the timorous diſpoſition of that general, who, conſcious of his guilt, on his arrival at Carthage, laid violent hands on himſelf, to prevent the puniſhment his cowardice deſerved. His body was hung upon a gallows or croſs, and expoſed as a public ſpectacle to the people, in order to deter ſucceeding generals from forfeiting their honour, and ſacrificing their country, in ſo flagrant a manner. Perhaps a more daſtardly action is not to be met with in the whole courſe of hiſtory [d].

He takes by ſtorm that part of Syracuſe poſſeſſed by Icetas.

THE next day, Timoleon appeared before the city with his army drawn up in order of battle; when being informed of Mago's precipitate flight, and ſeeing the haven quite clear of Carthaginian veſſels, he was moſt agreeably ſurpriſed, but could ſcarce believe his own eyes and ears. He could not forbear ridiculing the cowardice of Mago on this occaſion, and therefore, in a pleaſant humour by proclamation offered a great reward to any perſon who could bring him intelligence into what corner of the world the Carthaginian ſquadron was retired, to make its eſcape from his formidable ble fleet. Icetas being determined to defend that part of the town in which he was poſted, Timoleon made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a general aſſault. This he divided into three attacks; the firſt he commanded in perſon, with a body of choſen troops, againſt that part of the town ſituated upon the river Anapus, which was the ſtrongeſt and moſt difficult of acceſs; the ſecond he committed to the conduct of Iſias, a Corinthian captain, who was to advance from the quarter of Acradina; and the third was to be formed againſt the poſt Epipolæ by Dinarchus and Demaretus, who brought the laſt ſupply of troops from Corinth. In conformity to this plan, the aſſault was made; and the troops of Icetas being every-where driven from the walls, that part of the city which they held was taken by ſtorm. That Icetas ſhould loſe many men in this action, is eaſy to be believed; but that the Corinthian forces ſhould not have ſo much as a ſingle man wounded, ſavours ſo much of fable and rhodomontade, that Plutarch muſt excuſe us, if we are inclined to be of a contrary opinion [e].

Timoleon drives ſeveral tyrants out of Sicily.

TIMOLEON, after the junction of his forces with thoſe of Mamercus and the cities above-mentioned, and the reduction of Syracuſe, having left a body of troops to defend that capital, marched ſtrait to Leontium, Icetas's metropolis, with an intention to beſiege it. In conſequence of this deſign, he ſat down before the place; but finding the garriſon very numerous, and being repulſed with loſs in ſeveral attacks that he made, he was obliged to draw off. He next advanced to Engyon, a city that groaned under the tyranny of Leptines, and ſo terrified the tyrant by his repeated aſſaults, that he thought proper to capitulate, and was conducted to Peloponneſus. Apollonia, a neighbouring city under the power of Leptines, upon this, applied to Timoleon for his protection, and obtained it, ſo that this general now began to be looked upon as the ſcourge of tyrants, and conſequently to be in high eſtem amongſt the Sicilians; but being in great diſtreſs for money to ſatisfy the demands of his ſoldiers, he detached a thouſand men to make an incurſion into the Carthaginian territories. This detachment laying all the enemy's country waſte, and pillaging it thoroughly, carried off an immenſe booty, which they brought to Timoleon, who expoſing every thing to public ſale, by this means raiſed a vaſt ſum, and not only paid his army all their paſt arrears, but likewiſe advanced them their pay for a conſide-

rable time to come. Soon after, he made himſelf maſter of Entella, where he put to death fifteen of the citizens, who perſiſted in their adherence to the Carthaginians, and reſtored the reſt to their liberty. Upon this the Greek cities every-where ſubmitted to him, and were by him reſtored to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges. Many cities likewiſe of the Sicani and Siculi, ſubject to the Carthaginians, ſent embaſſadors to him, deſiring to be admitted among his confederates. Icetas, in the mean time, in conjunction with ſome Carthaginian auxiliaries, formed the ſiege of Syracuſe. This, in the beginning, he puſhed on with vigour; but as Timoleon's garriſon behaved with incredible reſolution, cutting off a great part of his army by their frequent ſallies, and as Timoleon himſelf was now advancing a ſecond time towards Leontium, he was at laſt forced to abandon the ſiege [f].

And reduces Leontium.

Icetas, having thus loſt the beſt part of his troops in this fruitleſs expedition, marched back with great precipitation to Leontium, in order to cover that important fortreſs from all attempts of the enemy, who, as he received intelligence, were advancing towards it. In this he was not miſinformed; for Timoleon, judging it of the higheſt conſequence to his affairs to reduce Icetas, before the Carthaginians returned into the iſland, which they threatened to do in a ſhort time, moved directly towards his frontiers, and appeared before Leontium, without giving him time to recruit his ſhattered troops, and re-eſtabliſh his affairs. The tyrant, terrified at this ſudden approach, and finding himſelf incapable of reſiſting an army ſo animated by ſucceſs, was glad to come to a compoſition with the Corinthian general; the terms of which were, that he ſhould renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians; that his forts ſhould all be demoliſhed; and laſtly, that the Leontini ſhould be governed by laws of their own, he reſiding amongſt them as a private perſon. Having thus detached Icetas from the Carthaginian intereſt, and extirpated tyranny out of the Greek part of Sicily, he returned to Syracuſe, deſigning to carry the war into the Carthaginian dominions without delay [g].

The Cathaginians make great preparations for carrying on the war with Timoleon.

THE ſenate and people of Carthage, being highly offended at the conduct of their general officers the laſt campaign, deprived moſt of them of their commiſſions; and, reſolving to new-model the army, filled the vacant poſts with perſons of known merit. As they were determined to carry on the war in Sicily with all poſſible vigour, they ordered levies to be made in all parts of their dominions, and took beſides into their ſervice a numerous body of mercenaries, raiſed in Spain, Gaul, and Liguria. Their naval preparations were in all reſpects proportioned to thoſe made by land; both which being completed, they ſent Aſdrubal and Hamilcar, two experienced commanders, over to Sicily with an army of ſeventy thouſand men, two hundred ſhips of war, and a thouſand tranſports laden with warlike engines, armed chariots, horſes, and all ſorts of proviſions. In the mean time, Timoleon, having juſt concluded the war with Icetas, and, by the acceſſion of his troops, conſiderably reinforced his army, advanced againſt them with great intrepidity upon the firſt news of their landing at Lilybæum, though his forces did not amount to above ſeven thouſand effective men. He had, before the arrival of the Carthaginians, detached Dinarchus and Demaretus with a body of choice troops to make an inroad into one of their provinces, where they did not only live for a conſiderable time at diſcretion, but likewiſe obliged ſeveral of their cities to ſide with the Greeks, and at their departure carried off a vaſt ſum of money, exacted from the inhabitants, whom they had laid under contribution. By this means Timoleon was enabled to ſettle a military cheſt, and eſtabliſh a fund ſufficient for the preſent exigences of the war. TheCarthaginian generals had no ſooner landed their forces, but they were appriſed of this affront, which they intended fully to revenge; and therefore moving with their wholearmy towards Timoleon, they at laſt encamped upon the banks of the river Crimeſus or Crimeſſus. The Corinthian commander was by no means tardy in his approaches to their camp; but on his march one of his mercenaries, by name Thracius, a profligate fellow, who had ſome time before been concerned in plundering the temple of Apollo at Delphi, cried out, that Timoleon was not in his right ſenſes, otherwiſe he would never propoſe with ſuch an handful of men to attack the Carthaginian army. He farther urged, that as the general was leading them to inevitable deſtruction, if he was not diſtracted, he muſt certainly have a deſign to ſacrifice them, perhaps becauſe he was not able to pay them their arrears. In fine, therefore, he adviſed them to go and demand their pay at Syracuſe, and not think of attending Timoleon in ſuch a deſperate expedition [h].

Timoleon, by his addreſs prevents a mutiny from breaking out in his camp.

THE mercenaries, naturally prone to mutiny and ſedition, received the harangue of this hot-headed incendiary with applauſe, and were all of them upon the point of deſerting their ſtandards. But at length Timoleon by his entreaties, large promiſes, and ſingular addreſs, brought them back to a ſenſe of their duty, excepting a thouſand, who were determined at all events to follow the deſperate fortunes of Thracius. After this he wrote to his friends at Syracuſe, informing them of what had happened, but at the ſame time enjoined them to treat the deſerters with moderation and humanity, and order the mercenaries their pay. By this means having extinguiſhed all the ſparks of ſedition, and regained the affection of his troops, he advanced to attack the Carthaginian forces with great ardour and celerity [i].

He engages and defeats the Carthaginian army.

IT happened that, as he was aſcending an eminence to take a view of the enemy's army, he met ſome mules loaded with parſley, an herb with which the ſepulchres of the dead were uſually adorned by the antients. This trifling event threw the ſoldiers into a great panic, as taking it for an omen of very bad ſignification. Timoleon, to calm their minds, halted for a moment, declaring that, as the victors at the Iſthmian games were crowned with this herb, particularly the Corinthians, it ought to be eſteemed as a ſymbol of victory, and therefore entreated them to baniſh all gloomy apprehenſions. To remove entirely all impreſſions of terror from their minds, he made himſelf a crown of parſley, and the officers, in imitation of their general, did the like. With theſe round their heads, they approached the enemy with as much alacrity as if they had been ſure of a triumph, and thereby inſpired the troops with as much reſolution as Timoleon had done, before the laſt occurrence happened, by a pathetic ſpeech, wherein he put them in mind of Gelon's ſignal victory over the barbarians with an inconſiderable force, and exhorted them to enable him to follow ſo great an example. Plutarch, an author not a little little tinctured with credulity and ſuperſtition, adds, that the ſoothſayers diſcovered two eagles flying towards them, one of which bore a dragon pierced through with her talons, and the other made a terrible and martial ſort of noiſe (A). Theſe they ſhewed to the ſoldiers, and interpreted them as a token of certain ſucceſs, by which the troops were confirmed in their hopes of an auſpicious day. Timoleon therefore, taking advantage of their preſent diſpoſition, and of the confuſion the Carthaginians were in at his unexpected arrival upon the banks of the Crimeſus, attacked them with great vigour and reſolution. Ten thouſand of the enemy's forces, who had already paſſed the river, were defeated and put to flight, before the reſt could come up to their aſſiſtance. Great numbers of the enemy periſhed in this firſt action; for Timoleon himſelf being at the head of the particular body of troops engaged, they performed wonders. But in the mean time the whole Carthaginian army having gained the oppoſite bank, the battle was renewed, and the victory a long time doubtful. The Sicilian horſe, under the conduct of Demaretus, charged the enemy in front, before they could form themſelves; but could make no impreſſion, the armed chariots (B) poſted there keeping

(A) Plutarch ſays, that juſt before the beginning of the engagement there aſcended ſo thick a fog out of the river, that neither the enemy's camp, nor any part of the plain, nor even the river itſelf, was viſible, the Greeks only hearing a confuſed noiſe of a vaſt multitude advancing towards them. But the ſun-beams at length diſſipating the vapours, they obſerved the Carthaginian army approaching them in the following order: Firſt, the armed chariots, which appeared very terrible; ſecondly, a body of ten thouſand infantry, with white targets on their arms, whom, from the brightneſs of their armour, and their ſlow regular march, they took to be native Carthaginians; and laſtly, the groſs of their army, compoſed of different nations, who followed the reſt in ſuch a diſorderly manner, as gave Timoleon great encouragement to attack them. By this it ſeems to appear, that the national troops in the Carthaginian armies were diſtinguiſhed in a particular manner from the mercenaries, as well as thoſe of the provinces ſubject to Carthage (1).

(B) The cuſtom of fighting in armed chariots was undoubtedly of great antiquity. That it prevailed amongſt the Greeks, Phrygians, and neighbouring nations, at the time of the Trojan war, in gthem at a diſtance, and puſhing them with ſuch vigour, that they found it difficult to maintain their ranks. Timoleon, obſerving this, ordered them inſtantly to wheel about, and is evident from Homer. Herodotus aſſures us, that the Greeks learned this method of fighting from the Libyans or Africans; and Xenophon intimates, that it was particularly in uſe amongſt the people of Cyrenaica. In the earlieſt ages the Medes, Syrians, Arabs, &c. fought in chariots, but eſpecially the Libyans and Ethiopians, as we are informed by ſcripture. The ſacred writings farther ſpeak of two ſorts of chariots, one for princes and generals to ride in, the other deſigned to break the enemies battalions, by being let looſe againſt them. Theſe laſt were armed with iron, which made terrible havock in the troops that oppoſed them (2).

The moſt antient chariots of war mentioned in hiſtory are Pharaoh's, which were overwhelmed in the Red-ſea. The Canaanites, to whom Joſhua gave battle at the waters of Merom, had cavalry, and a multitude of chariots; Siſera, Jabin the king of Hazor's general, had nine hundred chariots of iron in his army; the tribe of Judah could not take poſſeſſion of all the lands allotted to them, becauſe ſome of the antient inhabitants were ſtrong in chariots of iron; the Philiſtines, in the war carried on by them againſt Saul, had thirty thouſand chariots, and ſix thouſand horſemen; David, having taken a thouſand chariots of war from Hadadezer, king of Syria, ham-ſtrung the horſes, and burnt nine hundred chariots, preſerving only an hundred to himſelf. Theſe, with many more paſſages that might be produced, plainly evince, that armed chariots were uſed amongſt the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Egyptians, in very remote times (3).

Erectheus or Erichthonius, king of Attica, is ſaid firſt to have introduced theſe armed (4) chariots into Greece, though he, in all probability, received them from the Barbarians, amongſt whom they were in uſe long before his time, as is intimated by Euſebius. At the Trojan war the Greek chariots had for the moſt part only a pair of horſes, to which, however, ſometimes a third was added, called by Homer παρήορος, which was tied to them in a more lax manner, according to Euſtathius. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus ſays, that in his time this ſort of chariots was uſed among the

the Romans, but left off by the Greeks. Sometimes alſo the moſt antient Greeks had two pair of horſes to their warlike chariots, as may be inferred from Homer. The drivers were frequently perſons of the higheſt diſtinction, as Æneas, Neſtor, and one of Priamus's ſons. The perſon armed in the chariot directed the charioteer which way to drive, and was likewiſe frequently a perſon of prime quality, as Pandarus the ſon of Lycaon, and Hector the ſon of Priamus. He generally leaped out of the chariot to engage his enemy, as Paris, Agamemnon, Hercules, and Cygnus, &c. did. Princes and generals had their chariots adorned with gold and ſilver, and much curious workmanſhip, as that of Rheſus in Homer, and even ſometimes covered with plates of gold and tin, as that of Diomedes in the ſame author. The kings of Perſia were forbidden by the royal law ſo much as to touch the bridles or reins of horſes faſtened to a chariot, it being looked upon as inconſiſtent with the high dignity they enjoyed (5).

The Rhodians conſecrated horſes and chariots to the ſun annually, in conformity to the practice of their Phœnician anceſtors, as we learn from Feſtus; and Pauſanias, Heliodorus, and Strabo aſſure us, that the Spartans, Maſſagetæ, and Ethiopians antiently did the ſame thing. The ſcripture obſerves, that ſome of the kings of Judah preceding Joſiah did offer chariots to the ſun; which ſuperſtitious cuſtom was in imitation of the pagan nations, principally of the Perſians, as father Calmet thinks, who had horſes and chariots conſecrated in honour of that luminary. The reaſon the Rhodians gave for throwing a chariot every year into the ſea, in honour of the ſun, was becauſe they believed, that every day he travelled round the earth riding in a chariot (6).

The deſcription of the ſcythed chariots, mentioned in the Maccabees, as the antients have given it us, is as follows. The beam to which the horſes were faſtened, was armed with pikes having iron points to them, which projected forward; the yokes of the horſes hadlikewiſe two long points of three cubits. To the axle-tree alſo were fixed iron ſpits, armed at their extremities

with scythes; between the spokes of the wheels were placed javelins, and the very fellows of the wheels were furnished with scythes, which tore every thing they met with in pieces. The axle-tree was longer than usual, and the wheels stronger, that they might be able to resist the shock of the motion, and the chariot be less subject to overturn. The driver's seat was a kind of little tower made of very solid wood, and raised breast-high. The charioteer was armed all over, and covered with iron. Sometimes several men well armed were put in the chariots, who fought with darts and arrows (7).

Such chariots as these the Romans found amongst the antient inhabitants of this island when they first landed here, which very much galled them in their engagements with that people. They were likewise common in the neighbouring parts of Gaul, which is a plain proof, that both these countries were known to the antient Phœnicians, except it be admitted, that these machines were invented before the progenitors of the Gauls and Britons first came out of Asia. Diodorus affirms, that the military chariots of these remote nations were of the same kind with those used by the antient Greek heroes at the siege of Troy. It appears from different authors, that the Britons had several sorts of chariots, viz. the benna, the carrus or carrum, the covinus, the essedum, and the rheda, all of which, from their names, appear to have been of Phœnician extraction. The esseda seems to have been of the same kind as the Carthaginian armed chariots, from the description Cæsar gives us of them; for he tells us, that the charioteers drove through every part of the armies engaged, and threw their darts upon the enemy; that, with the terrible appearance of their horses, and the noise of their wheels, they usually broke the enemies ranks; that, when they had intermixed themselves with the cavalry, the armed men in the chariots flung themselves out, and fought on foot; and, that the drivers, in the mean time retiring out of the battle, posted themselves in such a manner, that, if their party was overpowered, they might enable them to make good their retreat. For a full account of their incredible dexterity and agility on these occasions, as well as their particular manner of engaging, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Cæsar and Dio, or to a future part of this history, to which it will more properly belong (8).

ling the enemies javelins with their iron and brazen armour, ſoon came to a cloſe engagement. The Carthaginians had now apparently the advantage, becauſe in ſuch actions as theſe ſtrength contributes as much to victory as diſcipline and military ſkill. But whilſt the enemy were fighting with great courage in this manner, and endeavouring to hem in and ſurround on all ſides Timoleon's ſmall army, there aroſe on a ſudden a violent ſtorm of hail, thunder, and lightning, which beating on the faces of the Carthaginians, put them into ſuch confuſion, that they were not able to ſtand their ground any longer. At the ſame time, the Crimeſus overflowing its banks, occaſioned ſuch an inundation, that the enemy were extremely embaraſſed by it, which heightened their conſternation and confuſion, and forced them to retire in diſorder. The Greeks then, encouraging one another with ſhouts of joy, preſſed them ſo vigorouſly, that the whole army was driven into the river, where great numbers of them were drowned. The ſacred cohort or brigade, as the Carthaginians called it, which conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred citizens of Carthage, all men of experienced courage and valour, fought with great reſolution, and ſtood their ground till they were all cut off to a man. Plutarch relates, that, of ten thouſand men, who

According to father Calmet, it does not appear, that the Hebrew kings ever made uſe of chariots in war. For though the ſcripture ſays, Solomon had fourteen hundred chariots, it does not appear, that they were ever employed by him in any military expedition. Perhaps, as the territories of theſe princes were very mountainous, chariots, being only fit for the plains, could not be of any great uſe there. This ſeems to be confirmed by an obſervation in ſcripture, viz. that the tribe of Judah could not diſpoſſeſs the antient inhabitants of the valleys in their diſtrict, becauſe they had chariots of iron. The Carthaginians, who were deſcended from the old Phœnicians or Canaanites, imitated their anceſtors in this particular. They generally poſted their chariots in front, and intermixed them with the horſe, that when the former had made an impreſſion upon any part of the enemies troops, the latter might be able to charge with the greater vigour, and cut off all thoſe who were put into diſorder and confuſion (9).

who were left dead on the field of battle, above three thouſand were native Carthaginians of the beſt families in Carthage, and that, according to the Punic records, ſuch a number of perſons of diſtinction never fell in any battle before, the Carthaginian armies being for the moſt part made up of Africans, Spaniards, Numidians, &c. ſo that when they received any remarkable defeat, it was generally at the expence of other nations. Beſides the ſlain, there were above fifteen thouſand taken priſoners; all their baggage and proviſions, with two hundred chariots, a thouſand coats of mail, and ten thouſand ſhields, fell into Timoleon's hands, and were either ſent to Corinth, and there dedicated to Neptune, or hung up in the temples of Syracuſe. The ſpoil, which conſiſted chiefly of gold and ſilver plate, and other furniture of great value, was, according to Plutarch, ſo immenſe, that the whole Sicilian army was three days in collecting it, and ſtripping the ſlain. In fine, after Timoleon's troops had paſſed the river, and taken poſſeſſion of the enemy's camp, they found there ſuch an incredible quantity of gold and ſilver in different forms, that nothing of inferior value was at all regarded; for the commander in chief divided the whole among the ſoldiers, reſerving nothing for himſelf but the glory of ſo famous a victory. It muſt not be forgot, that this memorable battle was fought on the twenty-ſeventh day of the month Thargelion, which was Timoleon's birth-day, nor that all the other engagements of note he was concerned in, if Cornelius Nepos may be credited, happened on the ſame day. The wonderful ſucceſs it was attended with, is a full proof of the great force of ſuperſtition; for, next to the violent ſtorm above-mentioned, this unparallelled victory was owing to the happy turn Timoleon gave to a frivolous accident conſidered as a fatal omen. This certainly ſhewed him to have been a man of genius, and perfectly well acquainted with the diſpoſitions of his countrymen, as well as with the general bent of mankind at that time; and Polyænus takes notice of it as an inſtance of the great military capacity of that general[k].

THE news of ſo ſignal a victory, obtained over the profeſſed enemies of the Greek name, could not but be highly agreeable to the people both at Corinth and Syracuſe, eſpecially as it was like to be attended with ſuch happy conſequences. The Corinthians adorned their temples with the Carthaginian ſpoils, which they hung up there with inſcriptions upon them, importing, that the people of Corinth, and Timoleon, their general, offered them to the gods as an acknowledgment for their having made them the inſtruments of delivering Sicily from Carthaginian ſervitude. Timoleon having left his mercenaries upon the enemy's frontiers, in order to plunder and ravage their whole country, returned to Syracuſe with the reſt of his army, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy. 'Tis worthy obſervation, that all the puniſhment he inflicted upon the thouſand mercenaries, who were accomplices of Thracius, for their infamous deſertion above-mentioned, was only baniſhment from Syracuſe; however, he ordered them all to be gone before ſun-ſet [1].

ICETAS, according to Plutarch, after this, being tired with his private ſtation, ſhewed an inclination to reinſtate himſelf, if poſſible, in his dominions; and, in order thereto, found means, in conjunction with Mamercus, tyrant of Catana, to ſtrike up another treaty with the Carthaginians. In conſequence of this freſh alliance, that nation equipped a fleet of ſeventy ſail, and took a ſtrong body of Greeks, of whoſe valour they had now a great opinion, for the firſt time, into their ſervice, intending to try their fortune once more in Sicily. Giſco, the brother of Hanno, a general of great experience and bravery, was recalled from baniſhment to command the troops deſtined for the new expedition. This news ſoon reaching Sicily, occaſioned freſh commotions there. The inhabitants of Meſſana, entering into an aſſociation againſt Timoleon, put four hundred of his men, left as a garriſon in that place, to the ſword; a detachment of mercenaries under the command of Euthymus the Leucadian, being drawn into an ambuſcade by the Carthaginian troops at Hieræ, were all cut off to man; and whilſt Timoleon was on his march to Calauria, Icetas, being reinforced by a Carthaginian party, made an incurſion into the territories of Syracuſe, carrying off a conſiderable booty, and, in contempt of Timoleon, paſſed passed by Calauria itself, the place where that general was then posted. However, he pursued the tyrant with a body of cavalry, attended with some of his light infantry, who could march with expedition. This Icetas perceiving, passed the river Damyrias with some precipitation; and drawing up his troops on the other side, put himself into a posture to receive the enemy. In the mean time, a dispute arising amongst Timoleon's officers, who could not agree which of them should pass the river first to attack Icetas; the general ordered them to cast lots, upon which every one of them threw a ring into Timoleon's robe, and the first that was taken out, and exposed to public view, had the figure of a trophy engraven for a seal upon it. This greatly encouraging the troops, they fell with incredible fury upon Icetas, who, not being able to sustain the shock, was put to flight, with the loss of a thousand men killed upon the spot, and pursued to the city of Leontium. Upon this defeat, the tyrant himself, his son Eupolemus, and Euthymus, general of his cavalry, were brought bound by their own soldiers to Timoleon. The two first were immediately executed, as tyrants and traytors, and the last murdered in cold blood. Icetas's wives and daughters likewise suffered death, after a public trial. Plutarch blames Timoleon (C) for not preventing this last execution, which, he

(C) We have already observed, that Timæus Siculus exalted Timoleon to a superiority above the highest divinities, and that he was greatly censured for this by Suidas. The last author's words are to this effect: "If Callisthenes deservedly suffered "death for designing to deify Alexander, a prince infinitely more "illustrious than Timoleon, what did Timæus deserve? &c." This passage seems to contradict most, if not all, of those writers who have given us any account of Alexander's atchievments, viz. Justin, Q. Curtius, Plutarch, &c. who represent Callisthenes as inflexibly determined not to deify Alexander, nor even to allow him that kind of adoration which the Persians paid their kings; when many of his sycophants, particularly Anaxarchus, would have made him that high compliment. Nay, these writers seem unanimously to agree, that he lost Alexander's favour by his obstinacy in this particular, and even at last was put to death by him. Now, in order to reconcile Suidas with these authors, it must be observed, that Timæus extolled Timoleon in his history; and therefore Suidas must intimate, that Callisthenes had an intention to deify Alexander in his history of that prince, otherwise the com-

he inſinuates, that general might have done, had he interpoſed in the affair, and cenſures it as the only blot in his character; tho' we think his conniving at the murder of Euthymus, a brave man, who was put to the ſword by the Corinthian ſoldiers for ſpeaking with ſome contempt of them, ought to be looked upon as another of the ſame kind. After this, he moved with his forces towards Catana; and meeting Mamercus, gave him battle in the plains of the river Abolus. The diſpute was for ſome time warm and bloody; but at laſt the tyrant was overthrown, his army entirely diſperſed, and above two thouſand men left dead upon the field of battle. As the greateſt part of theſe laſt were auxiliaries ſent to Mamercus by Giſco, the Carthaginians themſelves ſuffered conſiderably in this action [m].

compariſon is impertinent and abſurd. Admit this, and the paſſage in Suidas does not at all claſh with what the authors abovementioned have obſerved of Calliſthenes, becauſe it bears no relation to them as taking notice of that philoſopher's refuſal to adore Alexander, whilſt at the head of his army in Aſia. Arrian aſſures us, that Calliſthenes, out of a vanity peculiar to himſelf, declared, that Alexander ſhould in future ages be eſteemed as a god from the hiſtory he would write of him, and not from thoſe idle ſtories his mother Olympias impoſed upon the world. This comes up to the point, and ſeems to be what Suidas had particularly in view. As for that author's affirming, that Calliſthenes ſuffered death for his intention to deify Alexander in his hiſtory, no more can be meant by it than this, viz. he was put to death by that very prince whom in his hiſtory he intended to deify, which was a juſt puniſhment inflicted upon him by the gods for his great impiety. That this reconciliation is juſt, will appear from a peruſal of the paſſages referred to in Suidas and Arrian, as likewiſe from the drift and ſcope of Suidas's obſervation: we cannot therefore help expreſſing our ſurprize, that M. Bayle ſhould not have been able to diſcover the conſiſtency betwixt Suidas and the abovementioned hiſtorians (10).

nate had ſent embaſſadors to Timoleon to attempt ſtriking up a peace with him, imagining, perhaps, that he would be the more inclined to a pacification, when he ſaw them in a condition to continue the war. The two laſt blows given their confederates diſpoſed them ſtill more ſtrongly to an accommodation, to which they found Timoleon not averſe, as he was apprehenſive of freſh troubles from Mamercus and others, againſt whom he wanted to turn his arms. A peace was accordingly ſettled on the following terms: That all the Greek cities ſhould be ſet free; that the river Halycus, or, as Diodorus and Plutarch both call it, the Lycus, ſhould be the boundary between the territories of both parties; that the natives of the cities ſubject to the Carthaginians ſhould be allowed to withdraw, if they pleaſed, to Syracuſe, or its dependences, with their families and effects; and laſtly, that Carthage ſhould not for the future give any aſſiſtance to the remaining tyrants againſt the Syracuſans [n].

Hanno endeavours to make himſelf abſolute at Carthage.

ABOUT this time, one Hanno, who, according to Juſtin's account of him, was the moſt opulent and powerful citizen in Carthage, formed a deſign of ſubverting the conſtitution there, and introducing arbitrary power. In order to accompliſh this, he propoſed to invite the ſenators to a grand entertainment on the day of his daughter's marriage; and there, by mixing poiſon with his wine, to deſtroy them all, not doubting, but ſuch a tragical event would at once make him maſter of the republic. Though the ſcheme was carried on with great ſecrecy, yet it came to be diſcovered by ſome of his ſervants; but his intereſt in the city was ſo great, that the government did not dare to puniſh ſo execrable a crime. The magiſtrates therefore contented themſelves with only preventing it, which they did by paſſing a law prohibiting too great luxury and magnificence at weddings, and limiting the expence on ſuch occaſions. Hanno, ſeeing his ſtratagem defeated, was reſolved to have recourſe to arms, and for that purpoſe aſſembled all his ſlaves, and fixed upon a day a ſecond time to put his deſign in execution. However, he was again diſcovered; but, to avoid puniſhment, he retired with twenty thouſand armed ſlaves to a caſtle, that was very ſtrongly fortified, and from thence applied to the Africans, and the kin king of the Mauritani, for aſſiſtance, but without ſucceſs. He was afterwards taken priſoner, and carried to Carthage, where being ſeverely whipped, his eyes were put out, his arms and thighs broken, that puniſhment might be inflicted on every part; and at laſt he was executed in the preſence of all the people, to deter others from ſuch flagitious attempts; after which his body was hung on a croſs gibbet. His children and all his relations, though they had not joined in his guilt, ſhared in his puniſhment. They were all ſentenced to die, that not a ſingle perſon of his family might be left, either to imitate his crime, or revenge his death. Plutarch mentions one Hanno as admiral of the Carthaginian fleet, in the beginning of the late war between Icetas and Timoleon, who, in all probability, was the very perſon Juſtin repreſents as ſo infatuated with ambition, eſpecially as he was, if that author may be credited, very fond of ſhew and parade. However this may be, ſince Juſtin makes him cotemporary with the younger Dionyſius, and Oroſius affirms this conſpiracy to have happened in the time of Philip king of Macedon, we think from hence we are ſufficiently authorized to place that event here [o].

Q. Curtius guilty of a miſtake.

We muſt likewiſe obſerve here, that Diodorus Siculus places Alexander's reduction of Tyre in the firſt year of the 112th olympiad, and Agathocles's deſcent on Africa in the third of the 117th; and conſequently that Q. Curtius muſt have been out in his chronology, when he makes theſe two events to have happened about the ſame time, as anticipating the latter full twenty-two years by this ſynchroniſm. What the laſt of theſe authors relates of the arrival of certain Tyrian embaſſadors at Carthage, to implore the aſſiſtance of that potent republic againſt Alexander, has a greater appearance of truth; ſince not only a good underſtanding, but a moſt cordial friendſhip, always ſubſiſted between Carthage and Tyre, and even at this time moſt of the inhabitants of the latter were tranſported to the former of theſe cities. The extremity to which their countrymen (for ſo theſe two ſtates always called one another) were reduced, touched the Carthaginians in a moſt ſenſible manner, though, by reaſon of ſome domeſtic troubles, they were then incapable of ſending them any ſuccours. However, though they were unable to relieve, they at leaſt thought it their duty to comfort them, on this melancholy occa-occaſion, and therefore diſpatched to Tyre thirty of their principal citizens to expreſs their grief, that the bad ſituation of their own affairs would not permit them to ſpare any troops. The Tyrians, though fruſtrated of their hopes, did not deſpond, but took all the neceſſary meaſures for a vigorous defence. Their wives and children they put on board ſome veſſels, in order to ſend them to Carthage; by which being delivered from all apprehenſions of danger, with regard to what was the deareſt to them of any thing in nature, they were prepared againſt all events, and thought of nothing but making the moſt ſtrenuous efforts to repel the enemy. Curtius intimates, that the Carthaginians offered annually a ſacrifice to the tutelary gods of Tyre, conſidering them as their protectors; and that when their embaſſadors came to Tyre on this occaſion, they perſuaded the Tyrians to ſtand it out to the laſt, promiſing powerfully to ſupport them. As this very hiſtorian obſerves, that the ſeas at that time were blocked up by the Carthaginian fleets, and that by the hopes of mighty ſuccours they ſpirited up the Tyrians to oppoſe Alexander's whole force, 'tis not very probable, that they ſhould be then engaged in ſo dangerous a war as that with Agathocles was, or be reduced to ſo deplorable a condition as they muſt have been in, when that general, after giving them a notable defeat, advanced to the very walls of Carthage. He therefore ſeems not to be entirely conſiſtent with himſelf in this particular; for which reaſon, as well as upon account of Diodorus's ſuperior authority in the point before us, we muſt beg leave to diſſent from him, and look upon the arrival of the Carthaginian embaſſadors at Tyre, as coincident with the tranſactions of the period we are now upon [P].

The Carthaginians ſend Hamilcar Rhodanus to Alexander in order to diſcover that prince's intentions.

THE Carthaginians, hearing of the reduction of Tyre, and the great progreſs Alexander made in the eaſt, began to be under ſome apprehenſions for their own ſafety, as fearing that prince's good fortune might be as boundleſs as his ambition. But they were much alarmed, when they received advice, that he had made himſelf maſter of Egypt, was advancing towards the weſt, and had built Alexandria upon the confines of Eygpt and Africa, in order to rival them. They imagined now he might in reality have an in-intention to unite Africa and Aſia under his dominion, and aſpire to univerſal monarchy. They therefore choſe one Hamilcar, (or, as Gellius intimates, Aſdrubal) ſirnamed Rhodanus, to ſound the inclinations of that prince, and endeavour to pry into his counſels. Being a perſon of wonderful addreſs, as well as great eloquence, though at the ſame time of great ſubtilty and art, he made it his utmoſt endeavour to inſinuate himſelf into Alexander's favour. Having obtained an audience by means of Parmenio, he declared to the king, that he was, by the cabals of his enemies, baniſhed Carthage, and begged he might have the honour to attend him in all his future expeditions; which being granted, he did his country ſignal ſervice by communicating many important diſcoveries relating to Alexander's ſchemes. The manner of this communication being ſomewhat ſingular, we ſhall give it our readers from Gellius. He prepared tables of wood, in which he cut out the letters or characters of his epiſtle, and afterwards covering them with wax, as was the cuſtom of that age, without any characters upon it, ſent them away as blanks. This the people of Carthage being before appriſed of, decyphered the contents; which could not have been eaſily done by others, had the diſpatches been intercepted, becauſe the manner of writing then was upon the wax itſelf, and conſequently the whole muſt have been looked upon as a blank. We do not find, that Alexander ever diſcovered the treachery of this Carthaginian, or even entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of him; which is further proof of the refined genius of that nation for all works of intrigue. Upon his return home, notwithſtanding his eminent ſervices, he was conſidered as a betrayer of his country, and was accordingly put to death at Carthage, by a ſentence as barbarous as it was ungrateful [q].

In the ſecond year of the hundred-and-fourteenth Olympiad, Thimbro, after he had aſſaſſinated his friend Harpalus in Crete, ſailed with a body of mercenaries to Cyrenaica, and being joined by ſome exiles, who were perfectly well acquainted with all the by-ways and paſſes there, endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of that country. Having given the natives a defeat, they were obliged to apply to the Carthaginians, whose dominions were contiguous to theirs, for relief; which they thought that state, in point of good policy, could not well refuse them. This we learn from Diodorus; but as the whole country was immediately after conquered by Ophellas, and delivered into the hands of Ptolemy, 'tis very probable the Carthaginians were not then at leisure to assist them.

The Syracusans elect Agathocles their general against Sosistratus.

A few years afterwards, Sosistratus, who had usurped the supreme power at Syracuse, having been forced by Agathocles to raise the siege of Rhegium, returned with his shattered troops to Sicily. But soon after this unsuccessful expedition, he was obliged to abdicate the sovereignty and quit Syracuse. With him were expelled above six hundred of the principal citizens, who were suspected by the populace to have formed a design of altering the plan of government, which then prevailed in that city, as we have already related in the history of Syracuse. As Sosistratus and the exiles thought themselves ill treated, they had recourse to the Carthaginians, who readily espoused their cause. Hereupon the Syracusans recalling Agathocles, who had before been banished by Sosistratus, appointed him commander in chief of all their forces, principally on account of the known aversion he bore to that tyrant. The Carthaginians supplying Sosistratus with troops, he immediately assembled an army, and advanced at the head of it, to do himself, and his six hundred adherents, justice. After the two armies approached one another, several marches and counter-marches, and even some skirmishes happened, each side striving to gain some notable advantage. Agathocles, in all these military movements and falsifications, acquired great reputation, both for his valour and policy. He frequently contrived some stratagem or other, which turned out much to the advantage of the Syracusans; of which the following was one of the most remarkable [r].

Agathocles makes an attempt to surprise Gela, but is repulsed.

The Syracusan army having encamped near Gela, Agathocles, with a detachment of a thousand men, found an opportunity of entering the city in the dead time of the night; but being instantly charged by Sosistratus with a strong body of troops, he was obliged to retire with the loss of three hundred men. All the rest now looke looked upon themſelves as loſt, though Agathocles behaved with great intrepidity and reſolution. However, having received ſeven wounds, being ready to faint for loſs of blood, and hearing the enemy advancing from all parts to ſurround him, he ordered his trumpets to ſound a charge at both parts of the walls. This greatly alarmed the Carthaginians, who now imagined, that another party of the Syracuſans had forced their way into the town to relieve their companions. As the darkneſs of the night did not permit them to diſcover the truth, they thought proper to put an end to the purſuit; and dividing their forces, poſted away to the places from whence the trumpets ſounded, in order to defend the walls. In the mean time, Agathocles, at the head of his detachment, arrived ſafe in his own camp. By this artifice, he not only preſerved the ſeven hundred men that firſt entered, but ſeven hundred more that were ſent afterwards to his aſſiſtance [s].

Agathocles ſwears to do nothing at Syracuſe, to the prejudice of the democracy there.

THIS war did not continue long; for Soſiſtratus and the exiles being ſoon received again in the city, a treaty of peace was concluded between Carthage and Syracuſe. The Syracuſans now finding, that Agathocles began to exerciſe a ſovereign power over his fellow-citizens, and take ſuch meaſures as plainly ſhewed, that he aimed at monarchy, had recourſe anew to Corinth for a general to command their forces. Accordingly one Aceſtorides was ſent them to fill this poſt, who, upon his arrival, found that Syracuſe could never enjoy a perfect tranquillity as long as Agathocles was alive; and therefore formed a deſign of diſpatching him, which he attempted to execute in the manner already related in a the ſeventh volume of this work. But Agathocles by a ſtratagem eluded that attempt; and making his eſcape, raiſed a body of forces in the heart of the iſland, with which he prepared to attack Syracuſe. The Carthaginians being appriſed of this, were ſtruck with terror as well as the people of Syracuſe; and therefore, at the inſtigation of the former, the latter thought proper to re-admit him, to avoid the fatal conſequences of a civil war; however, he was obliged to ſwear in a ſolemn manner, that

But breaks this oath, makes himself master of Syracuse, and concludes a treaty with the Messanians by the mediation of the Carthaginians.

NOTWITSTANDING the solemn oath he had taken, Agathocles still pursued the point he had before in view, and, by a general massacre of the principal citizens, at last raised himself to the throne of Syracuse. Not content with this, he proposed to turn his arms against the other cities of Sicily, having a design to make himself master of the whole island. Beginning therefore with Messana, he seized upon a fort in the territory of that city; and being informed, that the walls were in a ruinous condition, he attempted at the head of a body of horse to surprise Messana itself. But missing his aim, he laid siege to the castle of Mylæ, which surrendered to him. Soon after he renewed his attempt upon Messana; but the citizens, knowing what treatment they were to expect, if the city fell into his hands, defended themselves with great bravery, and repulsed him in several attacks. In the mean time, the Carthaginians, being applied to, sent embassadors to him, complaining of such a notorious infraction of former treaties. The tyrant, at that time not caring to draw upon himself the whole power of Carthage, submitted to the terms prescribed him; and, in consequence of his peace with the people of Messana, concluded by the mediation of Carthage, he not only drew off his army from before their city, but restored likewise the castle of Mylæ to them. Upon which the Carthaginian embassadors, having happily executed their commission, returned back to Africa [u].

(D) It appears from Diodorus and Justin, as this last author's text is emended by Sebisius, that these solemn oaths were usually taken in the temple of Ceres, and that at taking them the persons generally put their hands on the altar of that goddess. Juvenal and Virgil illustrate this point to satisfaction; Scheffer, Tanaquil Faber, and Gronovius, agree with Sebisius, but Vorstius differs from him; though the passage this last author produces from Plutarch, equally supports both opinions (1).

But the reſtleſs ſpirit of Agathocles would not ſuffer him to be quiet. The cities therefore of Gela, Meſſana, and Agrigentum, entered into a confederacy againſt him, and ſent to the Lacedæmonians for a general, not daring to truſt any of their own principal citizens, as ſuſpecting them to be too much inclined to arbitrary power. But obſerving that Acrotatus, who came from Sparta to command their forces, was more cruel and bloody than even Agathocles himſelf, they not only refuſed to act under his conduct, but even attempted to ſtone him. Hamilcar therefore, the Carthaginian general, judging this a favourable juncture to accommodate matters between Agathocles and the confederate cities, propoſed a treaty of peace to both parties, which was at laſt made upon the following conditions: Firſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of Heraclea, Selinus, and Himera; and ſecondly, that all the other cities dependent on the Syracuſans, ſhould be governed by their own laws. By this treaty it ſeems to appear, that the cities above-mentioned were at that time greatly in the intereſt of the Carthaginians [w].

Several Sicilian cities enter into a confederacy againſt him, but at laſt make a peace with him by the mediation of Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general.

Agathocles, finding his ſubjects diſpoſed to ſecond his ambitious views, ſhewed as little regard to this laſt treaty as he had before done to his oath; and therefore, in violation of the ſecond article of it, he firſt made war on the neighbouring ſtates, and afterwards carried his arms into the very heart of the iſland. He was attended in theſe expeditions with extraordinary ſucceſs, inſomuch, that in the ſpace of two years he brought entirely under ſubjection all the Greek part of Sicily. This rapid progreſs alarmed the Carthaginians, who ſaw their territories there threatened with the ſame fate; eſpecially as the tyrant had ſtrengthened himſelf by many alliances, and, beſides a potent army, made up of his own forces and thoſe of his allies, had a body of mercenaries, conſiſting of ten thouſand foot and above three thouſand horſe, all excellent troops. On the other hand, Agathocles, being ſenſible that both his power and proceedings gave great umbrage to the Carthaginians, and that they were very angry with Hamilcar for being inſtrumental in concluding the late peace, made all the neceſſary preparations, not only to put himſelf into a good poſture of defence, but even to act offenſively, in caſe of a war with Carthage. Things being in this this situation, it was morally impossible but that a rupture must soon commence [x].

And commits great depredations in the territories of the Carthaginians.

It is intimated by Justin, that Agathocles was at first supported by the Carthaginians, or rather by Hamilcar, their general in Sicily, nay, he assures us, that the tyrant effected the massacre above-mentioned by the assistance of five thousand Africans sent him by Hamilcar. After the reduction of the other parts of Sicily, he made incursions into the Carthaginian territories and those of their allies, where he committed great depredations, Hamilcar not offering to give him the least disturbance. This highly incensed the people of those districts, who looked upon themselves as betrayed by Hamilcar; and therefore sent letters to Carthage, filled with bitter complaints of his perfidious conduct and Agathocles's tyranny; adding moreover, that, by the late infamous peace, many cities in alliance with Carthage had been sacrificed and delivered up into the tyrant's hands. This greatly exasperated the senate; but as Hamilcar was invested with great power in Sicily, they judged it prudent to suspend their resentment till the arrival of Hamilcar, the son of Gisco. In the mean time, they came to a vigorous resolution concerning him; but, for the reason just hinted, did not think proper to declare this openly, but threw all the suffrages that passed into an urn, which they sealed up, till the other Hamilcar came from Sicily. But the general, being surprised by death, escaped thereby the punishment prepared for him at Carthage; and Hamilcar, the son of Gisco, was appointed to succeed him in the command of the forces. This incident hastened the rupture between Agathocles and the Carthaginians [y].

He enters into a second treaty with the Messanians, and infringes it.

The last place that held out against Agathocles was Messana, whither all the Syracusan exiles had retired. His general Pasiphilus at first marched against it with an army; but having before received instructions from Agathocles to act as he should think fit for the good of his service, and finding that force would prove ineffectual, he cajoled the inhabitants into a treaty. This Agathocles likewise infringed when in possession of the town, cutting off all such as had formerly opposed his government; for as he intended to prosecute the war against Carthage with the utmost vigour, he thought it a point

The Carthaginians prevent his taking Agrigentum; notwithſtanding which, he ravages all the adjacent country, and takes ſeveral Carthaginian forts by ſtorm.

In the mean time, the Carthaginians arrived with a fleet of ſixty ſail at Agrigentum, and obliged Agathocles to deſiſt from an attempt upon that place, which a little before he had projected. But as they had not brought a ſufficient body of land-forces, he ravaged all the adjacent country, plundered the ſubjects of the Carthaginians, and took ſeveral of their forts by ſtorm. Whilſt he was thus employed, another Carthaginian ſquadron of fifty ſhips entered the great harbour of Syracuſe, and ſunk two tranſports, one of them an Athenian, which were all the veſſels then in port. The Carthaginians, according to their uſual cruelty, cut off the hands of all thoſe they found on board, though they had not offered them the leaſt injury, it being impoſſible for them to make any reſiſtance. This barbarity was ſoon retaliated by Agathocles upon the Carthaginians; for ſeveral of their galleys, having been ſeparated from the reſt of the fleet upon the coaſt of Italy, fell into his hands, when he ſerved all the priſoners taken therein in the ſame manner [a].

The Carthaginians aſſemble a powerful army to oppoſe him, and encamp near Himera.

The Carthaginians, being informed that Agathocles had pillaged their territories in Sicily, and that his forces grew very numerous upon the frontiers, reſolved to aſſemble an army without delay, in order to reduce that tyrant. As they had received advice, that they had offered battle to a conſiderable body of their troops poſted upon the hill Ecnomos, who [z] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. c. 6. [a] Idem ibid.

(E) In the midſt of theſe troubles, Dinocrates aſſembled a large body of troops, which conſiſted chiefly of Syracuſan and Meſſanian exiles. Having a great antipathy to Agathocles, he ſent a conſiderable detachment under the command of Nymphodorus, one of his captains, to reduce the city of Centuripe, which was then garriſoned by that tyrant's troops; but Nymphodorus was killed in this attempt, and his men forced to raiſe the ſiege with great loſs. Dinocrates ſent to the Carthaginians for aſſiſtance in this expedition; but whether or no he received any from them, Diodorus tells us not. However, Agathocles took from hence an occaſion of accuſing the Centuripians of having formed a conſpiracy againſt him, which gave him an opportunity of cutting off all thoſe whom he ſuſpected to be diſaffected to his government (z).

(z) Diod. Sic. l. xix. c. 6.

who were obliged to decline his challenge, they were determined to purſue the war with more vigour than they hitherto had done. Having therefore reinforced the troops intended for the Sicilian expedition with two thouſand native Carthaginians, among whom were many perſons of quality, a thouſand Etruſcan mercenaries, as many ſlingers from the Baleric iſlands, and two hundred chariots, they tranſported them to that iſland, under the command of Hamilcar, as abovementioned, to put a ſtop to the tyrant's conqueſts. The fleet, conſiſting of an hundred and thirty long ſhips, in the paſſage was diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, in which Hamilcar loſt ſixty ſhips of war and two hundred tranſports, with a great number of men. Many perſons of the beſt families of Carthage were loſt by this diſaſter, which cauſed a public lamentation in that city, when the walls were all hung with black, as uſual on ſuch melancholy occaſions. Hamilcar, notwithſtanding his loſs, being joined on his arrival by ſuch of the Sicilians as hated Agathocles, found upon a muſter, that his army conſiſted of forty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe. With theſe he took the field, and encamped near the city of Himera, deſigning to come to blows with the enemy as ſoon as a fair opportunity offered [b].

Agathocles defeated by the Carthaginians near Himera.

In the mean time, Agathocles, finding the Carthaginians much ſuperior to him, concluded, that many cities would join them, particularly that of Gela. What confirmed him in this opinion was, a blow he had lately received, twenty of his galleys, with all the troops on board, having fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians. To prevent the inhabitants of Gela from declaring againſt him, he found means gradually to introduce a party of his troops into the town, who not only pillaged it, but put four thouſand of the citizens to the ſword, threatening to uſe all others in the ſame manner, who did not immediately produce their treaſure. Having thus filled his coffers with wealth, and left a ſtrong garriſon in the place, he moved with his forces towards the Carthaginians; and poſſeſſing himſelf of an eminence oppoſite to the enemy, there encamped. The Carthaginians had poſted themſelves upon the hill Ecnomos, on which Phalaris's caſtle, where he tortured offenders in his brazen bull, formerly ſtood; and Agathocles took poſt in another of that tyrant's caſtles, which from him was called Phalerios, upon the

the oppoſite height, being ſeparated from Hamilcar by a river which ran between the two camps. As a prophecy or tradition had long prevailed there, that a great battle ſhould be fought on the banks of this river, in which a vaſt carnage ſhould be made, neither ſide for a long time ſhewed any diſpoſition to begin the attack, both armies having a ſuperſtitious dread upon them. At laſt a party of Africans, by way of bravado, paſſed the river, and another of Agathocles's troops, to return the compliment, did the ſame; and this brought on a general engagement. For the Sicilians, driving off ſome cattle and beaſts of burden belonging to the enemy, were purſued by a Carthaginian detachment, which immediately upon its arrival on the oppoſite bank, fell into an ambuſcade, that Agathocles, foreſeeing what would happen, had laid there to intercept it; and not having time to form itſelf, was eaſily routed. This firſt inſtance of ſucceſs greatly encouraged Agathocles, who hereupon moving out of his camp, attacked Hamilcar with his whole army, and with incredible bravery forced his trenches; though he ſuſtained great loſs from the ſlingers of the Balearic iſlands, who (F) with ſtones of a large ſize broke to pieces the ſhields and armour of his ſoldiers, and deſtroyed him abundance of men. But at this critical juncture a ſtrong reinforcement unexpectedly arrived from Carthage, which entirely changed the face of affairs; for the Sicilians having before made their utmoſt efforts, became greatly dejected upon the arrival of theſe ſuccours, and, almoſt as ſoon as the enemy rallied, took to their heels, and were ſo hotly purſued, that all the plains of Himera were covered with dead bodies. The heats being then exceſſive, great numbers that were ready to periſh with thirſt, drank too copiouſly of the river-water, which was ſalt and brackiſh, and thereby loſt their lives. The Carthaginians

(F) Diodorus tells us, that all theſe Balearic ſlingers had been trained up in the art of ſlinging from their infancy, and conſequently were very expert in that art; that they frequently attacked the enemy with ſtones of three pounds weight, which did great execution; and that in fine the Carthaginians wreſted many victories out of the enemy's hands almoſt entirely by their efforts. Our readers may expect a further account of them from Lycophron, Diodorus, Vegetius, and others, when we come to the hiſtory of Spain (3).

ginians had five hundred men killed in this battle, but Agathocles at leaſt ſeven thouſand [c].

Upon which the people of Catana, Leontium, Tauromi-nium, Abacœnum, and Meſſana, ſubmit to them.

AFTER this defeat, Agathocles, collecting the ſhattered remains of his army, burnt his camp, and retired with great precipitation to Gela. He had not been there long, before ſome of his troops, by chicane, deluded three hundred African horſe into the place, all of whom to a man he cauſed to be cut off. The tyrant remained ſometime in Gela, that he might draw the enemy thither, and thereby prevent the ſiege of Syracuſe, till the inhabitants of that place had got in their harveſt. Hamilcar, being informed, that Gela was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, ſupplied abundantly with all ſorts of proviſions and military ſtores, did not think fit to make an attempt upon it, but contented himſelf with reducing the forts and caſtles in the neighbourhood of that place, all of which ſurrendered upon the firſt ſummons. As he behaved in a very affable manner, the people of Camarina, Catana, Leontium, and Taurominium, ſent embaſſadors to him to implore his protection; as did ſoon after thoſe of Meſſana and Abacœnum, though they were before at variance amongſt themſelves. In ſuch perfect abhorrence did the people over the whole iſland hold the tyrant and all his adherents [d] (G).

And Agathocles ſhuts himſelf up within the walls of Syracuſe.

AGATHOCLES, finding the Carthaginian general not diſpoſed immediately to undertake either the ſiege of Gela or Syracuſe, repaired to the latter of theſe places; and having filled his magazines, reinforced the garriſon, and perfected all the works, he ſhut himſelf up within the walls of his metropolis. Thither the Carthaginians followed him, and laid cloſe ſiege to that important place, which, if they could have taken it, would ſoon have put them in poſſeſſion of the whole iſland [e]

THE Carthaginians having cut off a great part of Agathocles's army, ſtripped him of his confederates, and got all Sicily,

(G) Juſtin intimates, that there was a ſecond action between Hamilcar, the ſon of Giſco, and Agathocles, before the Carthaginians laid ſiege to Syracuſe, wherein the latter was totally routed, and obliged to ſhut himſelf up within the walls of his metropolis (4).

Sicily, except Syracuſe, into their hands, the tyrant now found himſelf driven to a ſtate of deſperation. Being therefore abandoned by his allies from their abhorrence of his enormous cruelties, he formed a deſign of ſo bold, and, in appearance, ſo impracticable, a nature, that nothing but the ſucceſs with which it was attended, could juſtify the undertaking of it. This deſign was to transfer the war into Africa, and beſiege Carthage at a time when he himſelf was beſieged in his metropolis, which was the only city left him in Sicily. His project he communicated to no perſon whatſoever, but only told the Syracuſans in general terms, that he had found out an infallible way of freeing them from the impending calamities, and repairing all the loſſes they had ſuſtained to that day. He then choſe the moſt daring and intrepid among the ſoldiers and citizens of Syracuſe, ordering the foot to be ready with their arms at the firſt call, and the horſemen to carry each along with him, beſides his arms, a ſaddle and a bridle. Before his departure he gave free permiſſion to all perſons, who were not willing to go through the fatigues of a ſiege, to (H) retire out of the town, which many of the principal citizens, Juſtin ſays ſixteen hundred, accepted of; but were ſcarce got out of the place, when they were cut off by parties poſted upon the roads for that purpoſe. He ſet at liberty all the ſlaves who were able to bear arms, and, after obliging them to take an oath, incorporated them among his troops. Having ſeized upon the eſtates and effects of thoſe perſons who left the city, he raiſed a conſiderable ſum, which was intended in ſome meaſure to defray the expence of the expedition he was going upon; however, he carried with him only fifty talents to ſupply his preſent wants, well aſſured that he ſhould find in the enemy's country whatever was neceſſary to his ſubſiſtence. His forces being all embarqued, he appointed his brother Antandrus governor of Syracuſe in his abſence, with forces and proviſions ſufficient to hold out a long ſiege; and taking with him his two ſons Archagathus and Heraclides, he went on board laſt himſelf, where he waited ſome time for a fair wind. All people were at a loſs to conjecture, what deſign he was going upon: ſome imagined his intention was to ſail to the coaſt of Italy or Sardinia, to plunder thoſe countries; others, that he propoſed ravaging that part of Sicily belonging to the Carthaginians; but moſt perſons agreed, that it was a deſperate project he had in view. As the Carthaginians had a much ſuperior fleet, and blocked up the mouth of the harbour, he was obliged to watch ſeveral days for an opportunity to ſet ſail. At laſt a large fleet of tranſports appeared laden with corn and other proviſions for Syracuſe. To intercept theſe, the Carthaginians put to ſea, and Agathocles no ſooner ſaw the mouth of the harbour open, but he likewiſe hoiſted ſail, and, by the great activity of his rowers, ſoon got out in the main ocean [f].

(H) Polyænus relates, that vaſt numbers of Syracuſans having crowded on board the ſixty veſſels, of which Agathocles's fleet conſiſted, the tyrant gave free liberty to all who were not willing to be engaged in a deſperate expedition, to retire with their effects. Many, embracing this offer, withdrew into the town, all of whom Agathocles, who looked upon them as cowards, ordered to be put to the ſword (5).

And, after a flight engagement with the Carthaginian fleet, makes a deſcent there.

THE Carthaginians, ſeeing a ſquadron of ſixty galleys, (for ſo many did this of Agathocles contain) at firſt imagined, that the enemy's fleet was ſent to defend the tranſports; and therefore, tacking about, prepared for an engagement. But obſerving that this ſquadron continued its courſe ſtrait forward, and was far before them, they immediately gave it chace, crowding all the ſail poſſible. However, Agathocles ſo beſtirred himſelf, that, night coming on, they loſt ſight of him; and in the mean time the tranſports, unexpectedly eſcaping the danger, plentifully ſupplied the city with corn and all other proviſions. The next day a moſt remarkable (I) eclipſe of the ſun happened, when

(I) Diodorus and Juſtin both affirm this to have been a ſolar eclipſe; but Frontinus makes it a lunar one. The laſt author has, however, been corrupted in the paſſage referred to, ſo that the critics can ſcarce make ſenſe of it. From the two former writers, as well as many others, that might be produced, it appears, that the antients believed the eclipſes of the luminaries to have portended great revolutions in human affairs; and it muſt be owned, that this notion, as well as ſome other points in judicial aſtrology, is of a very high antiquity (6).

(6) Diod. Sic. Juſtin. & Frontin. in loc. citat. Vide & Peucerum de divinat. p. 661.

when the ſtars appeared every-where in the firmament, and the day ſeemed to be turned into night. As the Sicilians were not a little ſuperſtitious, this event ſtruck the troops on board with terror, every one believing it to be a preſage of their approaching deſtruction. But Agathocles revived the drooping courage of his ſoldiers, by telling them, that if they had ſeen this before their departure from Sicily, it would have portended a diſappointment to them; but that as it happened afterwards, it predicted a train of diſaſters to the Carthaginians, whoſe dominions they were going to invade. He further remarked, that theſe eclipſes always foretold ſome inſtant change; that therefore happineſs was taking its leave of the enemy, and coming over to them. The Carthaginian admiral, finding that by purſuing two fleets at once, he had miſſed them both, and that Agathocles did not return, reſolved to purſue him cloſe, and prevent him from kindling the war in ſome other place. Having therefore ſailed ſix days and ſix nights ſteering his courſe towards Africa, he at laſt came up with the Sicilian fleet, then upon the point of landing the forces on board. As both ſquadrons had the coaſt of Africa in view, the Carthaginians made the utmoſt efforts to attack Agathocles before he could reach the ſhore; and on the other hand the tyrant, knowing what his fate would be, if he fell into the hands of ſo cruel an enemy, was no leſs active in his endeavours to land, before the Carthaginians could engage him. In fine, he had juſt began to execute his deſign, when part of the Carthaginian ſquadron coming up with his rear, a ſlight engagement enſued. The weapons chiefly made uſe of on this occaſion were bows and ſlings, the veſſels not being cloſe enough to grapple. As but a ſmall part of the Carthaginian fleet found it poſſible to engage, and the mariners were quite tired with rowing, Agathocles gained the advantage; whereupon the Carthaginians, tacking about, ſtood off a little above the caſt of a dart. This gave him an opportunity of landing his troops at a place called the quarries, without any farther oppoſition [g].

Soon after his landing, he burns his ſhips.

AGATHOCLES, having landed his forces in the enemy's country, and ſecured for the preſent his ſhipping by a breaſt-work or parapet, offered a ſolemn ſacrifice to Ceres and

and Proſerpina, the guardians of Sicily. After this he ſummoned a council of war, compoſed of ſuch officers as were entirely at his devotion; where, appearing in his royal robes, he acquainted them, that when they were ſo cloſely purſued by the Carthaginians, he applied himſelf to the two goddeſſes, promiſing, upon his arrival in Africa, to conſecrate all the veſſels of the ſquadron to them, by reducing them to ſo many burning lamps; and that, ſince they were now delivered from the enemy, his intention was to perform his vow by burning the whole fleet. He exhorted them to diſtinguiſh themſelves on the preſent occaſion, declaring, that by the ſacrifices the gods promiſed great ſucceſs. He likewiſe obſerved, that the only way to draw the enemy out of Sicily was, to carry the war into their own country; that the Carthaginians were ſoftened and enervated by eaſe and luxury; that the Africans under their ſubjection, as well as the neighbouring ſtates, being highly incenſed at the Carthaginian inſolence, would join them on the firſt news of their arrival; that the cities of Africa were not fortified and built on mountains, as in Sicily, and therefore could not make any defence; that the boldneſs only of their attempt would quite diſconcert the Carthaginians, who were altogether unprepared to repel an enemy at their own gates; that no enterprize could redound more to their honour and advantage, ſince this would, if attended with ſucceſs, make them maſters of all the wealth of Carthage, and tranſmit ther names and fame to the lateſt poſterity. In fine, he deſired them not to be diſmayed at the loſs of their ſhips, ſince the two goddeſſes above-mentioned would hereafter return them a far greater number. Having uttered theſe words, a ſervant brought him a torch, which he eagerly catching hold of, went on board his own ſhip, and ſet it on fire. All the officers did the like, and were chearfully followed by the ſoldiers. As the flames mounted up, the trumpets ſounded from every quarter, and, after a joint prayer to the gods to grant the army a ſafe return home, the whole ſhore echoed with joyful ſhouts and loud acclamations. In ſhort, the ſoldiers fancied themſelves already maſters of Africa; and not having been allowed time to reflect on the propoſal made them, the whole fleet was in a moment conſumed. This ſeems to have been one of the moſt moſt deſperate actions to be met with in hiſtory [h] (K).

The motives for his conduct.

THE motives for this aſtoniſhing point of conduct were various: Firſt, Agathocles was deſirous of putting his troops under a neceſſity of conquering, which he imagined might be done by the deſtruction of his fleet, ſince this would leave them no other refuge but victory. Secondly, he conſidered, that he had not one good harbour in Africa, where his ſhips could lie with ſafety; wherefore, as the Carthaginians were maſters at ſea, they would infallibly poſſeſs themſelves of all his ſhipping, which was no ways in a condition to cope with theirs. Thirdly, in caſe he had left as many troops as were neceſſary to defend the fleet, he would have thereby ſo weakened his army, which was at beſt but inconſiderable, that he could not have ventured a battle with the enemy, and of courſe would have rendered himſelf incapable of drawing any advantage from this unexpected diverſion. Theſe, with other reaſons, determined him to act in the manner above-mentioned, and exert that prodigious courage, neceſſary to work up his troops to ſuch an unparallelled reſolution. As they had been hurried on by a blind and impetuous ardour, when they began to cool, things appeared in another light. They now conſidered themſelves as in the midſt of an enemy's country, ſeparated from their own by the vaſt ocean, without the leaſt hopes or means of eſcaping. Upon this a ſad and melancholy ſilence ſucceeded that tranſport of joy, which but a moment before had been ſo general in the army [i].

BUT to diſſipate all gloomy apprehenſions, Agathocles marched inſtantly at the head of his troops againſt a place in the territories of Carthage, called the Great City, leaving

(K) This conduct of Agathocles, how wild and extravagant ſoever it may appear to us at this diſtance of time, who are not ſo well acquainted with the ſprings and motives to it, nor the circumſtances of his and the Carthaginian affairs, was highly approved of by Scipio, as we learn from Polybius. That great general looked upon Agathocles as a very able commander, and took hints from ſome points of his conduct, which much facilitated the conqueſt of Carthage (7).

(7) Polyb. l. xv. Liv. l. xxviii. n. 43.

He advances towards Carthage, takes a place called the Great City, and gives the plunder of it to his soldiers.

ving the soldiers here again no time for reflection. The whole country, through which he passed, afforded the most delicious and agreeable prospect imaginable. On each side were spacious meadows covered with flocks of all kinds of cattle, country-houses built with extraordinary magnificence, delightful avenues planted with all sorts of fruit-trees, charming gardens of a prodigious extent, and kept with all possible care and elegance, &c. The whole tract was likewise watered by beautiful streams, and full of towns adorned with stately palaces belonging to the nobility of Carthage, many of whom inhabited this particular province. As they had enjoyed a long peace, nothing but a face of plenty and abundance here appeared, and an immense quantity of wealth was amassed in every part. This inchanting scene raised the drooping spirits of the soldiery, who thought the possession of so fine a country would make full amends for all the toils and fatigues that could be undergone. They advanced therefore with intrepidity to the Great City, which, after a feeble resistance, they took by storm. As Agathocles was desirous of inspiring his troops with fresh courage, he abandoned the plunder of the place, which was very considerable, to them. That this was a town of importance, and called in the Punic language Samath, Sumeth, or Samatho, is in some degree probable from Alexander Polyhistor, Stephanus, and others [k].

He likewise takes Tunis, and levels this, as well as the above-mentioned city, with the ground.

FROM hence the tyrant moved with his army to Tunis, a city of eminence in the neighbourhood of Carthage, which being intimidated by so unexpected a visit, surrendered on the first summons. The troops would willingly have garrisoned both these places, and laid up in them the plunder they had got; but Agathocles would by no means listen to such a motion. He, with some difficulty, convinced them, that this was not consistent with the plan he had laid down, nor at all expedient in their present circumstances. Being therefore determined, that his men should have no place to retire to in case of any misfortune, that they might place all hopes of safety in victory, he caused both the cities lately reduced to be levelled with the ground, and encamped in the open fields [l].

In the mean time, the Carthaginians on board the galleys, that came up with Agathocles, juſt before he made his deſcent, expreſſed great joy upon ſeeing the Sicilian ſhips all on a blaze, imagining this to be the effect of fear. But they changed their note, when they obſerved the enemy marching in good order up into the country, being then convinced, that a puſh was intended to be made at Carthage itſelf. Hereupon they immediately ſpread a great number of hides upon the fore-caſtles of their ſhips, which was with them a conſtant ſignal of ſome impending public calamity. They alſo carried on board their own veſſels the iron beaks belonging to the Sicilian ſhips that had been deſtroyed, and diſpatched an expreſs to Carthage to give the ſenate a particular account of every thing that had happened. But the whole country was ſo alarmed upon the firſt appearance of the enemy's ſquadron on the African coaſt, that, before his arrival, the news of his unexpected deſcent had reached Carthage, and thrown the whole city into the utmoſt terror and confuſion. They all concluded, that their army before Syracuſe had been defeated, and their fleet loſt; for that, in any other ſituation of affairs, it was poſſible for Agathocles to leave Syracuſe, and paſs over into Africa, they could not believe. The people haſtened with trembling hearts to the market-place, while the ſenate aſſembled in a tumultuous manner to deliberate how they might ſave the city, which the victorious enemy was with long marches advancing to beſiege. They had no army in readineſs to make head againſt the enemy; and their imminent danger did not permit them to wait till forces were levied among their allies. Some therefore were for ſending embaſſadors to Agathocles to propoſe an accommodation, and at the ſame time to diſcover the poſture of the enemy; others apprehended it would be better to receive a more perfect intelligence of the true ſtate of affairs, before any public ſtep was taken; and this opinion prevailed [m].

The Carthaginians are greatly alarmed at this motion.

Whilst the city was in this ferment, the courier ſent by the Carthaginian admiral arrived, and informed the ſenate of the deſtruction of the Sicilian fleet, and that Agathocles was advancing with his army into the heart of their dominions. However he gave them to underſtand, that their troops in Sicily were all ſafe and in good condition; that they puſhed on the ſiege of Syracuſe with the utmoſt vigour; that the body of forces under Agathocles was not very conſiderable; and that the advantage he had lately gained by ſea was attended with no other conſequence in his favour, than that it enabled him barely to land his troops. This pacified the minds of the people, ſo that by degrees they recovered from the panic they were lately thrown into; though the ſenate ſeverely reprimanded the ſea-officers for their negligence, in ſuffering the enemy to make a deſcent, when they were maſters at ſea. It was now reſolved, that the citizens ſhould be armed; and accordingly in a few days they had on foot an army of forty thouſand infantry, and a thouſand cavalry, with two thouſand armed chariots. They appointed Hanno and Bomilcar to command the forces, notwithſtanding the grudges that had long ſubſiſted between their reſpective families, hoping that, laying aſide all private animoſities, they would jointly exert themſelves in the defence of their country, and not permit any family quarrels to interfere with the public welfare. In this, however, they were deceived; for Bomilcar, having long thirſted after arbitrary power, paſſionately wiſhed for an opportunity of ſubverting the republican form of government at Carthage; which believing the poſt above-mentioned would enable him to do, he readily accepted of it with that view only. As the Carthaginians frequently brought falſe accuſations againſt their generals after the concluſion of a peace, and through envy put many of them moſt unjuſtly to death, 'tis not to be wondered at, that ſometimes, in order to avoid ſuch perfidious treatment, they either reſigned their commiſſions, or attempted to introduce arbitrary power. Of this Bomilcar was an inſtance, as will more fully appear by-and-by [n].

Agathocles commits great ravages in Africa, and prepares to engage the Carthaginians.

In the mean time Agathocles committed great ravages, razing ſeveral caſtles, and burning many villages on his march, though his army did not conſiſt at moſt of above fourteen thouſand men. The Carthaginian generals, to find him other employ, immediately took the field, and advancing towards him with great celerity, at laſt poſſeſſed themſelves of an eminence in ſight of his camp, and drew up their forces in battle-array. Hanno commanded the right wing.

wing, ſupported by the (L) ſacred cohort; Bomilcar the left, making his phalanx very deep, ſince the nature of the place would not permit him to extend his wing farther in front; and the cavalry and chariots were placed, as uſual, in the van. Agathocles, on the other hand, made a proper diſpoſition of his forces, which were compoſed of Syracuſans, Samnites, Etruſcans, Celtes, and Greek mercenaries. The right wing he committed to the conduct of his ſon Archagathus; the other at the head of the troops of the houſhold and a thouſand cuiraſſiers, oppoſite to the Carthaginian ſacred cohort, he commanded himſelf; and laſtly, the ſlingers and archers, to the number of five hundred, were diſtributed in both wings to the beſt advantage. Finding ſeveral of his ſoldiers unarmed, he obliged them to draw the covers and caſes of ſhields over a quantity of rods collected for that purpoſe, and to carry thoſe before them, as if they had been real. By this ſtratagem, though none of the moſt refined, he impoſed upon the enemy, who were at ſome diſtance from him, and prevented the nakedneſs of his troops from being expoſed to their view°.

AGATHOCLES was in no ſmall conſternation, when he ſaw ſo numerous an army ready to engage him. However, he diſſembled his fear, and in order to encourage his men, who were quite diſpirited, and under great apprehenſions of the enemy's horſe and chariots, he let out ſeveral owls, which he

(L) The ſacred cohort conſiſted of the ſons of ſenators, and the prime nobility, who ſeem to have had their tents placed near that of the general. His aids-de-camps were taken out of this body, and the officers of it were his principal companions. The preciſe number of this corps cannot be determined; but from Appian we may conclude, that it conſiſted of about four thouſand men. It was known to the Romans by the appellations ſacra cohors, ſtipatores, prætoriani, delecta cohors, and anſwered to the evocati and ablecti of that nation. In ſhort, it was a body compoſed of voluntiers of diſtinction, who might be looked upon as the general's guard and particular friends. Curtius intimates, that Amyntas had a guard of Macedonian youths ſomething reſembling theſe. For a further account of them, we muſt refer our readers to the authors cited in the magin (8).

he had before prepared for that purpoſe. Theſe flying about the camp, and lighting on the ſoldiers ſhields, ſo raiſed their ſpirits, that of their own accord they began to advance againſt the enemy, not doubting, but by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, to whom that bird was ſacred, and therefore looked upon by the whole army as a good omen, they ſhould gain a complete victory. The firſt charge was made by the enemy's chariots, and the cavalry intermixed with them; but the body of Sicilian troops oppoſed to them did not only withſtand their efforts with incredible bravery, but pierced ſome of them through with darts and arrows, and drove the reſt back into the midſt of their own foot. This naturally threw the foot into confuſion, and occaſioned the defeat of the horſe; for theſe, finding themſelves deprived of their chief ſupport, were eaſily broken, and never afterwards made the leaſt attempt to rally. However, Hanno, with the ſacred cohort, which conſiſted of the flower of the troops, ſuſtained a long time the fury of the enemy, and even put them into diſorder; but being overwhelmed with ſhowers of darts, and covered with wounds, he fell, fighting bravely to the laſt. His death obliging the right wing to give ground, inſpired Agathocles and his troops with ſuch ardor, that they bore down all before them, though for ſome time they were moſt vigorouſly oppoſed by the enemy. Bomilcar, underſtanding that his collegue was ſlain, looked upon this as a favourable opportunity put into his hands by the gods of poſſeſſing himſelf of the ſovereignty, to which he had long aſpired. Tho' therefore it was in his power to have changed the face of things, yet being ſenſible, that he could not accompliſh the deſign he had in view, if the army of Agathocles were deſtroyed, but might eaſily put it in execution, if the enemy conquered, he reſolved to retire with the forces under his command, not doubting, but he ſhould be able to get the better of Agathocles whenever he pleaſed. Accordingly acquainting his men with Hanno's death, he enjoined them to keep their ranks, and retire in good order to a neighbouring hill; as the only means to eſcape the fury of the victorious enemy. As by the general's direction the retreat was ſo precipitate, that it looked like a downright flight, the Africans in their rear imagined, that all the reſt of the army were totally routed, and therefore immediately fell into diſorder; which being obſerved by Agathocles, he took advantage of this confuſion, and purſued them ſo cloſe, that they were obliged to take to their heels, as their companions before fore had done, whereby he gained a complete victory. The ſacred cohort, however, fought with great bravery, even after the death of Hanno, and courageouſly advanced over the dead bodies of their fellow-ſoldiers, till they ſaw themſelves abandoned by the whole army, and in danger of being ſurrounded by the enemy. Then indeed they thought it proper to have ſome regard to their own ſafety, and therefore retiring in good order, gained an eminence, where they halted, and endeavoured to make head againſt thoſe who purſued them; but not being ſupported by Bomilcar, they were either cut off, or forced to ſave themſelves by flight, after having diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very eminent manner. That general, after the defeat of his army, retired to Carthage, not having been purſued far by Agathocles, who returned back with great expedition to take poſſeſſion of the enemy's camp. This he allowed his ſoldiers to plunder for their further encouragement; where, among other rich ſpoils, they found many chariots of curious workmanſhip, that carried twenty thouſand pairs of fetters and manacles, which the enemy had provided for the Sicilian priſoners, not doubting, but they ſhould fill all the dungeons in Carthage with them. Of the Sicilians, according to Diodorus, not above two hundred were ſlain, and about a thouſand Carthaginians, or, as others will have it, ſix thouſand. Juſtin makes the loſs to be pretty equal on both ſides; for he tells us, that two thouſand Sicilians, and three thouſand Carthaginians, fell in this battle. As Bomilcar quitted the field of battle without fighting, and Agathocles did not long continue the purſuit, it is probable, that the ſlaughter was not very conſiderable, and that both ſides ſuffered pretty much alike, eſpecially ſince the ſacred cohort behaved to the laſt with ſuch unparallelled reſolution. Juſtin likewiſe differs from Diodorus in his account of the ſtrength of the Carthaginian forces in this action; for whereas the former will have that hoſt to have been very numerous, the latter relates, that it conſiſted only of thirty thouſand men. Be this as it will, the Carthaginians received a notable defeat, when they thought themſelves in a manner certain of victory; GOD, as our hiſtorian here obſerves, being pleaſed, by this inſtance, to let them know, that HE is the ſupreme diſpoſer and arbiter of events[p].

THOUGH

[p] Diod. Sic. & Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

The Carthaginians endeavour to appeaſe ſome deities, whom they imagined they had offended.

THOUGH the Carthaginians had ſuſtained no very conſiderable loſs in the late engagement, they were extremely diſheartened, believing the gods fought againſt them. They could not imagine it poſſible for Agathocles, after his whole army had been totally routed in Sicily, and he reduced almoſt to the neceſſity of ſurrendering his metropolis, to land in Africa, in ſpite of a powerful fleet, with the ſhattered remains of his broken troops, and afterwards defeat a numerous body of forces, without the interpoſition of ſome ſuperior being. Under the influence of this perſuaſion, they made it their firſt endeavour to appeaſe the offended deities, particularly Hercules and Saturn, whom they conſidered as the tutelar gods of their country. From the foundation of their city, they had ſent the tenth part of all their revenues annually to Tyre, as an offering to Hercules, the patron and protector both of Carthage and its mother city. This cuſtom for many ages had been religiouſly obſerved; but their revenues at laſt growing immenſely large, they not only had omitted to raiſe the tenths ſacred to Hercules in proportion, but even diſcontinued their antient acknowlegment to that deity. For this ſacrilegious avarice they now imagined themſelves puniſhed; and therefore, to expiate their guilt, they made a public confeſſion of their inſincerity, and ſent the golden ſhrines of their other deities to Hercules at Tyre, having a notion, that ſuch ſacred gifts would make a more effectual atonement. As for Saturn, in antient times it was uſual to ſacrifice children of the moſt noble families to him, as has been above obſerved; but for many years paſt in theſe ſacrifices they had ſubſtituted children of mean extraction, ſecretly bought and bred up for that purpoſe, in the room of thoſe nobly born. This they now conſidered as a departure from the religion of their forefathers, and a remarkable failure of paying this divinity the honour due to him, and conſequently were conſcious of having given him juſt cauſe of offence. To expiate the guilt of ſo horrid an impiety, a ſacrifice of two hundred children of the firſt rank was made to the bloody god, and above three hundred other perſons, in a ſenſe of their dreadful neglect, voluntarily offered themſelves as victims, to pacify, by the effuſion of their blood, the wrath of this deity. Such were the ſentiments of the Carthaginians at this juncture, and ſuch the method, they apprehended, would prove the moſt effectual in reconciling the offended deities to them, whom they imagined the immediate authors of the bad ſucceſs that attended their arms; though it is probable, bable, that ſoon after, upon the diſcovery of Bomilcar's perfidious conduct, they admitted at leaſt of the concurrence of an inferior cauſe [q].

And recal Hamilcar from Sicily.

AFTER theſe expiations, the Carthaginians thought it not improper likewiſe to make uſe of human means for their preſervation; they therefore diſpatched meſſengers to Hamilcar in Sicily, with advice of what had happened in Africa, and expreſs orders to haſten over to the relief of his country. When the meſſengers arrived, Hamilcar commanded them not once to mention the victory of Agathocles; but, on the contrary, to give out amongſt the troops, that he had been entirely defeated, his forces all cut off, and his fleet deſtroyed by the Carthaginians. The ſenate of Carthage had ſent to Hamilcar by the meſſengers all the beaks of the Syracuſan ſhips, that this report might more eaſily gain credit; for it was by their orders that he had cauſed it to be propagated. Hamilcar therefore, in conſequence of theſe orders, immediately ſent the perſons newly arrived from Carthage to Syracuſe, to publiſh this melancholy news there, and at the ſame time, in confirmation of it, to produce the iron beaks of the ſhips pretended to be taken from the enemy. This they did, ſummoning the governor and citizens to deliver up the city, ſince they could expect no ſuccours, their army and fleet in Africa being utterly ruined. At firſt this ſad account was generally believed, and greatly affected the whole city; but the leading men, to prevent all commotions, diſmiſſed the meſſengers without any anſwer, and ſoon after expelled eight thouſand of their citizens, who ſeemed diſpoſed to an inſurrection. This threw every part of the city into the utmoſt confuſion, the women running about the ſtreets in a diſtracted manner, and every houſe being filled with outcries and lamentations. Some bewailed the death of Agathocles and his ſons; others the loſs of their friends, who were ſuppoſed to be cut off in Africa; and great numbers their own hard fate, in being driven, with their wives and children, into the hands of the enemy. But Hamilcar entertained the exiles with great kindneſs; and being informed by them of the deplorable condition the city was in, he reſolved to make a general aſſault on all quarters at once. Tho' he expected eaſily to carry the place, as believing it to be almoſt deſtitute of

of troops to defend it, yet he first sent new deputies to Antandrus the governor, promising to spare him and all those who sided with him, if he delivered the city up into his hands. Hereupon a council of war was summoned, at which all the principal officers were invited to assist; when, after much debate, Antandrus, being a man of a mean spirit and very unlike his brother, declared himself for a capitulation; but Eurymnon the Ætolian, whom Agathocles had left to assist his brother with his advice, prevailed upon him and the rest to hold out, till they had certain intelligence of the truth. Hamilcar, being apprised of the resolution the garrison had taken, prepared his battering-engines to play afresh upon the walls, and made all the necessary dispositions to storm the town without delay [r].

Who, upon this, raises the siege of Syracuse, and sends a detachment of five thousand men to Africa.

WHILST matters remained in this situation, a galley with thirty oars arrived in the harbour of Syracuse, whose rowers crowned with garlands, and singing the Io Pæan, made directly to the city. This vessel Agathocles caused to be built immediately after the battle; and having manned it with some his best rowers, under the conduct of his intimate friend Nearchus, dispatched it to Syracuse, to carry thither the agreeable news of his late victory. The Carthaginian guard-ships, discovering it, gave it chace so briskly, that it narrowly escaped falling into their hands; which it must infallibly have done, had not the Syracusans advanced to its relief, when it was within a dart's cast of the shore. Hamilcar, observing that the garrison flocked down to the port on this occasion, and believing that he should find the walls unguarded, ordered his soldiers to rear up scaling-ladders, and begin the intended assault. The enemy having left the ramparts quite exposed, the Carthaginians mounted them without being discerned, and had almost possessed themselves of an entire part lying between two towers, when the patrol discovered them. Upon this a warm dispute ensued; but at last the Carthaginians were repulsed with considerable loss. Hamilcar therefore, finding it in vain to continue the siege, after such glad tidings had restored life and resolution to the Syracusans, drew off his forces from before the place, and sent a detachment of five thousand men to reinforce the troops in Africa [s].

AGATHO-

[r] Idem ibid. [s] Idem ibid.

AGATHOCLES, after his victory over the Carthaginians, finding no enemy to oppoſe him, reduced many forts and caſtles in the neighbourhood of Carthage. Many cities likewiſe, either out of fear, or averſion to the Carthaginians, joined him, by which his army being conſiderably reinforced, he moved towards the maritime towns, having left a body of troops to defend his fortified camp at Tunis. The firſt place he attacked was the New City; which he carried ſword in hand, but treated the inhabitants with great humanity. He then advanced to Adrumetum, and laid ſiege to it. The Carthaginians, by degrees recovering from the conſternation they were thrown into by the late defeat, and being informed of the progreſs Agathocles made, as alſo of his being ſupported by Elymas king of Libya, immediately aſſembled another army, and marched againſt Tunis. After a ſtout reſiſtance, they made themſelves maſters of the enemy's camp, and by their repeated attacks ſo preſſed the town, that it was ſoon reduced to great extremity. Agathocles, receiving intelligence of the enemy's ſucceſs, left the greateſt part of his army to carry on the ſiege of Adrumetum, and, with a ſmall body of troops, privately poſted himſelf on the top of a mountain between Adrumetum and Tunis (M), from whence he could take a view both of his own camp and that of the Carthaginians. Here he ordered his ſoldiers in the night to make large fires, that the Carthaginians might think he was advancing at the head of a formidable army to the relief of Tunis; and, on the other hand, the garriſon of Adrumetum might be induced to believe, that a ſtrong reinforcement was coming to his camp before that place. The ſtratagem anſwered both theſe views; for the Carthaginians raiſed the ſiege of Tunis hereupon with ſo much precipitation, that Agathocles after his victory, reduces moſt of the places of note in the proper territory of Carthage.

(M) The learned and ingenious Dr. Shaw ſuppoſes mount Zowaan, or Zag-wan, a conſpicuous mountain in the inland part of the ſummer circuit of the Tuniſeens, to have been the place from whence Agathocles was entertained with a view both of the country of the Adrumetines and Carthaginians. Solinus intimates, that the foot of this mountain was one of the limits of Africa Propria; which, in conjunction with the name, renders it ſomething probable, that the Regio Zeugitana received its denomination from it (9).

that they left all their battering engines being them; and the Adrumetines were so intimidated, that they immediately capitulated. Thapsus he afterwards took by storm, and reduced in that tract above two hundred cities and towns, partly by force, and partly by composition. Justin intimates, that he put a great number of people to the sword in this expedition; but as the contrary seems to appear from Diodorus, we must suspend our belief of this particular. Perhaps the author above-mentioned took this article from Timæus Siculus, who painted all the expeditions of Agathocles, and his whole life, in the blackest colours. Be that as it will, he made himself master of the whole territory of Carthage; but hearing that Elymas, king of Libya, in violation of the late treaty, had declared against him, he immediately entered Libya Superior, and in a great battle overthrew that prince, putting to the sword a good part of his troops, and the general that commanded them. This blow obliged the Libyan monarch to recal the body of auxiliaries he had sent to aid the Carthaginians, and enabled Agathocles to march against that nation, who, he was acquainted, had formed the siege of Tunis a second time. Advancing with great expedition, he at length encamped within two hundred stadia of the enemy, and commanded his soldiers not to make any fires at all. This prevented the Carthaginians from having any suspicion of his approach; so that marching all night with wonderful celerity, he arrived by break of day in the neighbourhood of their camp; where meeting with a body of their forces, that had been plundering and laying waste the adjacent country, he charged them with such vigour, that two thousand were killed upon the spot, many taken prisoners, and the rest dispersed. The Carthaginians, being extremely mortified at this disaster, and receiving advice, that Elymas had been obliged to recal the troops sent to their assistance, without waiting for Agathocles, abandoned the siege [t].

Hamilcar entirely defeated by the Syracusans, and his head sent to Agathocles in Africa.

It has been before observed, that Hamilcar sent only a detachment of five thousand men to the relief of his distressed country: keeping therefore the main body of his forces together, he still entertained hopes of obliging Agathocles to quit Africa, and return to the defence of his own dominions. He spent some time in making himself master of such cities as sided with the Syracusans; and after having brought all their allies under subjection, returned returned again to Syracuſe, hoping to ſurpriſe the city, by attacking it in the night. The Syracuſans were, before the approach of the Carthaginian army, reduced to ſome ſtreights; for Hamilcar had not only cut off all ſupplies of proviſions, that might have come to their relief by ſea, but likewiſe deſtroyed all the corn and fruits of the earth he could meet with in their territory, and had attempted to poſſeſs himſelf of the caſtle of Olympia or Olympieum, lying before the town. However, they were not diſcouraged, but took all the neceſſary meaſures for a vigorous defence; and ſuſpecting Hamilcar to have formed a deſign of ſurpriſing the city, they, by way of precaution ordered a body of three thouſand foot and four hundred horſe to take poſt in Euryalus, the citadel of Epipolæ (N). About midnight, Hamilcar advanced, at the head of a ſtrong party, to begin the attack, and was ſupported by Dinocrates, general of the horſe. His army was divided into two phalanxes, one formed of the Carthaginian forces, the other of the Greek mercenaries, which were followed by a confuſed multitude, compoſed of various nations (O), who attended the army for the ſake of plunder. The paſſes being then rough and narrow, this unwieldy rabble for ſome time found it impoſſible to move forwards; and therefore the

(N) Diodorus here makes a fine reflection on the uncertainty of war, and inſinuates, that neither valour nor conduct has the greateſt ſhare in bringing it to an happy concluſion. Agathocles, one of the greateſt captains of his age, at the head of a numerous army, was routed by Hamilcar at the battle of Himera; and yet ſoon after, this very victorious army, weakened only by an inconſiderable detachment ſent to Africa, and conſiſting then of an hundred and twenty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, was entirely defeated by a ſmall party of the routed enemy, ſupported only by the advantageous ſituation of the poſt they were ordered to defend (10).

(O) From this paſſage it appears probable, that the Carthaginian armies were attended by a numerous rabble in all remarkable expeditions. This will enable us to account for the prodigious carnage made of their troops when the enemy was victorious; for ſuch an undiſciplined number of people muſt firſt greatly contribute towards throwing the regular troops into confuſion; and then, not being able either to reſiſt or eſcape, be totally cut off. The Turks labour under the ſame inconvenience at this day, or at leaſt have done ſo till of late.

(10) Diod. Sic. in loc. citat.

the barbarians, of which it consisted, quarrelling for the way, came at last to downright blows; which put the whole army into confusion. The Syracusans posted at Euryalus, taking advantage of this, made a sally, and after having terribly galled the Carthaginians with their darts and arrows from the hill, attacked them in form. Hamilcar at first received the enemy with great resolution, crying out to the officers to do their duty, and endeavour to animate their troops to sustain the shock of the enemy; but the Syracusans having seized upon the passes, and there not being room for so numerous an army as Hamilcar's to act, great numbers of the Carthaginian foot were trod to death by their own horse; and the confusion they were at first thrown into being heightened by the darkness of the night, one part of their army engaged the other; so that the rout became general, and the slaughter dreadful. Hamilcar therefore, being deserted by all his army, which, before the engagement, amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, was taken prisoner, and carried into Syracuse. Diodorus relates, that an haruspex, or sooth-sayer, before the beginning of the action, predicted, that Hamilcar should sup the next night in Syracuse; which though it proved true, yet the entertainment he there met with was not much to his satisfaction; for those, whose parents and relations he had barbarously murdered, led him in chains about all the streets of the city, and, after having vented their rage on their miserable captive by all sorts of torments, struck off his head, and sent it into Africa, a welcome present to Agathocles, who, advancing to the enemy's camp, and shewing them the head of their general, struck them with such terror, that their commanders with the utmost difficulty kept them from abandoning the camp, and returning to Carthage[u].

The Agrigentines take several places from the Carthaginians and Syracusans.

THE day after this defeat, the Carthaginians rallied their shattered troops at some distance from Syracuse; but having lost their general, they could not agree amongst themselves about the choice of his successor: the exiles and Greek mercenaries therefore pitched upon Dinocrates for their commander, and the Carthaginians vested with the supreme command of the national troops the Carthaginian officer officer who was next in dignity to the general. The Agrigentines, finding the Carthaginians and Syracuſans had extremely weakened each other by this bloody war, and that the latter were in great diſtreſs for want of proviſions, judged this a favourable opportunity of ſeizing upon the ſovereignty of the whole iſland themſelves ; and therefore ſet on foot a conſiderable army for that purpoſe, appointing Xenodicus, one of their countrymen, general. This army was ſoon reinforced by a conſiderable body of troops from the city of Gela, which Xenodicus had found means to engage in the Agrigentine intereſt. He firſt made himſelf maſter of Enna, and then marched to Herbeſſus (P), that was defended by a Carthaginian garriſon. Upon his arrival there, he immediately cauſed it to be attacked. For ſome time the garriſon made a vigorous defence ; but at laſt the inhabitants declaring in favour of the beſiegers, the town, after a briſk action, was taken ; on which occaſion a great number

(P) That the cities of Enna and Herbeſſus were of Phœnician or Carthaginian extraction is apparent from the names themſelves. The former is undoubtedly a Greek corruption of Ennaam or Ennam, which, in Punic or Phœnician, imports the fountain of pleaſure, or the pleaſant fountain. The Greeks, having no words ending in M, frequently expunged that letter from Oriental proper names, in order to accommodate them to their own language, of which Maria, Gehenna, &c. are ſufficient inſtances (11). The authors referred to in the margin evince this etymon (12). The latter ſignifies in Punic or Phœnician, the mountain of the cave, or the hollow mountain ; and that the town of Herbeſſus ſtood upon ſuch a mountain, appears from ſeveral authors (13). We muſt not omit obſerving, that the word begins with an H, ſince Pliny (14) enumerates the Herbeſſenſes amongſt the inhabitants of thoſe cities, whoſe names begin with that letter ; nor that, in confirmation of what has been advanced, the place at this day is called Le Grotto, or the caverns. From Polyænus we may infer, that the Greeks ſometimes pronounced only one of the words of which this town's name was compoſed, viz, Beſſa, or Veſſa, which greatly ſtrengthens Bochart's conjecture (15).

number of Carthaginians were killed, and above five hundred taken priſoners. In fine, the Agrigentines proſecuted this war with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time they wreſted many places of note both out of the hands of Agathocles and the Carthaginians [w].

The Carthaginians gain an advantage over the Syracuſans by ſea.

THE Syracuſans, in the mean time, being threatened with a famine, and underſtanding, that ſome veſſels laden with corn were coming to the enemy, fitted out twenty galleys to intercept them. As the Carthaginians had entertained no ſuſpicion of ſuch an attempt, the Syracuſans found an opportunity of ſlipping by them, and for ſome time purſued their courſe in queſt of the tranſports above-mentioned. But the Carthaginians, being apprifed of what had happened, purſued them with thirty galleys; and coming up with them off of Hybla, immediately attacked them. At firſt the Syracuſans ſeemed to prepare themſelves for a warm engagement; but being ſoon driven on ſhore, they abandoned their ſhips, and taking ſhelter in the temple of Juno, endeavoured there to defend them againſt the Carthaginians. After a ſharp diſpute, the latter, by means of their grappling-irons, carried ten of them off; but the reſt were drawn on ſhore by the aſſiſtance of the garriſon of Hybla, who, upon the firſt news of the action, advanced to the relief of the Syracuſans [x].

The Carthaginians greatly dejected at the defeat of their army, and death of their general, in Sicily.

AGATHOCLES, having forced the Carthaginians to raiſe a ſecond time the ſiege of Tunis, and reduced all the places ſubject to them, prepared now to beſiege Carthage itſelf; and, in order thereto, advanced with his army to a poſt within five miles of that capital. On the other hand, the Carthaginians, notwithſtanding the great loſſes they had ſuſtained, in order to cover the city, encamped betwixt it and the enemy with a powerful army. This was the face of affairs, when Agathocles received advice of the defeat of the Carthaginian forces before Syracuſe, and the head of Hamilcar their general, who being taken priſoner in the action, had been put to death in Syracuſe, as above related. Upon receiving this agreeable news, Agathocles rode up to the enemy's camp, and ſhewing them the head, gave them an account of the total deſtruction of their army in Sicily. This threw the whole army into the utmoſt conſternation, and filled every part of the camp with outcries and lamentations. The barbarians, according to the cuſtom of the country, country, proſtrated themſelves before the head of their prince; for Hamilcar at the time of his death, according to Diodorus, was one of the Carthaginian ſuffetes. In ſhort, they were ſo dejected at the firſt publication of this melancholy account, that, in all human probability, Agathocles would ſoon have made himſelf maſter of Carthage, and put a glorious end to the war, had not an unexpected incident happened, which had like to have proved fatal to the tyrant himſelf, and thrown the game once more into the hands of the Carthaginians [y].

A mutiny in Agathocles's camp.

Lyciscus, an officer of great bravery, being invited by Agathocles to ſupper, and heated with wine, reflected on the tyrant's conduct in the moſt opprobrious terms, uttering at the ſame time againſt him the moſt bitter imprecations. Agathocles, having a perſonal value for him, on account of his merit, turned all his inſolence and ſcurrility into a jeſt; but his ſon Archagathus, highly reſenting ſuch infamous behaviour, did not fail to recriminate, and to his invectives not a few menaces were added. When the entertainment was over, and every one retired to his tent, Lyciſcus charged Archagathus with inceſt, he being ſuſpected of an illicit commerce with Alcia, his father's wife. This incenſed Archagathus to fury and madneſs; ſo that loſing all moderation, he ſnatched a lance out of the hands of one of the guard, and immediately piercing Lyciſcus with it, laid him dead at his feet. The friends of the deceaſed, and many other ſoldiers, enraged at the fact, filled the whole camp by break of day with tumult and confuſion. To theſe many officers, who were juſtly obnoxious to the tyrant's diſpleaſure for various crimes, thinking this a fair opportunity of delivering themſelves from all future apprehenſions of puniſhment, joined in exciting the troops to a revolt. The whole army was ſoon in motion, and determined to take vengeance either of Archagathus or Agathocles, if he refuſed to deliver up his ſon into their hands. The troops therefore, electing new officers to command them, ſoon poſſeſſed themſelves of the walls of Tunis, to which place the tyrant returned after the arrival of the laſt expreſs, and ſurrounded him, and his ſon, with their whole body of guards. The Carthaginians appriſed of what had happened, diſpatched meſſengers to the Sicilian forces, promiſing them larger pay, and ample rewards, if they would abandon the tyrant, and take on in their ſervice. Hereupon Agathocles, ſeeing himſelf in the moſt imminent danger, eſpecially as many of his officers had already cloſed with the enemy's propoſal, and judging it better to fall by the hands of his own ſoldiers, than to be put to an ignominious death by a cruel and inſulting enemy, deveſted himſelf of his royal robes, and, in the habit of a poor peaſant, appeared in the midſt of his troops. This ſtrange ſight ſo confounded them, that there was a deep ſilence all over the camp; which Agathocles taking advantage of, made a ſpeech ſuitable to the occaſion, wherein he gave a particular detail of the moſt memorable events of his paſt life, and the great actions in which he had been concerned, concluding, that he was determined never to forfeit his honour for the ſake of his life, and that therefore he was ready to put a period to his days immediately, if they, his fellow-ſoldiers, deemed this expedient for the public good. Upon this he drew his ſword, as though his intention was to have killed himſelf upon the ſpot; but when in all appearance he was upon the point of thruſting it into his body, the army cried out aloud to him to forbear; and deſiring him to reſume his purple robe, and other enſigns of royalty, in a moment returned to their duty. This greatly diſappointed the Carthaginians, who were in continual expectation of being joined by the moſt conſiderable part at leaſt of the tyrant's army, not dreaming of what was really in agitation at that time in the Sicilian camp. Agathocles therefore ſurpriſed a ſtrong body of the enemy, who had poſted themſelves cloſe by his troops, that they might be at hand to join them, in caſe the propoſal above-mentioned was liſtened to; and having put them to the rout, forced them back to their camp with great ſlaughter. Thus Agathocles not only extricated himſelf out of a ſtrange difficulty, in which his ſon's imprudence had involved him, but likewiſe defeated the enemy, when they looked upon his ſituation as deſperate. However, the ring-leaders of the mutiny, and two hundred others, who bore Archagathus a grudge, went over in a body to the Carthaginians [z].

But notwithſtanding the tyrant's affairs took ſo happy a turn at this critical juncture, when he ſeemed to be upon the very brink of deſtruction, yet the effects of the late mutiny tiny might, in ſome meaſure, have been eſteemed as fatal to him, ſince it gave the Carthaginians an opportunity of recovering from the conſternation, into which the deplorable news of the total ruin of their army in Sicily, and the death of their general there, had thrown them. Could Agathocles have attacked the Carthaginian forces immediately upon his communication of this advice to them, he would, in all human probability, have eaſily defeated them, and made himſelf maſter of Carthage, had he directly followed his blow, without any reſiſtance; but this unfortunate incident gave them time to ſhake off their panic, and make ſuch preparations for their defence, as, in concurrence with other unforeſeen events, baffled all the tyrant's future efforts to reduce that city. In the mean time, he endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf by alliances with the African princes, to whom he ſent embaſſadors, inviting them to join in the common cauſe, and aſſiſt him in overturning that imperious republic, which, with ſo much haughtineſs, lorded it over them. This, together with the fame of his victories, had ſuch an effect upon the Numidians, that, immediately declaring in his favour, they renounced all allegiance to the Carthaginians [a].

Which had a bad effect upon his affairs.

THE next year the people of Carthage, notwithſtanding their deplorable circumſtances, ſent an army into Numidia, to reduce the revolters; which, in conjunction with the (Q) Zuphons, a nation of that country, brought back many of them to their duty. Agathocles being informed of this, and fearing to loſe the benefit of ſo ſeaſonable a diverſion, left his ſon Archagathus with part of his forces at Tunis, and with the reſt, conſiſting of eight thouſand foot and

[a] Idem ibid.

(Q) The Zuphons were a hord or canton of thoſe Numidians, who either always perſiſted in their fidelity to the Carthaginians, or were the firſt who returned to their duty. It ſeems probable, that their capital city, if they had any, muſt have been named Zuphon, or Zupho, and ſituate not far from the frontiers of Africa Propria. It is impoſſible, however, to determine this ſituation with any tolerable degree of preciſion, eſpecially as none of the antient writers, except Diodorus in this place, if our memory fails us not, have taken any notice of them. Cellarius, though an accurate author, has paſſed them over in ſilence (16).

eight hundred horſe, all choſen men, together with fifty African carriages, for the ſake of the greater expedition, advanced to the relief of the Numidians. The Carthaginians, receiving advice of his approach, encamped upon an eminence on the oppoſite bank of a deep, and ſeemingly impaſſable, river, in order to prevent a ſurpriſe; from whence they detached a body of light Numidian horſe, to obſtruct their march, and haraſs them by continual alarms. To keep theſe in play, Agathocles ſent out parties of his ſlingers and archers, and with the main body of his army marched directly towards the enemy's camp, where he found them drawn up in battalia ready to receive him. Upon his firſt attempting to paſs the river, he was charged by a body of the Carthaginians with great fury, and loſt a conſiderable number of men; but his troops, notwithſtanding the great reſiſtance they met with, at laſt carried the oppoſite bank, where they warmly attacked the enemy. Moſt of the Carthaginian troops were, after an obſtinate fight, defeated, and driven into their camp; but a body of Greek auxiliaries, under the command of Clinon, for a conſiderable time ſuſtained the ſhock of the whole Sicilian army, where they did great execution, though at laſt they thought proper to retire. Agathocles, not judging it expedient to purſue ſuch reſolute fellows, fell upon the Carthaginian camp in two places at once, but, by reaſon of its being ſtrongly fortified, was vigorouſly repulſed. Notwithſtanding this, he continued his efforts to force it, depending greatly upon his Numidian allies; but theſe, during the heat of the engagement, kept themſelves perfectly neuter, having an eye chiefly to the plunder of both camps. The action happening near that of the Carthaginians, they durſt not move that way, and therefore advanced to the camp of Agathocles, which was at ſome diſtance, and defended but by a ſmall guard. This they plundered, after having put to the ſword, or taken priſoners, all that defended it; of which Agathocles being appriſed, he haſtened thither, and recovered part of the ſpoil. The Carthaginians, in the mean time, not only preſerved themſelves by this defection of the Numidians from Agathocles, but put their affairs in Numidia upon the antient footing [b].

THOUGH the tyrant had been hitherto the favourite of fortune, yet finding himſelf unable to carry on the war alone alone, he endeavoured to gain Ophellas, one of Alexander's captains, then poſſeſſed of Cyrenaica, over to his intereſt. In order to this, he ſent Orthon, a Syracuſan, one of his intimate friends, as embaſſador to that prince. Ophellas had at this time a conſiderable army on foot, and was forming a project to enlarge his dominions. Agathocles therefore thought proper to flatter his ambition, by promiſing him the ſovereignty of Africa, if, by his aſſiſtance, he would enable him to ſubdue the Carthaginians. He ſuggeſted, that could he get rid of ſo troubleſome a rival, he ſhould eaſily reduce the whole iſland of Sicily, which would abundantly gratify his ambition; that had he more extenſive views, Italy was near at hand, where he could make farther conqueſts; that being ſeparated from Africa by a large ſea, he had no intention to ſettle there; and that his laſt expedition did not proceed from a motive of choice, but neceſſity. Ophellas was entirely brought over by theſe ſuggeſtions, and, to ſuccour his new ally the more effectually, ſent to Athens for a body of troops. As he had married Eurydice, the daughter of Miltiades, who commanded the Greeks at the battle of Marathon, and was made free of the city, he obtained his requeſt, the Athenians not doubting but they ſhould ſhare with him and Agathocles all the wealth of the Carthaginians. The low condition to which that people, as well as the other ſtates of Greece, were then reduced by civil diſſenſions, and the immediate proſpect they had of conſiderable gain, made them exert themſelves on this occaſion with the greater alacrity [c]. *

Agathocles gains over Ophellas, prince of the Cyreneans, to his intereſt.

OPHELLAS, having finiſhed his military preparations, found his army to conſiſt of ten thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, all regular troops, beſides an hundred chariots, and a body of ten thouſand men, attended by their wives and children, as though they had been going to plant a new colony. At the head of theſe forces he continued his march towards Agathocles for eighteen days, and then encamped at Automolæ (R), a city about three thouſand ſtadia diſtant from the capital of his dominions. From thence he advanced through the Regio Syrtica, but found himſelf reduced to ſuch extremities, that his army was in danger of periſhing, for want of water, bread, and other proviſions. Beſides, they were greatly annoyed by ſerpents and wild beaſts, with which that deſolate region abounded. The ſerpents made the greateſt havock amongſt the troops; for being of the ſame colour with the earth (S), and extremely venemous, many

(R) This city ſeems to be the Automalax of Ptolemy, which, according to that author, was fortified, and undoubtedly a frontier town of Cyrenaica. Apollodorus and Strabo call it Automala, Diodorus here Automolæ, and Stephanus Automalaca. It was ſituate, according to Strabo, at the bottom of the greater Syrtis, now called the gulf of Seedra, at a ſmall diſtance from the Philænorum aræ, the Carthaginian frontier. None of the antients, except Diodorus, have told us how far it was from Cyrene, the capital of Cyrenaica. This laſt author here gives us to underſtand, that it ſtood on the borders of the Regio Syrtica, which agrees with the ſite aſſigned it by Ptolemy and Strabo, and that it was three thouſand ſtadia, or about three hundred and ſeventy-five miles from Cyrene; which ſeems greatly to exceed the truth (17).

(S) One remarkable circumſtance may be obſerved in the ſhort deſcription Diodorus here gives us of theſe ſerpents, or rather of the miſchiefs ariſing from thence to Ophellas's army, viz. that they were ſo exactly of the colour of that barren (18) ſoil, that the ſoldiers could not diſtinguiſh them from it. This certainly is a ſtrong preſumptive proof, that their whole ſubſtance muſt in a manner have conſiſted of that ſoil, and conſequently that they muſt have fed entirely upon it. The argument will receive a farther acceſſion of ſtrength from the nature of the region itſelf, which, Diodorus ſeems to inſinuate, was void of every other kind of ſuſtenance. Further, it may be remarked, that theſe ſerpents were of a moſt malignant ſpecies of that animal; ſince Diodorus (19) here intimates, that they were extremely venomous, and deſtroyed a vaſt number of men; which ſeems to point particularly at the cherſydrus, one of the moſt noxious ſpecies of ſerpents, ſubſiſting, many of the ſoldiers trod upon them without ſeeing them, and were ſtung to death. At laſt, after a very fatiguing march of two months, he approached Agathocles, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from him, to the great terror of the Carthaginians, who apprehended the moſt fatal conſequences from this junction. Agathocles at firſt highly careſſed him, and adviſed him to take all poſſible care of his troops, ſubſiſting, according to Nicander (20), upon duſt, and found, if Cicero and Ælian (21) may be credited, in vaſt numbers in the deſerts of Libya. Bochart has likewiſe proved by irrefragable (22) arguments, that the ſaraph, or, according to ſeveral authors, the ſerpent in which the devil beguiled Eve, was of this particular ſpecies; and that Arabia, as well as the adjacent countries, abounded with them (23); which is alſo evinced by Herodotus, Mela, Lucan, Solinus, and Ammianus Marcellinus, together with ſcripture. Let all theſe particulars be admitted, and the literal ſenſe of a paſſage in the Moſaic hiſtory, which has been hitherto, for the moſt part, either allegorically taken, or not fully underſtood, will be thereby rendered moſt apparent and inconteſtable, viz. (24) And the LORD GOD ſaid unto the ſerpent, Becauſe thou haſt done this, thou art curſed above all cattle, and above every beaſt of the field: upon thy belly ſhalt thou go, AND DUST SHALT THOU EAT ALL THE DAYS OF THY LIFE. This (25) ſeems alſo to be confirmed in the ſtrongeſt manner by the prophets Iſaiah and Micah. To what has been ſaid, we may add, if any thing is requiſite to be added to ſo clear a point, that ſeveral ſorts of animals live upon duſt, when they can meet with nothing elſe to eat, as we learn from (26) Ariſtotle, Bardeſanes in Euſebius, and others; and that though other ſerpents feed upon fiſh, frogs, herbs, &c. the cherſydrus, or ſaraph, lives only in ſuch places as the deſerts of Libya, Arabia, &c. where there is ſcarce a poſſibility of finding any other food than duſt or ſand to live upon (27).

troops, that had undergone ſo many fatigues (T); but making no ſcruple to commit the moſt enormous crimes, in order to promote his own intereſt, he reſolved upon his deſtruction. Obſerving therefore, that one day the greateſt part of Ophellas's (U) troops were gone out to forage, he thought a proper opportunity now offered of putting his deſign in execution. Accordingly he drew up his forces in order of battle, and acquainted them, that Ophellas was guilty of the blackeſt perfidy, ſince under the pretext of aſſiſting him as an ally, he had formed a ſcheme to deliver (X) him

(T) Diodorus (28) relates, that upon Ophellas's approaching the Regio Syrtica, he came to a double ridge of mountains, with a valley betwixt them, in which was a cave, wherein queen Lamia, a lady celebrated for her beauty, formerly had her reſidence. It is pretended, that this lady, being bereaved of all her children, out of an invidious and vindictive principle, cauſed all thoſe of her ſubjects to be deſtroyed. This gave all the neighbouring Africans ſuch a frightful idea of her, that they made uſe of her name as a bugbear to frighten their children with. Being extremely addicted to drunkenneſs, according to our author, ſhe never made an enquiry into any of her ſubjects conduct, but permitted them all to do what they pleaſed. For this reaſon ſhe was feigned to be blind, and for her cruelty above-mentioned had the face of a monſter aſſigned her. That ſhe was an African (29), Euripides likewiſe aſſerts; we may therefore take further notice of her, when we come to treat of the proper African nations.

(U) According to Diodorus, Polyænus, Theophraſtus, and others, this prince's name was Ophelas, or Ophellas; but Juſtin calls him Apheilas, and others Opheltas. With theſe laſt Tanaquil Faber agrees, though the reaſon he aſſigns for this agreement ſeems to us not to have any great force in it, viz. becauſe Opheltas is a Lacedæmonian name, and conſequently more likely than Ophellas to be the name of a Cyrenean, ſince the Cyreneans were a colony of the Lacedæmonians. Now, this ſuppoſes Ophellas to have been a Cyrenean, and that Opheltas was a proper name peculiar to the Lacedæmonians; neither of which ſuppoſitions can be proved, but are both improbable; ſince the Lacedæmonians had few, if any, names, that we know of, peculiar to themſelves; and Ophellas was one of Alexander's captains, and therefore undoubtedly a native of Greece (30), probably of Macedon.

(X) him up to the enemy. Incenſed at this, the army fell with great ardor upon Ophellas, who, being at that juncture too weak to oppoſe them, was killed upon the ſpot; upon which Agathocles, by fair words and large promiſes, prevailed upon the Cyreneans, now deſtitute of a leader, to ſerve under him, and be entirely at his devotion. Polyænus relates this event in a different manner from Diodorus; for he tells us, that Agathocles, being informed, that Ophellas was addicted to an unnatural ſpecies of luſt, decoyed him by means of his ſon Heraclides, who yet preſerved himſelf inviolate, and put both him, and the greateſt part of his army to the ſword [d].

WHILST theſe things were tranſacting, a great revolution had like to have happened at Carthage: Bomilcar, then poſſeſſed of the firſt employment in the ſtate, thought this a favourable juncture to obtain the ſovereignty of that city, to which he had long aſpired. In order to facilitate the execution of this his darling deſign, he had ſent away all the moſt eminent citizens, from whom he apprehended any obſtruction, to ſerve in the Numidian expedition. At the head therefore of five hundred of his aſſociates, ſupported by a body of a thouſand mercenaries, he advanced from Neapolis to Carthage, and entered the city without oppoſition. As many citizens as he met with, he cut off, without regard to ſex or age; which ſtruck the whole city with incredible terror, every one imagining, that the town was betrayed

(X) Juſtin relates, that Agathocles endeavoured to ingratiate himſelf with Ophellas, who frequently ſupped with him, by the moſt fawning addreſs, and the loweſt adulation; that Ophellas adopted the Syracuſan tyrant's ſon; and that this Cyrenean prince was cut off by treachery, not having taken the precaution to guard himſelf againſt a ſurprize. The ſame author likewiſe informs us, that, after this baſe and infamous action, Agathocles cajoled the Cyrenean army into his ſervice, and overthrew the Carthaginians in a pitched battle, with incredible ſlaughter, though at the ſame time he himſelf ſuſtained a very conſiderable loſs. This laſt article, however, not agreeing ſo well with Diodorus, will hardly engage our aſſent to the truth of it (31).

betrayed to the enemy. Dividing his forces into five bodies, he made five different attacks, carrying every thing before him, till at laſt his troops all met in the forum. However, when it was known that Bomilcar had been the occaſion of this diſturbance, and had moreover cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Carthage, the young men took up arms to repel the tyrant, and, from the tops of the houſes, diſcharged whole vollies of darts and ſtones upon the heads of his ſoldiers. The traitor, finding himſelf not able to carry the city, forced his way through the defiles, and retired to Neapolis; but being cloſely purſued by the Carthaginians, who by this time had aſſembled a ſufficient force, he retired with his troops to an eminence, there intending to make a vigorous defence, and ſell his life at as dear a rate as poſſible. To ſpare the blood of the citizens, a general amneſty was proclaimed for all who would lay down their arms. The rebels ſurrendered upon this proclamation, and all enjoyed the benefit of it, except Bomilcar their chief; but he, notwithſtanding the general indemnity promiſed on oath, was condemned to die, and fixed to a croſs in the middle of the forum, where he ſuffered the moſt exquiſite torments. From the croſs as from the roſtra, he harangued the people, reproaching them for their injuſtice, their ingratitude, and perfidy, which he demonſtrated in an hiſtorical deduction of many illuſtrious generals, whoſe ſervices they had rewarded with an ignominious death. Having thus inſulted both his tortures and the authors of them, he expired, by his death delivering the Carthaginians from the moſt dangerous domeſtic enemy their ſtate had ever produced [c].

It is worthy obſervation, that Agathocles cauſed Ophellas to be murdered, and Bomilcar made the laſt flagrant attempt upon the liberties of his country, at the ſame inſtant of time, though neither of them was privy to the other's deſign. Had Agathocles been appriſed of Bomilcar's ambition, or of the diſorder and confuſion then in the town of Carthage, he might eaſily have made himſelf maſter of it; for if the latter could have been ſupported by the former in the critical moment, he would undoubtedly have joined him, in order to avoid falling a victim to the fury of his enraged fellow-citizens. On the other hand, had the Carthaginians entertained any ſuſpicion of Ophellas's impending danger, by joining him, or at leaſt ſending him a ſtrong rein-reinforcement, they might, without much difficulty, have overthrown Agathocles, as in ſome meaſure appeared from the future courſe of this war; but the generals on both ſides being chiefly intent on gratifying their own ambition, which they at that time imagined incompatible with the public welfare, their armies were content not to obſerve one another's motions, and by this means undeſignedly contributed to each other's preſervation.

Agathocles aſſumes the title of king of Africa, and takes Utica by ſtorm.

AGATHOCLES, now finding himſelf at the head of a numerous army, in imitation of Alexander's captains, who took upon them the dignity of crowned heads, aſſumed the title of king of Africa, intending ſoon to complete his conqueſts in that country, by the reduction of Carthage. However, for the preſent, his arms received a conſiderable diverſion from the Uticans; which prevented him from putting his deſign in execution. Having received intelligence of their revolt, he advanced with ſuch expedition to their city, that he ſurpriſed three hundred of them in the adjacent fields, and made them all priſoners. Theſe he placed alive in a warlike engine, which he brought to the walls of the town, and expoſed them in ſuch a manner to the darts and arrows of the beſieged, that they could not repel his aſſaults, without deſtroying their own citizens, among whom were ſome of the prime nobility. He then ſummoned the garriſon to ſurrender, imagining they would be induced to this by the ſight of their friends and relations; but finding they valued their liberty more than theſe, he began the ſiege, and diſcharged ſuch vollies of ſtones and miſſive weapons from the engine abovementioned, that the beſieged were thrown into a great conſternation. At firſt they refuſed to defend themſelves for fear of deſtroying their countrymen; but finding the enemy to puſh on the ſiege with incredible fury, and that without a vigorous reſiſtance they muſt ſoon fall into their hands, they betook themſelves to their arms, and in ſeveral aſſaults bravely repulſed them. At laſt Agathocles ſummoning all his courage, made a general aſſault upon the weakeſt part of the wall, and carried it; notwithſtanding which the Uticans for ſome time kept their poſts; but the tyrant's whole army forcing itſelf like a torrent into the town, and ſoon driving them, partly into the temples, and partly into their own houſes, they were all either put to the ſword or taken priſoners [f].

[f] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

As likewiſe Hippo Diarrhytus.

THE tyrant, having hanged all the priſoners, plundered the town, and left a ſufficient garriſon in it, marched with his army to Hippouacra, or Hippo Diarrhytus, the Bizerta of the moderns, a place naturally fortified by the lake upon which it ſtood. Before he could reduce this city, he was obliged to engage the inhabitants upon the water with his galleys; but having defeated them on that element, and followed his attacks cloſely for ſome days, he at laſt took it by ſtorm. Moſt of the people bordering upon the ſea-coaſts, and even thoſe inhabiting the inland part of the country, after this ſubmitted to him. The Numidians he found himſelf not able to ſubdue; however, many of their hords or cantons thought proper to conclude a treaty of peace with him [g].

Xenodochus defeated by Demophilus and Leptines.

IN the mean time, Xenodochus, general of the Agrigentines, having reſtored many of the cities in Sicily to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges, the ſubjects both of the Carthaginians and Syracuſans entertained hopes of a revolution throughout the iſland in favour of liberty. Animated by theſe hopes, great numbers of them took up arms, and entered into an aſſociation, in order to extirpate tyranny. Agathocles, receiving advice of this from Demophilus and Leptines, the commanders of his troops in Sicily, was (Y) greatly alarmed, and therefore reſolved to return home; which, he thought, he might ſafely do for a while, as

(Y) Juſtin affirms, that not Xenodochus, but the Carthaginians, obliged Agathocles to return to Sicily; and that the latter, after the death of Hamilcar, the ſon of Giſco above-mentioned, ſent another army to that iſland; nay, he farther ſeems to hint, that they had laid ſiege to his metropolis, before Agathocles's arrival there; and that this was the immediate cauſe of the tyrant's abandoning Africa in ſo precipitate a manner. But as this fragment of hiſtory is not taken the leaſt notice of by Diodorus, and even inconſiſtent with what Juſtin had himſelf before related, we are not diſpoſed to give over-much credit to it (32).

The ſame author likewiſe tells us, that Agathocles, after his arrival in Sicily, expelled the Carthaginians from thence, and made himſelf maſter of the whole iſland. But as this directly contradicts Diodorus Siculus, we have not thought proper to inſert it in the body of the hiſtory (33).

(32) Juſtin. l. xxii. c. 8. ſub init. (33) Conf. Juſt. ubi ſup. cum Diod. Sic. l. xx. c. 2, 3.

as his affairs on the continent were in a very flouriſhing condition. Having therefore built ſome open veſſels, with fifty oars a-piece, and put two thouſand men on board, he ſet ſail for Sicily, leaving his ſon Archagathus governor of the conqueſts in Africa, and commander in chief of the forces there. Upon his arrival at Selinus, he found, that Demophilus and Leptines had not only aſſembled a powerful army, but likewiſe defeated Xenodochus in a pitched battle, and forced him to fly to Agrigentum, with the loſs of fifteen hundred men. After this victory, Agathocles advanced to Therma, a city poſſeſſed by a Carthaginian garriſon; which immediately ſubmitted to him. Cephalœdium, Heraclea, and other places, that had regained their liberty, he likewiſe reduced; but could not make himſelf maſter of the principal cities belonging to the Carthaginians[b]. Agathocles returns to Sicily.

ARCHAGATHUS, after his father's departure, greatly extended the conqueſts in Africa. He ſent Eumachus, at the head of a large detachment, to invade ſome of the neighbouring provinces, whilſt he himſelf, with the groſs of his army, obſerved the motions of the Carthaginians. Eumachus, falling into Numidia, firſt took the great city of Tocas, and conquered ſeveral of the Numidian cantons, that would not come into a ſtate of amity with Agathocles. Afterwards he laid ſiege to Phellina, and carried it; which was attended with the ſubmiſſion of the Aſphodelodians, a nation, according to Diodorus, as black as the Ethiopians. From hence he marched to Maſchala, a city of great importance, built by the Greeks in their return from Troy, and inhabited by their poſterity for ſeveral ſucceeding ages, which opened its gates to him. Then he moved to Hippouacra, which, ſince its ſurrender to Agathocles, had revolted to the enemy, and made himſelf maſter of it. Laſtly, he poſſeſſed himſelf of Acris (Z), a free city, of great Archagathus meets with great ſucceſs in Africa.

[b] Idem ibid. & Juſtin. ubi ſup. c. 8.

(Z) Neither the city of Trocas, nor thoſe of Phellina, Maſchala, Acris, nor yet the nation of the Aſphodelodians, though, according to our author, a very remarkable people, have been mentioned by Cellarius, whoſe work is yet held in the higheſt repute. They all ſeem to have had their ſituation in that part of Numidia contiguous to Africa Propria, and not far from Hippo Diarryhtus. It is probable thoſe auxiliary troops taken priſoners by great opulence, which he gave up to the soldiers to be plundered, and sold the inhabitants for slaves; after which he returned to the camp, loaden with the immense booty he had got in this successful expedition [i].

His general Eumachus penetrates into the more remote parts of Africa; but is soon obliged to retire with precipitation.

ELATED with such a run of good fortune, Eumachus resolved next to penetrate into the more remote parts of Africa on the side of Numidia; in order to which, having traversed the countries invaded last, and continuing his march, he arrived at a city called Miltine, and, at the first attempt, forced his way into it. But notwithstanding this first instance of success, the barbarians, immediately collecting their whole force, attacked him in the streets with such fury, that they obliged him to retire out of the town in great confusion, after he had lost a vast number of men. From hence he advanced to an high mountain, above two hundred stadia over, full of wild cats, but destitute of all kinds of birds, on account of the rapaciousness of these animals. Having passed this mountain with great difficulty, he came to three cities, called in the Greek language Pithecusæ, from the apes (A), with which all the adjacent country by Gelon in his engagement with the Carthaginians, which Frontinus calls Nigerrimi, were of this nation, the Melanogætuli, and even of the Nigritæ themselves; for that they all were not only known to, but likewise had an intercourse with, the Carthaginians, cannot well be doubted. As not only the cities abovementioned, but a vast number of others, taken notice of by Herodotus, Diodorus, Pausanias, Appian, &c. have been omitted by Cellarius, it were to be wished some learned man would give us a new edition of that author, which he might easily do, with very large additions (34).

(A) Diodorus tells us, that the inhabitants of this tract had customs far different from those of the Greeks; that the apes here mentioned were very familiar with them, had admission into their houses, and received divine honours from them, in the same manner that dogs did from the Egyptians. He adds, that when these creatures were hungry, they took meat out of the cellars, butteries, &c. without any disturbance; that parents named their children after them, as the Greeks did after the gods; that whoever killed country abounded. One of theſe he took by aſſault, and levelled it with the ground; which ſo terrified the other two, that they immediately ſurrendered; but receiving intelligence, that all the neighbouring nations were marching in a formidable body to give him battle, he abandoned his conqueſts, and retreated with the utmoſt precipitation towards the ſea-coaſts [k].

The diſpoſitions of Archagathus and the Carthaginians.

HITHERTO Archagathus had been the favourite of fortune; but this laſt unhappy expedition of Eumachus occaſioned a very conſiderable alteration in the face of affairs. The Carthaginians, being informed of that general's ill ſucceſs, took courage, and reſolved to exert themſelves in an extraordinary manner to recover their former loſſes. In order to this, they divided their forces into three bodies: one of theſe they ſent to the ſea-coaſts, to keep the towns there in awe; another they diſpatched into the Mediterranean parts, to preſerve the inhabitants there in their allegiance; and the laſt body they ordered to the Upper Africa, to ſupport their confederates in that country. They had other motives likewiſe for this conduct: by ſending ſuch a number of mouths out of the city, they ſuppoſed they ſhould, in ſome meaſure, reſtore plenty to the citizens, who began to be in want of proviſions: the city was ſo ſtrongly fortified, and lay ſo near the ſea, that it was in no danger of being taken by force; and therefore all ſuperfluous killed one of them, was ſure to ſuffer death, as a notorious atheiſt; and that for this reaſon, when any perſon behaved himſelf amongſt them with unuſual haughtineſs and inſolence, it was a proverbial expreſſion, Thou haſt drunk the blood of an ape. This proverb Eraſmus applies to thoſe who die a violent death. Two things may be inferred from Diodorus's relation: firſt, that the Africans gave theſe apes names, probably terms of honour and diſtinction, ſuch as the Egyptians and other nations conferred upon their gods; and ſecondly, that the Greeks applied the names of their gods to themſelves, particularly, as there is reaſon to believe, to their kings and heroes, as the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, &c. did. We ſhall treat more amply of this people, and their cuſtoms, in a proper place (35).

(35) Diod. Sic. ubi ſup. Eraſm in adag. p. 492.

ous hands were rather troubleſome than uſeful: by ſending a powerful army to the relief of their allies, they believed they ſhould not only confirm them in their fidelity, and prevent their joining the enemy, but likewiſe encourage the neighbouring neutral princes to declare in their favour; and laſtly, they had reaſon to imagine, that, by ſuch a various diverſion, they ſhould draw the enemy's forces at a greater diſtance from the city, and conſequently give themſelves a little time to breath. They were not deceived in their views; for upon the departure of thirty thouſand ſoldiers out of the city, proviſions returned to their former price; their confederates abandoned the ſide which through compulſion they had been obliged to take; and the enemy were forced to draw their troops off from the neighbourhood of Carthage. Archagathus, being appriſed of the motions of the Carthaginians, divided his forces likewiſe into three bodies: one of which he ſent to obſerve the Carthaginian troops on the ſea-coaſts, with orders afterwards to advance into the Upper Africa; another, under the command of Æſchrion, one of his generals, he poſted at a proper diſtance in the heart of the country, to have an eye both upon the enemy there and the barbarous nations; and with the laſt, which he led in perſon, he kept nearer Carthage, preſerving a communication with the other two, in order to ſend them ſuccours, or recal them, as the exigency of affairs ſhould require. Things being in this ſituation, Archagathus kept himſelf quiet in his camp, well pleaſed with the diſpoſition he had made, and with great impatience expecting the event [1].

The Syracuſans defeated by the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginian troops ſent into the heart of the country were commanded by Hanno, a general of great experience, who, being informed of Æſchrion's approach that way, laid an ambuſcade for him, into which being drawn, he was cut off himſelf, with four thouſand foot and two hundred horſe. The reſt were either taken priſoners, or fled to Archagathus, who lay encamped above five hundred ſtadia from the place where this action happened. Himilco, who commanded the Carthaginian forces in the Upper Africa, having advice of Eumachus's march, immediately put himſelf in motion, and at laſt took poſt in a town near that general's camp, with a reſolution to engage him. The Greeks,

Greeks, tho' much incommoded by the ſpoils taken out of ſeveral cities, which they carried with them, drew up their army in battalia, and prepared to attack the enemy. Himilco left part of his army in the town, with orders to ſally out upon the Greeks as ſoon as they ſaw them purſue him. Advancing then at the head of his other forces, he fell upon them with great fury: but ſoon after his men betook themſelves to a precipitate flight, as tho' they were in the utmoſt conſternation. Eumachus, puffed up with this ſuppoſed advantage, permitted his troops to purſue them with ſo much eagerneſs, that they fell into diſorder; which being obſerved by the forces in the place, they ruſhed out in an inſtant upon them, and at the ſame time the other body facing about, the Greeks were ſo diſheartened, that they endeavoured to retire to their camp; but finding their retreat cut off by the body that iſſued out of the town, they fled to a neighbouring eminence. Here being ſurrounded by the Carthaginians, and in great want of water, they were almoſt totally deſtroyed; for of eight thouſand foot only thirty, and of eight hundred horſe only forty, had the good fortune to eſcape, the reſt either periſhing of thirſt, or being put to the ſword [m].

Agathocles upon receiving this bad news, leaves Sicily.

ARCHAGATHUS, receiving the melancholy advice of theſe two defeats, and being rejoined by the remains of Æſchrion's army, ordered the detachments, he had ſent out to haraſs the enemy, to return with all ſpeed to the camp. This was a very neceſſary precaution; for after the defeat of Eumachus, Himilco moved with great expedition towards Archagathus, blocking up the paſſes, and ſecuring the country, all along as he advanced, from the enemy's incurſions; ſo that had not the above-mentioned detachments retired in time, purſuant to the order received, they muſt undoubtedly have been all cut to pieces. Himilco therefore cutting off all communication betwixt the Syracuſan army and the fruitful country of Africa on one ſide, and Atarbas, another Carthaginian commander, who lay encamped within forty ſtadia of Tunis, preventing any ſupplies coming to them by ſea on the other, the Greeks in a ſhort time were reduced to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions. Many of their confederates, being ſtruck with terror at ſo diſmal a proſpect, deſerted them and went over to the enemy, who now hemmed them in on all ſides, and ſeemed ready to ſwallow them up every moment. Whilſt things remained in this melancholy ſituation, Agathocles received an expreſs from Archagathus, acquainting him with the great loſſes he had ſuſtained, and the extreme ſcarcity of proviſions the troops laboured under. Upon which Agathocles, leaving the management of the war in Sicily to Leptines, by a ſtratagem got eighteen ſail of Etruſcan ſhips, that came to his aſſiſtance, out of the harbour of Syracuſe; and then engaging the Carthaginian ſquadron lying off of that harbour, took five of their ſhips and made all the men therein priſoners. By this action he became maſter of the port, and ſecured the paſſage into it for the merchants of all nations; which ſoon produced a plenty of all things in Syracuſe, where famine before began to make great havock. Supplying himſelf therefore with a ſufficient quantity of neceſſaries for the voyage he was going to undertake, he immediately looſed from Syracuſe, and ſet ſail for Africa [n].

Upon his arrival here, he tooſt a review of his forces (B), and found them to conſiſt of ſix thouſand Greeks, as many Celtes, Samnites, and Etruſcans (C), beſides ten thouſand Africans,

[n] Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

(B) Juſtin relates, that Agathocles, upon his arrival in Africa, found a mutiny in the army, which aroſe from a want of payment of the arrears due to the troops. In order to bring them back to their duty, he made them a florid ſpeech, wherein he told them, "That they ought to ſeek their pay from the enemy; "that as they would all of them have a hand in obtaining the "victory, ſo they ſhould all partake of the ſpoil; that if they "would but exert themſelves vigorouſly for a ſhort time, the war "might be brought to an happy concluſion, and Carthage re-"duced; in which caſe there would be riches enough to ſatisfy "their moſt avaricious deſires." The ſame author adds, that by this ſpeech having appeaſed all commotions, and calmed the minds of the ſoldiery, he ſoon after gave the enemy battle; but being defeated, the troops again grew very clamorous for their pay; which, together with the bad ſtate of his affairs, obliged him, and his ſon Archagathus, by night to abandon Africa (36).

(C) From this paſſage, as well as from many more that might be produced, it appears, that the Etruſcans at this time made ſome figure

(36) Juſtin. l. xxii. c. 8.

Africans, who had perſevered in their fidelity to him, notwithſtanding the diſaſter that had befallen him, and fifteen hundred horſe. As he found his troops reduced almoſt to a ſtate of deſperation, and conſequently prepared for any attempt, he thought this a proper juncture to offer the enemy battle; which he did accordingly. The Carthaginians, though they had the advantage of numbers, having collected all their forces into one body, and were encamped upon an eminence that was almoſt inacceſſible, thought proper to decline the challenge, not being willing to put all to the iſſue of a battle with men who were grown deſperate, but believing, that by lying ſtill in their camp, where they had plenty of every thing, and protracting the time, they could ſtarve the enemy to a ſurrender, and conſequently make themſelves maſters of their camp without ſtriking a ſtroke [o].

And, upon his arrival in Africa, offers the enemy battle.

AGATHOCLES, perceiving the enemy's deſign, and finding he could not long continue in that camp, reſolved at all events to force them to a battle. Moving therefore at the head of his forces to their camp, he attacked it with ſuch bravery, that he made a conſiderable impreſſion upon it, and might poſſibly have carried it, had not his mercenaries baſely deſerted him, and taken to their heels almoſt upon the firſt onſet. The Carthaginians, as much animated by this cowardice as the Greeks were diſmayed, redoubling their efforts, ſoon forced the tyrant to retreat with great precipitation to his camp; whither they purſued him very cloſely, doing great execution in the purſuit. The Carthaginians ſpared the Africans in this action, in order to win the affections of that people; but bearing an implacable hatred to the Greeks, beſides the priſoners they took, they put above three thouſand of them to the ſword [p].

He attacks the Carthaginian camp, but is entirely defeated.

THE next night, the Carthaginians ſacrificed all the priſoners of diſtinction, as a grateful acknowledgment to the gods for the victory they had given them. Whilſt they were in the midſt of this ſolemnity, the wind, ſuddenly riſing, carried the flames to the ſacred tabernacle, near the altar, which they entirely conſumed, as well as the general's tent, and thoſe of the principal officers adjoining to it.

figure by ſea; and that they, as well as many other nations of Italy, were afraid of the Carthaginian power, which induced them frequently to aſſiſt the Greeks of Sicily againſt that nation, both by ſea and land.

it. This occaſioned a dreadful alarm throughout the whole camp, which was heightened by the great progreſs the fire made; for the ſoldiers tents conſiſting of very combuſtible materials, and the wind blowing in a moſt violent manner, the whole camp was almoſt entirely laid in aſhes; and many of the ſoldiers, endeavouring to carry off their arms and the rich baggage of their officers, were burnt to death. Some of thoſe who made their eſcape out of the flames, met with as unhappy a fate; for after Agathocles had received the laſt blow, the Africans, as in all reverſes of fortune that people cloſed with the ſtrongeſt ſide, deſerted him, and were at that very inſtant coming over in a body to the Carthaginians. Theſe the perſons above-mentioned took to be the whole Syracuſan army advancing in order of battle to attack their camp; which being ſoon noiſed through the Carthaginian army, a dreadful confuſion enſued; ſome betook themſelves to their heels, others fell down in heaps one upon another, imagining the enemy was at that inſtant coming upon them; and laſtly, others engaged their comrades, miſtaking them for the enemy. In fine, five thouſand men loſt their lives in this nocturnal encounter, and the reſt thought proper to ſhelter themſelves within the walls of Carthage; neither could the appearance of the day itſelf, for ſome time, diſſipate thoſe terrible apprehenſions they were under [q].

And another in that of Agathocles.

AT the ſame time an accident, ſomething reſembling this, happened in the Greek camp. The African deſerters, obſerving the great confuſion the Carthaginians were in, and not underſtanding the meaning of it, were ſo terrified, that they thought proper to return to the place from whence they came. The Syracuſans, ſeeing a body of troops advancing towards them in good order, immediately concluded, that the enemy were marching to attack them, and therefore in an inſtant cried out, To arms. The flames aſcending out of the Carthaginian camp into the air, and the lamentable outcries proceeding from thence, confirmed them in this opinion, and greatly contributed towards heightening their confuſion. The conſequence of this panic was much the ſame with that above-mentioned; for coming to blows one with another inſtead of the enemy, they ſcarce recovered their ſenſes upon the return of the light. This inteſtine fray was ſo bloody, that it coſt Agathocles four thouſand men [r].

THE laſt diſaſter, though of no advantage to the enemy, who had themſelves ſuffered more than the Syracuſans on the like occaſion, quite diſheartened Agathocles. His mind being now filled with melancholy reflections, he conſidered himſelf as deſerted by the Africans; as not having a ſufficient number of troops to contend with the Carthaginians; and laſtly, as in danger of being aſſaſſinated by his own ſon, and therefore reſolved to quit Africa. As he knew the Carthaginians were maſters at ſea, and was perſuaded they would never make peace with him upon any terms conſiſtent with his ſafety, but take ample vengeance of him for the ravages he had made in their country, he concluded, it would be impoſſible for him to eſcape in a public manner, and therefore ſet his head to work to find out ſome method of ſlipping away privately. This he at laſt, though with great difficulty, effected. But as the manner of his eſcape, which more properly appertains to the hiſtory of Sicily, than that of Carthage, has been already related by us at large, we muſt refer our readers for farther ſatisfaction on this head to a former part of this hiſtory [s].

Who ſoon after abandons Africa.

AFTER Agathocles's departure, his two ſons fell a ſacrifice to the wild fury (D) of the ſoldiers, who immediately put them to death; and chuſing leaders from amongſt themſelves, concluded a peace with the Carthaginians upon the following terms: Firſt, that the Greeks ſhould deliver up all the places they held in Africa, receiving from them three hundred talents. Secondly, that ſuch of them as were willing Agathocles's troops cut off his two ſons, and conclude a peace with the Carthaginians.

(D) Juſtin ſays, that the Syracuſan troops, being appriſed of Agathocles's flight, were in as great a conſternation, as if they had all been actually ſurpriſed by the enemy; that Archagathus, being ſeparated from his father, and loſing his way by the darkneſs of the night, was taken by a Sicilian party, and carried to the camp; that he was put to death by Arceſilaus, one of his father's intimate friends; and that, before the fatal ſtroke was given, Archagathus aſked him, How he thought Agathocles would treat the children of Arceſilaus, who bereaved him of his children? To whom the other replied, that it was enough for him, that his children ſurvived thoſe of Agathocles. In other points, this author almoſt entirely agrees with Diodorus Siculus (37).

ing to ſerve under the Carthaginians, ſhould be kindly treated, and receive the uſual pay. And thirdly, that the reſt ſhould be tranſported to Sicily, and have the city of Selinus for their habitation. Theſe articles were agreed to, and punctually obſerved by the Carthaginians; in conſequence of which, all thoſe troops that adhered to the treaty they had concluded, met with a moſt kind reception; but the cities, which, in hopes of relief from Agathocles, refuſed to ſubmit, were reduced by force of arms, their governors crucified, and the garriſons obliged to cultivate thoſe parts of the country they had before laid waſte and deſtroyed. This war, after various turns and revolutions, ended to the advantage of the Carthaginians, who, by the laſt treaty, ſettled their affairs upon the antient footing, notwithſtanding the great loſſes they had ſuſtained, and notwithſtanding the Syracuſan army had brought them to the very brink of deſtruction [t].

Our hiſtorian here finely obſerves, that ſeveral moſt remarkable traces of a divine providence appeared through the whole courſe, and at the concluſion, of this war: Agathocles was routed in Sicily by the Carthaginians, and loſt the greateſt part of his army; his affairs there were almoſt deſperate, and his capital upon the point of ſurrendering to the enemy: notwithſtanding which, with a very inconſiderable body of men, he, at this perillous juncture, invaded Africa, defeated the Carthaginians, and reduced them almoſt to the ſame unhappy circumſtances his own troops laboured under at Syracuſe. In Sicily he loſt every thing, but his metropolis, which the enemy thought themſelves ſure of; but in Africa he poſſeſſed himſelf of all places, except Carthage, which, for ſome time, he cloſely beſieged. By which remarkable ſteps, Providence made it apparent, that it is equally eaſy for the Supreme Being in a moment to elevate the moſt afflicted ſtates, and depreſs the moſt powerful. After the tyrant, in the height of his proſperity, had murdered Ophellas, in violation of all the laws of friendſhip and hoſpitality, Providence diſtinguiſhed itſelf likewiſe in a moſt extraordinary manner: his affairs in Africa from that inſtant began to decline; the very month, and day of the month, on which he treacherouſly murdered Ophellas, and brought over his army, he loſt both his ſons and his army; and laſtly, as he had moſt perfidiouſly aſſaſſinated ſinated his friend, the very troops this friend commanded, afterwards cut off his two ſons. As Diodorus made theſe obſervations for the ſake of thoſe perſons, who are too apt to ſlight, or not duly attend to, ſuch uncommon inſtances of an over-ruling power, we thought we could not properly omit them [u].

NOTWITHSTANDING peace was concluded betwixt the Syracuſan troops in Africa and the Carthaginians, yet the treaty was not ratified by Agathocles till the year following. That prince, being reduced to great ſtreights by Dinocrates, who began to aſpire to the ſovereignty of Syracuſe, found it neceſſary to court the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. This obliged him to purchaſe a peace with them at a very dear rate; for he not only ratified the former treaty, but conſented to have an additional article inſerted in it much to the advantage of the Carthaginians, viz. that all the cities they formerly poſſeſſed in Sicily ſhould be reſtored to them; which being immediately executed, the Carthaginians left him at liberty to purſue his deſigns in Sicily; and, to facilitate the accompliſhment of them, ſent him three hundred, or, as Timæus Siculus will have it, an hundred and fifty, talents of gold, beſides two hundred thouſand medimni, or five hundred thouſand buſhels of wheat [w]. Which is ratified by Agathocles, AGATHOCLES, having defeated Dinocrates, and re-eſtabliſhed his affairs at Syracuſe, paſſed over into Italy, where he ſubdued the Brutii, rather by the terror of his name, than by force of arms. From hence he paſſed over to the Lipari iſlands, in order to raiſe contributions; which he did to the value of an hundred talents of gold, plundered the ſacred treaſure, ſtripped the temples, and then ſet ſail for Syracuſe, with eleven ſhips laden with the gold and ſpoils of the temples. Diodorus ſeems to intimate, that Sicily, for a conſiderable time after this, enjoyed the ſweets of peace, but that at laſt the implacable hatred Agathocles bore the Carthaginians prevailed upon him to make preparations for a new war with that nation. As the Carthaginians by the laſt war, had made themſelves maſters of the ſea, they were abundantly ſupplied with all the neceſſaries and elegancies of life, and eaſily ſecured their country from all foreign invaſions. Agathocles therefore fitted out a ſquadron of two hundred galleys, in order firſt to prevent the Agathocles meditates another war with Carthage.

exportation of corn and other proviſions from Sicily and Sardinia to Africa, and afterwards to tranſport a large body of forces into that country, to attempt a ſecond time the conqueſt of it. But this, as well as the other projects he had formed, fell to the ground by his death, an account of which we have already given in the hiſtory of Syracuſe [x].

And dies. Th: Syracuſans, being much agitated by civil diſſenſions, and invaded by the Carthaginians, call Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, to their aſſiſtance.

AFTER the death of Agathocles, Mænon, who had poiſoned him, uſurped the ſupreme authority at Syracuſe. This he did by murdering Archagathus, and bringing over the army to his intereſt. The Syracuſans, however, reſolved to have a ſtruggle for their liberty, and therefore raiſed another army, giving the command of it to Icetas, with orders to attack Mænon. In the mean time, Mænon, finding himſelf not ſtrong enough to engage Icetas, induſtriouſly avoided fighting, and applied to the Carthaginians for aſſiſtance. That people, always intent upon fomenting diviſions in Sicily, in order to enlarge their own acquiſitions there, readily granted his requeſt; and joining him with a ſtrong body of troops, obliged the Syracuſans to conclude a peace with them upon their own terms, to recall the exiles, and, as a ſecurity for their punctual obſervation of the treaty, to deliver them four hundred hoſtages. Soon after, Icetas ſeized upon the government at Syracuſe, and ruled there with an abſolute ſway, though he declined the title of king, contenting himſelf with that of prætor. In the mean time, the rebels and Syracuſan exiles, in conjunction with the Agrigentines, who, in the ninth year of his command, revolted from him, advanced, under the conduct of Phintias, to Hybla, where they were attacked and defeated by Icetas. That general, greatly puffed up with this victory, engaged the Carthaginian army upon the banks of the river Teria, but was overthrown with incredible ſlaughter, and forced to fly to Syracuſe. In Icetas's abſence, one Thynion had poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſovereign power there; but being oppoſed by Soſiſtratus, who had the ſame aim, a civil war broke out within the very walls of the city. Thynion maintained himſelf in the iſland with a body of ten thouſand men, and his rival held the other quarters of the city with the like number of forces; ſo that for ſome time Syracuſe was nothing thing but a ſcene of blood and ſlaughter. The Carthaginians, taking advantage of theſe diviſions, reduced moſt of the cities ſubject to Syracuſe, and inveſted the capital itſelf with a fleet of an hundred ſail, and an army of fifty thouſand men. Thynion and Soſiſtratus, finding the Carthaginians to puſh on the ſiege with ſuch vigour, that, in all probability, they would ſoon make themſelves maſters of the city, unleſs ſpeedily relieved, united their forces againſt the common enemy, and diſpatched meſſengers to Pyrrhus, then at Tarentum, entreating him to come over to Sicily, and deliver the Greeks there from the barbarians, who threatened them with utter deſtruction. That prince received theſe meſſengers very favourably, and, ſending Cyneas (E) before-hand to conclude a treaty with Thynion and Soſiſtratus, after having left a ſtrong garriſon in Tarentum, under the conduct of Milo, embarqued with his army for Sicily. He took with him a conſiderable number of elephants, and a vaſt quantity of proviſions, and the tenth day after he had looſed from Tarentum, arrived at Locri; from whence ſteering his courſe for Sicily, he, in a few days, landed at Taurominium, and upon his arrival, was joined by Tyndarion, tyrant of that city. With this reinforcement he advanced to Catana, and from thence marched to Syracuſe at the head of thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe, all his own troops, beſides the Sicilian auxiliaries that joined him, attended by a fleet of two hundred ſail. The Carthaginians, then carrying on the ſiege of Syracuſe, having detached thirty of their beſt veſſels to bring in a freſh ſupply of proviſions, did not think themſelves ſtrong enough to venture an engagement with Pyrrhus's fleet, and therefore judged it not proper to wait his approach; ſo that he entered Syracuſe without

(E) Cyneas was a famous orator, and an hearer of Demoſthenes. According to Plutarch, Pyrrhus looked upon himſelf as more obliged to Cyneas's eloquence for many of his conqueſts, than to the force of his arms. The author laſt mentioned calls him Cineas; but we chuſe rather to follow Juſtin, who calls him Cyneas. Pauſanias countenances us herein; for he takes notice of one Philabrus, an Eretrian traitor, the ſon of Cyneas. This, together with the word κύνεη, an helmet, from whence the proper name itſelf is apparently derived, ſeems to put the point beyond diſpute. Tanaquil Faber himſelf was of our opinion (37).

without oppoſition. Soon after he had poſſeſſed himſelf of that important place, embaſſadors arrived from the Leontini, who had joined with Thynion and Soſiſtratus in preſſing the king of Epirus to come and take upon him the defence of their reſpective ſtates, offering to deliver up their city into his hands, and to join his forces with a body of four thouſand foot and five hundred horſe. Many other cities followed the example of Syracuſe and Leontium. In ſhort, Pyrrhus, partly by the terror of his name, and partly by his inſinuating and affable behaviour, made ſuch an impreſſion upon the minds of the Sicilians in general, that he doubted not ſoon having them all entirely at his devotion, and conſequently flattered himſelf with the hopes of ſpeedily deveſting the Carthaginians of all their acquiſitions in Sicily [y].

The Carthaginians offer the Romans aſſiſtance, which is attacked by Pyrrhus, in conſequence of a treaty juſt concluded between them; which the Romans decline accepting of. They afterwards offer their mediation for accommodating all differences between the two powers.

We muſt not omit obſerving, that before Pyrrhus landed in Italy, the Romans were not unacquainted with the deſigns of that ambitious prince. In order therefore to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt any attemps he might make, or at leaſt to deter him from making any ſuch attempts, they renewed their treaties with the Carthaginians, who, on their ſide, likewiſe were under ſome apprehenſions of his invading Sicily. To the articles of the preceding treaties one was added, which contained an engagement of mutual aſſiſtance, in caſe either of the contracting powers ſhould be attacked by Pyrrhus. As it was particularly ſpecified therein, that the Carthaginians ſhould ſend a ſufficient naval force to the relief of the Romans, upon the firſt notice of a rupture with the king of Epirus, as ſoon as they heard he had made a deſcent in Italy, they ordered for that purpoſe a fleet (F) of an hundred and twenty ſail, under the command of Mago. That officer, in an audience he had of the ſenate, upon his arrival at Rome, told the conſcript fathers, that his principals principals had heard with great concern of the hoſtilities Pyrrhus committed in Italy; adding, that he was ſent by his republic to offer them a foreign force, to enable them to repel this foreign invader. The ſenate, after receiving him with proper marks of diſtinction, returned thanks for this obliging offer of the Carthaginians, but at the ſame time thought proper to decline accepting it. Diodorus tells us, that, notwithſtanding this, the Carthaginian fleet, having a body of land-forces on board, ſailed to Rhegium; which place they battered for ſome time with incredible fury, but were at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege. They deſtroyed, according to this author, a vaſt quantity of timber, and other materials for ſhipping, in that port, and then put to ſea with their ſquadron, to obſerve the motions of Pyrrhus. Mago, ſome days after his departure from Rome, repaired to Pyrrhus's camp, under pretence of offering the mediation of Carthage for accommodating all differences betwixt him and the Romans, but in reality to ſound him, and diſcover, if poſſible, his deſigns with regard to Sicily, which common fame reported he was going to invade. The Carthaginians at that time were afraid, leſt either Pyrrhus, or the Romans, ſhould concern themſelves with the affairs of that iſland, and tranſport forces thither for the conqueſt of it. And indeed this ſeems to have been the real motive for their ſending a fleet to aſſiſt the Romans, rather than a deſire to be punctual in the obſervance of their engagements, which they were never famous for, this being inconſiſtent with that ſubtle and intriguing genius, which diſcovered itſelf in every remarkable point of conduct of the African republic [z].

(F) Valerius Maximus, in the place cited, makes this ſquadron to have conſiſted of an hundred and thirty ſail. Poſſibly the particular number of ſhips, with which the Carthaginians were to aſſiſt the Romans, might be ſpecified in a ſubſequent treaty, ſince the epitomizer of Livy mentions a fourth treaty concluded between the two republics after the battle of Aſculum (38).

As ſoon as Pyrrhus had ſettled his affairs at Syracuſe, Leontium, and the other places that had ſubmitted to him, he began to move with his army towards Agrigentum, which was then poſſeſſed by a Carthaginian garriſon, under the command of Phintias. Upon his march he received intelligence, that the inhabitants had expelled the Carthaginians, and were come to a reſolution to admit him into their city, and join him with a good body of troops. Accordingly, upon his arrival on their frontiers, he was met by Soſiſtratus, at the head of eight thouſand Agrigentine foot, and eight hundred horſe, nothing at all inferior in military ſkill and and bravery to the Epirots themſelves. Soſiſtratus likewiſe prevailed upon him to take thirty towns of the neighbouring country under his protection. Being abundantly ſupplied with darts, arrows, all other kinds of arms, and engines of battery, from Syracuſe, he advanced into the Carthaginian territories, and reduced Heraclea, which was for ſome time defended by a party of Carthaginians. After this, the Azones, Selinuntines, Halicyæans, Egeſtines, and others, made their ſubmiſſion to him; in fine, the Carthaginians found, that this conqueror ſoon deprived them of all their allies, made himſelf maſter of many of their towns without the leaſt oppoſition, and was determined to make the Libyan ſea, on the ſide of Greece, the boundary of their dominions [a].

Takes Eryx by ſtorm, and lays ſiege to Lilybæum.

PYRRHUS, in conformity to the plan he had laid down, advanced to Eryx, a fortreſs defended by a numerous Carthaginian garriſon, and of ſuch natural ſtrength, that it was almoſt inacceſſible. This place, with ſome difficulty, he inveſted, and, after bringing his battering rams to the walls, formed the ſiege of it. The garriſon for ſome time made a vigorous defence; but at laſt Pyrrhus, making a general aſſault, entered the breach his rams had opened, and bore down all before him. In order to render his name famous to all poſterity, after the example of Hercules, he was the firſt who mounted the walls, after having killed many of the Africans, with his own hand. However, he met with ſuch a reſiſtance, that his ſucceſs was dubious, till a freſh reinforcement of his troops ſupported him in the attack, and then he eaſily carried the town. Panormus, Erycta, and moſt other places of note, were either taken by ſtorm, or opened their gates to the victor upon the firſt ſummons; ſo that now the Carthaginians had no town left in Sicily but Lilybæum, to which Pyrrhus laid ſiege with all his forces [b].

But is obliged to raiſe it.

LILYBÆUM was a maritime city of great ſtrength, eſteemed by the Carthaginians as one of the keys of Sicily. They had therefore raiſed many outworks for its defence, drawn a trench to prevent any approaches on the land-ſide, and fortified it in the beſt manner poſſible. The Carthaginians, being maſters of the ſea, landed a ſtrong body of troops here, juſt as Pyrrhus was going to form the ſiege of the

the place; but being greatly alarmed at the rapidity of his conqueſts, they ſent embaſſadors to treat of a peace with him upon very advantageous terms, offering him either a large ſum of money, or to abandon all their conqueſts in Sicily, except Lilybæum. But he, puffed up with his great ſucceſs, and ſpirited up by the Sicilians, who were ſenſible, that they could enjoyno tranquillity, as long as the Carthaginians had any footing in the iſland, anſwered them, that the only means to obtain what they deſired, was to leave Sicily entirely to the Greeks. Upon this the Carthaginians broke off the negotiation, and Pyrrhus repeated his aſſaults with the utmoſt fury; but the town being well furniſhed with all ſorts of proviſions and military ſtores, ſituated upon a rock, and defended by a numerous garriſon, the Carthaginians repulſed him in every attack, and, at the end of two months, obliged him ſhamefully to raiſe the ſiege [c].

NOTWITHSTANDING this repulſe, Pyrrhus began to entertain thoughts of attacking the Carthaginians in the very heart of their dominions, and therefore made all the neceſſary preparations to transfer the war into Africa. As he wanted ſeamen for this expedition, he obliged the maritime cities in his intereſt to furniſh him with ſailors and mariners, and even forced into the ſervice perſons of rank, who had any experience in naval affairs. The cities complained of this violence, but he had no regard to their complaints. This, with ſome other arbitrary proceedings, ſo diſguſted the Sicilians, that they began to look upon him as a tyrant, and the cities in general conceived ſuch an averſion to him, that ſome of them entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines, his avowed enemies. In conſequence of this, there was ſuch a general deſertion amongſt the Sicilian troops in his ſervice, moſt of whom went over to the Carthaginians, that he ſoon found himſelf attended only by his Epirot phalanx; which obliged him to lay aſide all thoughts of any farther military operations, either in Sicily or Africa. The Carthaginians, being informed of this ſudden revolution, ſent a ſtrong reinforcement to their army in Sicily, in order to recover their antient conqueſts conquests there, whilst a mighty fleet cruised round the island to prevent Pyrrhus from making his escape [d] (G).

He returns to Italy.

THAT prince therefore, meditating a return to Italy, embarqued with the remains of his troops on the vessels he brought to Sicily, being attended by a large additional number of Sicilian transports, with a considerable treasure on board, according to Appian. With his fleet he set sail for Rhegium, but was met at sea by the Carthaginian squadron, and obliged to venture an engagement; wherein being defeated, he had seventy of his ships sunk, and most of the rest so shattered, that they were rendered entirely unfit for service; so that he arrived at Locri, with only ten vessels, and from thence with great difficulty marched to Tarentum. The Carthaginians after this reduced the Sicilian towns before in their possession with as much celerity as Pyrrhus had conquered them, and settled their affairs in Sicily upon a firmer footing than ever. It is said, that Pyrrhus, when he was on the point of setting sail, cried out to his men, at the sight of that wealthy country he was going to abandon, "What a fine field of battle do we leave to the Carthaginians and Romans! a prediction which was soon afterwards verified. What happened to this prince after his arrival in Italy, it is unnecessary to touch upon here, since an ample relation of this has been already given in other parts of our history [e].

Hiero declared general of the Syracusan army, and prætor of Syracuse.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Carthaginians so easily dislodged the Epirots from their part of Sicily, yet they had two powerful enemies still to contend with in that island, the Syracusans and the Mamertines. After Pyrrhus's departure, the former, being destitute of a governor, fell into the greatest disorders. Whilst their army lay encamped near Mergana, na, a quarrel aroſe betwixt the ſoldiers and the citizens, which had like to have been attended with fatal effects. Upon this, the ſoldiers elected Artemidorus and Hiero for their leaders, and veſted them with an almoſt abſolute authority. Hiero, tho' then very young, had all the good qualities to be wiſhed for in any prince; and having, by the addreſs and management of his friends, got poſſeſſion of the city, ſoon ſuppreſſed the contrary faction. Far from being elated with his good fortune, he held the reins of government in ſo gentle and ſlack a manner, that he gained the hearts of all men; inſomuch, that the Syracuſans, though highly diſſatisfied with the ſoldiery for aſſuming the right of chuſing their own generals, received him as prætor, without the leaſt conteſt; nay, according to Juſtin, they unanimouſly confirmed him in the command the army had conferred upon him, inveſting him with all the civil and military power during the inter-regnum. He is repreſented by the antient hiſtorians as a conſummate hero and moſt amiable prince; as one who, by the arts of inſinuation and addreſs, without ſhedding of blood or hurting one ſingle citizen, calmed the minds of the people of Syracuſe, and reconciled the different factions, which then miſerably diſtracted that unhappy ſtate. He made his firſt campaign under Pyrrhus, and ſo improved in the art of war by the direction of that great general, that he was looked upon as the beſt commander in his army. The Syracuſan forces under his command, deſtined to act againſt the Carthaginians, after the departure of Pyrrhus, being moſt excellently diſciplined, obtained ſeveral conſiderable advantages over them, and even in a ſhort time grew formidable to them [f].

(H) Alſius gives us the following ſhort hiſtory of the Mamertines: The whole country of the Samnites having been viſited with a terrible peſtilence, Sthenius Mettius, prince of that people, aſſembled all his ſubjects, and told them, that Apollo in a dream had aſſured him, that they ſhould be delivered from the plague, provided they would make a vow to offer up to him all the produce of the next ſpring; which they immediately complying with, the plague ceaſed. Some time after it broke out again amongſt them, and made great havock; upon which conſulting Apollo, they were informed by him, that the return of the peſtilence was owing to the non-obſervance of their vow, ſince thaginians had to deal with in Sicily, they were originally a body of Campanian mercenaries, that Agathocles took into his ſervice. Being tempted with the beauty and opulence of Meſſana, they formed a deſign to make themſelves maſters of it by ſurprize, which took effect in the following manner: Theſe troops, being denied by the Syracuſans the right of giving their votes at the election of magiſtrates, immediately had recourſe to arms; which threw the city into great confuſion; but ſome perſons of diſtinction interpoſing, it was at laſt agreed, that the Campanians ſhould evacuate Sicily within a limited time, and carry off all their effects along with them. Upon the expiration of this term they retired to Meſſana, in order to embarque for their native country. Here they met with a moſt friendly and kind reception from the citizens; in return for whch favour, they in the night either expelled or aſſaſſinated all the men, took the women to their own uſe, and ſeized upon the city. After they had divided the lands and riches of the unhappy Meſſanians amongſt themſelves, they called the city Mamertina, and aſſumed to themſelves the name of Mamertini, that is, martial or warlike people, from Mamers, a word, which, in their language, being a dialect of the Oſcan, ſignified Mars, the (I) god of war. As they ſince they had not ſacrificed to him the children born in the ſpring above-mentioned; but that if they ſhould baniſh all of them that were then living, and grown up, they would be delivered a ſecond time from that dreadful evil. They immediately followed this advice of the god; and the men thus baniſhed retiring to Sicily, came into that part of the iſland called Taurominitana, or Regio Taurominitana. The Meſſanians, being at that time engaged in a bloody war, deſired their aſſiſtance; which having obtained, they overcame all their enemies, and, as a grateful acknowledgment for the ſervice done them, made them free of their city. As the republic of Meſſana was now grown more powerful by the coalition of two different nations, the Meſſanians propoſed aſſuming a new name, and, in order to this, caſt the names of twelve of the gods into an urn, by way of lots, reſolving to take that which came out firſt. This happened to be Mamers; ſo that they were from that time called Mamertines (40).

(I) We are informed by Feſtus, that, in the Oſcan tongue, Mamers ſignified Mars, the god of war. Scaliger obſerves, that Mamers.

they were a bold and reſolute nation, they in a ſhort time reduced many of the neighbouring ſtates, and extended their conqueſts to the middle of the iſland. By the aſſiſtance of the Roman garriſon at Rhegium, which, under the command of one Decius a Campanian, had ſeized upon that city in the ſame infamous manner that the Mamertines had poſſeſſed themſelves of Meſſana, they ſoon became very powerful, and made frequent incurſions both into the Syracuſan and Carthaginian territories, plundering the country, and laying moſt of the towns and villages under contribution. The Romans, thinking their honour concerned in making an example of Decius and his accomplices, for the flagrant violation of public faith they had been guilty of, attacked the city of Rhegium, took it by ſtorm, and put to the ſword all the garriſon, except three hundred men, whom they carried to Rome; and after having ſcourged them with rods, in conformity to the Roman cuſtom, beheaded them publicly in the forum. The Mamertines, being thus deprived of their main ſupport, could not long defend themſelves againſt the attacks of Hiero, who, on account of their repeated depredations, and for ſeveral other weighty reaſons, declared war againſt them. As that prince's troops were always ready to enter upon action, he immediately advanced to the frontiers, and cutting off all communication betwixt the Mamertines and the neighbouring ſtates, encamped on (K) the river Longanus, where he put himſelf in a poſture to receive the enemy, in caſe they ſhould think proper to venture an engagement with him [g].

mers, Mavors, and Mars, amongſt that people, denoted valiant. It has likewiſe been ſuppoſed, that the word Mars comes from amarus, or the Hebrew מרר amaritudo; and this notion is countenanced by the epithets πικρὸς, δεινὸς, ἄγριος, βλοσυρὸς, δήϊος, σχέτλιος, λυγρὸς, ἀμείλικτος, durus, torvus, rigidus, &c. which are frequently applied to him. Scaliger, in his notes upon Varro, thinks that Mars, by reduplication, becomes Mamers (41).

(K) Diodorus Siculus calls this river Loitanus; but we apprehend this to be a corruption of Longanus, the name given it by Polybius,

They are attacked and defeated by Hiero, who, after this action, is proclaimed king of Syracuse.

THE Mamertines, finding all the avenues leading to their capital city guarded by the enemy's detachments, and themselves reduced to great ſtreights by Hiero's poſſeſſing himſelf of ſo commodious a camp, were obliged to run the riſque of a battle; and therefore drawing their forces, which conſiſted of eight thouſand foot and ſome horſe, out of Meſſana, under the command of Cios, they encamped on the oppoſite bank, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to paſs the river. In the mean time, Hiero ſent a choice detachment, conſiſting of two hundred Meſſanians and four hundred picked ſoldiers of his own troops, with orders to take poſt on the hill Thorax, and then wheeling about, to attack the enemy in the rear, whilſt he himſelf, with the groſs of his army, charged them in front. The action for ſome time was ſharp and bloody, both ſides behaving with undaunted reſolution; but at laſt Hiero having gained an eminence near the river, which, being a very advantageous poſt, enabled him terribly to gall the enemy, the detachment poſted upon the hill falling with great fury upon their rear, and they having with much difficulty already ſuſtained the firſt ſhock of the Syracuſan army, the Mamertines immediately gave ground, and ſoon after betook themſelves to a precipitate flight. The Syracuſans purſued them ſo cloſely, that they put every man of them to the ſword, except Cios (L), who having received many wounds

Polybius. We own, the generality of MSS. of the former author have ΛΟΙΤΑΝΟΣ; but this cannot ſtand in competition with the great authority of Polybius. Beſides, upon viewing the words ΛΟΙΤΑΝΟΣ and ΛΟΓΓΑΝΟΣ together, we ſhall find, that nothing can be conceived more eaſy than ſuch a corruption; for ΓΓ IT in the middle of theſe words, the letters on which the true reading depends, reſemble one another ſo nearly, that it is the eaſieſt thing in nature to miſtake the former for the latter. Cellarius, by taking notice only of Polybius's name, ſeems to have been entirely of our opinion (42).

(L) Diodorus tells us, that Cios aſſembled his ſoothſayers, and conſulted them, before he joined battle with Hiero. Upon viewing the ſacrifices narrowly, they unanimouſly declared, that he ſhould lodge that night in the enemy's camp. This prediction of the entrails he took as an infallible token of victory, and therefore engaged the Syracuſan army with great alacrity and courage, but had the misfortune to meet with the fate here mentioned. However, being brought a priſoner into Hiero's camp, the prediction was wounds in the engagement, fainted through loſs of blood, and being taken priſoner, was brought half-dead to Hiero's camp. Hiero, being a prince of ſingular humanity, ordered all poſſible care to be taken of that general, and his wounds to be dreſſed by the moſt ſkilful ſurgeons in his army; but Cios, ſoon after ſeeing his ſon's horſe brought into the camp by a party of Syracuſans, immediately concluded he was killed, which threw him into ſuch an exceſs of grief, that he refuſed all comfort, tore in pieces the ligatures of his wounds, and choſe rather to fall by his own hand, than ſurvive a perſon ſo dear to him. This defeat, which Hiero gave the Mamertines in the plains of Mylæ, was the greateſt blow that people ever received; neither did they ever afterwards find it poſſible to re-eſtabliſh their broken affairs. The troops were ſo highly pleaſed with Hiero's conduct in this battle, that they proclaimed him king of Syracuſe upon his arrival at that metropolis [h].

And is overreached by the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginians, being appriſed of the great victory Hiero had gained over the Mamertines, began to be uneaſy at the progreſs of that prince's arms; but their uneaſineſs was much heightened, upon receiving intelligence, that the Mamertines had made ſome overtures to him for an accommodation, the principal of which was, that they ſhould put the city of Meſſana into his hands, provided he would engage to maintain the inhabitants in the poſſeſſion of their antient rights and privileges, and protect them againſt any foreign invaſion. The Carthaginians endeavoured to traverſe this negotiation; but finding themſelves unable to prevent its taking effect, they formed a ſcheme to keep Meſſana out of the hands of the Syracuſans. In order to this, Hannibal, who at that time commanded the Carthaginian forces in Sicily, amuſed Hiero, till ſome troops, which he had kept concealed in the Lipari iſlands, drew near Meſſana. The cunning African came to Hiero, advancing to take poſſeſſion of the place, as it were to congratulate him on his late victory, was undoubtedly looked upon as fulfilled, though not in the ſenſe in which he underſtood it. By ſuch ambiguous anſwers both the oracles and haruſpices frequently impoſed upon thoſe who conſulted them (43).

but in reality with an intention to retard the march of his troops to Meſſana. In the mean time, an officer being ſent, at the head of a detachment, into the town, aſſured the Mamertines, that he came as a friend, and that his only deſign was to aſſiſt them againſt the Syracuſans, and prevent them from delivering their city into the enemy's hands. The Mamertines, being greatly weakened by the late overthrow, readily admitted the Carthaginian detachment, and by that means preſerved themſelves ſtill independent both of the Syracuſans and Carthaginians. Theſe two laſt powers, finding they had purſued wrong meaſures, afterwards entered into an alliance, and aſſembled their joint forces to form the ſiege of Meſſana. This obliged the Mamertines to call in the Romans to their aid; which gave riſe to the firſt Punic war, a particular account of which will be found in the following ſection [i].

SECT. VI.

The hiſtory of the Carthaginians, from the firſt to the ſecond Punic war.

The Carthaginians advance with a powerful fleet to Tarentum, when beſieged by the Romans; which gives great umbrage to that nation.

THOUGH the Carthaginians had entered into an alliance with the Romans a little before Pyrrhus landed in Italy, and offered them powerful ſuccours againſt that prince, yet, even at this time, there reigned a mutual jealouſy and diffidence between the two ſtates. As their power was very extenſive, their political views and intereſts diametrically oppoſite, and both of them ſeemed acted by the ſame ſpirit of ambition, it was morally impoſſible but that, ſooner or later, a bloody quarrel muſt commence betwixt them. The Romans, proving ſuperior to Pyrrhus, as has been related, obliged him to abandon his Italian allies, whom, ſoon after his departure, they eaſily reduced [a]. The Samnites received ſo terrible an overthrow from the conſuls L. Papirius Curſor and Sp. Corvilius, ſurnamed Maximus, that, that, from this time, they ceaſed to be a nation [b]. The Brutians and Lucanians were next obliged to ſubmit; ſo that only Tarentum remained to be chaſtiſed for incurring the diſpleaſure of the Romans. As that city had not only embroiled the Romans with their neighbours, but likewiſe deſtroyed one of their fleets, inſulted their embaſſadors, invited Pyrrhus over into Italy, and greatly exerted itſelf in aſſiſting him to execute the project he had formed againſt the Roman republic, they were reſolved to make it feel the effects of their reſentment; and therefore the conſuls, immediately after they had conquered the Brutians and Lucanians, cauſed it to be inveſted [c]. Milo at this time commanded the Epirot garriſon in the citadel, and the Tarentines had poſſeſſion of the town. Theſe two parties, being then at variance, inſtead of taking proper meaſures for the defence of the place, ſeemed to be under-hand contriving how they might deliver it up to a foreign power [d]. As the Carthaginians lay at that time with a ſtrong ſquadron of galleys, and a body of land-forces on board, before the town, and affected to treat only the Epirots as enemies, it was ſuſpected, that the Tarentines had implored their aſſiſtance; and on the other hand Milo entered into a negotiation with the Romans, in order to put both the town and citadel into their hands; which at laſt he did, and that even by the conſent of the Tarentines themſelves [e]. The Carthaginians, being diſappointed of their aim, retired to their own coaſts; but the Romans were not a little chagrined at this ſtep, ſince they thereby diſcovered, not only that the Carthaginians intended to rob the republic of a city, which by right of conqueſt, belonged to it, but likewiſe that they meditated the conqueſt even of Italy itſelf. Beſides, could the deſign have been carried into execution, it would have been a notorious infraction of the treaty lately concluded between the two ſtates. This therefore convinced the Romans, that the Carthaginians paid little regard to the faith of treaties, and conſequently that they could not be too much upon their guard againſt the attempts of ſo perfidious, as well as enterpriſing, a nation. That the Romans drew ſuch a concluſion from the conduct of the Carthaginians at this juncture, seems not only probable from the nature of the thing itself, but likewise from an observation of Cato [f] and Gellius; and therefore we may look upon it as a remote or pretended cause at least of the first Punic war; and indeed this is allowed by Zonaras, as well as Lucius Ampelius, one of their own later historians [g].

The Carthaginians jealous of the growing power of the Romans.

THE Romans, soon after the reduction of Tarentum, made themselves masters of all the countries in Italy, from the remotest part of Etrutria to the Ionian sea, and from the Tyrrhenian sea to the Adriatic. This rapid progress of their arms gave a fresh alarm to the Carthaginians, who now considered, that the Romans had a very short passage over to Sicily, and that the continent of Italy could not limit their ambition. They therefore began to look upon all their possessions in that island as very precarious, unless they could speedily reduce the exorbitant power of their rival within narrower bounds. Such a consideration as this must undoubtedly have encreased the jealousy, and heightened the disgust already conceived in the breasts of the Carthaginians, and had most certainly its proper influence in pushing them on to a rupture with the Romans [h].

THE inhabitants of Rhegium, being exposed to the attempts of Pyrrhus, as well as the insults of the Carthaginians, who, soon after the arrival of that prince in Italy, infested all the Ionian sea, applied to the Romans for a garrison to defend them from an invasion. In compliance with their request, a legion of Campanians was raised, the Romans at that time not being able to spare any of their own troops, on account of the war with Pyrrhus, and sent under the command of one Decius Jubellius, a native of Campania, to garrison that city. These troops, for some time, did their duty perfectly well; but at last, in imitation of the Mamertines, who had possessed themselves of Messana in a most perfidious manner, and, being of the same nation, assisted these Campanians with a body of forces to accomplish their design, they began to entertain thoughts of rendering themselves independent at Rhegium. To this they were strongly excited by the beauty and opulence of the place, and the elegancies the citizens abounded with. As

As the Romans at that time had their hands full of the war with Pyrrhus, they thought this a favourable juncture to bring their project to bear, ſince nothing but the oppoſition which might be apprehended from that quarter could poſſibly obſtruct the execution of it. Decius therefore, to colour his proceedings, pretended to have advice, that the Rhegians had entered into a conſpiracy to deliver up the place to Pyrrhus, and betray the garriſon into his hands. In order to prevent this, he ſuggeſted there was a neceſſity of taking poſſeſſion of the town, and making an example of the conſpirators. To ſupport what he advanced, forged letters were produced, which he pretended to have intercepted, wherein all the particulars of the conſpiracy were related at large. This, together with a ſet ſpeech on the occaſion, made ſuch an impreſſion upon the troops, that they were prepared for any attempt, and ready at an inſtant to execute their general's orders. In the mean time, a perſon privy to the deſign, appearing, pretended to have certain news, that Pyrrhus had already made a deſcent on the territories of Rhegium, and was advancing towards the city, in order to have a conference with the principals of the conſpiracy. This ſerving as a ſignal to the Campanians, the train being already laid, they immediately took poſſeſſion of the city, divided amongſt themſelves all the plunder found therein, and put moſt of the men to the ſword [i].

NOT long after the perpetration of this horrid fact, Decius was expelled by the ſoldiery, and obliged to fly to Meſſana. There being ſeized by a violent pain in his eyes, he applied to a Rhegian phyſician for relief; who, reſenting the injuries offered his country, preſcribed him a plaiſter of cantharides, which totally deprived him of his ſight, and then made his eſcape. This we learn from Diodorus. But Appian intimates, that he was attacked by this diſorder at Rhegium, and ſent to Meſſana for a phyſician, not caring to truſt any of thoſe in the place where he reſided. The Mamertines ſent him one, eminent for his ſkill in the art of medicine, whom the laſt author inſinuates to have been a Rhegian; who, applying cauſtics to his eyes, adviſed him to keep them on till his return, which never happened; ſo that in a ſhort time he became ſtark-blind. Neither

The Romans retake Rhegium, and either put to the ſword, or behead, all the Campanians; which, together with the defeat given the Mamertines by Hiero, obliges this laſt people to receive a Carthaginian detachment into Meſſana,

Neither Polybius nor Dio take notice of any of theſe circumſtances; and therefore give us reaſon to believe, which is likewiſe conſonant to the fragment of Appian juſt referred to, that he did not depart from Rhegium, as Diodorus ſuggeſts, but met with the fate he deſerved either in that place or Rome, with his accomplices and companions. Be this as it will, as ſoon as the Roman republic was in a condition to take vengeance of this perfidious legion, ſhe ordered L. Genucius Clepſina to beſiege Rhegium with a powerful army. The Campanians, being reinforced by a ſtrong body of Mamertines, whom they had likewiſe aſſiſted in their wars with the Syracuſans and Carthaginians, made a vigorous defence; but the conſul, redoubling his attacks, at laſt took the place, and put all the garriſon to the ſword, except three hundred men, who were carried to Rome, and there puniſhed with exemplary ſeverity. They were whipped with rods in the middle of the forum, had their heads ſtruck off, and their bodies remained, by the ſenate's order, uninterred. Appian relates, that Decius, being detained in cloſe cuſtody, grew impatient of his confinement, and laid violent hands on himſelf; but whether this happened at Rome or Rhegium, he ſays not. In the mean time, the Mamertines, having ſuſtained a prodigious loſs, not only by the ſlaughter of their troops ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Campanians, but likewiſe by the deſtruction of their faithful ally, who had hitherto greatly contributed to ſupport them againſt all their enemies, and receiving about the ſame time the terrible defeat from Hiero above-mentioned, found themſelves upon the point of ſubmitting to the Syracuſans. Some of the principal citizens, to prevent this, applied to the Romans for ſuccours, who, for certain reaſons, not being diſpoſed to ſupport them at that conjuncture, the Carthaginian faction in Meſſana admitted a Carthaginian detachment into the town, which immediately took poſſeſſion of the citadel. The Roman party, highly incenſed at ſuch a point of conduct, hereupon reſolved to ſend a ſecond time to their friends for ſpeedy relief. This ſtep of the Carthaginians therefore muſt be allowed to have been the immediate cauſe of the firſt Punic war [k].

As

As for the motives which prompted the Carthaginians to this war, we have juſt hinted at them: a deſire of ſecuring and enlarging their acquiſitions in Sicily; the neceſſity of humbling a proud rival, whoſe intereſts in every reſpect claſhed with theirs; a reſolution to preſerve the dominion of the (A) ſea, and that extenſive trade they then enjoyed; theſe, we ſay, were undoubtedly the principal motives, which prevailed upon them to engage in this famous quarrel. The Romans likewiſe, in all probability, were influenced by reaſons of much the ſame kind: a thirſt after empire, an abhorrence of the Carthaginian genius, a fear that ſo falſe a friend would get a footing in Italy; in fine

Some of the principal motives which induced both the Carthaginians and Romans to undertake the firſt Punic war.

(A) That the Carthaginians were, for ſeveral centuries, extremely powerful by ſea, cannot be diſputed; nay, if John Tzetzes may be credited, they came as far with their fleets as the Thracian Boſphorus, where they carried on a naval war with the Byzantines. However, this we cannot believe, as being entirely unſupported by any other author. That ſcholiaſt's words are, Ὁμοίως δέ τυτοις καὶ ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ καὶ Βυζάντιοι, διά πλειαρίυ σκαλμοῦς τινας διενεχθέντες, δεινῶς ἐναυμάχησαν ἐν τῷ Βοσπόρω. Tzetzes, in the place referred to, obſerves how common a thing it is for neighbouring ſtates to quarrel, and that even about trifles; and, amongſt others, brings the diſpute betwixt the ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ and the Βυζάντιοι, in the paſſage before us, as an inſtance of it. As therefore the Carthaginians and Byzantines could never have been looked upon as neighbours, the paſſage under conſideration wants undoubtedly to be amended; which will be done to ſatisfaction, if for ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ we read ΚΑΛΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ; ſince the people of Chalcedon or Calchedon were moſt certainly neighbours to the Byzantines, and ſometimes embroiled with them. That the people of Chalcedon were neighbours to the Byzantines, is evident from the ſituation aſſigned that city by Stephanus, Tacitus, Pliny, and Strabo; ſince, according to theſe authors, it ſtood over-againſt Byzantium, on the oppoſite ſhore. In order to ſupport our emendation farther, it may be not improper to obſerve, that tho', in printed books, for the moſt part, we find the name of this city to be ΧΑΛΚΗΔΩΝ, yet, in antient coins, which are of much greater authority, it is always exhibited ΚΑΛΧΗΔΩΝ, and the people named ΚΑΛΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ, or, in the Doric dialect, ΚΑΛΧΑΔΟΝΙΟΙ. This is ſo ſtrong a proof of the error of the printed books, and many MSS. in this particular, that Hardouin has corrected the MSS. and printed editions of Pliny, and Seguin thoſe of Strabo, by the help of theſe coins. Spanheim likewiſe looks upon ΚΑΛΧΗΔΩΝ fine, a notion, that their political views were entirely repugnant to thoſe of the Carthaginians, diſpoſed them to a rupture with that people. That the poſſeſſion alſo of the fertile iſlands of Sicily and Sardinia, which, they imagined, muſt of courſe fall to the victor, had great weight with the Romans, in determining them to enter upon a war with Carthage, is extremely probable, and even acknowledged by ſome of their own writers[l]. The firſt Punic war, according to Polybius, laſted twenty-four years[m], and was carried on chiefly by ſea, both ſides ſtruggling hard for the dominion of that element. As Sicily, the object of this diſpute, was an iſland, ſuch a contention was very natural. We ſhall now proceed to give a brief account of the principal tranſactions of every campaign, in order of time as they happened[n].

The Roman faction in Meſſana, upon the admiſſion of a Carthaginian garriſon into the citadel, diſpatched freſh deputies to Rome, to ſollicit aſſiſtance from the republic. Upon their arrival, in the name of their principals, they offered the poſſeſſion of Meſſana to the Romans, and, in the moſt moving terms, implored their protection. The conſcript fathers, imagining that a compliance with this requeſt would deſtroy the uniformity of their conduct, and make them loſe the high character they had gained by the ſevere ſevere puniſhment lately inflicted upon the perfidious Campanian legion, were for ſome time in ſuſpenſe what courſe to take; but afterwards conſidering what vaſt territories the Carthaginians poſſeſſed in Africa and Spain; that they were maſters of a great part of Sicily, Sardinia, and the other iſlands lying on the coaſt of Italy; that they had a deſign on Italy itſelf, which they would moſt certainly put in execution, if they could entirely reduce Meſſana, and ſeize upon the whole iſland of Sicily; they either really were, or pretended to be, under great apprehenſions for their own ſafety, and therefore appeared diſpoſed to ſupport the Mamertines. This diſpoſition was ſoon turned into a reſolution by the unanimous voice of the people, who, having been greatly impoveriſhed by the late wars, and propoſing to themſelves no ſmall advantage from an invaſion of Sicily, to which likewiſe they were ſtrongly excited by thoſe who expected the command of the armies deſtined for that ſervice, were very eager from the beginning for an attempt to deliver Meſſana. The ſenate therefore decreed, that this enterpriſe ſhould be undertaken; and in conſequence of this decree, which was likewiſe confirmed by an ordinance of the people, Appius Claudius, one of the conſuls, received orders to attempt a paſſage to Sicily, at the head of a powerful army.

THE conſul, being obliged to ſtay ſome time longer in Rome, where his preſence was then neceſſary, on account of ſome affairs of moment, commanded one Caius Claudius, a legionary tribune, and a perſon of great intrepidity and reſolution, to advance with a few (B) veſſels to Rhegium. The conſul ſends C. Claudius, a legionary tribune, to act in his ſtead.

(B) Zonaras calls theſe veſſels triremes; but in this he not only contradicts Polybius, but himſelf. For Polybius aſſerts, that neither quinqueremes nor triremes were in uſe amongſt the Italians before the firſt Punic war; and as for Zonaras himſelf, he aſſures us, that the Romans were entirely ignorant of every thing relating to the building and equipping of fleets before the commencement of their firſt quarrel with Carthage. We are told by ſome writers, that a Carthaginian galley, venturing too near the ſhore, was ſtranded, and taken by the Romans; and that, after the model of this galley, the Romans built many of thoſe veſſels, of which their firſt fleet was compoſed. This muſt have been a trireme; ſince, according to Polybius, their firſt fleet conſiſted of quinqueremes and triremes. And Aurelius Victor gives us to underſtand, that the firſt Carthaginian quinquereme, which fell into gium. Claudius, upon his arrival there, obſerving the Carthaginian ſquadron to be infinitely ſuperior to his own, and abſolute maſters of the ſtreights, thought it would be little inferior to madneſs to attempt at that time tranſporting any forces to Sicily; and therefore contented himſelf, for the preſent, with watching the enemies motions. However, he ſoon after, in a ſmall boat, boldly croſſed the ſtreights himſelf, and had a conference with the Mamertines; but finding that people awed by the Carthaginian garriſon in the citadel, he returned to Rhegium, without having been able to prevail upon them to accept of the Roman protection. Notwithſtanding which, in a little time, he received advice, that the Mamertines, being deſirous of expelling the Carthaginians, and recovering their former abſolute independency, were in motion; upon which he ventured a ſecond time to Meſſana, and aſſured the Mamertines, that the ſole view of his republic was, to reſtore them to the full enjoyment of all their rights and privileges, and preſerve them in that ſituation. Then addreſſing himſelf to the Carthaginian officers there preſent, he, with an air of dignity, told them, that they either ought immediately to abandon the place, or aſſign a reaſon for their continuance in it. The Mamertines, being under ſome reſtraint, by reaſon of the Carthaginian troops, which had taken poſt amongſt them, were ſilent; and the Carthaginians, being, in effect, maſters of the place, would not vouchſafe him an anſwer. Directing himſelf therefore to the latter, he told them, they had reaſon to be ſilent, ſince the iniquity of their conduct would not admit of a vindication. And as for you, Mamertines, added he, your ſilence I take to be a full proof of your paſſion for liberty; ſince, if you were diſpoſed to be ſlaves to ſuch imperious maſters, nothing could hinder you from declaring for them. The Mamertines, animated by the tribune's boldneſs, applauded his ſpeech, and ſhewed their readineſs to receive the Roman ſuccours. Claudius, having thus happily gained his point, departed to the oppoſite ſhore, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions

(C) That the Romans were not entirely unacquainted with the art of navigation before the time of the firſt Punic war, is apparent from hence, that they were contiguous to the Etruſcans, a nation (3) very powerful by ſea many centuries before this war, from whom they muſt undoubtedly have received ſome knowledge of ſea affairs; nay, they had conquered Etruria, and conſequently made themſelves maſters of the Etruſcan power both by ſea and land, before the commencement of the rſt Punic war. It is true, the Etruſcan power, particularly by ſea, had been declining many years before the Romans reduced Etruria; but conſidering how celebrated the Etruſcans had been (4) for the figure they made by ſea in former ages, we cannot ſuppoſe them entirely void of ſhipping, when conquered by the Romans. Beſides, ſeveral very antient Roman coins, prior to the firſt Punic war, if not as old as the regal government, plainly prove the Romans not to have been abſolute ſtrangers to the art of conſtructing ſhips in earlier ages, ſince different parts of ſhips are viſible on the reverſes of theſe (5) coins. On the other hand, it muſt be allowed, that, till the period above-mentioned, the Romans were much more intent upon rendering themſelves formidable by land, than by ſea; neither is it at all natural to believe, that they ſhould have entertained any thoughts of building and equipping a fleet of any force, before they had formed a deſign of attacking the dominions of ſome rival ſtate, ſeparated from in order to throw a body of troops into that place, immediately went in queſt of him; and coming up with him near from their own by the watry element; and ſo we find, in fact, it happened. After having premiſed this, we think we may venture to allow a poſſibility of reconciling Polybius with himſelf, in his relation of the manner and period, wherein the Romans firſt endeavoured to fit out a fleet. That the Romans applied themſelves to commerce long before the times we are now ſpeaking of, is evident from the two firſt treaties they concluded with the Carthaginians, and from ſeveral other incidents taken notice of in the Roman hiſtory, as we have elſewhere obſerved; but then it is probable, that, for the moſt part at leaſt, they traded in Italian bottoms, making uſe of the ſhips of their allies, who are expreſly mentioned in thoſe treaties, on ſuch occaſions. Be this as it will, it is certain, that they generally, if not always, as we are inclined to believe they did, applied to their allies for ſhips of war and naval ſuccours, whenever they wanted them. This is evident from Juſtin and Polybius, to omit other authors, from whom it appears, that, in the treaty concluded with Carthage near the time of Pyrrhus's coming to Italy, it was ſtipulated, that the Carthaginians ſhould aſſiſt the Romans with a ſquadron, in caſe they ſhould be attacked by that prince; and that, in the beginning of the firſt Punic war, Claudius could not paſs over to Sicily, till he was ſupplied with ſhips by the Tarentines, Locrians, and Neapolitans. That the Romans never equipped a fleet of any conſequence before this war, or even had any quinqueremes or triremes amongſt them, likewiſe farther appears from their being totally ignorant of the art of rowing and navigating thoſe veſſels, which they found themſelves obliged to learn firſt upon land; nor indeed is it poſſible to conceive, that they ſhould have had any ſquadron of note before they had theſe galleys, ſince the chief ſtrength of fleets, in the age we are now upon at leaſt, conſiſted in ſuch galleys. The Romans therefore might have had a few coaſting veſſels, and rude galleys or biremes, of their own, in the times preceding the firſt Punic war; but they never croſſed the ſeas with any ſquadron of quinqueremes or triremes till now, as appears from Polybius, Livy, and others. Polybius therefore, in his account of the firſt fleet the Romans fitted out, muſt be underſtood as ſpeaking of theſe ſhips only. And indeed that the Romans were totally ignorant of the conſtruction of this ſort of veſſels, and that they were not uſed in any part of Italy before the firſt rupture of the Romans with the Carthaginians, may be certainly inferred from the expreſs words of that excellent hiſtorian (6).

(6) Polyb. l. i. & l. iii. Juſtin. l. xviii. Liv. epit. l. xvi. & Flor. l. ii. c. 2. &c.

near the coaſt of Sicily, attacked him with great fury. He had ſcarce begun the attack, when a violent ſtorm aroſe, which daſhed many of the Roman veſſels in pieces againſt the rocks, they not being ſo capable of riding out a ſtorm as the Carthaginian, and did their ſquadron infinite prejudice; inſomuch, that Claudius, finding himſelf engaged with two enemies at once, was forced to give way. He was therefore totally defeated, moſt of his ſhips taken, others deſtroyed, and he himſelf obliged to retire with great difficulty to Rhegium. Hanno, either to pique the Romans in point of honour, or to divert them from ſending ſuccours to Meſſina, reſtored all the veſſels he had taken from Claudius, who, when the Carthaginian deputies arrived, was refitting his fleet. Theſe deputies, upon their arrival, propoſed a treaty of peace to the tribune; which being rejected, they had ſome warm expoſtulations with the Romans, whom they accuſed of a violation of former treaties, declaring, that the Carthaginians would never ſuffer the Romans to be maſters of the ſtreights betwixt Italy and Sicily, nor even to waſh their hands in them. This, for the preſent, cut off all hopes of a pacification, ſo that Claudius reſumed his military preparations with the utmoſt vigour; which having completed, and narrowly obſerved when the wind and tide favoured him, he weighed anchor a ſecond time, and, eluding the vigilance of the Carthaginian ſquadron poſted to intercept them, got ſafe into the port of Meſſana. The Mamertines having ſurrendered the town to him, Hanno thought proper to retire into the citadel; but at the deſire of Claudius, and the heads of the Mamertines, he had a conference with them, when he was perfidiouſly ſeized by one of the legionaries, at the command of the Roman general, and detained a conſiderable time priſoner. This ſtep greatly intimidated the Carthaginian garriſon, and, with ſome ſucceeding perſuaſions and menaces intermixed, induced them to ſurrender the citadel to Claudius. Hanno, being afterwards releaſed, went to Carthage, to juſtify his conduct; which having the misfortune not to do to the ſatisfaction of the ſenate, he was, by their order, immediately crucified. Polybius tells us, that his countrymen ſuſpected him guilty either of cowardice or treachery; but that he really deſerved ſuch an imputation, does not appear from any point of his conduct. On the contrary, the cowardice of the Carthaginian Carthaginian garriſon, when deprived of their commandant, and the perfidiouſneſs of Claudius, ſeem to have been the true cauſes of the loſs of the citadel. Nothing can be inferred to his prejudice from the cruel and ignominious death he met with, ſince that was a fate common to the moſt famous Carthaginian generals when unſucceſsful [P].

The Carthaginians and Syracuſans lay ſiege to Meſſana.

THE Carthaginians, being determined at all events to diſlodge the Romans from Meſſana, raiſed a formidable army, and equipped a powerful fleet, for that purpoſe, appointing another Hanno, the ſon of Hannibal, commander in chief of theſe forces. This general, landing his troops at Lilybæum, invited Hiero, king of Syracuſe, to enter into an alliance with the Carthaginians, and then marched to Selinus, near which city he encamped; from whence, at the head of a conſiderable detachment, he advanced to Agrigentum, and repaired the fortifications of the citadel there. The Agrigentines were eaſily prevailed upon to declare for the Carthaginians; and Hanno, upon his return to the camp at Selinus, found embaſſadors from Hiero, who had orders to concert with him the proper meaſures for driving the Romans out of Sicily. Purſuant to the plan of operations Hanno and Hiero had laid down, thoſe two generals marched with their united forces to Meſſana, and immediately inveſted the town. Before they beſieged the place in form, they ſummoned the Roman garriſon to ſurrender; which they refuſing to do, Hanno put all the Italian ſoldiers in the Carthaginian ſervice to the ſword, and thereby rendered an accommodation with the Romans, on the part of his nation, impracticable. The Carthaginians pitched their tents at Senes (D), a town in the neighbourhood

(D) The Greek name of this place in Polybius is ΣΗΝΕΙΣ, in Diodorus ΕΓΝΕΙΣ, which Rhodomanus tranſlates cubilia. Whether the word is a proper name, or an appellative emphatically uſed, cannot now be determined, ſince none of the old geographers have taken any notice of a place known by this name in the neighbourhood of Meſſana. However this may be, it is probable, that the words uſed by Polybius and Diodo-hood of Meſſana, and poſted their fleet near the promontory (E) Pelorus, to prevent any ſupplies coming by ſea; whilſt Hiero encamped on the hill Chalcidicus, in order to cut off all communication betwixt the beſieged and the neighbouring country. The Romans, being appriſed of theſe motions, diſpatched the conſul Appius Claudius himſelf, at the head of a powerful army to Rhegium; who, upon his arrival there, ſent embaſſadors to Hiero, conjuring him, by the antient friendſhip betwixt the Romans and him, to deſiſt from the ſiege he had undertaken, promiſing at the ſame time, that not the leaſt damage ſhould be offered to his territories. Hiero anſwered, that the Mamertines had poſſeſſed themſelves of Meſſana in the moſt villainous manner; that they had razed the cities of Gela and Camarina, and treated the inhabitants with unheard-of cruelty; that therefore ſuch a neſt of banditti ought to be entirely extirpated; that the Romans could not, without a manifeſt deviation from their pretended equity, take them under their protection; and that in caſe, contrary to expectation, this ſhould happen, the world would naturally conclude, that they were not rus (7) were originally the ſame, though afterwards rendered different by the careleſſneſs and inattention of tranſcribers. The great affinity betwixt the letters [ΣΗΝΕΙΣ, ΕΥΝΕΙΣ] of which they conſiſt, ſince H is often written in MSS. |-|, one ſide of which might be eaſily defaced by length of time, and the letter thereby miſtaken for a Υ, and the two initial letters in many MSS. being nearly the ſame, gives good ground for ſuch a ſuppoſition.

(E) It is ſomething ſurpriſing, that ſo learned a man as Rhodomanus, in his Latin verſion of Diodorus, ſhould tranſlate the word ΑΚΡΑ here "arx", which ſignifies a fort or citadel; whereas it ought to have been rendered promontorium, a cape or promontory. It is true, ΑΚΡΑ anſwers to both the ſignifications of arx and promontorium; but that, in this place, it ſhould be confined to the latter, is evident from Polybius, who intimates, that the Carthaginian fleet lay near cape Pelorus or Peloris, and lined the coaſt. That this cape or promontory was called Pelorias, the name Diodorus here uſes, appears from Ovid and Solinus; which proves Diodorus exactly to correſpond with Polybius. It muſt therefore be allowed, that here is a ſecond inſtance produced, to which many others might be added, of Rhodomanus's inaccuracy in his above-mentioned verſion (8).

influenced by the maxims of rigid probity and juſtice, as they would have mankind believe, but ſwayed by ambition, their aim being not to ſuccour the diſtreſſed, but to make themſelves maſters of the iſland of Sicily [q].

And are defeated by the conſul Appius Claudius.

THE conſul, having received this anſwer, reſolved to paſs over into Sicily with all poſſible expedition; but, to conceal his deſign, gave out, that he could not venture upon that enterprize, before he had conſulted the ſenate. This ſtratagem was of ſignal ſervice to him, ſince the Carthaginian ſquadron poſted to oppoſe his paſſage would undoubtedly have been too ſtrong for him, had they been appriſed of his reſolution; but this report reaching their ears, they guarded the ſtreights with leſs care and vigilance. In the mean time, Appius, going on board a (F) galley, built unſkilfully and in great haſte, pretended to coaſt along the ſhore in his way to Rome; but as ſoon as he was out of ſight, he tacked about, and, being favoured by a dark night, reached, with ſome tranſports, the neareſt coaſts of Sicily, and landed his forces, without being perceived by the enemy. He had no ſooner landed, but he took a view of both the enemies armies and their fleet; and finding them vaſtly ſuperior to his own, that they puſhed on the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour, and that, in all probability, the town muſt ſoon capitulate, unleſs their camps could be forced, which could not be done without a great effuſion of blood, he reſolved

(F) Aurælius Victor intimates, that this Claudius, who was ſurnamed Caudex, and the brother of Appius Claudius Cæcus, or "the blind", croſſed the ſtreights firſt in a ſmall fiſher-boat, with a few tranſports attending him, in order to diſcover the diſpoſition of the Mamertines, and reconnoitre the enemy; which having done, he returned to Rhegium in the ſame veſſel, and had the good luck to take a Carthaginian quinquereme, with a body of foot, in his paſſage, on board of which he ſoon after tranſported a Roman legion to Meſſana, following himſelf with his whole fleet, and the reſt of the land-forces. This general is ſaid likewiſe by the ſame author to have diſtinguiſhed himſelf againſt the Vollinians; which doubtleſs induced the ſenate to give him the command of the army deſtined to act againſt the Carthaginians and their allies in Sicily (9)

reſolved to make another effort to bring about an accommodation between the contending parties. In order to this, he diſpatched miniſters a ſecond time both to Hiero and the Carthaginians, with freſh propoſals for a peace, purely, as it ſhould ſeem, to amuſe them, till he had received a reinforcement from Rome, and was able to attack them with a better proſpect of ſucceſs; but the negotiation proving ineffectual, and finding, notwitſtanding the inequality of numbers, that he muſt either conquer or die, he firſt attacked the Syracuſans, and that with ſuch intrepidity, that tho' for ſome time they defended themſelves with great bravery, putting the Roman cavalry into diſorder, he defeated them, and entered Meſſana in a triumphant manner, loaden with their ſpoils. Following his blow, he fell immediately upon the Carthaginians, whoſe camp was at ſome diſtance from that of the Syracuſans, as has been before obſerved; who, being ſurpriſed by the ſuddenneſs of the attack, were put to the rout, and, for the moſt part, either cut to pieces, or diſperſed. The Romans, however, in all probability, would not have bought theſe advantages at ſo cheap a rate, had Hanno and Hiero oppoſed them with their united forces, as in good policy they ought to have done; but Hiero, finding that the Romans landed their troops without any oppoſition from the Carthaginian fleet, immediately concluded, that Hanno kept a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy, and therefore was afraid of repoſing too great a confidence in him; in conſequence of which diſtruſt, Hiero decamped haſtily in the night, after the late advantage Claudius had obtained over him, though he was not in the leaſt obliged to it, ſince the Romans could not force his camp. The enemy had hereby thrown into their hands an opportunity of attacking the Carthaginians with their whole ſtrength, and gaining a moſt ſignal victory over them. This is the account given us by Polybius; but Zonaras relates that event differently. According to him, the Carthaginian camp was ſo ſecured by the ſea and a moraſs, that it was acceſſible only by one avenue, which, being a narrow paſſage, and fortified by a ſtrong wall, the Romans found it impoſſible to enter. After a furious aſſault, they were beaten off by a ſhower of darts, and forced to retire with great loſs. The Carthaginians, thinking themſelves now ſure of victory, purſued the legionaries to the walls of the town; but the latter, having drawn the enemy out of their impregnable camp, faced about with great bravery, and in their turn repulſed them with ſuch ſlaughter, that they never durſt appear afterwards, as long as Claudius continued in Meſſana. Claudius afterwards, finding no enemy to make head againſt him in the field, ravaged the enemy's territories in a dreadful manner, making excurſions to the very gates of Syracuſe; nay, if Zonaras may be credited, he laid ſiege to that place, though the Syracuſans defended themſelves with ſuch valour, that he had no proſpect of reducing it. They cut off abundance of his men in the ſallies they made, and in one of them had taken him priſoner, had he not luckily juſt before propoſed ſome terms of peace to Hiero, which prevented the garriſon from puſhing matters to the laſt extremity. As Hiero was inwardly a well-wiſher to the Romans, he did not ſhew himſelf diſpleaſed at the conſul's overtures; but the campaign being almoſt at an end, and Claudius leaving the iſland ſoon after, the negotiation was ſuſpended till the following year. Thus the Carthaginians not only loſt Meſſana, but almoſt all poſſibility of recovering it. Thoſe of them that eſcaped the late carnage took ſhelter in the neighbouring fortified towns, expecting to be put in a condition of acting offenſively the following ſpring. As for Claudius, having left a ſtrong garriſon in Meſſana, the ſeaſon being far advanced, he paſſed over to Rhegium, and from thence purſued his journey to Rome [r].

The Romans detach Hiero from the Carthaginian intereſt, and enter into a negotiat on with him.

AFTER the conſul's departure, Hiero and the Carthaginians, drawing together a body of regular troops, reduced many towns that had fallen to the enemy. But the ſucceeding conſuls, Manius Octacilius Craſſus and Manius Valerius Flaccus, tranſporting to Sicily two conſular armies, conſiſting each of eight thouſand legionaries and ſix hundred horſe, with a great number of auxiliaries, upon their arrival recovered moſt of thoſe places. They firſt laid ſiege to Adranum, and took it by ſtorm. Afterwards they advanced to Centuripe, and encamped before it. While they were making preparations for an attack, there arrived embaſſadors in the camp from the Alæſinians (G), who deſired

(G) The Greek word, in all the printed and manuſcript copies of Polybius, is ΑΑΙΣΙΝΟΙ, in which, through the neglect of red to be taken under the protection of the Romans; and about ſixty-ſeven other towns followed their example. The conſuls, animated by ſuch a rapid progreſs, moved with all their forces towards Syracuſe, the capital of the iſland, with an intention to form the ſiege of that city. Their approach ſcattered terror thoughout the iſland, and ſo intimidated Hiero, who now plainly diſcovered the great ſuperiority of the Romans in this war, that he began to entertain thoughts of renewing the negotiation, which Claudius's ſudden departure out of Sicily had broken off towards the cloſe of the laſt campaign. As the treaty concluded betwixt the Romans and Hiero did not a little contribute to the declenſion of the Carthaginian power, we ſhall beg leave here to touch upon a few particulars relating to that remarkable event, as well as to Hiero himſelf, which have been omitted in all former parts of this work [s].

Hiero comes to an accommodation with the Romans.

AFTER Pyrrhus's precipitate retreat, the Carthaginians became on a ſudden ſo powerful in Sicily, that the Greek cities there thought themſelves in danger of being ſpeedily over-run by that nation; nay Polyænus intimates, that there was an actual war betwixt theſe two powers, and that the Carthaginian admiral, by a ſtratagem, gained a conſiderable advantage over Hiero. This induced Hiero to court the friendſhip of the Romans, looking upon them as the only power that could give a check to the towering projects of the Carthaginians, and defeat their ambitious deſigns. He therefore ſent a ſupply of troops and proviſions to the Roman forces then employed in the ſiege of Rhegium, which enabled them to reduce that place, and conſequently rendered them more capable of ſupporting him, whenever he ſhould ſtand in need of their aſſiſtance. This was the baſis of that good underſtanding, which ſubſiſted for ſo long a time between the two powers, though it at firſt met with a ſhort interruption. The Carthaginians, ever jealous of the neighbouring ſtates, and now particularly ſo of the Roor ignorance of tranſcribers, [A] has been omitted. This is ſo apparent, that we think it ſufficient juſt to have taken notice of it.

mans, took umbrage at this harmony, as plainly discovering the drift of it. In order therefore to traverse it, they prevented Hiero from possessing himself of Messana, made it a pretext for a quarrel with the Romans, and pretended to take the Mamertines under their protection. Hiero, finding the Romans not willing to act in favour of the Mamertines, upon the first application of that people to them, and that the Carthaginians, at the same time they entered the citadel of Messana, expressed a desire of being upon good terms with him, thought it agreeable to his interest to enter into an alliance with the latter; which he accordingly did, and, in conjunction with them, declared war against the Romans. This brought on the action above-mentioned between Hiero and Claudius, wherein the former being defeated, fled to Syracuse, looking upon himself as betrayed by the Carthaginians, because their fleet had not hindered Claudius from landing his troops in Sicily. The Carthaginians could never afterwards make a friend of that prince; so great an aversion did he, from this period, conceive to them. Claudius, pursuing Hiero to his capital city, besieged him therein; which still made him more desirous of abandoning the Carthaginians, and which he undoubtedly then had done, since Claudius proposed an accommodation to him, had not the plague broke out in the Roman army, which, together with a famine and the vigorous defence of the besieged, obliged the consul to draw off, and, as it should seem, precipitately to leave the island. However, the next year matters took another turn: the Romans, in the beginning of the campaign, conquered a good part of Sicily almost without opposition, advanced, at the head of their legions, to the gates of Syracuse, and invested the town. At the same time, according to Philinus (H), they besieged Echetla, a fortress in the dependency of Syracuse. The Syracusan nobility, having now a prospect of nothing but a long train of calamities, entreated their sovereign to make over-

(H) This Philinus we have already had occasion to mention as a very partial historian; but Polybius likewise represents him as one absolutely inconsistent with himself, and guilty of the greatest absurdities. A certain author, whom we have before taken notice of, thinks, from the corrupted proper name Philinus, that he was the same person Cornelius Nepos tells us wrote the history of Hannibal. From hence, and some MSS. of Nepos, it seems to follow, that he was called by Cicero, Silenus.

overtures for a peace to the Roman generals, and thereby prevent the ruin that threatened them. Such a deſire falling in with Hiero's natural ſentiments, he readily complied with it; ſo that diſpatching embaſſadors immediately to the Roman camp, a treaty of friendſhip and alliance was concluded to the ſatisfaction of both parties. Many things concurred to diſpoſe the Romans to facilitate ſo ſalutary a work; but it will be ſufficient to obſerve here, that, by the concluſion of this treaty, they got, according to Eutropius, two hundred talents of ſilver, or, as Diodorus will have it, an hundred and forty thouſand drachmas, a plentiful ſupply of proviſions through the future courſe of this war, and found themſelves enabled to reduce their army in Sicily to two legions. For an account of the particular articles of this treaty, we muſt refer our readers to the hiſtory of Syracuſe [t] (I).

THE intereſt both of Hiero and the Romans rendered an accommodation neceſſary: the Romans could not have carried on the war with any tolerable proſpect of ſucceſs for want of proviſions, ſince the Carthaginians, being maſters at ſea, could eaſily have intercepted their convoys, and cut off

Which the Carthaginians endeavour to obſtruct, but in vain.

But both theſe notions are overthrown by Diodorus Siculus, who, in agreement with Polybius, calls him Philinus; and tells us, that he was an Agrigentine, and wrote the hiſtory of the firſt Punic war, without entering at all into his character. Had this been duly attended to, it might have prevented ſome miſtakes in Hendreich, Voſſius, and others (10).

(I) Eutropius intimates, that Hiero concluded a treaty of peace with the Romans in the third year of this war. But the other authors we have cited, or at leaſt the majority and beſt of them, have placed that treaty in the ſecond campaign, and therefore we have choſen to follow them (11).

off all ſupplies, that might have come from the coaſts of Italy, as they actually did the laſt year, which reduced the Romans to the extremities hinted at above. And, on the other hand, Hiero found the Carthaginians not able to protect his dominions, nor himſelf in a capacity to make head againſt the conſuls. If Livy, Zonaras, Eutropius, and Syncellus, may be credited, he received ſeveral overthrows from the Romans ſince the breaking out of this war, which in all probability, muſt have entirely exhauſted him. The peace concluded at firſt was not perpetual, but only for a term of fourteen years. The Carthaginians endeavoured by all poſſible means to obſtruct the negotiation, but without any effect. With this view it was, that Hannibal the Carthaginian general, advanced with a ſtrong body of troops to Xiphonia, giving Hiero to underſtand, that he was in a condition to ſupport him; but hearing that every thing was ſettled, he thought proper to retire [u].

The Romans reduce ſeveral towns in Sicily.

THE Carthaginians, being thus deſerted by their ally, found themſelves obliged to bear the whole burden of the war, which yet they believed themſelves capable of doing. They were ſo far from being diſpirited on this occaſion, that they reſolved to exert themſelves in an extraordinary manner, to drive the Romans out of Sicily, and even to oblige king Hiero to renounce his new alliance. They placed numerous garriſons in all their frontiers, perfected the works of their fortified towns, and ſent officers, with large ſums of money, to make levies in Liguria, Gaul, and Iberia. The Romans in the mean time, marching into the Carthaginian territories, laid ſiege to Adranon and Macella, which they carried on with great vigour, but were repulſed in all their aſſaults, and at laſt forced to riſe from before them. However, they met with better ſucceſs at Segeſta (K), which, having been founded by Æneas, or at leaſt

(K) According to Servius, this city received its name from one Aceſtes, a Trojan, whom Æneas left in poſſeſſion of it at his departure from Sicily. Ennius calls this Aceſtes Æneas's hoſt, and conſequently intimates him to have been one of the Aborigines of Sicily. The inhabitants of it, from their firſt acquaintance with the Romans, looked upon them as their kindred and relations, and always moſt heartily eſpouſed their intereſt. Before that time, leaſt one of his Trojan companions, and conſequently related to the Romans, opened its gates to the conſul, after having maſſacred the Carthaginian garriſon. The people of Aliena did the like. Hilara, Tyrata, and Aſcela, were carried ſword in hand. As for the Tyndarites, they propoſed ſubmitting upon the firſt appearance of the Roman army, had they not been prevented by the Carthaginians, who upon the firſt intelligence of their deſign, carried off the principal citizens as hoſtages, and conveyed all the proviſions and military ſtores in the place to Lilybæum. After this, the conſuls retired to Rhegium, where they took up their winter-quarters [w].

They defeat the Carthaginians, and take Agrigentum.

THE next campaign, the Carthaginians appointed Hanno commander in chief of all their forces, who made Agrigentum, as being the moſt commodious for that purpoſe by its ſituation, a place of arms, and fixed there his principal magazine. The conſuls L. Poſthumius Megellus and Q. Mamilius Vitulus, being appriſed of this, advanced with a powerful army into the neighbourhood of that city, and, after having blocked it up for ſome months, beſieged it in form. As this ſiege happened in the middle of harveſt, the Carthaginian garriſon, obſerving great numbers of the enemy diſperſed in the fields, in order to carry off the corn to their camp, made a vigorous ſally, cut many of them to pieces, and had almoſt forced their intrenchments; but were time, it is probable, they had an averſion to the Greeks, as being of Trojan extraction; and therefore might very naturally court the aſſiſtance of the Carthaginians on all occaſions, as we find ſometimes they did. Afterwards, when they became ſubject to Carthage, they undoubtedly were very faithful to that ſtate; but, at the commencement of this war, preferred the Romans to that nation, for the reaſon above aſſigned. That cities frequently, in antient times, were denominated after great men, is a truth obvious to all perſons moderately verſed in the knowledge of antiquity (12).

(12) Virg. Æn. v. ver. 718. & Serv. in loc. Cic. in Ver. 4. de ſign. c. 33. Ennius apud Lactant. l. i. c. 22. Dio, l. liv. Vide & Velſer. antiquit. l. v.

were at last beat back into the town. In the mean time, Hannibal, the son of Gisco, who commanded in the place, finding the Romans to push on the siege with such vigour, that he must be obliged to capitulate, unless speedily relieved, dispatched reiterated expresses to Carthage, with an account of his distress. Hereupon Hanno received orders to attempt raising the siege; in order to which, he first marched to Heraclea, within twenty miles of Agrigentum, and from thence to Erbessa, where posting himself, he so streightened the Roman army, that they were in great danger of perishing for want of provisions, as having no prospect of any supply. Though that army at first, according to Diodorus, consisted of an hundred thousand men, most of whom were Sicilians, not a fourth part of them now remained fit for service; and the plague at the same time breaking out amongst them, they found themselves in a very melancholy situation. This induced the consuls now to think of attacking Hanno, though they had before declined an engagement, when that general had made a motion, as though he intended to offer them battle, and even defeated their cavalry. Having then plenty of provisions, and being strongly intrenched, they imagined themselves able to starve the garrison to a surrender; and therefore, as their army, through the great fatigues they had undergone during the siege, was not near so numerous as the Carthaginian, they judged it prudent to avoid a battle; but being now reduced to great distress, they braved the enemy; who, suspecting some ambuscade, did not shew the same disposition to fight The Romans, however, reaped considerable advantage from this conduct; for Hiero, finding the Carthaginians superior to his new allies, had delayed supporting them in the manner he was obliged to by the last treaty; whereas at this time, seeing the tables turned, he supplied them in great abundance with all kinds of provisions. Many Sicilian cities likewise, animated by the same event, sent deputations to the Romans, and joined them with a good body of forces. Hanno, observing this, and believing Hannibal, sallying out of the town in the heat of the action, would fall upon the rear of the enemy, advanced some time after into a plain near the Roman camp, and drew up his army in order of battle. In the mean time, the Roman generals, by way of precaution, had posted proper detachments to repulse any sally the besieged might make, and, upon Hanno's approach, sent privately another body to attack the Carthaginian rear.

As

As ſoon as this diſpoſition was made, the Roman army, moving out of their trenches into the plain, faced the enemy, and towards evening a bloody engagement enſued. But the Romans behaved with ſuch bravery, that, notwithſtanding the obſtinate reſiſtance they met with, they carried the day, and entirely routed the Carthaginians, putting to the ſword vaſt numbers of their men, and killing ſome of their elephants. Hannibal, during the engagement, ſallied out with the beſt part of the garriſon; but being repulſed by the troops the conſuls had poſted at all the avenues to the city, he was obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs. Immediately afterwards making his eſcape, he abandoned the place to the Romans; and Hanno fled, with the broken remains of his army, to Heraclea. The ſiege of Agrigentum continued ſeven months, the Romans loſing thirty thouſand foot and five hundred and forty horſe before the town[x].

Proceedings of the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily the beginning of this campaign.

THE Carthaginians, greatly chagrined at the ill ſucceſs of their arms the preceding campaign, attributed it as uſual, to the bad conduct of their general; and therefore not only exacted an immenſe ſum of money from Hanno, by way of fine, but likewiſe deprived him of his commiſſion, appointing Hamilcar to command the forces in his room. Hannibal, an officer of good repute, took upon him the command of the fleet, and received orders from Hamilcar to ravage the coaſts of Italy, that he might draw the conſuls that way, and, by ſuch a diverſion, enable the land-forces to attack more ſucceſsfully the Roman conqueſts in Sicily. But the Romans had taken ſuch care to guard their coaſts, by poſting detachments in proper places to prevent the enemy from making a deſcent, that this deſign was rendered abortive, and the conſul C. Duilius landed two legions in Sicily without oppoſition. Upon his arrival there, he advanced to Myttiſtratum (L), and laid ſiege to that fortreſs; but, notwithſtanding the large train of battering-engines he had with him, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege,

(L) This Town Diodorus calls Myſtratus, Polybius Myttiſtratum, Zonaras Mutiſtratus, Stephanus Byzantinus Ameſtratus, and Silius Italicus Amaſtra. Pliny mentions the Mutuſtratini, which were undoubtedly the inhabitants of it. Both from the name and the ſiege, and retire with great loſs. In the mean time, Hamilcar, ſuſpecting a body of Gallic mercenaries in his army of a deſign to deſert to the enemy, becauſe they had lately mutinied for want of their pay, commanded them to ſtorm a town defended by a Roman garriſon, of which, by means of his ſpies, he gave the Romans private intelligence, that they might receive them in a proper manner. The Romans, thus informed of their approach, laid an ambuſcade for the Gauls; into which falling, and not being ſupported by Hamilcar, they were all cut off to a man. Frontinus ſeems to relate this event differently, intimating, that the Gauls, amounting to four thouſand men, were ſent to pillage the country, and that they ſold their lives at a dear rate. The conſul, being ignorant of Hamilcar's view in this point of conduct, looked upon the action as a ſignal advantage gained over the enemy, and, animated thereby, made preparations with great vigour for a freſh attack upon the Carthaginian territories. But the Romans receiving now a blow by ſea, he was recalled to command the fleet, and conſequently, for ſome time, obliged to ſuſpend the operations by land [y].

Boodes takes a Roman ſquadron of galleys; and the Romans in their turn, beat Hannibal, the Carthaginian admiral.

THE Romans, obſerving that the coaſts of Italy lay expoſed to the depredations of the Carthaginian fleets, which made frequent deſcents upon them, whilſt Africa enjoyed all the ſweets of peace, were reſolved to attack the enemy in the moſt ſenſible part, and, in order to this, to equip a fleet capable of coping with any the Carthaginians could fit out againſt them. This was a bold undertaking in a nation, who were almoſt totally ignorant of ſea-affairs, and ſuch a ſtrange phænomenon, that it induced Polybius, according to his own relation, to write the hiſtory of the firſt Punic war. We ſhall therefore make it our buſineſs here to touch upon all the moſt material circumſtances relative to ſuch an extraordinary attempt, that have hitherto eſcaped us.

us. Hannibal, the Carthaginian admiral, being deſirous of deſtroying the Roman navy in its infancy, by his emiſſaries, found means to decoy Cneius, or, as Polybius calls him, Caius, Cornelius Scipio, with ſeventeen new-built galleys, to the port of Lipara. Upon his arrival there, the Carthaginians, who had ſent before a ſquadron into that harbour under the command of Boodes, begged for peace in the moſt ſuppliant manner, pretending to ſubmit to whatever conditions the Romans ſhould think fit to impoſe upon them. At the ſame time they acquainted him, that the Carthaginian commodore was ſo extremely indiſpoſed, that he could not poſſibly come on board his galley, or that otherwiſe he would have waited upon him, and made the overture in perſon; and therefore entreated him to honour Boodes with his company, in order to ſettle a firm and laſting peace between the two nations. The credulous Roman, giving ear to this propoſal, was detained priſoner by the perfidious Carthaginian, and his whole ſquadron taken after a faint reſiſtance. The Roman ſquadron was ſent from the reſt of the ſhips to Meſſana, to reconnoitre the coaſts, and give direction there for the reception and ſecurity of the grand fleet; of which Hannibal, who was then at Panormus, receiving intelligence, immediately detached twenty galleys, under the command of Boodes, who made themſelves maſters of the Roman veſſels in the manner above-mentioned. Zonaras tells us, that the Carthaginian commodore at firſt made the proper diſpoſitions to attack the Romans; but finding them in a poſture to give him a warm reception, he judged it more convenient to have recourſe to the artifice already related. The ſame author adds, that the legionary tribunes on board the Roman fleet, attending the conſul, were likewiſe taken, and all of them ſent priſoners to Carthage; and that, after this, the ſeventeen galleys ſurrendered, without ſtriking a ſtroke. Soon after Hannibal himſelf committed great ravages on the coaſts of Italy, whither he had advanced at the head of fifty galleys, to take a view of the Roman naval forces there; but was attacked in his turn, loſt the beſt part of his ſhips, and with great difficulty made his eſcape. This ſomething raiſed the drooping ſpirits of the Romans, who were not a little dejected at the loſs they had before ſuſtained [z].

Duilius the consul gains another most signal victory over him.

NOTWITHSTANDING this defeat, the Carthaginians, being one of the most powerful nations of the world by sea, entertained still a very contemptible opinion of the Roman fleet, which was but in its infancy. The Romans, on the other hand, dreaded the naval force of the Carthaginians, though they had gained an advantage over Hannibal, especially as they had lost one of their consuls, who was an able and brave commander. In order therefore to make head against the enemy upon the watery element, the senate ordered the remaining consul, C. Duilius, immediately to leave Sicily, and take upon him the command of the squadron then in the streights of Rhegium. This he did, and engaging the Carthaginians, by the help of the corvus, a machine which we have already described at large from Polybius, entirely defeated them [a]. Some authors intimate, that the manus ferreæ, or harpagones, a grappling instrument, were a machine different from the corvi [b] (M), and of great service to the Romans in this action. Others maintain, that they were the same, or at least, that the former appertained to the latter [c]. For our part, we think it evident from Curtius, Pliny, and others, that the manus ferreæ (N) were more antient than the corvi, and of Tyrian

(M) To what has been already said of the corvus, we shall only add, that the chevalier Folard has obliged the world with a learned and curious dissertation upon it. Domincius Machanæus, in his folia upon Cornelius Nepos, likewise has given us a minute description of it, which is extracted chiefly from Polybius. This we mention purely for the sake of our curious and inquisitive readers.

(N) Zonaras intimates, that the manus ferreæ, or harpagones, were fixed to the ends of long poles, and that with them the Roman grappled and brought-to the enemies ships. Livy gives us much the same account of them, and tells us, that the Carthaginians likewise made use of them in their naval engagements with the Romans; which seems a sufficient proof, that they were not the corvi, since this was invented by Duilius. Scheffer thinks that these manus ferreæ, or harpagones, were iron hooks fixed in the Tyrian extraction, and conſequently known to the [d] Carthaginians themſelves; though at the ſame time we believe they were much improved by the corvi. As the Roman veſſels were vaſtly inferior to the Carthaginian in lightneſs and activity, the corvus was invented to remedy that defect. Hannibal, though he performed the part of a gallant commander in this action, was obliged to abandon his ſeptireme, or admiral galley, to the enemy, and got off in a ſmall boat. The reſt of the Carthaginian galleys ſoon after came up with the Romans, but met with the ſame fate the others had done before. The loſs of the Carthaginians in this double engagement is variouſly related by the Roman hiſtorians; but the moſt authentic account of it is the inſcription on the baſis of the columna roſtrata (O) of Duilius, ſtill preſerved at Rome, and which may be ſeen in a former part of this work. As for Hannibal, having before fled from Agrigentum, he would moſt certainly have been crucified upon his arrival at Carthage, had he not, by an inſtance of Punic ſubtilty, avoided the impending danger.

However,

the heads of poles, which, by the aſſiſtance of a chain faſtened to the maſt, were thrown down with great force upon the enemies veſſels; which they penetrated in ſuch a manner, that nothing could diſengage them; ſo that they hoiſted them in the air, and then daſhed them upon the water with ſo great violence, that they were frequently ſunk. The Greeks called this machine ἁρπάγη, according to Heſychius (14).

(O) The naves roſtratæ, from whence Duilius's pillar was called columna roſtrata, were veſſels ſo denominated from the Latin word roſtra, ſignifying the beaks of ſhips. Theſe beaks, in figure reſembling thoſe of birds, conſiſted of braſs, and ſerved not only to cut the water in ſailing, but likewiſe to damage the enemies ſhips in an engagement. This is not only apparent from the figure of theſe veſſels in the columna roſtrata of Duilius, and on antient coins, but likewiſe from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius. The Romans and Carthaginians both made uſe of ſuch veſſels. It is likely they were of eaſtern extraction. The Carthaginians, as Silius ſeems to intimate, had them from their anceſtors the Tyrians and they from the Sidonians (15).

However, the ſenate thought proper to remove him from the command of the ſea-forces. This we learn from Oroſius and Zonaras; but, according to Polybius, he was continued in that poſt, and the ſame campaign crucified by his own men, upon their receiving another diſgrace from the Romans [e].

Hamilcar ſurprizes the Syracuſans, and reduces ſeveral towns in Sicily.

FORTUNE, however, did not entirely abandon the Carthaginians. Their arms in Sicily were attended with a good run of ſucceſs after the departure of Duilius; for though the Romans, in conſequence of their late victory, obliged the Carthaginians to raiſe the ſiege of Segeſta, which a body of their troops had formed, and carried the town of Macella by aſſault; yet Hamilcar, whoſe head-quarters were then at Panormus, only waited for a favourable opportunity to attack them. In the mean time, a diſpute aroſe in the Roman camp between the auxiliary troops and the legionaries, which came to ſuch a height, that a ſeparation ſeemed inevitable, the former having actually marked out a camp for themſelves between Paropus and Thermæ (P). A general, much leſs vigilant than Hamilcar, would naturally have taken advantage of ſuch a diſſenſion; the Carthaginians therefore, ſurpriſing them near the ſpot of ground they had choſen to encamp upon, before

(P) Salmaſius, depending upon the authority of Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, places the city here mentioned by Diodorus in the ſouthern, or rather ſouth-weſtern, part of the iſland, in the neighbourhood of Selinus. Beſides this, there was another of the ſame name, founded by the Carthaginians upon the ruins of Himera, which we have already given a deſcription of. That the Termini of the modern Sicilians ſtands upon the ſame ſpot of ground, which the antient Thermæ Himerenſes, or, as Diodorus calls it, Therma, occupied, is evident from Gruter and Marius Aretius. Cicero likewiſe, and Pindar's ſcholiaſt, both take notice of this laſt city; which we could not entirely paſs over in ſilence, as being of Carthaginian extraction (16).

before they could intrench themſelves, put four thouſand, according to Polybius, or, as Diodorus will have it, ſix thouſand, of them to the ſword, and diſperſed the reſt. After this blow, Hamilcar made himſelf maſter of Camarina and Enna, and fortified Drepanum, ſurrounding it with a wall. Here he likewiſe depoſited the moſt valuable part of his baggage and other effects. Then advancing to Eryx, he almoſt razed that antient city, leaving only a ſmall part of it ſtanding to cover the famous temple of Venus Erycina, ſuppoſed to have been built by Æneas; and carried the inhabitants to Drepanum. This he did to prevent the Romans from taking poſt in that fortreſs, in caſe the citizens ſhould be diſpoſed to invite them thither. In ſhort, he reduced many cities, partly by force, and partly by treachery; and had made himſelf maſter of the whole iſland, had not Florus, the Roman general, after Duilius was gone to Rome, behaved with great vigilance and bravery. However, this ſucceſs was not laſting, as we ſhall ſee immediately [f].

HANNIBAL, according to Polybius, after the defeat off of Mylæ, returned to Carthage; where being reinforced by a good number of galleys, and attended by many officers of great merit, he put to ſea again, ſteering his courſe for the coaſt of Sardinia. He had not been long in one of the harbours of that iſland, probably Calaris, now Cagliari, but he was ſurprized by the Romans, who carried off many of his ſhips, and took great numbers of his men priſoners. This ſo incenſed the reſt, that they ſeized their admiral, and crucified him; but who was his immediate ſucceſſor, does not appear. The Romans, however, reaped no other advantage from this action, than ſhewing their activity, encouraging their allies, and a little diminiſhing the naval power of their rival. Had Hannibal eſcaped death for the preſent, it is probable he would have met with it at Carthage; ſince it was looked upon there as the higheſt crime in a general to be unſucceſsful. Nothing further material happened either this campaign, or the following, if we will give credit to Polybius [g].

Hannibal ſurpriſed by the Romans, and crucified by his own men.

TOWARDS the cloſe of the following campaign, Hamilcar put his troops into winter-quarters at Panormus, poſting proper detachments at the principal avenues to the city, ty, to prevent a ſurprize. In the mean time, C. Aquilius Florus, the Roman general, having received a reinforcement, advanced into the neighbourhood of Panormus, and offered the enemy battle: but finding that they would not ſtir out of the town, and that he was not ſtrong enough to undertake the ſiege of the place, eſpecially as the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, he moved with his army to Hippana, and took it by aſſault. From thence he marched to Myttiſtratum, a fortreſs which the Romans had twice ineffectually beſieged, and ſat down before it. Florus here made his approaches ſo ſlowly, either through the bad diſpoſition of the ground, or the bravery of the Carthaginian garriſon, that he could not reduce the city before the expiration of his office. However, early the next ſpring, his ſucceſſor, A. Attilius Collatinus, or, as Zonaras calls him, A. Attilius Latinus, joining the army before Myttiſtratum with a ſtrong body of forces, puſhed on the ſiege with ſuch vigour, that the Carthaginian garriſon abandoned the town in the night, and the wives and children of the citizens, by their outcries and lamentations, obliged them to open the gates to the Romans. The ſoldiers, enraged at the obſtinate defence they had made, and their attachment to the Carthaginians, at firſt put all they met, without diſtinction to the ſword; but the conſul cauſing a proclamation to be made, that every Roman ſoldier ſhould poſſeſs all the perſons and effects of thoſe he took priſoners, the ſlaughter ceaſed. However, the city itſelf was levelled with the ground, and the remaining part of the inhabitants ſold for ſlaves. The conſul next attacked Camarina, and, in his march thither, was near being cut off with his whole army, by a ſtratagem of Hamilcar, as has been already related; but found it ſo ſtrong, and defended by ſo numerous a garriſon, that he could not make himſelf maſter of it, till he received a large train of battering-engines and other ſupplies from king Hiero. After theſe arrived, the Romans ſoon carried the town, and treated the inhabitants in the ſame manner they had done thoſe of Myttiſtratum. The conſul afterwards ſeized upon Enna by treachery, and maſſacred the Carthaginian garriſon. Sittana he took by ſtorm; and Camicus, a caſtle belonging to the Agrigentines, was betrayed to him. Other places, of leſs importance, ſurrendered of courſe; ſo that the Carthaginians began to loſe ground conſiderably, notwithſtanding their late ſucceſſes. The Romans, looking upon Camicus as a poſt

of conſequence, left a conſiderable party of men to defend it; and having poſſeſſed themſelves of Erbeſſus, which was deſerted by its inhabitants, made preparations to ſit down before Lipara with all their forces [h].

As likewiſe in Sardinia and Corſica.

In the mean time L. Cornelius Scipio, Florus's colegue, ſailed, with the ſquadron under his command, towards Sardinia and Corſica, two iſlands in the Tyrrhenian ſea, ſubject to Carthage, and ſo near one another, that, at a great diſtance, they ſeemed to be but one iſland. The conſul firſt made a deſcent in Corſica, and took Aleria, or, as Zonaras calls it, Valeria, by ſtorm; upon (Q) which

"Moſt people agree, that of all the good men in Rome this "Lucius Scipio was the beſt. He was the ſon of Scipio ſur- "named Barbatus, as likewiſe conſul, cenſor, and ædile. He "took the city of Aleria, and conquered Corſica; and built a "temple for the Tempeſts, as he had great reaſon to do.

From this moſt remarkable inſcription, which, in point of antiquity, is ſcarce inferior to that on the baſe of the columna roſtrata of Duilius, ſince the action here referred to happened in the

the other towns ſubmitted, that being the only place of ſtrength in the whole iſland. As the Carthaginians had a ſtrong the year of Rome 494, the year after Duilius got his naval victory, may be drawn the following obſervations:

1. That the L. Scipio mentioned here was not the L. Scipio ſaid by Livy to have been made conſul in Etruria, but another, the ſon of Barbatus, who ſubdued Corſica, A. U. C. 494.

2. That he was the ſame perſon with him, who, according to the Capitoline Tables, triumphed over the Corſi, Sardi, and Carthaginians.

3. That either the MSS. of Livy, or the Faſti Captitolini, muſt be out, when the firſt affirm, that Scipio Barbatus's prænomen was Publius, and the laſt, that Lucius Scipio, who triumphed over the Corſi, Sardi, and Carthaginians, at the time aforeſaid, was the ſon of L. Scipio.

4. That a vacancy or hiatus in the Capitoline Tables may be from hence ſupplied; ſince from the inſcription it appears, that this L. Scipio muſt have been, in all probability, Duilius's colleague in the cenſorſhip A. U. C. 495. From whence it follows, that Onuphrinus Panvinius is guilty of a miſtake, when he makes Cn. Scipio Aſina to have been Duilius's collegue in the cenſorſhip the year above-mentioned.

5. That a paſſage in Ovid may be hereby explained, which, before the diſcovery of this inſcription, was not underſtood:

Te quoque, Tempeſtas, meritam delubra fatemur,
Cum pœne eſt Corſis obruta claſſis aquis.

Some authors imagined this to point at the tempeſt Claudius Nero the conſul met with in the year of Rome 551, in which, according to Livy, his fleet was near being deſtroyed; others, to one that attacked Marcellus; and laſtly, others, to one in which Metellus's ſquadron was almoſt loſt; whereas it undoubtedly alludes to one, that L. Scipio, at the time we are ſpeaking of, met with on the coaſt of Corſica, wherein he very narrowly eſcaped deſtruction.

6. That of courſe L. Scipio was attacked by ſuch a tempeſt on the coaſt of Corſica, in which his whole fleet was in the moſt imminent danger of being loſt; and that, upon account of his deliverance therefrom, he built a temple, which he dedicated to the Tempeſts, i. e. to the deities preſiding over them.

7. That the Romans looked upon tempeſts as deities, or at leaſt imagined they had deities preſiding over them, and therefore paid them divine honours.

8. That the name of the principal fortreſs in Corſica was Aleria, and not Valeria, as we find it in all the MSS. of Zonaras; and a ſtrong fleet of galleys on the coaſt of Sardinia, they were in no great pain for that iſland. Upon Scipio's moving that way, they detached one part of it to reconnoitre him; which immediately retired upon his approach. But, upon his entering the port of Olbia, the appearance of the whole Carthaginian ſquadron, then riding at anchor there, was ſo terrible, that he thought proper to ſheer off, without putting his deſign in execution. A further inducement to him not to undertake the conqueſt of Sardinia at this preſent juncture, was his not having a ſufficient body of legionaries on board to attack the Carthaginians by land. As he had not received proper intelligence of the enemy's ſtrength on that ſide, he had not taken the neceſſary meaſures to render that expedition ſucceſsful, and therefore found himſelf obliged to retreat in a precipitate manner; but ſome authors give us to underſtand, that ſoon after, having been furniſhed with a larger body of and that therefore theſe MSS. may be emended by this inſcription.

9. That many obſervations relating to the antient language of the Romans and Latins, laid down by Feſtus, Quintilian, and others, are confirmed by the words it contains.

10. That, in antient times, ſome letters of the Roman and Latin alphabet, at leaſt, were borrowed from the Etruſcans, ſince ↄ and ϛ apparently belong to that nation; at leaſt, that the Etruſcans had letters in their alphabet, which, in figure, correſponded with ſome of the Roman and Latin letters. This is confirmed by the legends on ſeveral conſular coins.

Many other concluſions might be drawn from hence, which we have not time at preſent to touch upon. It is not improbable, that the ſtone, on which this inſcription was found, belonged to Scipio's tomb, and that he was buried not far from the Porta Capena (17).

land-forces, he returned, and (R) reduced Olbia. Other places of leſs note, upon the reduction of that town, fell to him; but he could not make himſelf maſter of the whole iſland. However, according to Eutropius, he carried off with him a vaſt number both of the Corſi and Sardi priſoners [i].

The Romans by a ſtratagem, give the Carthaginians a blow in Sardinia.

HAMILCAR being informed the year following, that the Romans had a deſign upon Lipara, threw a body of forces into that town by night, unknown to the conſul. This was done in ſo private and unexpected a manner, that the citizens, though ſtrongly inclined to the Romans, found themſelves incapable of making any reſiſtance. The conſul, arriving before the place, made a vigorous attack; but was repulſed by Hamilcar, at the head of the garriſon, with the ſlaughter of a great number of men. At the ſame time Sulpicius, who then acted as admiral, after having hovered ſeveral days about the coaſt of Sardinia, made a deſcent there, and completed the reduction of that iſland. According to Florus, by razing the city of Caralis, or Carala, the capital of the iſland, he ſo terrified the Sardi, that they ſubmitted to him. Zonaras informs us, that the contrary winds prevented an engagement between Sulpicius and the Carthaginians; but that afterwards Attilius, who commanded the land-forces, found an opportunity of impoſing upon the Carthaginian admiral, by means of ſome deſerters, whom he bribed to aſſure him, that the Romans intended to land in Africa. Upon this, according to the ſame author, the Carthaginian ſquadron, having been before driven by ſtreſs of weather into one of the ports of Sardinia, looſed immediately, though in the night, and ſet ſail for Africa;

(R) Hanno, who had behaved with ſo much bravery in Sicily, commanded in Olbia, and was killed in one of the attacks. We muſt own ourſelves guilty of a miſtake in a former part of this work when we cite Valerius Maximus to prove, that the Roman conſul honoured Hanno's body with a noble funeral; ſince that author, in the place referred to, ſpeaks of Hannibal in the ſecond Punic war, who ſhewed great humanity on ſuch an occaſion to the body of Tiberius Gracchus (18.)

Africa; but were attacked by Sulpicius, who, being apprifed of the intelligence given them, had poſted himſelf in a proper place to intercept them, and either took or ſunk, by favour of the night, moſt of their ſhips. The good ſucceſs of this ſtratagem encouraged the Romans now in good earneſt to prepare for an expedition to Africa, as the only means to oblige the enemy to evacuate Sicily, and procure them a peace upon their own terms [k] (S).

THE next year, from Zonaras it ſeems probable, that the Roman forces in Sicily, under the command of A. Attilius Collatinus, or, as Livy will have it, Calatinus, who, on account of his great ſervices, was continued general there, with the title of proconſul, beſieged Lipara a ſecond time, though they had been routed by the Carthaginians towards the cloſe of the laſt campaign. C Attilius Regulus, one of the new conſuls, who had the command of the fleet allotted to him, had two naval engagements with the enemy off the coaſts of Sicily, in the firſt of which he loſt nine galleys; but in the other routed the Carthaginian

(S) Zonaras and Oroſius make Hannibal to have been the Carthaginian admiral at this time, and, if we remember right, are the only authors who tell us, that he had his commiſſion taken from him for the ill ſucceſs he met with in his engagement with Duilius. Aurelius Victor indeed agrees with them in relation to Hannibal's eſcaping puniſhment by a ſtratagem; but ſays not a word of his being deprived of his command. Zonaras and Oroſius therefore being modern, in compariſon of Polybius, whom they contradict in this particular, and unſupported by any antient writer in what they advance as to the point before us, we have choſen to follow the laſt hiſtorian, when he affirms, that Hannibal was continued in his command of the fleet, and crucified ſoon after by his own men. Beſides, it ſeems improbable, that, if he had been diſcarded on account of his ill conduct, or ill ſucceſs, which the ſuperſtitious Carthaginians looked upon as very ominous, the ſenate of Carthage ſhould have afterwards employed him, eſpecially as they might naturally have ſome apprehenſions of his conduct's being influenced by his reſentment. Zonaras and Oroſius therefore ought to give way to Polybius in the preſent caſe. Oroſius intimates, that he was ſtoned to death by his troops. (19).

Carthaginian ſquadron, ſinking ten, and taking eight of their veſſels, with all their crews. The other conſul, about the ſame time, laid waſte the iſland of Malta; which is a good proof, that the Carthaginians were then in poſſeſſion of it. Theſe advantages ſtill farther excited the Romans to attack the African republic in the very heart of its dominions [l].

They both prepare for a deciſive engagement.

As neither of the late actions had been deciſive, both parties made ſuch vaſt and expeditious preparations, that the enſuing ſummer, the ninth year of this war, they had collected their whole naval force, in order to determine the fate of Sicily, as well as the dominion of the ſea, and, in conſequence thereof, that of Carthage itſelf. The conſuls, L. Manlius Vulſo and C. Attilius Regulus, who were elected purely on account of their diſtinguiſhed merit, with the Roman fleet under their command, conſiſting of three hundred and thirty galleys of different ſizes, had their rendezvous at Meſſana. From thence, ſtretching their line along the coaſt towards cape Pachynum, after having doubled that cape, they ſailed directly to Ecnomus, where they took their land-forces on board. About the ſame time, the Carthaginian ſquadron, compoſed of three hundred and fifty ſail, arrived at Lilybæum, the only place they had left in Sicily, except Panormus, and a few towns of leſs note in that neighbourhood. They did not ſtay long here, but, purſuing their projected courſe, took up their ſtation at Heraclea Minor, where they made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to give the enemy battle [m].

The diſpoſition of their fleets.

The Romans, in order either to engage the enemy by ſea, or make a deſcent upon their territories in Africa, had taken care to put on board the galleys the very flower of their land-forces. The grand ſquadron conſiſted of four diviſions, the firſt of which was called the firſt legion, and the firſt fleet; the ſecond and third in like manner received a denomination from their order; but the fourth went by the name of triarians, a term peculiarly applied to a certain order of ſoldiers, who were always the choiceſt troops, and formed the corps de reſerve amongſt the Romans. Each galley contained three hundred rowers, and an hundred and twenty ſoldiers; ſo that the whole united force on board amounted to near an hundred and forty thouſand men.

[m] Polyb. & Eutrop. ubi ſup. Dio. Caſs. in excerptis Valeſii.

The firſt diviſion was poſted on the right, the ſecond on the left, and the third in the rear of the other two, in ſuch a manner, as with them to form a triangle, the vertex of which was the two admiral-galleys, wherein were the two conſuls, placed in the front of their reſpective ſquadrons. The triarians were drawn up in the rear of the whole fleet, parallel to the third legion; the baſe of the aforeſaid triangle, but extended beyond the two angles there. The tranſports, with the horſes and baggage on board, lay between the two laſt-mentioned lines, that is, between the third diviſion and the triarians, this being judged the beſt ſituation for them to be covered from any irruptions of the enemy. The combined naval and land-force of the Carthaginians muſt, according to Polybius, have exceeded that of the Romans; ſince he ſeems to inſinuate, that their troops, including the ſeamen, could not have been leſs than an hundred and fifty thouſand ſtrong. When the Carthaginians had obſerved the diſpoſition of the Roman ſquadron, they immediately ranged their own in order of battle. They divided it into four ſmaller ſquadrons, which they drew up into one line. The three firſt diviſions, poſted to the right, ſtretched out far into the ſea, as though they had an intention to ſurround the Romans, pointing their prows directly upon them; the fourth, lying to the left, kept cloſe under the ſhore, being diſpoſed in the form of an outwork or tenaille. Hanno, who had met with ſuch bad ſucceſs at Agrigentum, commanded on the right with the light veſſels, that could attack and retreat with great ſwiftneſs, and row nimbly round the galleys of the Romans. Hamilcar, the Carthaginian admiral in the late action off of Tyndaris, had the left wing committed to his conduct, who, though he had the misfortune to be defeated, gave ſufficient proofs of his merit and experience in this engagement[n].

THE conſuls, obſerving the Carthaginian line to be very thin in the middle, cauſed it to be vigorouſly attacked in that part by their firſt and ſecond diviſions. The Carthaginians, at the firſt onſet, purſuant to the orders received from Hamilcar, retired with precipitation, hoping by this means to ſeparate that part of the Roman fleet, with which they were engaged, from the other, not doubting but the Romans would purſue them with great ardor, and thereby give the groſs of their fleet an opportunity of charging the remaining remaining Roman diviſions with great advantage. Accordingly the Romans, by their eagerneſs in the purſuit, left their comrades expoſed to the efforts of the enemy. The Carthaginians, that fled, perceiving this, immediately, upon a ſignal given from Hamilcar's galley, tacked about, and, with great bravery, made head againſt their purſuers; but, after a warm diſpute, the Romans, notwithſtanding the lightneſs and activity of the Carthaginian veſſels, by the aſſiſtance of their corvi and other grappling inſtruments, coming to a cloſe engagement with them, and being animated by the example of their officers, who expoſed themſelves as much as the meaneſt ſoldiers, worſted the enemy, obliging them to ſheer off. In the mean time, Hanno fell with great fury upon the triarians, whilſt that part of the Carthaginian ſquadron poſted on the left under the ſhore, attacked the tranſports and the third legion. Here were three ſea-fights at once, which continued for ſome hours with a vaſt effuſion of blood. In fine, Hanno on one ſide, and the fourth Carthaginian diviſion on the other, reduced the triarians, tranſports, and third legion, to the laſt extremity, forced many of them on ſhore, and had totally ruined them, had they not been kept in awe by the corvi. But at laſt Manlius returning from the chace of the Carthaginian ſquadron already routed, and Regulus, with the ſecond legion, advancing to the relief of the triarians, the enemy were entirely defeated. The Romans loſt only twenty-four galleys in this action; but the Carthaginians had thirty ſunk, and thirty-three taken by the victors. After this battle, which happened off of Heraclea Minor, Hamilcar ſent Hanno to make propoſals of peace to the Romans, chiefly with a deſign to amuſe the conſuls, and divert them from the African expedition they had in view. But the Romans rejecting theſe propoſals, the war continued with as much fierceneſs as ever; and the conſuls, ſoon after ſetting ſail for Africa with their whole fleet, and a powerful army on board, landed at Clypea without oppoſition [o].

The Romans commit great ravages in Africa.

No words can expreſs the conſternation the Carthaginians were in, upon advice of the Roman army's landing in Africa. They very well knew, that the conſuls might march to Carthage without any obſtruction, and lay waſte all all the fertile country as they advanced, which could not but reduce them to the greateſt ſtreights. Zonaras tells us, that the inhabitants of Clypea or Clupea were ſeized with ſuch impreſſions of terror, that they abandoned the city at the approach of the Romans; but, according to Polybius, it ſtood a ſiege, though the Carthaginians not being in a condition to relieve it, the conſuls, without much bloodſhed, made themſelves maſters of it. Appian repreſents the Roman navy employed in this invaſion as very formidable, telling us, that it included no leſs than three hundred and fifty ſail. From cape Hermea, where it lay for a ſhort time, it coaſted along to Clypea, or, as the Greeks call it, Aſpis, where there was a very commodious harbour. The Romans, having left a ſtrong garriſon in the place, to ſecure their ſhipping, and keep the adjacent territory in awe, moved with the reſt of their army nearer Carthage, and reduced a great number of towns, partly by force, and partly by compoſition. They likewiſe plundered an infinity of villages, laid vaſt numbers of noblemen's ſeats in aſhes, took above twenty thouſand (Eutropius ſays twenty-ſeven thouſand) priſoners, amongſt whom were many Romans, that had fallen into the enemy's hands ſince the beginning of this war, with ſeveral deſerters; and having ſcoured all the country almoſt to the gates of Carthage, they returned to Clypea, loaden with the immenſe booty got in this expedition [P].

THE Carthaginians, ſoon after, receiving intelligence, that Manlius was ſet out for Rome with the beſt part of the troops, and had left Regulus with only forty ſhips, fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, to carry on the war in Africa, began to recover from the terrible fright they were thrown into by the firſt news of this invaſion, and therefore inſtantly ſet about making the proper diſpoſitions for their defence. They appointed Hanno, the ſon of Aſdrubal, and Boſtar generals of their forces, and diſpatched an expreſs to Hamilcar, then at Heraclea, to return home with all expedition. Hamilcar, in a ſhort time, arrived at Carthage, with a reinforcement of five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, and was joined with Aſdrubal and Boſtar in the command of the army. The firſt object of their conſultations was, how to prevent the incurſions of the Romans at leaſt, if not diſlodge them from the province, wherein wherein the capital of Africa was ſeated. On the other hand, Regulus, who had taken up his winter-quarters at Clypea, committed great ravages along the ſea-coaſts, and even penetrated into the very heart of the country; but hearing that the Carthaginian army was in motion, he likewiſe made a movement with his forces, and encamped upon the Bagrada, in the neighbourhood of Carthage. Here with his battering-engines he ſlew a ſerpent of a monſtrous ſize, which, if Ælius Tubero may be believed, found the whole Roman army for ſome time in employ. The Roman hiſtorians have undoubtedly given us an hyperbolic deſcription of this monſter, and the effects it produced; but conſidering that [q] Livy, Valerius Maximus, Ælius Tubero, Pliny, Zonaras, and others, agree in the main in their accounts of it, we cannot help thinking, that a ſerpent of an enormous ſize the Romans really killed at the place where they were now encamped, eſpecially ſince dragons or ſerpents immenſely large were pretty common in Mauritania, Numidia, Libya, Ethiopia, &c. and (T) ſince it appears from Megaſthe-

(T) In proof of what is here advanced, many authors might be produced. Megaſthenes ſays, that in India there were ſerpents or dragons, which could ſwallow at once a ſtag, or a bull. Metrodorus affirms, that near the river Ryndacus in Pontus, they were ſo large, that they could ſeize upon birds flying at a great height over their heads, and devour them. Pliny relates, that a certain ſpecies of this animal, called boæ or boiæ, were of ſuch a magnitude, that a whole child had been found in the ſtomach of one of them, in the reign of the emperor Claudius; and that at firſt they lived upon cows milk, from whence they derived their name. Seneca, a very grave author, intimates, that the ſerpent here mentioned infected the river for a vaſt diſtance, deſtroyed the country all round, and burnt many of the ſoldiers to death with his breath. Plutarch tells us of a monſtrous ſerpent or dragon, which was brought up by a virgin at Lanuvium; and on ſome old Roman denarii, we find this virgin repreſented as bringing him meat, with a baſket hanging by her ſide. Agatharchides Cnidius, in Photius, mentions ſerpents of various kinds of an enormous ſize common in Ethiopia, and aſſerts, that he himſelf ſaw one thirty cubits long. Oneſicritus Aſtypalæus, in Strabo, informs us, that Abiſarus, an Indian prince.

Megaſthenes [r] and others, that various inſtances of ſurpriſingly huge animals of the ſerpentine kind might be drawn from antiquity.

HAMILCAR and his collegues, receiving advice of the Roman general's approach, and of his having formed the ſiege of Adis, or Adda, a fortreſs of great conſequence to Carthage, advanced at the head of their forces to attack him. Upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of Adda, they encamped upon ſome heights covered with woods, which was a capital error, and occaſioned the defeat of their army; for by neglecting the plains, and taking poſt in rough and inacceſſible places, they rendered their elephants and cavalry, And defeat the Carthaginians.

prince, kept two dragons or ſerpents, one of which was an hundred and forty cubits long, and the other eighty; which Alexander greatly deſired to ſee. Herodotus tells us, that ſerpents of a ſize exceeding all belief, were found upon the banks of the Triton, a river bordering on the territory of Carthage. Iſidore, Avicenna, Philoſtratus, Solinus, Nicephorus Calliſtus, Lucian, Arrian, Strabo, Pliny, Ætius, Leo Africanus, and others, affirm, that ſerpents of an immenſe ſize were produced in Mauritania, Libya, and Ethiopia. Our Philoſophical tranſactions ſupply us with inſtances of rattle-ſnakes prodigiouſly large, which countenances, in ſome meaſure, what the Roman hiſtorians have related about the ſerpent we are diſcourſing of. Ludolphus and father Lobo likewiſe, in their accounts of Ethiopia, add ſome weight to what is here advanced, as we ſhall ſee, when we come to the hiſtory of that country. It has been imagined by ſome, that the animal Regulus killed was a crocodile; but the manner in which this was ſlain, which has been minutely deſcribed by Oroſius, as well as the expreſs teſtimony of many Roman authors to the contrary, will not permit us to come into this opinion. Beſides, it does not appear from antient hiſtory, that the river Bagrada, or indeed any part of Africa Propria, was formerly infeſted by crocodiles; nor, from the relations of modern travellers, that they are obſerved in the kingdom of Tunis at this day (20).

cavalry, in which their principal ſtrength conſiſted, incapable of acting. The Romans, taking advantage of this miſtake, did not give them time to rectify it, but immediately fell upon them with the utmoſt fury. The attack, which happened in the night, was ſo ſudden and unexpected, that many of the Carthaginians had their throats cut in bed, and others loſt their lives before they could lay hold of their arms to defend themſelves. However, the mercenaries in the Carthaginian ſervice behaved with great bravery, and not only repulſed the firſt legion, but forced them to fly to their camp. But Regulus having, at the beginning of the action, ordered a detachment to wheel about, and attack the enemy's rear, they were hereby thrown into confuſion, and at laſt forced to abandon their camp. A great part of the infantry periſhed, the Romans very cloſely purſuing them, and having guarded many of the defiles through which they muſt paſs; but moſt of the elephants and cavalry made their eſcape. The Carthaginians loſt ſeventeen thouſand, or, according to Eutropius, eighteen thouſand men in the battle and purſuit; eighteen elephants were taken; five thouſand men made priſoners, and the reſt diſperſed. Regulus, after this action, continued his devaſtations as before, burnt all the open places, and reduced the fortified towns. Some authors aſſure us, that he took above two hundred cities; but as this account ſeems rather to refer to the whole number of places plundered or reduced ſince the firſt deſcent, we ſhall chuſe to follow Eutropius, who tells us, that the conſul conquered ſeventy-three cities. Utica, amongſt the reſt, was forced to ſubmit, and Tunis, within nine miles of Carthage, ſoon met with the ſame fate. In ſhort, nothing now remained but to lay ſiege to Carthage itſelf [s].

To complete the misfortunes of the Carthaginians, the Numidians, a ſort of Tartars, or at leaſt in their manners and way of life ſomething reſembling that people, entered the territories of Carthage, where they committed dreadful devaſtations. This drove moſt of the Carthaginian ſubjects into Carthage, which, by this means, was filled with ſuch numbers of people, that a famine ſeemed inevitable, eſpecially as the produce of the earth had been, in a great meaſure ſure, deſtroyed, partly by Regulus, and partly by the aforeſaid Numidians [t].

THE African nations likewiſe, more immediately ſubject to Carthage, being weary of the Carthaginian yoke, declared for the Romans, who now carried every thing before them. This induced Regulus to imagine, that the Carthaginians would conclude a peace with him upon any, even the moſt diſhonourable, terms. He therefore, according to Polybius, offered to treat with them about a peace, being afraid, that his ſucceſſor would rob him of the glory he had acquired, by putting an end to the preſent war; though Zonaras tells us, that the Carthaginians themſelves made the firſt overtures. Be that as it will, the terms Regulus preſcribed them ſeemed ſo intolerable, and incompatible with their honour, that they were reſolved to ſuffer all extremities, rather than ſubmit to them. As Regulus had met with an uninterrupted courſe of proſperity from the beginning of his conſulſhip, he ſet no bounds to his arrogance; and the Romans in general being then of the ſame diſpoſition, by reaſon of the great ſucceſs their arms were attended with both by ſea and land, it is no wonder, that the Carthaginians ſhould have been treated in ſo imperious a manner. Regulus wrote to the ſenate, that the Carthaginians were upon the brink of ruin, and that he had taken care to "ſeal up their gates with fear." All hopes therefore of an accommodation vaniſhing into ſmoke, both ſides ſeemed reſolved to refer the deciſion of the points at preſent in diſpute betwixt them to the ſword. A certain author tells us, that the whole number of priſoners taken by the Romans, from their firſt arrival in Africa to this time, including thoſe who fell into their hands in the late battle, amounted to two hundred thouſand. All the riches and valuable effects found in the Carthagininian camp after the laſt action, Regulus ſent on board ſome tranſports to Rome; and having laid waſte all the adjacent country, advanced at the head of his victorious troops to the ſtagnum or great moraſs, on which Carthage ſtood. Here, immediately after the rejection of his above-mentioned propoſals, he encamped, reſolving without delay to attack the capital of the African republic [u].

Regulus makes propoſals for a peace to the Carthaginians, but they are rejected.

Xantippus, with a body of Greek mercenaries, arrives at Carthage.

WHILST matters remained in this melancholy situation, a Carthaginian officer, who had been sent to Greece, to levy soldiers there, returned home with a body of Greek mercenaries, consisting chiefly of Lacedæmonians. This body was commanded by Xantippus the Lacedæmonian, a person of great bravery and military skill, who had learned the art of war in the school of Sparta, then the most renowned of any in the world for the famous generals it produced. As soon as he had informed himself wherein the main strength of the Carthaginian forces lay, and of the circumstances of the late defeat, he openly declared, that it was owing to the false step taken by their generals in encamping upon hills, where their cavalry and elephants could not act; and that, by an opposite conduct, they might still retrieve their affairs, and drive the enemy out of their dominions. Being prevailed upon by the Carthaginian senate, people, Hamilcar, and all the other officers, to take upon him the command of their forces, he first trained them up in the discipline of his country: exercising them near the city he drew them up in order of battle; made them advance or retreat upon the first signal; file off with order and swiftness; in a word, to form all the evolutions and movements of the military art, according to the Lacedæmonian manner. As nothing inspires soldiers with a greater degree of courage, than a persuasion of their general's abilities, the Carthaginian troops, who were before so greatly dispirited, now thought themselves invincible, under the conduct of Xantippus, observing how vastly he excelled their own generals in the military art. As he judged it highly improper to permit their ardor to cool, he drew them up in battalia in a large plain before the city, and boldly advanced towards the Romans. We have already, in a former part of this work, described the disposition of both armies, and given an account of the principal things that passed betwixt them previous to the engagement, and therefore shall not here repeat what was there said; but only observe, that Xantippus, being within twelve hundred and fifty paces of the enemy, thought proper to call a council of war, in order to shew a respect and deference to the Carthaginian commanders, by consulting them; and that, all joining unanimously in opinion with him, it was resolved to give the enemy battle the day following [w].

THE Romans were not a little ſurpriſed at the motions of the Carthaginian army, and the new form of diſcipline introduced amongſt them; notwithſtanding which, they affected to hold both them and their new general Xantippus in great contempt, not doubting, but they ſhould ſoon be able to give a good account of them. One capital error, according to Polybius, the Roman general committed in the arrangement of his forces. Though he took a proper precaution to ſuſtain the ſhock of the enemy's elephants, he did not provide for the inequality of his cavalry, which was vaſtly inferior in number to the Carthaginian, but diſpoſed them in ſuch a manner, that they were broken almoſt upon the firſt onſet. To which we may add from Appian, that the ſame general ought to have been deemed guilty of a great and complicated miſtake, when elated with his former ſucceſs, through his great ardour, he overfatigued his ſoldiers, led them through ſuch places as expoſed them to the enemy's parties, poſted on eminencies to annoy them with miſſive weapons in their march; and, to crown all, paſſed a river parting the two armies, by which means he cut off a retreat, in caſe of any misfortune. This bad conduct of Regulus proved the total ruin of his army; for Xantippus had thereby ſuch an advantage over the enemy thrown into his hands, that he entirely defeated them, and either put to the ſword, or took priſoners, all of them, except two thouſand, who, after having broken his right wing, had drawn themſelves out of the engagement, and made their eſcape to Clypea. Of the Carthaginians eight hundred were ſlain in this action; but on the Roman ſide near thirteen thouſand muſt have fallen in the battle and purſuit, if Polybius has given us a juſt account of the number of forces Manlius, at his departure for Rome, left with Regulus. Xantippus took Regulus himſelf, and five hundred of his men, priſoners in the purſuit, and immediatly carried them to Carthage. According to Eutropius, thirty thouſand Romans loſt their lives in this battle, and fifteen thouſand their liberty; but this cannot be admitted, except we ſuppoſe, that Regulus had either received a ſtrong reinforcement from Rome, ſince the departure of his collegue, or been joined by a good body of Africans in the interval betwixt that event and the battle; neither of which ſuppoſitions receives the leaſt countenance from Polybius, whom, in the main, we chuſe to follow *.

The Carthaginians treat all the Roman priſoners with great humanity, except Regulus.

THE Carthaginians treated all the Roman priſoners, except Regulus, with great humanity, hoping by this conduct to engage the Romans to behave with lenity and moderation to the Carthaginian captives, who were very numerous, in their hands. But as for Regulus, he had inſulted them in ſo outrageous a manner, in the height of his proſperity, that they could not forbear ſhewing him the greateſt marks of their reſentment on this occaſion. According to Zonaras and others, he was thrown into a dungeon, where he had only ſuſtenance allowed him barely ſufficient to keep him alive; nay, his cruel maſters, to heighten his other torments, ordered an huge elephant, at the ſight of which animal, it ſeems, he was greatly terrified, to be conſtantly placed near him; which prevented him from enjoying any tranquillity or repoſe, and rendered his life a burden to him. When he would have preſcribed diſhonourable terms of peace to the Carthaginians, he pretended with unparallelled haughtineſs, that every thing he ſuffered them to poſſeſs ought to be eſteemed a favour, with this further inſult, that "they ought either to overcome like brave men, or learn "to ſubmit to the victor." No wonder therefore that ſo harſh and diſdainful a treatment ſhould incenſe to the higheſt degree a nation naturally proud, as well as cruel and implacable, and even, in the point before us, force their intereſt itſelf to give way to their reſentment. Zonaras intimates, that Regulus ſuffered himſelf to be ſurpriſed by Xantippus, not believing that he would have the courage to attack him. However this may be, as the Carthaginian army did not conſiſt of above ſixteen thouſand men, beſides the elephants, this ought to be looked upon as a moſt wonderful victory, eſpecially conſidering the heroic valour of the Roman legions; and, as Frontinus rightly inſinuates, muſt be almoſt entirely attributed to the conduct and bravery of Xantippus [y].

Great rejoicings at Carthage, on account of this victory.

THE Carthaginians remained on the field of battle till they had ſtripped the ſlain, and then entered the metropolis, which was almoſt the only place left them, in great triumph. The citizens immediately repaired to the temples in crouds, to return thanks to the immortal gods for ſo ſignal

nal a victory, and hung up in theſe temples (U), as ſo many trophies, the arms taken from the enemy. Several days were devoted wholly to feſtivities and rejoicings, a ſpirit of joy and gladneſs diffuſing itſelf over the whole city. However, according to ſome authors, they not only ſoon forgot the vaſt obligation they were under to Xantippus, but even ſhewed themſelves guilty of moſt ſhocking ingratitude to him, as well as to the whole body of mercenaries, who had delivered them at the critical moment. If theſe writers may be credited, they either actually deſtroyed Xantippus, or attempted his deſtruction; and not only refuſed paying the mercenaries the arrears due to them, but ordered the captains of the veſſels, who were to carry them home, to leave them expoſed on a deſolate iſland. Theſe horrid inſtances of Carthaginian ingratitude, we ſay, are atteſted by ſome authors; yet at the ſame time we think it our duty, as impartial hiſtorians, to obſerve that their authority in the point before us, is not to be entirely depended upon; for although we ſhould allow, that the Carthaginians were frequently both cruel and ungrateful, nay, that they had a natural propenſity to the odious vices of cruelty and ingratitude; yet in the preſent caſe, what advantage or emolument could accrue to them from ſo execrable a fact? It could never have buried in oblivion ſo illuſtrious an action as the victory Xantippus acquired for them, ſince that could not fail of being tranſmitted to poſterity by their enemies, in order to deprive them, to whom they bore ſo implacable a hatred, of the merit of it; and indeed through this canal it has been conveyed down to us, and yet the authors, who ſtigmatize the Carthaginians, by accuſing them of ſo enormous a crime, aſſign this as their motive to it; nor can any other motive be conceived, except we will ſuppoſe, that they did it purely to gratify a barbarous and inhuman diſpoſition; which, wicked as the world is, can ſcare be imagined poſſible. Beſides, Polybius, the beſt author extant who has treated of this particular branch of hiſtory, ſays not a word of it. Livy alſo, if we may judge of him from his epitomizer,

(U) Other nations, as well as the Carthaginians, hung up the arms taken from the enemy in the temples of their gods. The Gauls, and even the Romans themſelves, may be ranked amongſt theſe, as we learn from Plutarch, Tacitus, and others (21).

paſſes it over in ſilence, as do Florus, Eutropius, &c. who, being Roman hiſtorians, would moſt certainly have taken the greateſt pleaſure in relating ſuch a ſtory, if founded on good authority, as reflecting an eternal ſhame and diſhonour upon their moſt avowed and mortal enemies, whom they never failed to treat with the utmoſt freedom on all occaſions. We think it therefore but equitable to ſuſpend our belief of what Appian and Zonaras have affirmed with regard to the departure of Xantippus, eſpecially as the ſcheme theſe authors have made the Carthaginians form for the deſtruction of the Lacedæmonian mercenaries, is, in point of policy, ſo defective and incredible that no ſtreſs can be laid upon it; for, according to them, all theſe mercenaries, as well as their general, were to be expoſed to inevitable deſtruction, without the loſs of a ſingle Carthaginian, or pretence of even a ſtorm, to colour the perpetration of ſo horrid a crime. This certainly ſeems incompatible with that genius for refined policy and intrigues, the Carthaginians were in hiſtory ſo famous for; and therefore will, with great difficulty, be admitted for fact by our impartial and intelligent readers [z].

As for Regulus, he was a lively inſtance of the great inſtability of fortune and human affairs. Had he been either influenced by the maxims of ſound policy, or touched with the leaſt ſenſe of compaſſion for the misfortunes and ſufferings of his fellow-creatures, he would have abated ſomething of the rigour he ſhewed the Carthaginians after the laſt defeat given them, and might have concluded a moſt advantageous peace for the Romans; but, giddy with ſucceſs, nothing leſs would ſatisfy him than the total ruin of that people, or at leaſt a reduction of them to a ſtate of ſervitude, which they thought equivalent to it. This providence did not permit him to accompliſh; but, on the contrary, by a ſwift revolution, he fell from the height of proſperity to the loweſt degree of contempt, nay, into the extremeſt miſery and deſpair, his exalted ſtation ſerving only to render his fall the more precipitate, and the leſs pitied by thoſe he had before inſulted. Many, and even recent, examples might be produced of princes, who, by purſuing the ſame conduct, have met with the ſame fate, would would the limits of our hiſtory permit; but, as they will not, we muſt beg leave to refer our readers to their own obſervations on this head, and to thoſe fine reflections of Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, which we could not avoid glancing at here [a].

We have, in a former part of this work, given a full account of what happened to Regulus in the ſubſequent part of his life, and cenſured Hoffman for differing from a great number of Roman authors in this particular. But our high regard to impartiality, a quality eſſentially neceſſary in an hiſtorian, obliges us now to lay before our readers the reaſons, that may poſſibly have induced ſome learned men to believe the whole relation of Regulus's death, as handed down to us by the aforeſaid authors to be an abſolute fiction [b].

1. All the Roman hiſtorians, as Romans, bore an implacable hatred to the very memory of the Carthaginians, and did their utmoſt to make it appear odious in the eyes of all mankind. They were entirely void of impartiality when they ſpoke of that nation, as manifeſtly appears from what Polybius relates of Fabius Pictor, one of their moſt celebrated writers, and the moſt antient of their hiſtorians.
2. All the ſubſequent Roman hiſtorians muſt have followed Fabius Pictor in this particular, ſince neither Diodorus Siculus nor Polybius have taken the leaſt notice of Regulus's being ſent to Rome, and ſuffering death afterwards at Carthage upon his return; though, had this been true, they would undoubtedly have related it, the Greeks bearing as great an averſion to the Carthaginians, as did the Romans.
3. From a fragment of Diodorus Siculus in the excerpta (W) of Valeſius, it appears, that Regulus's ſons, at the inſtigation of their mother, treated Hamilcar and Boſtar,

[b] Univerſ. hiſt. ubi. ſupra.

(W) The paſſage referred to imports in ſubſtance, that Regulus's widow, hearing of his death at Carthage, and ſuppoſing him to have died through want of neceſſaries, inſtigated her ſons to uſe Hamilcar and Boſtar, two Carthaginian generals, taken priſoners, and delivered into their hands by the ſenate, in order to exchange for their father, with the utmoſt inhumanity. They were confined in ſo ſtreight a room, that they could not move, and kept without meat for five days together; inſomuch that Boſtar died two Carthaginian generals, taken priſoners, and delivered into her hands to exchange for her huſband, with the utmoſt cruelty; inſomuch, that one of them died. She was prompted to this, according to the ſame fragment, by a perſuaſion, that her huſband died at Carthage for want of a proper care being taken of him, upon the news ſhe received of his death there. This evidently ſuppoſes Regulus to have died in that city, without any other torture than what the want of neceſſaries occaſioned. 4. Palmerius has accounted for the whole ſtory, as related by the Roman writers, and the Greeks attached to the Roman intereſt, in ſuch a manner, as to give ſome reaſon to believe, that they are neither of them to be entirely relied upon in their accounts of the ſufferings and death of Regulus. Beſides the authors cited in the twelfth volume of this work, it will be neceſſary to conſult thoſe referred to in the margin of grief and hunger. Hamilcar, in order to move her compaſſion, told her, that he had taken all poſſible care of her huſband, who was committed to his cuſtody at Carthage. But this not availing, ſhe extended her barbarity ſo far, as to cauſe him to be ſhut up five days with the dead body of Boſtar, allowing him all that time only ſuſtenance barely ſufficient to keep him alive. Being ready to expire through the ſtench of the dead body, and the other miſeries he laboured under, this barbarous treatment was rumoured abroad by the meaner ſervants; which reaching the ears of the tribunes of the people, they had like to have cauſed the young men to be put to death for ſo execrable a fact, which diſgraced the Roman name. They were therefore obliged, by way of atonement for the perpetration of ſo heinous a crime, to burn the body of Boſtar, and ſend his aſhes to Carthage, as likewiſe to treat Hamilcar with lenity during the remainder of his confinement. Tuditanus in Gellius, in order to take off the odium of this barbarous action, and ſuit it more to the Roman taſte, tells us, that Regulus died for want of ſleep, which the Carthaginians, by various methods, deprived him of; and that this reaching Rome, his ſons uſed ſome noble Carthaginian captives, delivered to them by the ſenate, in the ſame manner. This relation, partial and diſguiſed as it is, gives great weight to the valuable fragment of Diodorus referred to, and at the ſame time renders Palmerius's notion of this affair not a little probable (22).

gin, in order to have an adequate idea, according to the Roman tradition, of the point we are now upon [c].

THE Carthaginians, now forgetting all former misfortunes, began to talk in a very high ſtrain, threatening even Italy itſelf with an invaſion. The Romans, being informed of this, placed ſtrong garriſons in all the maritime towns, that lay moſt expoſed, and fitted out a new fleet, with a ſtrong body of land-forces on board, not only to divert the enemy from executing the deſign they pretended to have formed, but alſo to retrieve their broken affairs in Africa. In the mean time, the Carthaginians beſieged Clypea and Utica in vain, being obliged to riſe from before thoſe places by the approach of the Roman ſquadron, which had already plundered the iſland of Corſura, and left a garriſon there. Having equipped a fleet of two hundred ſail, they put to ſea, in order to prevent the enemy from making a ſecond deſcent; and coming up with them off cape Hermea, engaged them; but being routed, the Romans landed without oppoſition at Clypea, defeated the Carthaginians in a pitched battle near that place; and carrying off the remains of Regulus's army, ſteered for Sicily. However, notwithſtanding theſe victories, the Romans were greatly weakened. In the late engagement they had been worſted, had not the two thouſand men left at Clypea, attacked the enemy's rear unexpectedly, which obliged them to give way. In their paſſage to Sicily, they met with ſo dreadful a tempeſt, that out of three hundred and ſeventy odd veſſels, of which their fleet was compoſed, eighty only eſcaped. Diodorus Siculus ſays, they loſt three hundred and forty galleys, beſides about three hundred tranſports. Eutropius affirms only eighty galleys to have remained out of four hundred and ſixty-four; inſomuch, that all the ſea-coaſts, from Camarina to Pachynum, were ſtrewed ſtrewed with the dead bodies of men and horſes, as well as the wrecks of ſhips. Immediately after this diſaſter, Carthalo, a Carthaginian commander, advancing to Agrigentum, laid ſiege to it, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of it. The town he laid in aſhes, and demoliſhed the walls, obliging the inhabitants to fly to Olympieum. The Carthaginians, appriſed of this, immediately ſent Aſdrubal to Sicily, with a large reinforcement of troops and an hundred and fifty elephants. They likewiſe fitted out a ſquadron, with which they retook the iſland of Corſura; and though they had loſt nine thouſand men in the laſt action, beſides five thouſand in the naval engagement, they marched a ſtrong body of forces, under the command of Hamilcar, into Mauritania and Numidia, to puniſh the people of thoſe countries for ſhewing a diſpoſition to join the Romans. Hamilcar treated them with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity, cauſing all their chiefs to be crucified, putting great numbers of the poorer ſort to the ſword, and exacting from the reſt a thouſand talents of ſilver, beſides twenty thouſand head of cattle. In Sicily, the conſuls poſſeſſed themſelves of Cephalædium by treachery; but Carthalo forced them to raiſe the ſiege of Drepanum, and retire with great loſs. The Carthaginians, however, ſoon after found themſelves obliged to abandon Ieta, as likewiſe the territories of the Selinuntines, Petrinians, Enatterinians, and Tyndaritæ. The Romans, landing afterwards an army in Sicily, laid ſiege (X) to Panormus, the capital of the Carthaginian dominions there; and making themſelves maſters of a fort or tower tower by the ſea-ſide, carried that part of the city called the New Town; but the inhabitants defending themſelves with great bravery, they could not immediately reduce the other. However, forming the blockade of the place, they at laſt forced both it and the citadel to ſurrender for want of proviſions. The Carthaginian fleet, poſted to obſerve the enemy's motions, fell in with one of their ſquadrons, and carried off many of their ſhips laden with money and other valuable effects. Both parties, ſoon after put an end to the operations of the campaign, the conſuls returning to Rome, and the Carthaginians retiring into winter-quarters; ſo that we hear of no hoſtilities betwixt them till the following ſpring [d].

(X) Panormus according to Diodorus, derived its name from its port or haven, which was the fineſt in Sicily. The Phœnicians probably called it Labrin, or Leptin, from labt an harbour or ſtation for ſhips. Polybius tells us, that it was the capital of the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily; and if we may credit Thucydides, it was either of Punic or Phœnician extraction, being built in very early times either by the Phœnicians, who traded with the Aborigines of Sicily, or their poſterity, the moſt antient Carthaginians. That it was the moſt eminent city the Carthaginians poſſeſſed in Sicily, at leaſt for a conſiderable period of time, and the moſt reſorted to, if not for the moſt part inhabited, by that nation, is evident from the great number of coins belonging to it, with Punic legends upon them. Paruta and others exhibit many of theſe to our view, which ſerve to confirm the authorities above-mentioned. Some Sicilian writers will have th

THE Carthaginians, notwithſtanding all their diſaſters, ſuffered leſs at ſea than the Romans. The prodigious loſſes the laſt nation had ſuſtained on that element, made them entertain thoughts of declining all preparations for the future againſt the Carthaginians there. The next year, loſing above an hundred and fifty galleys more on the coaſts of Sicily, they came to a reſolution to lay aſide all naval operations, and conſequently left the Carthaginians maſters of the ſea. This was not their only misfortune; for in the late battle with Regulus, the elephants had made ſuch havock amongſt them, that, for the two ſucceeding years, the Roman ſoldiers in Sicily durſt not approach theſe furious animals within five or ſix ſtadia. This prevented the war from being carried on with any vigour during that term. The Romans, however, wreſted Lipara, Himera, and Thermæ, out of the hands of the Phœnicians and Damaſcenes to have founded it in the time of Iſaac. In ſupport of which notion they produce two Hebrew inſcriptions, found at that place in the reign of William the ſecond king of Sicily, importing, that ſome colonies of thoſe nations ſettled there at that time, and called the place Panormus. But as few, if any, Hebrew inſcriptions of that date are genuine, and as Panormus is a Greek, not a Hebrew name, we muſt be excuſed from ſubſcribing to their opinion (23).

of the Carthaginians; but were obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Erƈta. So ſlow a progreſs induced them to attempt making a figure once more by ſea, hoping by this means to compenſate for the terror, with which the elephants had ſtruck their legions [c].

Aſdrubal overthrown by Cæcilius.

ASDRUBAL, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, perceiving how much afraid the Romans were of his elephants, marched out of Lilybæum, and advanced into the neighbourhood of Panormus, in order to draw the enemy to a battle. Cæcilius, who commanded the Roman forces in the town, ſeemed to be afraid of him, till he had paſſed the river running cloſe by the city, when, having a great advantage over him, he attacked him with incredible fury. The fight was very obſtinate for ſome time, and the Romans were even repulſed by the violence of the elephants; but at laſt the dart-men wounded theſe boiſterous animals in ſuch a manner, that they fell foul upon their own troops, and threw them into confuſion. This being obſerved by the Roman general, he ſallied with a body of freſh forces out of the town, and attacking the enemy in flank, gave them a total defeat. The Carthaginians loſt a vaſt number of men in this action, it being one of the greateſt overthrows they ever received in Sicily, beſides many elephants, which were either killed or taken, and amongſt the reſt ten with their (Y) Indian leaders. The Carthaginian elephants could never after this battle

[c] Liv. Zonar. Diod. Sic. Polyb. & Oroſ. ubi ſup.

(Y) From the paſſage of Polybius here referred to, it is evident, that the Carthaginians, before the thirteenth year of the firſt Punic war, had an intercourſe with India, as receiving elephants, and perſons to manage and train them up, from thence. This greatly ſtrengthens what Pliny intimates, viz. that the Carthaginians carried on a trade with the Indians, and imported from India many carbuncles of an ineſtimable value. This they muſt either have done by means of caravans going through the interior parts of Africa to the Arabic gulf, if not through Egypt to Perſia and India, or by their own veſſels trading to thoſe parts, or laſtly, by their communication with Tyre. The paſſage we are now conſidering ſeems likewiſe clearly to prove, that the Carthaginians trafficked with the Perſians, ſince all caravans coming entirely by land from India to Carthage muſt neceſſarily paſs through part of Perſia; and we know, that the Perſians dealt much in theſe animals. But that the Carthaginians were well known to the Perſians in very early times, which we cannot well

tle make any impreſſion upon the Roman troops; on which account the victory might juſtly have been looked upon as of vaſt conſequence to them. According to Zonaras, the Carthaginian fleet, by being then in port, completed the ruin of the land-forces; for vaſt numbers of Aſdrubal's ſoldiers, endeavouring to make their eſcape on board the galleys, fell into the ſea and were drowned. Diodorus intimates, that Aſdrubal was, in a manner, compelled by his own troops to venture an engagement with the enemy; that advancing to Panormus, he paſſed the river above-mentioned with great temerity, not taking the leaſt precaution to ſecure himſelf againſt any attempts of the Romans; and that ſome merchants well conceive to have been in any other manner than by trading with them, is evident from Cambyſes's intention to attack them, and from the embaſſy Darius ſent them towards the cloſe of his reign, already mentioned. Beſides, that they were acquainted with the Perſian gulf, is probable from what Pliny relates of one of their ſea-commanders, who ſteered his courſe that way, in order to make diſcoveries in very early times. If they traded with theſe remote nations by caravans, they might likewiſe have gone through part of the country of the Garamantes and Ethiopia; which that they did, appears probable from Pliny and Strabo, who tell us, that the Indian, Garamantican, and Ethiopian carbuncles, by reaſon of their great plenty at Carthage, were called Carchedonian carbuncles; and that the Carthaginians received them from the Garamantes. After having weighed all theſe particulars, we cannot help thinking, that the Carthaginians ſent caravans to the country of the Garamantes, Ethiopia, and Perſia, as well as ſhips to the Red-ſea, rather than that they had a communication with thoſe parts of the world by means of the Tyrians. As a further proof of this, it may be conſidered, that Hanno, who is ſuppoſed to have written the periplus going under his name, one of their admirals, ſailed to the remoteſt coaſts of Arabia from Cadiz, long before the age we are now treating of; and that Pliny intimates their commerce to have been ſo much more extenſive than that of any other nation, that merchandize was ſaid to be the invention of the Pœni, not of the Phœnicians. Dalecampius, in his notes on Pliny, receives a great acceſſion of ſtrength from this paſſage of Polybius, and on his part illuſtrates this laſt-mentioned author, as well as Pliny. We ſhall reſerve what we have to ſay of elephants, and thoſe nations, who firſt uſed them in war, for a future notes (24).

(24) Polyb. in loc. citat. Plin. l. xxxvii. c. 7. & Dalecamp. in loc. Strab. l. xvii. Herodot. l. iii. Juſt. l. xix. Plin. l. ii. c. 67.

chants having brought a large quantity of wine into the camp, the Celtes got drunk, filling all parts with noiſe, diſorder, and confuſion; which Cæcilius obſerving, ſallied out of the town, put the Carthaginian army to the rout, and either killed or took priſoners a vaſt number of men. Sixty elephants, according to the ſame author, that fell into the hands of the Romans, were ſent to Rome as a great curioſity. It may not be improper to remark, that this exploit concluded the thirteenth year of the firſt Punic war [f].

The Romans beſiege Lilybæum.

THE beginning of the following year, the Carthaginians received intelligence, that the Romans intended to form the ſiege of Lilybæum, imagining, that the reduction of that place would put an end to this tedious and bloody war. As they looked upon the preſervation of Lilybæum, which was the only city they now poſſeſſed in Sicily, except Drepanum, to be of the utmoſt conſequence to them, they reinforced the garriſon with a large body of choſen troops, and finiſhed the fortifications in ſuch a manner, as to render the place almoſt impregnable. Notwithſtanding which, the two conſuls, Manlius and Attilius, inveſted the place; and, after having opened trenches before it, carried on the ſiege with great vigour. The Carthaginians ſome time before the beginning of this ſiege, had razed the city of Selinus, and tranſplanted the inhabitants to Lilybæum; ſo that this laſt place was very populous when the Roman army appeared before it. The garriſon was alſo very numerous, conſiſting of ten thouſand mercenary Gauls and Greeks, beſides a large detachment of Carthaginian forces, commanded by Hamilcar, an officer of great experience and bravery. Though the Romans ſoon demoliſhed ſeveral of the outworks, and even made their approaches cloſe to the body of the place, yet Hamilcar defended it with an intrepidity and reſolution worthy of himſelf. He rebuilt, as it were in a moment, many forts, which the enemy had deſtroyed with their battering-engines; poſted to every part of the town to give the neceſſary orders, prevent confuſion, and animate the troops, as well as the citizens, by his preſence; and laſtly, made frequent, as well as vigorous ſallies, upon the beſiegers. According to Diodorus, in one of theſe ſallies he killed ten thouſand Romans upon the ſpot, put a great part of their army to flight, burnt many of their rams, rams, baſiliæ, and catapults, and then entered triumphantly into the town. The Carthaginians in the mean time, finding their cavalry of no ſervice in the defence of the place, ſent them to Drepanum. Soon after the laſt diſaſter, a famine began to rage in the Roman camp, which in a ſhort time introduced the plague there, of which, in a very few days, above ten thouſand men were carried off. In fine, the beſiegers, by ſuch a train of calamities, coming, as it were, one upon the neck of another, loſt more men than they could well have done in ſeveral pitched battles. This ſo greatly weakened, and at the ſame time diſpirited, them, that had they not received an immediate ſupply both of troops and proviſions from king Hiero, they muſt have been infallibly obliged to raiſe the ſiege [g].

BUT what the Romans could not effect by force, they attempted to accompliſh by treachery. In order to which, they ſo far corrupted ſome of the leaders of the mercenaries, that they decoyed them into their camp, to concert with them the proper meaſures for having the place delivered into their hands. This might have proved fatal to the Carthaginians, had not one Alexon, an Achaian, diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to Hamilcar; who, aſſembling all the remaining mercenary officers, acquainted them with the particulars of the horrid deſign, and, by his ſingular addreſs, engaged them to perſevere in their fidelity to the Carthaginians. Having ſecured this point, he prevailed upon them next to endeavour at inſpiring the ſoldiers under their command with the ſame ſentiments. He likewiſe ſent one Hannibal, the ſon of the admiral of that name, who was crucified by his own men at Sulci in Sardinia, to keep the Gauls, with whom he was very popular, firm in the Carthaginian intereſt; whilſt Alexon went to hinder the Greeks, amongſt whom he was extremely beloved, from entering into the enemy's meaſures. Theſe ſalutary precautions had the deſired effect; for the mercenary chiefs, returning ſoon after from the Roman camp, found their men ſo far from liſtening to their ſuggeſtions, that they drove them out of the place with the utmoſt fury (Z). Zonaras ſays, that the length of the ſiege, ſiege, and want of pay, induced the mercenaries to entertain thoughts of betraying the city to the Romans; of which Hamilcar being appriſed, he paid the officers their arrears, and appeaſed the minds of the ſoldiery by large promiſes; by which means all the ſparks of diſcontent and ſedition were extinguiſhed. This impending ſtorm being blown over, Hamilcar rewarded Alexon for his fidelity, and continued his ſallies upon the Romans with the uſual ſucceſs [h].

The garriſon receives a reinforcement of ten thouſand men from Carthage.

THE Carthaginians being informed, that the Romans had received a reinforcement from Hiero, though they could have no intelligence from the garriſon, concluded, that the Romans puſhed on the ſiege with vigour, and that conſequently Hamilcar wanted ſome relief. They therefore ſent one Hannibal with a ſupply of ten thouſand men, who putting in at the iſland of Eguſa, was obliged to ſtay there ſome time, in expectation of a fair wind. He was not detained long here, but ſoon happily made his way into the town. Having landed his troops, he paſſed in the night by the enemy's camp to Drepanum, where he had a conference with his friend Adherbal, who commanded in that place. The ſubject of this conference undoubtedly was, how to open a communication betwixt Lilybæum and Drepanum. In conſequence, as it is probable, of the meaſures there concerted, Hannibal, ſurnamed the Rhodian, was pitched upon to execute the plan formed by the two com-

of it, for fear of an open and public defection of the mercenaries; but having ſecured the fidelity of the officers, by paying them their arrears, and calmed the minds of the ſoldiery, by promiſing them ſpeedy payment, which the Carthaginians enabled him to do, by ſending him immediately a large ſum of money for that purpoſe, he, by this means, avoided the danger that threatened him. The ſame author moreover relates, that the Romans received the commanders of the mercenaries, who were expelled the city by their own troops, with great kindneſs, gave them lands in Sicily, and other valuable effects, to compenſate the loſs they had ſuſtained for their affection to them. This laſt particular is likely enough to be true; but as to the firſt, ſince it contradicts Polybius, we think no degree of credit is due to it (25).

commanders above-mentioned. This he very luckily did for ſome time, and thereby greatly contributed to the ſupport of the garriſon of Lilybæum, as well as the ſervice of the Carthaginian ſtate in general; but was at laſt taken by ſome galleys detached from the Roman fleet, in the manner by us already related [i].

And burn in a ſally the beſiegers battering-engines.

ALL communication betwixt Lilybæum and the other Carthaginian territories being thus cut off, the garriſon was reduced to ſome extremities. However, at laſt a ſtorm aroſe, which broke and rendered uſeleſs all the Roman battering-engines, and overturned many of the towers they had erected to facilitate the reduction of the town. This unexpected event prompted the Greek troops in garriſon to attempt the deſtruction of the machines, which eſcaped the fury of the tempeſt; which they eaſily effected, and put a great number of Romans to the ſword. The conſuls, upon this unexpected blow, deſiſted from the attack of the town, turning the ſiege into a blockade, and drawing a line near the place, to prevent any ſuccours being thrown into it. The beſieged, on the other hand, repaired all the breaches made by the enemy, ſtrengthened the fortifications with ſome new works, and receiving a freſh flow of ſpirits from the great ſucceſs they had met with, were determined to defend the town to the laſt drop of blood [k].

Claudius totally routed by Adiubal in a ſea-fight.

SOON after this diſaſter, which greatly alarmed the Romans, Claudius the conſul put to ſea with a powerful fleet, having a deſign of ſurpriſing Drepanum. Upon his approach to that place, Adherbal, the commander there, was not a little amazed to ſee a formidable ſquadron entering the port, eſpecially conſidering the blow the Romans had lately received. However, he ſoon reſumed his uſual preſence of mind, and, aſſembling his troops, made a pathetic ſpeech to them, expatiating upon the hardſhips of a ſiege, which they muſt inevitably undergo, if they ſuffered the enemy to enter their harbour unattacked, and at the ſame time aſſuring them, that no doubt could be entertained of their vanquiſhing the Romans, conſidering the many advantages they had over them in point of ſituation, provided they fell upon upon them immediately, and did their duty. The ſoldiers and ſeamen, greatly animated by this ſpeech, required to be led inſtantly againſt the enemy. Upon which Adherbal, drawing up his ſquadron in line of battle near the rocks that lay on the coaſt, boldly advanced againſt Claudius, who was now entering the port. The engagement immediately began, and the fight was, for ſome time, obſtinate and dubious; but at laſt the Carthaginians, by the lightneſs and activity of their veſſels, by the diſadvantageous ſituation of the Romans, who, through Claudius's imprudence, were poſted near the ſhore, and laſtly, by reaſon of the Roman galleys being incapable, on account of their clumſy make, of charging the enemy in flank or rear, as occaſion ſhould require, obtained a complete victory. Ninety-three of the Roman galleys, if we may give credit to Polybius, with the greateſt part of their crews, fell into the hands of the Carthaginians, who, it is ſaid, did not loſe a ſingle man or galley in this glorious action. According to Diodorus, Claudius loſt an hundred and ſeventeen ſhips, and twenty thouſand men. Eutropius affirms ninety galleys to have been taken, and ninety, with all the troops on board, ſunk in this fatal battle. And laſtly, Oroſius relates eight thouſand men to have been killed or drowned, and twenty thouſand taken priſoners. Claudius, with thirty veſſels, made his eſcape (A) out of the fight to the camp at Lilybæum, bringing thither to the conſuls the news (B) of his defeat; which was the greateſt blow the Romans had received by ſea ſince the commencement of this war[1].

NOTHING was now celebrated at Carthage but the praiſes of Adherbal, who, at this juncture, was eſteemed, both on account of his conſummate prudence and perſonal valour, as one of the greateſt heroes Carthage had ever produced: and indeed ſuch an entire overthrow, given to a moſt proud and inſulting enemy, could not but be in the higheſt degree grateful to all orders of men in that metropolis, and conſequently render the general, to whom it was chiefly owing, greatly acceptable to all his fellow-citizens. As the Romans had amaſſed a vaſt quantity of proviſions on board their fleet, Adherbal furniſhed Lilybæum with a moſt plentiful ſupply, and filled all his magazines at Drepanum. In the mean time, Hamilcar found himſelf inſpired with new vigour, not only by the unexpected ſucceſs of Adherbal, but by his having deſtroyed all the enemy's works and military engines, in the ſally above-mentioned, wherein he was not a little favoured by the violent guſt of wind, which rendered unquenchable the flames his Greek mercenaries had kindled amongſt them. The Carthaginians likewiſe at this juncture, by ravaging the coaſts of Italy and Sicily, reduced the natives to the extremeſt poverty. Soon after, Hanno, a Carthaginian officer, in a quinquereme, fell into the hands of Junius the conſul, as he was ſteering with a new fleet for Lilybæum. However this loſs was ſoon repaired; for Adherbal, detaching Carthalo with an hundred galleys to obſerve the Roman ſquadrons and convoys ſent to the relief of the camp before Lilybæum, gained ſeveral advantages over them, and at laſt had the pleaſure of ſeeing them totally deſtroyed by a ſtorm. Beſides many other places, Carthalo reduced Ægythalus, a ſtrong caſtle the Romans had poſſeſſed themſelves of. Diodorus tells us, that in the firſt ſea-fight with Carthalo, the Romans had thirty-five thouſand men killed, and as many taken priſoners; but this is ſcarce credible. Notwithſtanding all the loſſes the Romans had ſuſtained, they continued the blockade of Lilybæum. with great firmneſs, cantoning all their troops, in the neighbourhood, being determined, if poſſible, to carry the place. Carthalo, by ſome indiſcreet actions, became ſo unpopular amongſt the troops, that he had like to have occaſioned an univerſal defection; which obliged the ſenate to recal him to Carthage. The Romans, being greatly dejected by their late frequent misfortunes at ſea, reſolved once more to lay aſide all thoughts of oppoſing their rival upon the watery element. This revived the drooping ſpirits of the Carthaginian, thaginians, and encouraged them to entertain hopes of coping with their formidable enemy once more by land. In order to which, they appointed Hamilcar, surnamed Barcas, the head of the Barcan faction in Carthage, general of their forces. This extraordinary person, by his future conduct both in Sicily, Africa, and Spain, demonstrated himself to be the greatest general, excepting his son Hannibal, who indeed outshined him, that ever appeared at the head of the Carthaginian armies [m].

Hamilcar lands in Sicily, and makes several motions.

HAMILCAR (C), receiving a charte blanche from the senate, to act as he should think proper for the service of the republic of Carthage, set sail from Carthage in the eighteenth year of this war. According to Cornelius Nepos, he was a perfect youth, when he took upon him the command of the army; which, considering the bad situation of the Carthaginian affairs, adds no small lustre to his first gallant atchievements. Having put to death all the ringleaders and most guilty of the mutineers, he ravaged the coasts of the Locrians and Brutians, and then made a descent near Panormus with all his forces. Upon his landing, he marked out a camp betwixt

(C) The surname of this famous general the Greek authors write Barcas; but the Latin, Barca. It was common for the Greeks to terminate the same proper name in as, that the Latins did in a, and even such proper names as were of African extraction; witness Micipsas, Micipsa, &c According to Silius and others, this was the surname of a family, which was the noblest in Carthage, being lineally descended from the antient kings of Tyre. The party in Carthage, that adhered to this Hamilcar, was, from him, called the Barchine or Barcan faction, of which Livy takes particular notice. Servius in direct terms affirms this name to appertain to a family; and Plutarch mentions one Maherbal, or Adherbal, (who intimated to Hannibal, that he did not know so well how to make a proper use of a victory, as to get one) as a member of it. We may possibly have occasion to speak further of this family in the next section (28).

betwixt Panormus and Eryx; which was of itſelf a ſufficient proof of his great military capacity, ſince the ſpot of ground pitched upon ſeems, from the deſcription given us of it by Polybius, to have been the moſt commodious for the end propoſed, that could poſſibly be conceived. Soon after his encampment here, he detached ſome galleys, with a body of land-forces on board, to pillage the Roman allies. Theſe executed their orders with great ſeverity, making excurſions as far as Cumæ, and laying the country waſte where-ever they moved. Upon their return, he marched with his army to the very walls of Panormus, though the enemy lay encamped but eight hundred paces from that city, and afterwards returned to his former camp. For ſome time the generals on both ſides made it their whole buſineſs to obſerve each others motions. In ſhort, by marches and counter-marches, by rencounters and ambuſcades, by military falſifications, and ſtratagems of all kinds, Hamilcar and the conſuls ſtrove who ſhould ſhew the greateſt ſkill and dexterity; which, though it greatly fatigued the ſoldiers, trained them up in military diſcipline, and formed them for action in the moſt perfect manner. But ſuch a variety of motions, as was the reſult of this conduct, being too tedious for an hiſtorian to deſcribe, Polybius has, in a great meaſure, omitted it [n].

Neither ſide could force the other to a battle.

BOTH the Carthaginian and Roman camps were, by art and nature, rendered impregnable; ſo that neither ſide could force the other to a battle. The military operations therefore, for a conſiderable period of time, conſiſted in rencounters betwixt parties, who, on both ſides, behaved with very great bravery. The ſucceſs of theſe ſkirmiſhes was dubious, ſometimes one party being victorious, and ſometimes the other. The Carthaginians, however, in general, from what we find in Polybius, ſeem rather to have had the advantage, eſpecially as Diodorus intimates, that Hamilcar took a caſtle of conſiderable ſtrength in the territory of Catana, before he advanced to Eryx. If ſo, this ought undoubtedly to be aſcribed to the incomparable conduct of Hamilcar; ſince, from the time he became their general, they performed feats, of which before they might juſtly have been thought incapable [o].

THE Romans had, for ſome time paſt, deſiſted from all naval naval preparations, being deterred from them by the terrible disasters they had met with at sea; and confined themselves wholly to a land-war, thinking their land-forces much more than a match for those of Carthage. But finding themselves greatly mistaken in their views, by the excellent conduct of Hamilcar, and that, instead of carrying their point in Sicily, they were even themselves reduced to some extremities there by the enemy, they began to think of annoying them again by sea. In order to this, a fleet was first equipped by private persons. This privateer-squadron of galleys was of considerable force, and fitted out chiefly with a view of plundering the enemy's territories, and inuring the Romans to the sea, to which they were now, in a manner, strangers. They committed great depredations on the coasts of Africa; and entering the port of Hippo, notwithstanding the citizens had endeavoured to hinder their entrance, by shutting up the mouth of the harbour with a large and strong chain thrown across it, they laid the greatest part of the town, together with the shipping, in ashes. Having filled their vessels with spoils, they returned to Panormus, near which place they gave a considerable defeat to the enemy. In the mean time, one of the consuls pushed on the siege of Lilybæum, and the other that of Drepanum. The Romans likewise dislodged the Carthaginians from the island of Columbria; which Hamilcar in vain attempted to retake. Fabius, who carried on the siege of Drepanum, afterwards, with incredible labour, joined this island to the continent, which greatly facilitated his approaches. Notwithstanding these advantages, the brave Hamilcar terribly harrassed the enemy, not only making incursions into the very heart of the island, but plundering frequently the coasts of Italy, that lay opposite to Sicily. Nothing considerable, for some time, happened after this, except that a cartel was settled betwixt both parties for an exchange of prisoners. They were exchanged man for man; but the Carthaginian prisoners being by far most numerous, many of them were redeemed by money out of the hands of the Romans [p].

Hamilcar takes Eryx.

About three years after Hamilcar's arrival in Sicily, he made himself master of Eryx by surprize. The town was situate on the declivity of a mountain of the same name and had fallen again to the Romans since the reduction o it by Carthalo above-mentioned. What rendered this action the more remarkable was, that the Romans had not only a body of troops in the town, whom they might eaſily have ſupported, and the ſupport of whom was of the higheſt conſequence to them, but were likewiſe in poſſeſſion both of the top and foot of the mountain, where they had forts defended by ſtrong garriſons. By the poſſeſſion of this poſt, the Romans on the ſummit of the mountain laboured under all the hardſhips and inconveniencies of a place cloſely beſieged; notwithſtanding which, they bore all their calamities with wonderful patience, as well as behaved with incredible bravery and reſolution. Hamilcar maintained himſelf in the advantageous poſt he had gained with equal bravery. However, as the Romans were maſters of the open country, he found himſelf ſometimes ſtreightened for want of proviſions, and with no ſmall difficulty preſerved the avenue, keeping open a communication with the ſea, by means of which he, from time to time, received ſupplies. Fabius repreſents both parties as ſinking under the miſeries they then endured; but Polybius, with greater juſtice, and more agreeable to the faith of hiſtory, as triumphing over them. Both ſides continued in this melancholy ſituation for the ſpace of two years. The Romans, notwithſtanding the difficulties they were reduced to, ſtill continued the blockade of Lilybæum [q].

The Romans fit out a new fleet.

As the privateer-ſquadron was only a prelude to the figure the Romans intended to make by ſea, in the conſulate of C. Lutatius Catulus and A. Poſthumius, they fitted out another fleet of two hundred ſail, which was likewiſe, in a great meaſure, equipped at the expence of private perſons. The command of this armament was given to C. Lutatius, with an intention to ſtrike a home-ſtroke, and force fortune to give a coup de grace to the Carthaginians. In the firſt place the conſul poſſeſſed himſelf of the port of Drepanum and all the other harbours in the neighbourhood of Lilybæum. Afterwards he took care to exerciſe his ſoldiers and ſeamen with the utmoſt diligence, that they might be able to look the enemy in the face, as firmly believing, that a deciſive action by ſea muſt put an end to this long and burdenſome war. Soon after their entrance in the haven of Drepanum, the Romans attempted to ſtorm the town, and might have ſucceeded in their attempt, had not the conſul been wounded; which occaſioned ſome confuſion, and gave the enemy an opportunity of repulſing them. Zonaras obſerves, that when the troops on both ſides were drawn up in order of battle before the fight off the iſlands called Ægates, the place of rendezvous for the Carthaginian fleet, a blazing ſtar or comet appeared, to the great terror of both parties; but ſeemed to point directly at the Carthaginians. Though the wind proved unfavourable to Lutatius when he came in ſight of the enemy's fleet, yet he reſolved to attack them, ſince they expected every moment to be joined by Hamilcar, whoſe name was become terrible to the Romans. The Carthaginians, intending now to make their laſt effort by ſea, had collected their whole naval power, conſiſting of four hundred ſail. The Romans on this occaſion, according to Polybius, fitted out two hundred gallies, as above obſerved; but Eutropius and Oroſius make them to have been three hundred. Both fleets, coming in ſight of each other, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for an engagement, which was to determine the fate of Sicily[r].

Which entirely defeats that of the Carthaginians near the iſlands of Ægates.

THOUGH the galleys, of which the Carthaginian armament was compoſed, in number greatly exceeded thoſe of the Romans, yet, in many reſpects, the Roman ſquadron was vaſtly ſuperior to the Carthaginian; for whereas the forces on board the latter conſiſted, for the moſt part, of new levies, entirely raw and undiſciplined, Lutatius had taken care to man the former with choice troops and able ſeamen, trained up in the moſt perfect manner. Beſides, as his veſſels were built after the model of the galley taken from Hannibal the Rhodian, in lightneſs and activity they far excelled thoſe of the enemy. To which we may add, that the Carthaginians had the naval power of the Romans in the higheſt contempt, as having themſelves, for ſome years, been maſters at ſea; and therefore, upon the firſt advice of the enemy's motions, they, being vaſtly ſurpriſed, put to ſea a fleet fitted out in haſte, manned only with mercenaries, who had neither courage, experience, nor zeal for the ſtate, in whoſe ſervice they were engaged. Hanno therefore made but a faint reſiſtance, his forces being routed at the firſt onſet. Florus ſays, that the Carthaginian fleet was ſo heavy laden with troops, baggage, arms, proviſions, &c.

&c. that the whole city of Carthage ſeemed to have been on board, and that the veſſels could not move with any freedom; which greatly contributed to Hanno's defeat. The loſs of the Carthaginians on this melancholy occaſion ſeems greatly to be exaggerated by Eutropius, who tells us, that they had ſeventy-three ſhips taken, an hundred twenty-five ſunk, thirty-two thouſand men made priſoners, thirteen thouſand killed or drowned, and that an immenſe quantity of gold and ſilver fell into the victors hands. Oroſius differs not much from him. But Polybius, who undoubtedly comes nearer the truth, affirms, that the Romans (D) ſunk only fifty of the Carthaginian veſſels, and took ſeventy with their crews, the reſt making off in great confuſion to the iſle of Hiera. Lutatius, following his blow, advanced to the city of Eryx; where engaging the Carthaginians, he cut off two thouſand men. This laſt action concluded the operations of the firſt Punic war [s].

Which is followed by a peace.

THE Romans, naturally inſolent in proſperity, were ſo elated with their victory, that Lutatius inſiſted upon Hamilcar's delivering up his arms to him; but this haughty demand was rejected with the ſcorn and indignation it deſerved, that great captain proteſting, "That he would ſuffer "all extremities, rather than give up thoſe arms to his "country's enemies, with which he had been entruſted for it's "preſervation." The conſul, however, underſtanding, that Hamilcar was inveſted with full powers to ſign a treaty with him, and being deſirous of having the honour of putting an end to a war, which had coſt both republics ſuch an immenſe quantity of blood and treaſure, before the expiration

(D) According to Diodorus, the Roman fleet, ſhips of war and tranſports, amounted to a thouſand ſail and the Carthaginian only to two hundred and fifty. But this contradicts all other authors, and is highly improbable. The leſs credit is to be given to Diodorus in this particular, as he depends entirely upon Philinus, a writer of ſuch partiality, that his authority is not to be regarded. The ſame author affirms, that the Romans loſt eighty ſhips, and had ſix thouſand men taken priſoners in this action; which conſidering the relation of it given us by other hiſtorians, ſeems abſolutely impoſſible (28).

tion of his office, he concluded a peace with that general, provided the ſenate and people of Rome would ratify it, upon the following terms: "That the Carthaginians ſhould "immediately evacuate Sicily; that they ſhould never for "the future make war upon Hiero, or any other ally of "the Romans; that they ſhould reſtore all the Roman "priſoners in their cuſtody without ranſom, but redeem "their own with money; and laſtly, that, within twen-"ty years, they ſhould pay the Romans two thouſand two "hundred Euboic talents of the pureſt ſilver[t]." Zonaras intimates, that the ſenate of Carthage ſent a deputation directly to Lutatius to ſue for peace: but he muſt give way to the ſuperior authority of Polybius and Cornelius Nepos, who affirm, that Hamilcar Barcas had the management of the whole tranſaction. The people of Rome, greatly puffed up with their unexpected ſucceſs, and looking upon the republic of Carthage as now lying at their mercy, refuſed to ratify the treaty, till they had ſent ten deputies to Sicily, to inform them thoroughly of the ſituation of affairs there, who, in conjunction with the conſul, agreed to the ratification of it, upon condition the four following additional articles were inſerted in it: "That the Carthaginians ſhould "encreaſe the above-ſtipulated ſum with two hundred ta-"lents; that a thouſand talents ſhould be paid immediately, "and the remaining ſum in ten years time; that the Car-"thaginians ſhould not approach with their long ſhips ei-"ther the coaſts of Italy, or any territories belonging to the "allies of the Romans; that they ſhould not make levies "either in the dominions of the Romans, or thoſe of "their allies; and laſtly, that they ſhould abandon all the "little iſlands betwixt Sicily and the coaſt of Italy." As theſe hard conditions were extorted from Hamilcar by the Romans, becauſe they ſaw him not in a ſituation to refuſe them, he, from this moment, conceived an implacable hatred to that nation. In fine, he was determined to conclude a peace with them upon any terms, to give his country time to breath, that he might have an opportunity of hereafter chaſtiſing them for the unparallelled inſolence they had been guilty of through the whole courſe, and more particularly at the concluſion, of this war. entirely agreed about the preciſe duration of the firſt Punic war. Polybius, Diodorus, Livy, and Zonaras, ſay, it continued twenty-four years; whereas Oroſius, Eutropius, Syncellus and others, affirm it to have laſted twenty-three years only, with whom Gellius, as he makes it to have commenced A. U. C. 490, ſeems to agree. Be this as it will, both ſides ſuffered extremely by it, the Romans having loſt, ſince their firſt putting to ſea, ſeven hundred ſhips, and the Carthaginians five hundred. We ſhall not here tranſcribe the reflections Polybius makes upon the power of both ſtates in this war, ſince our readers may ſo eaſily have recourſe to that excellent hiſtorian; but content ourſelves with obſerving, that though, in his opinion, the Roman ſoldiers were far ſuperior to the Carthaginian in valour and reſolution, yet he allows Hamilcar, for his conduct and bravery, to have been the greateſt captain of the age [u].

THE Carthaginians were no ſooner got out of this bloody and expenſive war, than they found themſelves engaged in another, which had like to have proved fatal to them. The mercenary troops, that had ſerved under Hamilcar in Sicily, and diſtinguiſhed themſelves greatly on all occaſions, upon their return to Africa, found the ſtate of Carthage ſo drained, that, far from being able to give them the largeſſes and rewards promiſed by Hamilcar, it could not pay them their arrears. This, with ſome other concurring cauſes, occaſioned a war (E), which, for three years and a half, preyed upon the very vitals of the republic, and was attended with ſuch inſtances of cruelty and barbarity, as are ſcarce to be parallelled in hiſtory. The antient hiſtorians call it the Libyan or African war, and ſometimes the war with the

the mercenaries. As many ſalutary inſtructions may be drawn from thence, of great ſervice to ſome ſtates in all ages, for the better rgulation of their conduct in ſeveral important particulars, which is one of the great ends of hiſtory, Polybius has tranſmitted to poſterity a full and minute account of it. For the ſame reaſon we think it incumbent upon us, in this part of our work, to inſert the ſubſtance of what has been laid down by that noble author relating to ſo remarkable a tranſaction, aſſuring our readers at the ſame time, that nothing of moment ſhall be omitted, that we can be ſupplied with from other antient hiſtorians [w].

The mercenary troops of the Carthaginians greatly diſguſted, on account of not receiving their full pay

As ſoon as Hamilcar had put the laſt hand to the treaty abovementioned, he retired, with the forces which were in Eryx, to Lilybæum, and there reſigned his commiſſion, leaving to Giſco, the commandant of that place, the care of tranſporting them to Africa. Giſco, being an officer of great penetration, as though he had foreſeen what would happen, did not ſhip them off all at once, but in ſmall and ſeparate parties, that thoſe who came firſt might be paid off, and ſent home, before the arrival of the reſt. The Carthaginians at home, however, did not act with the ſame forecaſt andprecaution. As they were almoſtentirely exhauſted by the laſt war, and the immenſe ſum ofmoney, in conſequence of peace, paid to the Romans, they judged it would be a laudable action to ſave ſomething to the public, not conſidering the injuſtice, as well as imprudence, of the meaſure they were going to purſue in order to this. They therefore did not pay the mercenaries in proportion as they arrived, thinking it more proper to wait till they all came together, with a view of obtaining from the whole body a remiſſion of ſome part of their arrears; but being ſoon made ſenſible of their wrong conduct on this occaſion, by the frequent diſorders theſe barbarians committed in the city, they, with ſome difficulty, prevailed upon the officers to take up their quarters at Sicca, and canton their troops in that neighbourhood, giving them a ſum of money for their preſent ſubſiſtance, and promiſing to adjuſt their pretenſions, when the reſt of their comrades came from Sicily. For ſome time they refuſed to begin their march, becauſe the Carthaginians were not diſpoſed to permit their wives and children to ſtay in Carthage, as they they deſired, believing, that this would be an inducement to the ſoldiers to return often to Carthage, and conſequently deprive them of the benefits they had propoſed to themſelves from their departure. However, this difficulty was at laſt got over; and all the mercenaries already arrived in Africa, with their wives, children, and baggage, marched to Sicca. Polybius looks upon this ſtep as an overſight in the Carthaginians, ſince, had the women and children remained in Carthage, they would have been as ſo many hoſtages for the future good behaviour of the ſoldiers: and indeed that ſuch an advantage would have more than counterbalanced the inconvenience ariſing from an oppoſite conduct, hinted at by the ſame author, notwithſtanding the fierceneſs of the African troops, required no uncommon degree of ſagacity to apprehend [x].

BEING now wholly immerſed in idleneſs, to which they had long being ſtrangers, a neglect of diſcipline enſued, and of courſe a petulant and licentious ſpirit immediately took place. They were now determined not to acquieſce in receiving their bare pay, but to inſiſt upon the rewards Hamilcar had promiſed them, and even to compel the ſtate of Carthage to comply with their demands by force of arms. The ſenate being appriſed of the mutinous diſpoſition of the ſoldiery, diſpatched Hanno, one of the ſuffetes, to pacify them. Upon his arrival at Sicca, he behaved in a very preſterous and imprudent manner. He expatiated largely upon the poverty of the ſtate, and the heavy taxes with which the citizens of Carthage were loaded; and therefore, inſtead of anſwering their high expectations, he deſired them to be ſatisfied with receiving part of their pay, and remit the remainder to ſerve the preſſing exigencies of the public [y].

Upon which they advance in a body to Tunes.

NOTHING could have been more impolitic than this conduct of Hanno, excepting that of the Carthaginians, in employing a perſon ſo unqualified for the buſineſs he went upon. In the firſt place, he expoſed his country's weakneſs to the contempt of the mercenaries, and then farther inflamed them againſt it, by refuſing to comply with their juſt pretenſions, when they ſeemed determined to inſiſt upon a compliance with the moſt extravagant. But this perſon's conduct was all of a piece, both in civil and military capacity, as will appear in the courſe of this war: ſo that Carthage muſt

muſt have been ruined, had ſhe not had ſo able a captain as Hamilcar to ſupport her in the time of this her great diſtreſs. In fine, the mercenaries being highly exaſperated, that neither Hamilcar, nor any other of the principal officers, who commanded them in Sicily, who were the beſt judges of their merit, appeared on this occaſion, but only this Hanno, a perſon utterly unknown, and above all others diſagreeable to them, had immediately recourſe to arms. Aſſembling therefore in a body, to the number of twenty thouſand men, they advanced to Tunes, and immediately encamped before that city [z].

As Polybius's hiſtory is interſperſed throughout with the fineſt political maxims and reflections, ſo ſcarce any part of it abounds more with them than deſcribing the beginning of the Libyan war. It is ſuperfluous to give theſe at large, becauſe the author is in every one's hands; and therefore we ſhall only obſerve, that though, in ſome reſpects, he approves of the Carthaginian practice, of making up their armies chiefly of mercenaries, yet in the main he condemns that practice, and demonſtrates from the breaking out of this war, as well as from the nature of the thing, that an obſervance of the fundamental axiom on which they proceeded, might ſometimes produce diſmal effects. They imagined, that by drawing their forces from different nations, who did not underſtand one another, they ſhould prevent all conſpiracies, intrigues, and combinations againſt the ſtate, and undoubtedly this had a tendency to the end propoſed. But what Ariſtotle has obſerved of their conſtitution in general, viz. that it was more wiſely framed to prevent inconveniencies than remedy them, may be applied to this particular cuſtom; for though the evil guarded againſt by it was frequently by this means prevented, yet when it happened, the conſequence could ſcarce fail of being deplorable, ſince it was next to impoſſible for any officers to perſuade a ſoldiery, compoſed of ſo many nations in any tongue, to liſten to the dictates of reaſon. As Polybius has ſet this point in a ſtrong light, we ſhall refer our readers to him, and now return to the hiſtory [a].

The mercenaries break out into an open rebellion.

THE Carthaginians, being greatly alarmed at the approach of ſo formidable a body to Tunes, made large conceſſions to the mercenaries, in order to bring them back to their duty. They ordered them ſupplies of proviſions at their own prices, and ſent a deputation of even ſenators themſelv

ſelves to confer with their chiefs, and, if poſſible, to ſatisfy them. Far from being ſoftened, they grew more inſolent upon theſe conceſſions, taking them for the effects of fear and weakneſs in the Carthaginians. As this powerful corps conſiſted of Iberians, Gauls, Ligurians, natives of the Balearic iſlands, Greeks, and Africans, who were ſtrangers to one another's language, the Carthaginians found it next to impoſſible to treat with them. Many of them likewiſe being ſlaves and deſerters, and conſequently expecting capital puniſhment, either for this rebellion, or ſome other enormous crime, did their utmoſt to prevent all friendly intercourſe with the ſtate of Carthage. They moreover conſidered that republic as deſtitute of troops, and themſelves as the beſt ſoldiers in the world, having performed many notable exploits in Sicily, and been trained up there in the art of war by the moſt celebrated captain of the age. Theſe conſiderations, for ſome time, made them entirely averſe to all thoughts of an accommodation. They roſe in their demands, without the leaſt regard to reaſon, juſtice, or moderation. They practiſed every knaviſh art that could be thought of to extort money from their maſters. When one point was gained, they immediately had recourſe to a new artifice, on which to ground ſome freſh pretenſion. Was their pay ſettled beyond the agreement made with them, they ſtill would be reimburſed for the loſſes, which they pretended to have ſuſtained, either (E) by the death of horſes, the exceſſive price they had, at certain times, paid for their bread-corn, or their ſhort allowance of proviſions at thoſe ſeaſons. They inſiſted alſo upon the recompence due to their merit, ſo often promiſed; and that, in all theſe points, they ſhould have immediate ſatisfaction given them. The Carthaginians, finding themſelves obliged to make a virtue of neceſſity, ſhewed a diſpoſition to ſatisfy them in all points, how unreaſonable ſoever, and agreed to refer themſelves to the opinion of ſome general in Sicily, who had commanded them there, as they all along deſired, leaving the choice

(E) According to Diodorus Siculus, the mercenaries inſiſted upon being paid for every one of their body who fell in Sicily, as well as for the loſs of their horſes here mentioned; which that hiſtorian looked upon as a very unjuſt and unreaſonable demand (30)

choice of ſuch commander entirely to them. Accordingly they pitched upon Giſco, a perſon greatly beloved by them, to mediate this affair, believing Hamilcar to have been a principal cauſe of the ill treatment they had met with, ſince he never appeared amongſt them, and, according to the general opinion, had voluntarily reſigned his commiſſion. Giſco ſoon arrived at Tunes with money to pay the troops; and after conferring with the officers, and the ſeveral nations apart, he harangued them in a mild and inſinuating manner, put them in mind of the long time they had been in the Carthaginian ſervice, the conſiderable ſums they had received from the republic; and, in ſhort, gave them to underſtand, that their reaſonable demands would be complied with; at the ſame time deſiring them to recede from all exorbitant claims, and reſt ſatisfied with their pay. This made ſuch an impreſſion upon the minds of the ſoldiery, that a treaty was upon the point of being concluded, when Spendius and Mathos, two of the principal mutineers, occaſioned a tumult in every part of the camp. Spendius was by nation a Campanian, who had been a ſlave at Rome, and fled to the Carthaginians. He was a ſtrong, luſty, and extremely bold fellow. The apprehenſions he was under of being delivered into the hands of his old maſter, by whom he was ſure to be hanged or crucified, his crime meriting capital puniſhment by the Roman laws, if a pacification took place, prompted him to break off the accommodation. Mathos was an African, and free-born; but as he had been active in raiſing the rebellion, and was well acquainted with the implacable diſpoſition of the Carthaginians, he knew, that a peace muſt infallibly prove his ruin. He therefore very warmly eſpouſed the intereſts of Spendius, and inſinuated to the Africans the danger of concluding a treaty at that juncture, as this could not but leave them ſingly expoſed to the rage of the Carthaginians. "The Gauls, Iberians, Ligurians, and Greeks" ſaid he "after having received their arrears, will be diſmiſſed, "and from thenceforth enjoy an uninterrupted repoſe amongſt "their countrymen at home, whereas you, being left alone, "will have the whole guilt of the rebellion imputed to you, "and, deſtitute of ſupport, fall an eaſy ſacrifice to the re-"ſentment of your imperious maſters." This gave a new turn to affairs, and ſo incenſed the Africans, who were much more numerous than the troops of any other nation, that they immediately aſſembled in a tumultuous manner. The foreigners ſoon joined them, being inſpired by Spendius with an equal degree of fury. Nothing now was heard amongſt them, but the moſt bitter oaths and horrid imprecations uttered againſt Giſco and the Carthaginians. Whoever offered to make any remonſtrance, or lend an ear to temperate counſels, was ſtoned to death by the enraged multitude; nay, many perſons loſt their lives, barely for preſuming to ſpeak, before the purport of their diſcourſe could be known, or any one could from thence with certainty infer, whether they were in the intereſt of the Carthaginians or Spendius. As the ſtate of Carthage had very impoliticly ſupplied the malecontents with plenty of wine, and all kinds of proviſions, they indulged themſelves with great freedom; and being at this very juncture heated (F) with wine, which they had drank to great exceſs, they gave a full vent to their rage and inſolence, threatening the African republic with utter deſtruction. In fine, no one having the courage to open his mouth in favour of peace, the troops made choice of Spendius and Mathos to head them in the intended expedition [b].

In the midſt of theſe commotions, Giſco behaved with great firmneſs and intrepidity. That general had too much

(F) We learn from Polyænus, that the Libyans or Africans were much addicted to drunkenneſs; which Himilco, a Carthaginian general, being appriſed of, found an opportunity of intoxicating their troops in a war the Carthaginians had with that people, and, by this ſtratagem, gained a ſignal advantage over them. Poſſibly the Carthaginians might have ſomething of that kind in view at this time, when they ſupplied the mercenaries with ſuch quantities of wine. If they had not, they were in the higheſt degree impolitic to furniſh their enemies with wine at this juncture, as well as all ſorts of proviſions. Be this as it will, they ſeem to have been infatuated, their conduct, from the concluſion of the firſt Punic war, having been nothing but a ſeries of blunders and miſtakes. We ſhall not, however, here expatiate upon this topic, but refer our curious readers to Polybius, whoſe judicious reflections and obſervations cannot fail of giving them ample ſatisfaction (31).

much courage, and too great a regard for his country's welfare, to deſiſt from all poſſible attempts to reduce the mutineers to reaſon, notwithſtanding his preſent dangerous ſituation. He left no methods untried to ſoften the officers, and calm the minds of the ſoldiery, though at the ſame time he kept up an air of dignity and command, giving them to underſtand, that Carthage was not in ſuch low circumſtances as they imagined. But the many falſe ſteps the Carthaginians had been guilty of ſince the commencement of theſe troubles, as well as before, defeated his good intentions, and rendered ineffectual all his endeavours. The torrent of ſedition was now become ſo ſtrong and rapid, that there was no poſſibility of ſtemming it, or keeping it within any bounds. A ſcarcity of proviſions ſucceeding their late plenty and profuſion, the troops, in an inſolent manner, demanded of Giſco an immediate ſupply, who, to reprove their inſolence, bade them go to Mathos their captain for it. Such an accident as this, conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of the malecontents, could not but ſet the whole camp in a flame. "Shall "he with impunity," ſaid they, "not only refuſe "redreſſing our juſt grievances and complaints, but "turn even our wants and neceſſities into ridicule?" In a moment therefore they ſeized upon the military cheſt, dividing the money amongſt themſelves in part of their arrears, put the perſon of Giſco under arreſt, and treated him, as well as his attendants, with the utmoſt indignities. Mathos and Spendius, to deſtroy the remoteſt hopes of a reconciliation with Carthage, applauded the courage and reſolution of their men, loaded the unhappy Giſco, and his followers, with irons, and formally declared war againſt the Carthaginians. All the cities of Africa, to whom they had ſent deputies, to exhort them to recover their liberty, ſoon came over to them, except Utica and Hippo Dyarrhytus, or, as Polybius calls it, Hippacra. By this means their army being greatly encreaſed, they divided it into two bodies; with one of which they moved towards Utica, whilſt the other marched to Hippo, in order to beſiege both thoſe places. The Carthaginians in the mean time found themſelves ready to ſink under the preſſure of their misfortunes, their city having never before been expoſed to ſuch imminent danger. Every thing at preſent ſeemed to conſpire to their ruin. After they had been haraſſed four-and-twenty years by a moſt cruel and deſtructive foreign war, they entertained hopes of enjoying ſome repoſe; and re-eſtabliſhing their affairs; inſtead of which, a numerous army ariſes out of their own bowels, threatening them with immediate deſtruction. All the citizens of Carthage drew their particular ſubſiſtance from the rents or revenues of their lands, and the public expences from the tribute paid from Africa; all which they were not only deprived of at once, but, what is much worſe, had it turned entirely againſt them. They were deſtitute of arms and forces either for ſea or land; of all neceſſary preparations for the ſuſtaining of a ſiege, or the equipping of a fleet. They ſuffered all the calamities incident to the moſt ruinous civil war, and, to complete their miſery, had not the leaſt proſpect of receiving aſſiſtance from any foreign friend or ally [c].

The true cauſes of this rebellion.

SUCH was the preſent melancholy ſituation of affairs at Carthage, which the Carthaginians had, in a great meaſure, themſelves occaſioned, by their numerous inſtances of cruelty, injuſtice, and ill conduct. During the laſt war, they had moſt tyrannically oppreſſed all the African nations ſubject to them, by impoſing exceſſive tributes upon them, in the exaction of which no allowance was made for poverty, or the extremes of miſery. They never ſent ſuch governors into the provinces as were likely to win the affections of the people by their lenity and moderation; but ſuch only as would moſt fleece them, in order to fit out fleets, and raiſe armies, and by that means the moſt adminiſter to the ambition of the republic, where Hanno at that time governed with almoſt an abſolute ſway. This being conſidered, it cannot certainly appear ſtrange, that the Africans were ſo eaſily prevailed upon to engage in this rebellion. At the very firſt ſignal that was made, it broke out, and in a moment became general. The women, who had often, with the greateſt affliction, ſeen their huſbands and fathers dragged to priſon for non-payment of the moſt unreaſonable taxes and impoſts, as likewiſe ſuffering cruel deaths for the ſlighteſt crimes, ſhewed themſelves every-where extremely active in forwarding a revolt. They not only entered into an aſſociation to annoy noy, by all possible methods, so barbarous and inhuman an enemy, but likewise with pleasure gave up all their ornaments to contribute towards the expences of the war. Mathos and Spendius therefore, by such seasonable and large supplies, found themselves enabled, not only to animate their soldiers by a prompt payment of the sums promised them, but likewise to settle a sufficient fund for all the future exigencies of the army; in which, says Polybius, they acted like wise men, who do not only look to the present occasion, but likewise extend their views to futurity [d].

The Carthaginians make preparations to reduce the mercenaries to reason.

The Carthaginians, notwithstanding their deplorable circumstances, did not despond, but pursued all the measures necessary to put themselves into a posture of defence. As Hanno had already distinguished himself in their service, by conquering a territory of good extent on the confines of Hecatompolis, they appointed him commander in chief of all their forces. Troops they levied both for land and sea-service, horse as well as foot. All citizens capable of bearing arms, were mustered; the horse exercised with great diligence and application; mercenaries invited from all parts; many new galleys built, and all the old ones refitted. In short, the most extraordinary efforts were made, not only to repel all the attempts of the mutineers, but even to reduce them to reason by force of arms [e].

Mathos and Spendius besiege Utica and Hippacra at the same time.

In the mean time, Mathos and Spendius, having an army of seventy thousand men at their devotion, began the military operations. They laid siege to Utica and Hippacra at one and the same time, and pushed on both those sieges with the utmost vigour. But as they were carried on by detachments drawn from the army for that purpose, they remained with the main body of their forces at Tunes, and thereby cut off all communication betwixt Carthage and the continent of Africa. This greatly straightened the Carthaginians, whose capital was thereby held in a kind of blockade. The Africans likewise harassed them by perpetual alarms, advancing to the very walls of Carthage by day, as well as by night, and treating with the utmost cruelty every Carthaginian that fell into their hands [f].

Hanno,

HANNO, a general more to be eſteemed for his diligence in making military preparations, than his conduct in time of action, notwithſtanding the reputation he had acquired by the conqueſt above-mentioned, marched to the relief of Utica with a good body of forces, an hundred elephants, and a large train of battering-engines. Having taken a view of the enemy, he immediately attacked their intrenchments, and, after an obſtinate diſpute, by the help of his elephants, forced them, and made himſelf maſter of their camp. As the (G) elephants did great execution, Hanno ſent againſt them, who behaves very imprudently.

(G) If we remember right, no mention is made by the antient hiſtorians of the Carthaginians uſing elephants in war, till the time of the firſt Punic war. It is certain Plutarch takes no notice of them, when he gives us a deſcription of the arrangement of the Carthaginian forces juſt before the battle on the banks of the Crimeſus; nor Diodorus, when he deſcribes the diſpoſitions of the Carthaginian armies before their various engagements with Dionyſius and Agathocles. This countenances Giſbertus Cuperus's opinion, who aſſerts, that elephants never formed part of an army in Europe, till after the time of Alexander the Great, who took many of thoſe animals from Porus an Indian king; which occaſioned their being known and uſed by his ſucceſſors afterwards in Greece; for if their military uſe had been known by the Sicilians before, or even at that period of time, that people would moſt certainly have joined them with their other forces in ſome of the earlieſt wars they were engaged in; which, from the ſilence of all hiſtorians mentioning the Sicilian wars, it is plain they never did. It follows therefore, that they were not uſed in Sicily before the interval above mentioned, which was the moſt likely part of Europe for them to be known in, by reaſon of its vicinity to Libya, which produced them. It ſeems to follow likewiſe, that the Carthaginians did not intermix them with their troops before that period, ſince hiſtory could not have omitted taking notice of ſo formidable a part of their armies, had they been a part of them; eſpecially as we find afterwards, that almoſt in all battles wherein they were concerned, they were, in a manner, the ſole cauſe of victory. We cannot help further remarking, that, unleſs we are greatly deceived, no mention is made of armed chariots after the introduction of elephants into military engagements, nor of elephants before the laſt time armed chariots are mentioned in any battles the Carthaginians had with their enemies. This, if true, as we perſuade ourſelves it is, will point out to us the interval, in which chariots were firſt diſuſed, and elephants introduced amongſt the Carthaginians, viz. betwixt the year before Chriſt 309, when Agathocles defeated Hanno and Bomilcar, the laſt time we hear of chariots ecution, the mercenaries loſt a vaſt number of men in this action, and conſequently the advantage gained was ſo conſiderable, that it might have proved deciſive, had Hanno made a proper uſe of it. But not entertaining a right idea of thoſe veteran troops, who had learned, under the conduct of Hamilcar in Sicily, to fly before an enemy, face about, and attack their purſuers, in one and the ſame day, as occaſion ſhould require, he imagiriots in the Carthaginian armies, and the year 262, before the chriſtian æra, when the Romans routed Hanno before Agrigentum, the firſt time we find elephants mentioned in them; and not only ſo, but likewiſe fully prove, that the cuſtom of fighting with elephants was adopted by the people under conſideration in the room of that which before prevailed of engaging with chariots. What ſtrengthens this is, that thoſe nations, who, it is probable, knew nothing of elephants, as the Britons, Gauls, &c. had chariots in uſe amongſt them, till they were conquered by the Romans, as is evident from Diodorus, Cæſar, and Dio. Pyrrhus was the firſt who brought them into Italy; and that the Romans had little or no knowledge of them for a conſiderable time after that prince's death, appears from the defeat Regulus received from Xantippus, occaſioned, in a great meaſure, by the Carthaginian elephants, of which the Romans were ſo much afraid, that, for two years afterwards, they durſt not look the enemy in the face in Sicily. It likewiſe further appears from the overthrow Cæcilius gave Aſdrubal near Panormus, when he took moſt of the elephants, and ſent them to Rome, as a great curioſity. According to Pauſanias, the Indians in Aſia, and the Libyans in Africa, were the firſt nations that uſed elephants in battles, others only eſteeming them on account of the ivory they produced. The Perſians, Lydians, and neighbouring nations, antiently intermixed camels with their troops, as in after-ages they did elephants. Though from Herodotus, Plato, and others, it is ſufficiently evident, that Egypt produced elephants, particularly that part of it bordering upon Ethiopia; yet they were not known in that country as military animals, till the time of the Ptolemies. From Egypt, it is probable, the practice of fighting with them ſpread into Cyrenaica, the people of which region, in all likelihood, might communicate it to their neighbours the Carthaginians. Neither the Jews, Aſſyrians, Babylonians, Phœnicians, Arabs, Ethiopians, nor even the Medes and Perſians, ever brought elephants into the field before the reign of Alexander the Great. King Juba in Philoſtratus intimates, that the Moors and Libyans, in very early times, fought with elephants; which notion ſeems likewiſe to be countenanced by Ælian. Lucretius affirms the Carthaginians to have invented this method of fight-

ned himſelf to have routed a body of raw, undiſciplined Africans and Numidians, who, upon any defeat, generally retired into the heart of the country; and therefore entering the town, lay there in great ſecurity, his troops in the mean time, ordered to guard the camp, being every where off their duty. The mercenaries, who, after Hanno's victory, had rallied their ſhattered forces upon a neighbouring eminence, ſtrong by its ſitu-ing; but as ſuch an opinion runs counter to the whole ſtream of antiquity, we ſhall pay no regard to it (32).

According to Dr. Hyde, the moſt uſual name of the elephant in India is bari or bri; from whence, it is probable, the Latin words barrus, barritus, ebur, &c. were derived. Iſidore adds ſome weight to this, when he tells us, that, in the Indian language, an elephant is called barro. Martinius makes the elephant to be named in the Chaldee beira; which probably was likewiſe the Ethiopic name, or nearly related to it, ſince there is a great affinity betwixt the Ethiopic and the Chaldee; and, in confirmation of this ſentiment, Horace's ſcholiaſt interprets the word barri of the elephants of Ethiopia. The animal under conſideration went likewiſe almoſt all over the eaſt by the appellation phil or pil, and even in Egypt and Ethiopia; though, in the laſt country, that animal is now called nage, and by the Copts delphinos. In ſome parts of India the elephants were named boſare, according to Arrian; in others, if Ælian may be credited, praſii and taxilæ, from the names of the places where they were produced. The Moors and Carthaginians ſtyled an elephant cæſar, as we learn from Spartian and Servius. Some derive the word elephas or ἐλέφας from phil, with the Arabic article al prefixed; others from the Hebrew verb alaph, he learned, the elephant, according to Pliny, Arrian, and others, being an animal of ſurpriſing docility; and laſtly, others from the Hebrew aleph or eleph, ſignifying an ox, a leader, or indeed any large quadruped. Heſychius uſes the the words piriſſas and elephas as ſynonymous terms. So much for the name (33).

The Carthaginians generally poſted theſe animals in front, in order to ſtrike the greater terror into the enemy, as we learn from the manner in which Xantippus, Hannibal, Mago, &c. drew up their armies. This ſeems a farther proof, that they immediately ſucceeded armed chariots, which had the ſame ſituation aſſigned them in the Carthaginian armies. Sometimes, however, they were diſtributed in both wings, as appears from Livy. The elephants made uſe of by the Carthaginians in battles were generally, if not always, Indian elephants, which much exceeded the Libyan in ſtrength and magnitude. Each of theſe had a wooden tower faſtened to his back, with twenty-two warriors in it, and an Indian to manage the beaſt, which he did with the utmoſt dexterity. The Libyan elephants were not able to carry above ſix or ſeven men, as Geſner and Aldrovandus have proved from Livy, Pliny, and Solinus. In the firſt book of the Maccabees, Antiochus Eupator is ſaid to have brought againſt the Jews ſeveral Indian elephants, with towers on their backs, containing thirty-two men a-piece, with an Indian guide. Philoſtratus ſays, that an Indian elephant as much exceeded in ſize one of Libya, as this laſt did a Nyſæan horſe; and Pliny tells us, that the African elephants were ſo much afraid of the Indian, that they could not bear the ſight of them; which is confirmed by Livy and Polybius, who intimate, that the Libyan elephants could neither bear the noiſe nor ſmell of the Indian. Theſe laſt animals, according to Ælian, were nine cubits high, and five broad. The Romans called the elephant bos Luca, or bos Lucana, becauſe they firſt ſaw that creature in Lucania, and uſed the word bos to denote any great animal. That nation firſt placed elephants in their armies in the year of Rome 555, in the conſulate of P. Sulpicius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta. As the Carthaginian ſoldiers were exerciſed by their officers, ſo their elephants were trained up and exerciſed by the Indian guides. By their monſtrous ſize, filthy ſmell, terrible noiſe, into the town, retook and plundered the camp, and ſeized upon all the proviſions, military ſtores, &c. brought from Carthage to the relief of the beſieged. Nor was this the only error committed by Hanno; another inſtance of his military incapacity ſoon diſcovered itſelf. Notwithſtanding he lay encamped in the moſt advantageous manner near a town called Gorza (H), at which place noiſe, and prodigious ſtrength, as well as the efforts of the garriſons on their backs, they generally threw the enemy into confuſion, and made great havock amongſt them. The Indians, that managed them, appeared in a dreſs the moſt proper to heighten the conſternation of the enemy, and began the fight with the utmoſt fury. No horſes but the Numidian, which were accuſtomed to them, could approach the Indian elephants; and therefore the enemy's cavalry was ſoon put to the rout by them. Sometimes, by being pierced with darts, they became ſo enraged, as to turn upon their own men, treading vaſt numbers of the ſoldiers to death, which was their common method of deſtroying thoſe they attacked; though ſometimes with their trunk or proboſcis they diſpatched them. The Romans alſo ſometimes, by firing the caſtles on their backs, forced them to recoil upon their own troops, which, in ſuch a caſe, they did not fail of putting into diſorder. When this happened, the Carthaginians themſelves were obliged to kill them; which they did very expeditiouſly, by a method Aſdrubal diſcovered, and which we find deſcribed by Livy. Theſe are the principal points relating to the manner of fighting with elephants, particularly amongſt the Carthaginians, as far as we can collect from the authors, who have been the moſt explicit on this ſubject. The natural hiſtory of the elephant our readers may expect from us in another note (34).

(H) It may be collected from Polybius, that the town of Gorza was ſituated in the neighbourhood of Utica, and not far from the iſthmus or neck of land joining the peninſula, on which Carthage ſtood, to the continent of Africa, though the ſituation of it cannot be preciſely determined. It is probable the Punic name was Goza or place he twice overthrew the enemy, and had it in his power to have totally ruined them, he yet neglected to improve thoſe advantages, and even ſuffered the mercenaries to poſſeſs themſelves of the iſthmus, which joined the peninſula, on which Carthage ſtood, to the continent of Africa [d].

Hamilcar commands the Carthaginians in his room.

SUCH repeated miſtakes, which had almoſt proved fatal to the republic, highly diſpleaſed the Carthaginians, and induced them once more to place Hamilcar Barcas at the head of the forces. This could not but be extremely mortifying to Hanno, who had always been an inveterate enemy to the Barchine faction, and of courſe infuſe new life into Hamilcar and his adherents, who undoubtedly, during Hanno's influence, were excluded from all poſts in the adminiſtration. Hamilcar, in all reſpects, anſwered the high idea his countrymen had entertained of him. He marched againſt the enemy with an army of about ten thouſand men, horſe and foot, and ſeventy elephants, all the troops the Carthaginians could at that time aſſemble for their defence; which is a full proof of the great extremities to which they were then reduced. As Mathos, after he had made himſelf maſter of the iſthmus, had poſted proper detachments in two paſſes on two hills facing the continent, and guarded the bridge over the Bagrada, which, through Hanno's neglect, he had taken, Hamilcar ſaw little probability of engaging him upon equal terms, or indeed of coming at him. He was therefore obliged to have recourſe to a ſtratagem or Gaza, ſince the Greeks frequently inſerted the letter R or P in ſuch proper names, as appears from Bochart; and Gaza or Goza (a permutation of vowels eſpecially O and A, being very common in the Hebrew and Phœnician proper names, when written and pronounced by the Greeks) was the Carthaginian name of a town in Sicily, as well as the Phœnician name of a fortreſs in Paleſtine, or, as the prophet calls it, Peleſeth. Be this as it will, that not only Gaz or Goza, but likewiſe Chorſa or Gorza, is the Punic proper name of a place, cannot be denied, after a peruſal of Bochart. No author, either antient or modern, if we remember right, except Polybius in this paſſage, has ſo much as mentioned it (35).

tagem at this critical conjuncture, eſpecially as Mathos lay encamped with his army at a village near the bridge, and watched the enemy's motions with the utmoſt vigilance. Obſerving that, upon the blowing of certain winds, the mouth of the river was choaked up with ſand, which formed a kind of bar, and rendered the river paſſable, though with no ſmall difficulty, as long as thoſe winds continued, he halted for ſome time at the river's mouth, without communicating to any perſon his deſign. As ſoon as the wind favoured his intended project, he paſſed the river privately by night, without the leaſt oppoſition, neither his own men, nor the mercenaries, dreaming of any ſuch attempt. Immediately after his paſſage, he drew up the troops in order of battle, and advancing into the plain, where his elephants were capable of acting, moved towards Mathos, who was poſted at the village near the bridge. This action greatly redounded to Hamilcar's glory, being of ſo daring a nature, that it equally ſurpriſed the malecontents and the Carthaginians [e].

And defeats the mercenaries.

THE Africans being informed, that Hamilcar ſucceeded Hanno in the command of the Carthaginian army, that he had already paſſed the Bagrada, and was marching at the head of his forces to attack their camp, were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation. They very well knew, that they had now to deal not with a man of Hanno's genius, but with the greateſt captain of the age; a captain, from whom they themſelves had learned the art of war, and who was infinitely ſuperior to all their generals in every branch of it. However, Spendius, receiving intelligence of the enemy's motions, drew a body of ten thouſand men out of Matho's camp, with which he attended Hamilcar on one ſide, and ordered fifteen thouſand from Utica to obſerve him on the other, thinking by this means to ſurround the Carthaginians, and cut off both their army and general at one ſingle ſtroke. Hamilcar in the mean time advanced with great intrepidity, his troops being ranged in the following manner: the elephants were poſted in front, then came the cavalry, and after them the light-armed infantry, being ſupported by the targeteers, who brought up the rear. But obſerving the mercenaries to approach him with great temerity, though at the ſame time with reſolution, and as much confidence as if they had been ſure of victory, he changed his his order of battle in a precipitate manner, ſtill retiring before the enemy, as though he was afraid of them. This motion anſwered the end propoſed; for the mercenaries, looking upon it as the effect of fear, and conſequently as a tacit acknowledgment of their valour and ſuperiority, fell upon him with great fury, but without any diſcipline or order. Hamilcar therefore facing about in an inſtant, and his horſe behaving with extraordinary bravery, the enemy were ſoon put to flight; when meeting a body of their own men coming to their relief, and miſtaking them for the Carthaginians, they engaged them; upon which a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. In fine, Hamilcar gave the malecontents a total overthrow, in which they had ſix thouſand men killed, and two thouſand taken priſoners. The reſt fled, ſome to the town at the bridge, and others to the camp at Utica. Hamilcar did not give the enemy time to recover from their defeat, as Hanno before had done, but purſued them with great ardour to the village near the bridge before-mentioned; which he entered without oppoſition, the mercenaries flying in great confuſion to Tunes. Many towns, which had revolted to the enemy, terrified by this defeat, ſubmitted to the Carthaginians; others Hamilcar reduced by force. In ſhort, the Carthaginians, finding that Hamilcar had ſeized many of the enemy's advantageous poſts, were greatly animated by his conduct, and doubted not but he would ſoon put a happy concluſion to this deſtructive war [f].

Hamilcar aſſiſted by Naravaſus.

NOTWITHSTANDING theſe diſaſters, Mathos puſhed on the ſiege of Hippo with great vigour, and appointed Spendius and Autaritus, commander of the Gauls, with a ſtrong body of troops, to obſerve the motions of Hamilcar, adviſing them above all things to guard againſt a ſurprize; which, conſidering the abilities of that general, as well as his ſuperiority in horſe and elephants, was a very wholeſome admonition. At the ſame time, he ſolicited the Numidians and neighbouring Africans to ſend him a proper number of recruits, exhorting them to make their utmoſt efforts at the preſent juncture, which ſeemed to be the only opportunity left them of recovering their liberty, to aſſert their independency, and throw off the yoke of the Carthaginians. Spendius and Autaritus therefore, at the head of a choice detachment of ſix thouſand men, drawn out of the camp at Tunes, and two thouſand Gallic horſe, attended Hamilcar, approaching

ing him as near as they could with ſafety, and keeping cloſe to the ſkirts of the mountains, as they had been adviſed. At laſt Spendius, having received a ſtrong reinforcement of Africans and Numidians, and poſſeſſing himſelf of all the heights ſurrounding the plain, in which Hamilcar lay encamped, reſolved not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of attacking him. Accordingly he placed the Numidians in the rear and the Africans in front, whilſt he himſelf, with his firſt detachment, was reſolved to charge the enemy in flank; and having made this diſpoſition, boldly advanced towards the Carthaginians. Had a battle enſued, Hamilcar and his whole army muſt, in all human probability, have been totally ruined; but here his good fortune interpoſing, ſaved them both. It happened, that at that time one Naravaſus, a young Numidian nobleman, eminent for his perſonal merit, commanded a body of Numidians in the enemy's army. This nobleman, before the breaking out of the preſent war, had been a great promoter of the Carthaginian intereſt, on account of the friendſhip, that had ſubſiſted many years betwixt his father and that nation; and, being now charmed with the great worth of Hamilcar, was determined to renew his former good underſtanding with Carthage, and not ſuffer ſo brave a man to be ſacrificed. He therefore, with an hundred Numidian horſe, approached the Carthaginian lines, acquainting one of their advanced guards, that he had ſomething of importance to communicate to the general. As the Carthaginians ſhewed themſelves a little diffident of him, he immediately diſmounted, and, leaving his horſe and arms with the guard that eſcorted him, went directly to Hamilcar's tent, without the leaſt diſtruſt or ſuſpicion. He then informed Hamilcar, that he was well diſpoſed towards the Carthaginian nation in general, but that to contract a friendſhip with him, for whom he had the moſt profound veneration and eſteem, was the height of his ambition. Hamilcar, greatly admiring ſo generous, polite, and gallant an action, made him an equal return of gallantry, politeneſs, and generoſity. He made him his abſolute confident in all points whatſoever. He took him for his companion, imparting to him his moſt ſecret deſigns; and, to crown all, afterwards gave him his daughter in marriage. Upon the fame of this event, two thouſand Numidians came over in a body to Hamilcar, who, ſtrengthened by ſuch a ſeaſonable reinforcement, found himſelf in a condition to give Spendius and Autaritus battle. The fight was obſtinate and bloody, and the victory for a long time in

ſuſpenſe; but, the young Numidian moſt eminently diſtinguiſhing himſelf, and the Carthaginian elephants bearing down all before them, the mercenaries were at laſt entirely overthrown. Spendius and Autaritus eſcaped by flight, but left ten thouſand of their men dead upon the ſpot, beſides four thouſand taken priſoners. All the priſoners, who were willing to take on in the Carthaginian ſervice, Hamilcar received amongſt his troops, ſupplying them with the arms of the ſoldiers, who had fallen in the engagement. To the reſt he gave free liberty to go where-ever they pleaſed, on condition that they ſhould never for the future bear arms againſt the Carthaginians. However, he thought proper to acquaint them, that as many violators of this agreement as ſhould hereafter fall into his hands, muſt expect to ſuffer death without mercy [g].

The chiefs of the mercenaries guilty of great cruelty.

MATHOS, Spendius, and Autaritus, the chiefs of the malecontents, fearing that this affected lenity of Hamilcar might occaſion a defection among their troops, thought the only expedient left them to prevent it would be, to put them upon ſome action ſo execrable and ſhocking in its own nature, as ſhould deprive them of all hopes of ever being reconciled to the enemy. Accordingly, having aſſembled them in a formal manner, as though ſomething of moment was to have been imparted to them, a meſſenger, as had been before concerted, appeared with fictitious letters from the mercenaries in Sardinia, who had followed the example of the Africans, giving them advice of a ſecret deſign formed by ſome of their comrades, in conjunction with Giſco, to reſcue that general, and all his attendants, out of priſon at Tunes, where they had been ſo long detained. Spendius on this occaſion made a ſpeech to the ſoldiers, wherein he exhorted them not to be impoſed upon by Hamilcar's pretended clemency, ſince this was only intended for a bait to decoy their whole body into his hands, that he might take vengeance of them all at once. He further adviſed them to have a narrow eye upon Giſco; inſinuating, that the eſcape of an officer of ſuch influence and capacity might be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences. He had ſcarce finiſhed, when another courier arrived, as was given out, from Tunes, intimating, that the plot was upon the point of being carried into execution. Hereupon Autaritus, addreſſing himſelf to the ſoldiery, moved, in ſupport of what Spendius had advanced, that who-whoever ſhould ſhew any diſpoſition to repoſe the leaſt confidence in the Carthaginian promiſes or inſinuations, ſhould be deemed a traitor; and in fine, gave it as his opinion, that Giſco, and all the Carthaginians with him, ought immediately to be put to death. Autaritus, being very popular in the army, and ſuppoſed to have a perfect knowledge of the Carthaginians, as having reſided long amongſt them, and being a perfect maſter of their language, was liſtened to with great attention. His ſpeech in fine made ſuch an impreſſion, that the whole aſſembly expreſſed themſelves of the ſame ſentiments, though ſome of every nation joined in a petition, that as Giſco had been a common friend and benefactor to them all, he might be diſpatched without any torture; but the groſs of the army being compoſed of ſuch a variety of nations, and not underſtanding the matter of the petition, no regard was paid to it. In conformity therefore to that ſavage brutality ſo natural to them, the mercenaries firſt ſtoned to death all the priſoners they had taken from the Carthaginians in the late engagements, who were ſoon after interred by their relations; and then, at the command of Spendius, executed Giſco, and ſeven hundred Carthaginians with him, as the vileſt malefactors. Their heads were cut off, their bodies diſmembered, and afterwards thrown breathing into a hole prepared for them. The Carthaginians, being appriſed of theſe inhuman cruelties, were moſt ſenſibly touched with them, and ordered their generals to retaliate them upon the murderers with the utmoſt ſeverity. In the mean time, Hamilcar ſending an herald to demand the remains of his countrymen, in order to pay them the laſt ſad office, received for anſwer, that whoever preſumed hereafter to come upon that errand, ſhould meet with Giſco's fate. They moreover came to an immediate reſolution to treat all ſuch Carthaginians as ſhould fall into their hands with the ſame barbarity. As for their countrymen in the Carthaginian ſervice, who ſhould happen to be taken priſoners, they paſſed a decree, firſt to cut off their hands, and then ſend them to Carthage; which bloody reſolution they executed with great rigour and punctuality. Such infernal practices as theſe, ſo contrary to the laws of nature and all nations, can never be ſufficiently deteſted. However, as they are on one ſide ſufficient proofs of the more than ferine diſpoſition of the Africans, they may on the other likewiſe be conſidered sidered as strong intimations of Carthaginian oppression, since human nature, wicked as it is, seems scarce capable of such cruelties, except it be in the highest degree irritated and inflamed. This reflection, so naturally occurring to us from what has been just related, we could not avoid. As for others, a large field for which must necessarily open itself to all our curious and intelligent readers, we are obliged to pass them by untouched; at the same time observing, that a perusal of Polybius, in the point before us, will in a good measure supply our deficiency in this particular [h].

Utica and Hippacra revolt to the mercenaries.

HAMILCAR, being determined to revenge the barbarous treatment of his countrymen, ordered Hanno, who, it seems, at that time commanded a separate body, to join him, that they might act with the greater vigour against the enemy. In order to deter the malecontents from such enormous proceeding for the future, he threw all the prisoners that fell into his hands, to wild beasts, to be devoured by them, being convinced, that compassion served only to render them more fierce and untractable. And now, when the Carthaginians were just beginning, as it were, to breath, and recover their spirits, several unlucky accidents concurred again to depress them. By reason of a misunderstanding betwixt the generals, nothing could be undertaken against the enemy; a great supply of provisions and military stores, of which they were in extreme necessity, coming to them from Emporium by sea, were all cast away in a storm; Sardinia, which had always served them as a magazine in their greatest streights, was totally lost, as we shall hereafter have occasion to observe; and, to complete all their other misfortunes, they received intelligence of the defection of Utica and Hippacra, the two only cities which, till then, had preserved their allegiance, and always adhered inviolably to the republic, even when Agathocles and the Romans made their descents in Africa. The citizens, not satisfied with entering into an alliance with Mathos and Spendius, massacred the Carthaginian garrison, consisting of five hundred men, throwing their bodies over the walls; nay, to imitate their good allies in all their amiable qualities, they refused them burial, though the Carthaginians, by their embassadors, in most pressing terms desired this favour of them. The mercenaries, animated by by ſuch ſucceſs, advanced to the very walls of Carthage, with an intention to lay ſiege to that city [i].

Hiero aſſiſts the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginians, being appriſed of the diviſion betwixt their generals, and ſeeing the fatal effects of it, reſolved to ſeparate them, but left the determination of this point entirely to the army, who having had long experience of the great merit of Hamilcar, continued him in his command; upon which Hanno was recalled a ſecond time to Carthage, and Hannibal, an officer more agreeable to Hamilcar, ſent to ſupply his place. Upon Hannibal's arrival in the camp, affairs ſoon began to take a happy turn. There being now a perfect harmony betwixt the commanders, the operations were not clogged as formerly; they ſent out detachments to plunder and lay waſte the country, in order to cut off all ſubſiſtence from the enemy; which they happily effected, deſtroying or carrying off all the forage and proviſions. This, however, did not entirely relieve the garriſon of Carthage, which was reduced to great extremities. The Carthaginians therefore were obliged to have recourſe to their friends, and particularly to Hiero king of Syracuſe; who granted what was demanded of him, both now and throughout the whole courſe of this war. That prince, as Polybius obſerves, acted according to the maxims of true policy on this occaſion; ſince, if Carthage had been now deſtroyed, Rome would have had no rival to contend with in any future times, and therefore he himſelf might ſoon have lain at the mercy of the Romans, without a poſſibility of being relieved by any neighbouring power [k].

THEY alſo applied to the Romans for aſſiſtance at this critical juncture, though they had, ſince the concluſion of the laſt treaty, diſobliged them. At the beginning of this war, they ſeized upon ſeveral Roman veſſels trading to the coaſts of Africa, for ſupplying the enemy with military ſtores and proviſions, and detained the crews, conſiſting of five hundred men, in cuſtody. The Romans, being incenſed at this treatment, threatened the Carthaginians with their reſentment, if they did not releaſe the priſoners, and reſtore them their ſhips. The Carthaginians, either out of a principle of fear or generoſity, immediately ſent both the men men and ſhips to Rome, and that in ſo handſome a manner, as gave the Romans entire ſatisfaction. The Romans therefore, not to be behind-hand with them in point of politeneſs, at this time ſent them all the priſoners, that ſtill remained in their hands ſince the late war, without ranſom, ordered their merchants to aſſiſt Carthage with what it wanted, and prohibited all manner of commerce with the Africans. At the ſame time both the malecontents of Africa and Sardinia offered to ſubmit to them, and to put them into the immediate poſſeſſion both of Sardinia and the town of Utica; which overture they refuſed. Theſe inſtances of ſucceſs animating the Carthaginians, they bore the fatigues of the ſiege with great alacrity. In fine, Mathos and Spendius, being extremely haraſſed by Hamilcar, who, by ſtratagems and rencounters, daily cut off great numbers of their men, and ſo ſtreightened for want of proviſions, that they apprehended a ſpeedy famine, found themſelves obliged to abandon the ſiege [1].

[k] Idem ibid. & Zonar. ubi ſup.

Strange viciſſitudes of fortune.

NOTWITHSTANDING this diſgrace, the generals of the malecontents took the field with an army of fifty thouſand effective men, having been joined by one Zarxas, the head of an African hord or canton, with all his people capable of bearing arms. They watched Hamilcar's motions, but kept on the hills, carefully avoiding coming down into the plains, on account of Naravaſus's Numidian horſe and the Carthaginian elephants. Hamilcar, being much ſuperior to any of their generals in every branch of the military art, frequently outwitted them; ſometimes diſpoſſeſſing them of their advantageous poſts; at other times drawing them into ambuſcades; and often defeating them in rencounters, by which means he cut off abundance of their men. If any of their ſoldiers ſtraggled ever ſo little from the main body of the army, they certainly fell into his hands, and were thrown by him to wild beaſts, that he might, in ſome meaſure, retaliate the inhuman cruelty of Spendius. In ſhort, he haraſſed them a thouſand ways; which, as it greatly dejected them, ſo it inſpired his own troops with freſh courage and vigour. At laſt, he ſurpriſed them when they leaſt expected it, and ſhut them up in a poſt, which was ſo ſituated, that it was impoſſible for them to get out of it. Here he kept them ſtreightly beſieged, lying at eaſe in his camp, and being plentifully ſupplied with all kinds of of neceſſaries. The mercenaries, not daring to venture a battle, and finding themſelves not able to get off, began to fortify their camp, and ſurround it with ditches and entrenchments. Conſcious of their enormous guilt, they deſpaired of mercy, and therefore concluded it would be to no purpoſe to make any overtures to Hamilcar. They were ſoon ſo ſorely preſſed by famine, that they were obliged to eat one another; Divine Providence, ſays Polybius, thus avenging upon themſelves the inhumanity they had exerciſed on others. As they could not entertain the leaſt thought of peace, or of coming to an accommodation, after having been ſo deeply concerned in ſuch bloody ſcenes, and knew what puniſhments would be inflicted upon them, in caſe they fell alive into the hands of the enemy, they ſaw they had no reſource left, and therefore prepared themſelves for the meaſures deſpair ſhould dictate to them. The forces they looked for from Tunes came not to their aid as was expected, and the famine made daily large ſtrides amongſt them. They firſt found themſelves under the neceſſity of eating their priſoners, then their ſlaves, and laſt of all their comrades. Prompted therefore to it by the extremity of miſery they ſuffered, they inſiſted, that Spendius, Autaritus, and Zarxas, their leaders, ſhould in perſon make propoſals to Hamilcar, and to that end have a conference with him. Accordingly, having obtained a ſafe conduct from him, a treaty was agreed upon, and peace concluded, upon the following terms: That ten of the ringleaders of the malecontents ſhould be left entirely to the mercy of the Carthaginians; and that the troops ſhould all be diſarmed, every man retiring only in a ſingle coat. The treaty was no ſooner concluded, than Hamilcar ſeized upon the negotiators themſelves, by virtue of the firſt article, which favoured not a little of Punic ſubtlety. The army being informed, that their chiefs were under arreſt, and at the ſame time ignorant of the articles of the treaty, had immediately recourſe to arms, ſuſpecting that they were betrayed; but Hamilcar, drawing out his army in order of battle, immediately ſurrounded them, and either cut them to pieces, or trod them to death with his elephants. The place, where this bloody tragedy was acted, was called Prion (I).

(I) Polybius ſays this place was called Prion, from the ſimilitude its figure bore to that of a ſaw, the Greek word πρίων prion, ſignifying that inſtrument. But this notion, at firſt ſight, appears high-

The number of the wretches, who periſhed, amounted to above forty thouſand [m].

Mathos takes Hannibal priſoner, and crucifies him.

AFTER this complete victory, Hamilcar, Hannibal, and Naravaſus, ſcoured the country, and many of the revolted towns returned to their obedience. According to the plan of operations, Hamilcar, immediately inveſted Tunes, into which place Mathos (K) retired with all his remaining forces. Hannibal's quarter was on the road leading to Carthage, and Hamilcar's on the oppoſite ſide. The army was no ſooner encamped, than Hamilcar cauſed Spendius and the reſt of the priſoners, to be led out in view of the beſieged, and crucified near the walls. Mathos, by this, was appriſed of the fate he muſt expect to meet with, and therefore undoubtedly rendered much more attentive to his own defence. Obſerving, that Hannibal did not keep ſo good a guard as he ought, he ly improbable, not to ſay ridiculous; for, to omit the abſurdity of ſuppoſing this particular ſpot to reſemble a ſaw, how can it enter into any perſon's head, that the Carthaginians ſhould give Greek names to their towns and villages? All the other names of towns, this author mentions here, are apparently Punic or Phœnician; and therefore it is but reaſonable, nay natural, to conclude, that this muſt be ſo too. The word פרי peri or pri, fruit, is undoubtedly the original from whence Prion is to be deduced, ſince Bochart has demonſtrated ſome names of places near Carthage to have been derived from thence, and ſince many antient authors conſpire to evince, that this country abounded with ſpots of ground ſurpriſingly fruitful. Add to this, that the rabbinical word פרין prion ſignifies a garden; which, no doubt, is ſo called by the rabbins, on account of its fruitfulneſs or fertility. We cannot take upon us to affirm how near exactly this place was to Carthage; but, according to Polybius, it muſt have been in the neighbourhood of Tunes (36).

(K) Sir Walter Raleigh, M Rollin, &c. call this African captain Matho; whereas his true name is Mathos, ſince the original word in Polybius is ΜΑΘΩΣ. So ΑΘΩΣ, the proper name of a mountain in Maccedonia, in Latin and the modern languages is Athos Many other examples might be produced to ſupport what is here advanced (37).

he made a ſally, attacked his quarters, killed many of his men, took ſeveral priſoners, among whom was Hannibal himſelf, and plundered his camp. Taking the body of Spendius from the croſs on which it was fixed, he ſubſtituted Hannibal there in its place; and thirty Carthaginian priſoners of diſtinction, who all expired in exquiſite torture, were crucified round him; fortune, as Polybius expreſſes it, giving both ſides an opportunity of vying with each other in point of cruelty. Hamilcar being at ſome diſtance from his collegue, it was ſome time before his misfortune reached him, and the road betwixt them being impaſſable, had he received earlier intelligence of the ſituation of affairs on that ſide, he could not have moved with any expedition to his aſſiſtance. He therefore immediately decamped, and poſted himſelf along the ſea-coaſt, near the mouth of the river Bagrada [n].

THE Carthaginians were greatly terrified at this laſt diſaſter; however, they omitted no means neceſſary for their preſervation. They ſent thirty ſenators, with Hanno at the head of them, to conſult with Hamilcar about the proper meaſures to be taken for ſpeedily terminating this cruel and unnatural war, conjuring in the moſt preſſing manner Hanno to be reconciled to Hamilcar, and to ſacrifice his private reſentment to the public welfare. This, with ſome difficulty, was complied with, and the two generals came to a full reſolution to act in concert for the good of the republic. The ſenate at the ſame time ordered all the youth capable of bearing arms, to be preſſed into the ſervice, by which means a ſtrong reinforcement being ſent to Hamilcar, he ſoon found himſelf in a condition to act offenſively; ſo that the Carthaginian affairs began to have a better aſpect. Hamilcar defeated the enemy in all his rencounters with them, drew Mathos into frequent ambuſcades, and gave him one notable overthrow near Leptis. This reduced him to the neceſſity of hazarding a deciſive battle with the Carthaginians, which proved fatal to him. The leaders on both ſides animated their troops, as going to decide their reſpective fates; upon which an engagement immediately enſued. Victory was not long in ſuſpenſe, the mercenaries flying almoſt upon the firſt onſet. Moſt of their army fell upon the field of battle, and in the purſuit, Mathos, with a few, eſcaping to a neighbouring town, where he was taken, and carried alive to Carthage.

[n] Idem. ibid.

All the revolted towns, except Utica, and Hippo, which had behaved in such a manner, as to exclude themselves from all hopes of mercy, returned to their duty upon this defeat. Hamilcar, sitting down before those cities, soon reduced them and thereby concluded this war. Mathos, having adorned the public triumph, was led to execution, and finished, by a painful and ignominious death, a life, that had been polluted with the blackest treasons and unparallelled barbarities. From the excesses of cruelty committed in it, Polybius tells us, that this war generally went amongst the Greeks by the name of the inexpiable war. The same excellent author from hence remarks, that those states must be exposed to the greatest dangers, which hire for their defence a body of foreigners, who are not attached to them either by interest or affection °.

The Romans extort Sardinia and a vast sum from the Carthaginians.

During the Libyan war, the mercenaries in Sardinia declared against the Carthaginians, excited thereto by the example of Mathos and Spendius in Africa. They seized upon the person of Bostar, who commanded in the citadel of Olbia, and massacred both him and the Carthaginian garrison. The senate, apprised of this, sent one Hanno, with a strong reinforcement of troops, to bring the mutineers to reason. Hanno, upon his arrival, was abandoned by his men, who joined the mercenaries, and soon after not only crucified him, but put to the sword all the Carthaginians they could meet with in the island, and possessed themselves of all the strong places there, though, in a short time they were expelled from thence by the natives, and forced to take shelter in Italy. The Romans, notwithstanding the friendship they had lately expressed for the Carthaginians, gave countenance and protection to these fugitives, and thereby greatly deviated from those maxims of justice and honour their own writers celebrate them so much for. In fine, they sent the consul Sempronius, on trifling pretences, with a fleet, to reinstate those malecontents, and take possession of Sardinia; which the Carthaginians, being now in a manner exhausted, were obliged to cede to them. Not content with this iniquitous act, they obliged the Carthaginians to defray the expence of their armament, and besides extorted from them a sum of twelve hundred talents. Such a perfidious conduct as this could not fail of heightening the averſion Hamilcar had already conceived to them, and did not a little contribute to the ſecond Punic war, and to thoſe dreadful devaſtations, which Hannibal afterwards committed in Italy [p].

POLYBIUS tells us, that when the Carthaginians made preparations to reduce Sardinia, the Romans pretended to be under terrible apprehenſions of their power, as though theſe preparations had been intended to ſubvert their republic; and therefore from hence took occaſion to declare war againſt them. This plainly demonſtrates, that the Romans at that time were determined to ſtick at nothing, in order to gratify their ambition, and that they had then a refined genius for villainy. The motives that prompted them to act in a friendly manner towards Carthage, when that ſtate was in danger of being overturned by its rebellious ſubjects, were undoubtedly far different from the ſpecious pretext they offered to impoſe upon the world, viz. a principal of honour. They probably conſidered, that if the Carthaginians were reduced to the laſt gaſp by the barbarians, with whom they were then engaged in war, they would, by a little kindneſs, be induced to ſubmit to them at ſo critical a conjuncture. They likewiſe, in all probability, were afraid, that the mercenaries would find their way again into Sicily, where they had behaved with ſuch bravery, could they have made themſelves maſters of Carthage, and have diſlodged them from thence; both or either of which conſiderations were ſufficient to determine their conduct as above related. Be this as it will, that the friendly offices the Romans did the Carthaginians in the time of their great diſtreſs were the reſult of political views, and did not proceed from any noble or generous ſentiments, is abundantly evident, not only from their ſubſequent conduct, but even from ſeveral hints given us by their own prejudiced hiſtorians [q].

The faithleſs dealings of Rome with Carthage.

IN order, no doubt, to palliate the conduct of the Romans on this occaſion, we are told by ſome of their writers, that, by the treaty concluded at the end of the firſt Punic war, the Carthaginians made a ceſſion of Sardinia, as well as Sicily, to the Romans. But, notwithſtanding the authority of theſe writers, this is utterly improbable; for, if ſo, why did not the Romans take immediate poſſeſſion of it, ſince the Carthaginians were too weak to oppoſe them, otherwiſe they would not have made peace upon ſuch advantageous terms? And that they did not take poſſeſſion of it, is evident from Polybius, an author infinitely ſuperior to thoſe here hinted at, when he aſſures us, that the mercenary troops in that iſland rebelled againſt their maſters the Carthaginians. But what ſerves ſufficiently to explain the diſpoſition of the Romans towards the Carthaginians, is an incident that happened ſoon after, viz. the rebellion of the Corſi, Sardi, and Ligurians, which the Romans pretended to have been fomented by the Carthaginians, in order to have an opportunity of picking a quarrel with that nation, though Hanno, a young Carthaginian lord, by his great ſpirit and vivacity, parried the blow. However, ſome time after, without any tolerable colour or pretext, they aſſumed to themſelves the power of preſcribing limits to the Carthaginian conqueſts in Spain, obliging Aſdrubal to engage himſelf by treaty not to paſs the Iberus. Such points of conduct need no comment; they render moſt glaring the motives the juſt and upright Romans acted upon [r].

Hamilcar marches into Spain.

HAMILCAR, by the happy concluſion of the Libyan war, did not only reſtore tranquillity to the republic, but greatly extended the Carthaginian conqueſts in Africa. Finding his country not in a condition to enter into an immediate war with Rome, he formed a ſcheme to put it upon a level with that imperious republic, which was, to make an entire conqueſt of Spain, that the Carthaginians might have troops capable of coping with the Romans. In order to facilitate the execution of this ſcheme, he inſpired both his ſon-in-law Aſdrubal and his ſon Hannibal with an implacable averſion to the Romans, the great blaſters of his and his country's grandeur. Aſdrubal did not live to be a ſcourge to the Romans; but Hannibal brought that proud nation to the very brink of deſtruction. Immediately after the troubles in Africa were appeaſed, the ſenate ſent Hamilcar upon an expedition againſt the Numidians, notwithſtanding his ſon-in-law Naravaſus was of that nation; which renders it probable, that the Carthaginians had an intention intention to puniſh them for joining their diſcontented mercenaries. Be that as it will, Hamilcar gave freſh proofs of his courage and abilities in this expedition, ſince, by his valour and conduct, he finiſhed it ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the republic, that the command of the army deſtined to act againſt Spain was given him. Hannibal his ſon, at that time but nine years of age, begged, with the utmoſt importunity, to attend him on this occaſion, for that purpoſe employing all the ſoothing arts ſo common to children of his age, and which have ſo much power over a loving father. Hamilcar therefore granted his requeſt; but ordered him to put his hand upon the altar, and ſwear, that he would be an irreconcileable enemy to the Romans, and act as ſuch as ſoon as his age would permit him. He likewiſe took with him Aſdrubal, after he had beſtowed his daughter in marriage upon him. Nepos intimates, that he was obliged to this ſtep, becauſe the cenſor took Aſdrubal from him, upon a report, that he was more familiar with that youth than was conſiſtent with modeſty. However, that biographer at the ſame time inſinuates this report to have been a calumny, and tells us, that, by the Carthaginian laws, it was not permitted any perſon to ſeparate the ſon-in-law from the father-in-law. The military preparations being completed, Hamilcar advanced with a powerful army to Abyla (L), and croſſing the ſtreights of Hercules, landed in Spain without oppoſition. He began the operations by incurſions into the enemy's country, fixing his head-quarters at Gades, now Cadiz, the capital of the Carthaginian acquiſitions in Spain. According to Appian and Polybius, he had two views in this war: firſt, to put Carthage in a ſituation to revenge the indignities received from the Romans; and ſecondly, to have an opportunity of being abſent from home, the Carthaginian ſtate being at that time miſerably diſtracted by two potent factions, over one of which preſided Hanno, Hamilcar's inveterate enemy.

(L) Abyla, the pillar of Hercules on the African ſide, is oppoſite to the other in Spain called Calpe. They are both conſiderable mountains, and have a narrow ſea betwixt them, called anciently Fretum Herculeum, the ſtreights of Hercules, but, by the moderns, the ſtreights of Gibraltar. Marcianus Heracleota, Silius Italicus, and others, take particular notice of them (38).

enemy. However, by the great ſucceſs he met with, and the vaſt reputation he had already acquired, he animated his friends at home, enabling them to carry every point there, and would undoubtedly have come ſoon to blows with the Romans, had not death prevented his deſign from taking effect[s] (M).

(M) According to Diodorus Siculus, after his landing in Spain, he reduced the city of Tarteſſus, and gave a memorable defeat to Iſtolatius, general of the Celtes and Iberians, putting a great number of his men, together with himſelf and his brother, to the ſword. Many of the Celtic nobility likewiſe periſhed in the action. Out of the priſoners Hamilcar ſelected three thouſand, whom he incorporated with his own troops. But Indortes, one of the Celtic or Iberian general officers, collecting the remains of the army, and receiving a conſiderable reinforcement, aſſembled a body of fifty thouſand men, with which he intended to give Hamilcar battle. However, his men, conſiſting partly of veterans terrified by the laſt overthrow, and partly of new-raiſed levies, fled, upon the firſt appearance of the enemy, to a neighbouring eminence, where the Carthaginians ſurrounded them, and for ſome time cloſely beſieged them. Indortes, by a ſtratagem, and by the favour of the night, found means to make his eſcape; but the greateſt part of his army was either cut off, or obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. At laſt Indortes himſelf fell into Hamilcar's hands, who, according to the ſame author, firſt put out his eyes, and then, after many inſults, crucified him. But this we can ſcarcely give credit to, ſince it is ſo inconſiſtent with the character of that general, as given us by Polybius, except we will ſuppoſe, that this Indortes had been guilty of ſome monſtrous piece of cruelty towards the Carthaginians. Ten thouſand Celtic and Iberian priſoners, that would not take on in the Carthaginian ſervice, Diodorus likewiſe tells us, Hamilcar ſet at liberty without ranſom; which countenances the ſuppoſition juſt hinted at. Many cities he alſo reduced, partly by force, and partly by compoſition; and had probably made a vaſt progreſs, had he not received an expreſs from Carthage, with advice, that a part of Numidia had rebelled againſt the Carthaginians. This obliged him to weaken his army, by ſending a ſtrong detachment, under his ſon-in-law Aſdrubal, to reduce the rebels. Aſdrubal ſoon obliged them to return to their duty, after having put eight thouſand of them to the ſword, and taking two thouſand priſoners. In the mean time, Hamilcar made himſelf maſter of ſeveral towns, and built

This he diſtributed in the moſt politic manner, partly amongſt the troops, and partly amongſt the great men at Carthage; by which means he ſecured his intereſt with both thoſe powerful bodies. We have received no particular detail of the actions he was concerned in, during the term above-mentioned, to be depended upon, only an account of that wherein he fell. The Vettones or Vectones, a nation of Luſitania, being incenſed at the devaſtations committed in their country by the Carthaginians, drew out all their forces, with an intention to give Hamilcar battle. They were joined by many other petty nations, with their reguli at the head of them, who had built a large city from its ſituation called by the Greeks Acra Leuca, or the White citadel. Some time afterwards he laid ſiege to Helice with part of his army, putting the reſt into winter-quarters at Acra Leuca. Oriſſon, prince of the country, being informed, that Hamilcar had ſent the beſt part of his army, and all his elephants, to Acra Leuca, advanced with his forces towards the Carthaginians, pretending, that he came with a deſign to join them, and thereby facilitate the conqueſt of the remaining part of the country. Hamilcar, giving too much credit to him, was ſurpriſed, his body of troops before the town utterly ruined, himſelf obliged to fly one way, and his ſons Aſdrubal and Hannibal another, that they might not all fall into the enemy's hands. The two laſt arrived at Acra Leuca, Hamilcar only being purſued by Oriſſon; but the purſuit was ſo hot, that he was obliged to atempt paſſing a rapid river, in the midſt of which, by the violence of the ſtream, he was forced from his horſe, and drowned. This is the account given by Diodorus Siculus, which abounds with ſo many improbable particulars, and is ſo contradictory to the character of that excellent general, as given us even by that author himſelf, that no great ſtreſs is to be laid upon it. However, we muſt deſire our readers to obſerve, that the fragments of this uſeful and excellent author are not, for the moſt part, of equal authority with that part of the body of his hiſtory preſerved to us, being much more corrupted, and conſequently ſtanding in need of many more emendations. That this is true of the fragment we have here given our readers a tranſlation of, will appear from an attentive peruſal of it, ſince its parts do not hang together in a proper manner (39).

had been plundered and laid under contribution in the ſame manner. To compaſs their end, they made uſe of the following ſtratagem: they ſent before them a vaſt number of waggons filled with faſcines, pitch, ſulphur, and other ſuch-like combuſtible materials, and drawn by oxen, their troops following under arms, and marching in battle-array. The Carthaginians at firſt ridiculed this ſeemingly coarſe ſtratagem? but at laſt the Spaniards, upon their approaching Hamilcar, ſet fire to theſe vehicles, driving the beaſts amongſt the enemy, who ſoon found themſelves obliged to quit their ranks. The Vettones and their allies, obſerving this, charged them with ſuch bravery, that they ſoon put them to flight, killing many upon the ſpot, amongſt whom was the general himſelf. This relation we have extracted from Appian, Nepos, Frontinus, and Zonaras; but muſt own, that moſt, if not all, the circumſtances of it are omitted by Polybius. That excellent hiſtorian only tells us in general, that Hamilcar came to an end worthy his exalted character, dying glorioufly in the field of battle at the head of his troops. And indeed was not Polybius's authority ſufficient to ſupport him in the point before us, yet the nature of the thing plainly enough confutes the other writers; for is it poſſible to imagine, that ſo expert and famed a general as Hamilcar, a general who was ſo perfect a maſter of the military art, who, by an infinity of the moſt refined ſtratagems, had ſo frequently outwitted the greateſt captains of the age, ſhould at laſt be over-reached by ſo mean an artifice? This, we ſay, is incompatible with the character of that commander, as given us by Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and even theſe very authors themſelves; for which reaſon we muſt caution our readers not to be over-haſty in giving their aſſent to it. Upon Hamilcar's death, the army elected his ſon-in-law Aſdrubal, then the Carthaginian admiral, to ſucceed him [t] (N).

THE ſenate, being appriſed of the choice the army had made, after they had confirmed it, ſent a ſtrong reinforcement of troops to Aſdrubal, to enable him not only to preſerve, but to extend, their conqueſts. As the new general had been trained up in the art of war by Hamilcar, under whom he had ſerved ſo many campaigns, the people in general entertained an high idea of him, though Hanno and his adherents did their utmoſt to depreciate his merit. Aſdrubal anſwered their expectations, behaving with ſuch wiſdom and addreſs, as enabled him to ſupport Hamilcar's friends both at Carthage and in the army. To ſecure his predeceſſor's acquiſitions, he built a city, which, by the advantage of its ſituation, the commodiouſneſs of its harbours, its fortifications, and flow of wealth, which its great commerce produced, became afterwards one of the moſt conſiderable cities in the world. Some people, at that time, called it the New city, others Carthage, nothing being more common in that age, as well as many of the preceding, than to denominate new-built cities after the names of thoſe to which their founders belonged. It is known at this day by the name of Carthagena, from whence one of the principal fortreſſes of the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies at preſent is ſo called [u].

of fifty thouſand foot, all veteran troops, ſix thouſand horſe, and two hundred elephants, to attack Oriſſon, whom, after a bloody conteſt, he entirely defeated, cutting to pieces a great part of his forces. Twelve cities, in conſequence of his victory, immediately ſurrendered to him, and ſoon after all the others in Spain, that remained unſubdued. Having had ſuch a happy run of ſucceſs, to crown all, he married a Spaniſh prince's daughter; which ſecured his conqueſts to him. As this fragment is a continuation of the preceding, ſome particulars in it are of a very dubious authority; and indeed our readers themſelves will eaſily perceive this, upon their peruſal of it, though others, that agree with the moſt approved authors, will, without any ſcruple, be admitted (40).

(40) Diod. Sic. ubi ſup.

The great progress of Asdrubal in Spain is checked by the Romans.

THE Romans, receiving intelligence of the great progress the Carthaginians made in Spain, began to have a watchful eye over them. They could not but imagine, that both Hamilcar and Asdrubal had something more grand in view than the reduction of Spain; and had formed a remote design, vast in its nature, which they proposed gradually putting in execution. They were not long at a loss to find out whom this must be levelled at, as easily discovering, that their republic was, of all other states, the most diametrically opposite in point of views and interest to that of the Carthaginians. As they took for granted, that their rivals never lost sight of their grand scheme, though the execution of it might be at a great distance, they began to reproach themselves for their indolence and sloth, which had thrown them into a kind of lethargy, especially as the Carthaginians now, with the utmost rapidity, pushed on their conquests in Spain, which might one day be turned against them. They however, at this juncture, seemed afraid of coming to an open rupture with them, on account of the apprehensions they were under of an invasion from the Gauls, who, according to common fame, were advancing with a formidable army to the very gates of Rome. At present therefore they judged it expedient to have recourse to milder methods; and, in conformity to their plan, partly by menaces, and partly by persuasion, prevailed upon Asdrubal to conclude a new treaty with them. The articles of it were, 1. That the Carthaginians should not pass the Iberus. 2. That Saguntum, a colony of Zacynthians; and a city between the Iberus and that part of Spain subject to the Carthaginians, as well as the other Greek colonies there, should enjoy their antient rights and privileges. The Saguntines afforded the Romans something of a pretext for this unjustifiable procedure, since they implored the protection of Rome, which republic, they heard, was superior in power to that of Carthage, and kept a curb upon it. Zonaras intimates, that about this time the Carthaginians had formed a design of attacking the Romans, but were by that people terrified into a pacific disposition. Asdrubal took care not to pass beyond the limits stipulated by the treaty, though he still pushed on his conquests, and made himself master of all that part of Spain extending from the western ocean to the Iberus, within five days journey of the Pyrenees. He made it his endeavour to render himself himſelf popular amongſt the reguli of Spain, by his engaging addreſs and affable deportment. His endeavours were not unſucceſsful; for, by his perſuaſive methods, he brought over more effectually thoſe reguli to the intereſt of Carthage, than he could have done by force of arms. He did not fail, however, exerting himſelf ſometimes in a military way, tho' the other was, in the main, the moſt effectual. Having governed the Carthaginian dominions in Spain eight years, he was treacherouſly murdered by a Gaul, whoſe maſter he had put to death. The murder was perpetrated in public; and the aſſaſſin, being ſeized by the guards, and put to the torture, expreſſed ſo ſtrong a ſatisfaction in the thoughts of his having executed his revenge ſo ſucceſsfully, that he ſeemed to inſult all the terror of his torments. This, however, notwithſtanding the youth of Hannibal, occaſioned no revolution in the ſtate of affairs [w].

Asdrubal ſends for Hannibal.

Asdrubal, three years before his death, had written to Carthage, to deſire, that Hannibal, then twenty-two years of age, might be ſent to him. Hanno, the inveterate enemy of the Barchine family, oppoſed this with all his might, repreſenting, in a moſt ill-natured ſpeech to the ſenate, handed down to us by Livy, that this was entirely improper. The ſubſtance of it was, "that though Aſdrubal's requeſt ſeemed "in itſelf reaſonable, yet he could, by no means, give his "conſent to it." "Aſdrubal," ſaid he, "accompanied "Hamilcar in his expeditions, ſpent the flour of his youth "with him, and was abuſed by him; and now he would "have young Hannibal in the ſame manner ſubſervient to "him. This ought not to be granted." "Beſides," added he, "this young man has all the pride and thirſt after "arbitrary power of the Barchine family transfuſed into him. "Inſtead therefore of putting him at the head of the army, "where he will be, in a manner, maſter of all our properties, he ought to be kept under the eye of the magiſtrates, "and the power of the laws, that he may learn obedience, "and a modeſty, which ſhould teach him to look upon himſelf as on a level with other men." He concluded with obſerving, "that this ſpark might one day riſe to a conflagration, which would occaſion the ruin of the republic." However, the Barchine faction prevailed, and Hannibal was ſent to the army in Spain [x].

Hannibal very popular amongst the troops.

HANNIBAL, upon his first arrival in the camp, discovered indications of an extraordinary courage and greatness of mind. He drew upon himself the eyes of the whole army, who fancied they saw Hamilcar his father survive in him. From his first appearance in the army, every one perceived, that he meditated a war against the Romans, which was considered as the effect of his father's disposition. The great resemblance he bore to Hamilcar rendered him extremely agreeable to the army; but his personal good qualities endeared him still more to them. Every talent and qualification he seemed to possess, that can contribute towards constituting the great man. His patience in labour was invincible, his temperance surprising, his courage in the greatest dangers intrepid, his presence of mind in the heat of battle admirable, and his disposition equally suited to command or obey. This could not but render him the darling both of the officers and soldiers. Under Asdrubal he made three campaigns, that general always employing him in enterprizes of the greatest importance, as thinking him the best qualified for the execution of them. The soldiers likewise reposed the utmost confidence in him, esteeming him superior to all the other commanders in conduct and personal bravery, though he was then but in the twenty-third year of his age. In short, after Asdrubal's death, the army immediately saluted him general, with the highest demonstrations of joy, and the sincerest attachment to his person; and the senate, as well as people of Carthage, confirmed this election, in a manner that shewed them to have been entirely at his devotion; though it must be owned, Hanno and his faction were secretly averse to him. He had no sooner taken upon him the command of the troops, being then in the twenty-sixth year of his age, than he made the proper dispositions to prosecute the war with vigour, having the pleasure to find all the officers approve of the plan of operations he proposed to them [y].

Elected general after the death of Asdrubal.

As the suffrages, both of the army and republic, concurred to raise Hannibal to the supreme command upon the death of Asdrubal, he must, of course, have been extremely popular at Carthage. It is therefore probable, that about the time of his being elected general, or soon after, to heighten his credit and authority, he was advanced to the first dignity of the state, that that of one of the ſuffetes, which was ſometimes conferred upon generals. In ſupport of this notion, Cornelius Nepos informs us, that Hannibal was choſen prætor of Carthage, upon the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, twenty-two years after he had been nominated king there; which brings that event pretty near the period we are now upon [z].

HANNIBAL had no ſooner taken upon him the command of the forces, than he put himſelf in motion. As though Italy had been the province allotted him, and he had been appointed to make war upon the Romans, he turned ſecretly his whole views to that country, and loſt no time, for fear of being prevented by death, as his father and brother-in-law had been. Though he was determined to attack Saguntum, he thought it at preſent more expedient not to ſeem to have an eye directly upon that place, but to reduce ſome provinces, that would facilitate the conqueſt of it, believing the Romans could not from thence penetrate his deſigns. Accordingly he marched againſt the Olcades, a nation not far diſtant from the Iberus, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of Althæa, their capital; upon which all their other towns immediately ſubmitted. All the plunder taken in this expedition he diſtributed amongſt the troops, which greatly animated them, and then retired to new Carthage, where he put them into winter-quarters. Here he ſoon after paid the army all their arrears; by which the ſoldiers became in ſuch a manner attached to him, that they were abſolutely at his devotion. This firſt inſtance of ſucceſs rendered his name terrible to the neighbouring nations of Spain, who were not in a ſtate of amity with Carthage [a]. Hannibal conquers the Olcades,

THE next campaign he opened with the ſiege of Salmantica, and ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of it. Then he advanced to Arbucala, which, being a place of great ſtrength, very populous, and defended by a numerous garriſon, made a vigorous reſiſtance; but was at laſt forced to ſurrender. Soon after this event, ſome fugitives, who had made their eſcape out of Salmantica, before it was obliged to capitulate, joining a body of the Olcades, excited the Carpetani, one of the moſt powerful nations in Spain, to declare againſt the Carthaginians. Their army amounted to an hundred thouſand fighting men, with which they propoſed to attack Hannibal in his return from the country of the Vaccæi, which, it ſeems, he ſubdued this And the Vaccæi.

He gives the Spaniards a great overthrow, and subdues the Carpetani.

HANNIBAL, being informed of the enemies design, and knowing himself to be much inferior to them, was determined to avoid a battle, which he had great reason to imagine would prove fatal to him. In order to this, he moved with the utmost prudence and circumspection, covering himself with the Tagus in such a manner, that the Spaniards could not come at him. At last he passed it in the dead-time of the night with his whole army, the enemy not entertaining the least suspicion of such an attempt. The Spaniards interpreted this as a flight, and therefore, looking upon themselves as invincible, they immediately resolved to pursue him, and, in consequence of this resolution, passed the river without any order or discipline. This was what Hannibal wanted; and, as he had foreseen it, he disposed his army in a proper manner to fall upon them when in the midst of the river. Forty elephants he posted on the bank, and ordered his horse to charge the Spanish infantry, as soon as they were advanced into the middle of the stream. The Carthaginian cavalry, being well mounted, kept their post firm, notwithstanding the rapidity of the torrent; whereas the enemy's foot were borne down by it, and besides, entering the water in a straggling disorderly manner, they were incapable of making any resistance. Great numbers of them therefore were cut to pieces in the water, without opposition, by Hannibal's horse, and others, that landed, trod to death by his elephants. Most of those who collected themselves into a body upon this disaster, and strove to gain the opposite bank, were charged by Hannibal himself, at the head of his Carthaginian phalanx, with which he had entered the water for that purpose, and, for the most part, either cut to pieces, or drowned. Hannibal, after this, laid waste the whole country of the Carpetani, who, terrified by so great a defeat, thought proper to submit to the conqueror. Nothing now remained but Saguntum to give any obstruction to the Carthaginian arms [c].

And meditates the siege of Saguntum.

THE Carthaginian general, however, thought the season was not yet come for him to lay siege to that city, and therefore did not, for some time, approach it, carefully avoiding every thing that might occasion a rupture with the Romans. His intention was to furnish himself with all things necessary for so important an enterprize before he entered upon it, according cording to the advice he had received from his brother-in-law Aſdrubal. In conſequence of which, he puſhed on his conqueſts, in a manner, to the very gates of Saguntum, and, by his ſingular addreſs, took care to ſecure theſe conqueſts, before he gave the Romans an opportunity of declaring war againſt the Carthaginians [d].

The Saguntines apply to the Romans for relief.

In the mean time, the Saguntines, being greatly alarmed at the continued ſucceſſes of Hannibal, did not know how to avoid the impending ſtorm, any otherwiſe than by appriſing the Romans of what had happened in Spain, and applying to them for ſpeedy relief. They therefore diſpatched deputies in all haſte to Rome, to inform the ſenate of the great progreſs made by Hannibal in Spain, and to deſire immediate ſuccours againſt him. What induced them chiefly to take this ſtep was, an attempt Hannibal made to embroil them with their neighbours the Turdetani, or, according to Appian, the Torboletæ, that, by eſpouſing the intereſt of that people, he might be enabled to pick a quarrel with them. Appian intimates, that the Torboletæ made excurſions upon the Saguntine territories, where they committed great depredations. As ſoon as the Saguntine deputies arrived at Rome, and communicated their meſſage to the ſenate, all the members of that illuſtrious aſſembly expreſſed a prodigious concern for their Spaniſh allies, and came to a reſolution to ſend embaſſadors to Hannibal, to expoſtulate with him about his conduct, with orders, in caſe he did not give ear to their complaints, to proceed directly to Carthage, and inſiſt upon that republic's withdrawing its troops from the territories of their confederates in Spain. But this reſolution not being preſently executed, whilſt the Romans were amuſing themſelves with frivolous conſultations, advice was brought, that Hannibal had not only paſſed the Iberus, but actually inveſted Saguntum. The ſenators were divided in their ſentiments on this occaſion: ſome were for coming to a vigorous reſolution, and ſending one of the conſuls, with a powerful army, to Africa, and the other to Spain; others were for employing the whole force of the republic in driving Hannibal out of Spain; and laſtly, others gave it as their opinion, that nothing ſhould be undertaken againſt Carthage, till all pacific methods had been tried, and no redreſs could be had but by force of arms. This motion, being the moſt ſafe, as well as rational and equitable, prevailed; and accordingly P. Valerius

Hannibal besieges Saguntum.

In the mean time, Hannibal pushed on the siege of Saguntum, promising himself great advantages from the reduction of that place. He was convinced, that this would enable him to put his favourite scheme in execution, and even accomplish it; that he should deprive the Romans of all means of carrying the war into Spain; that this new conquest would serve as a barrier to the old ones; that no enemy would be left behind him, a circumstance which would render him much more secure and unmolested; that he should there find treasure sufficient to defray the expence of his projected war with the Romans; that the plunder of the city would inspire his soldiers with greater ardour, and make them follow him with the utmost alacrity; and that, lastly, thereby he should win the people of Carthage over to his interest. These considerations had such an effect upon him, that he was present at all the works, conducted every particular measure in the siege, and exposed himself to the greatest dangers, as much as the meanest soldier. With the commencement of this siege we shall conclude this section, and begin our next with an account of the reduction of Saguntum, which was the immediate cause of the second Punic war [f].

SECT. VII.

The hiſtory of the Carthaginians, from the beginning of the ſecond Punic war, to the deſtruction of Carthage by Æmilianus.

THE conſul Lutatius, at the concluſion of the firſt Punic war, had behaved with ſuch inſolence to Hamilcar Barcas, when, for ſome time, he inſiſted, that the Carthaginian troops, under his command, ſhould deliver up their arms to the Romans, and even paſs under the jugum, that the Carthaginian general, from that moment probably, conceived an averſion to him, and his whole nation. Nothing could have been more inconſiſtent with true magnanimity and greatneſs of ſoul, than ſuch a conduct, and conſequently more diſagreeable to a perſon of heroic and generous ſentiments. Hamilcar therefore could not but deeply reſent an action ſo infamous in its nature, and look upon the people countenancing it as void of honour, as ſtrangers to all thoſe amiable qualities, from which military virtue is inſeparable. That this notion is founded upon truth, ſufficiently appears from Cornelius Nepos, who tells us, that Hamilcar profeſſed he would rather die, than return home loaded with the ignominy a compliance with ſuch a propoſal muſt fix upon him. We may therefore conclude this to have been a remote cauſe of the ſecond Punic war [a]. The remote cauſes of the ſecond Punic war.

HAMILCAR likewiſe condemned himſelf for having ſo tamely given up Sicily to the Romans. Being endued with that greatneſs of ſoul ſo natural to a true lover of his country, he reflected, with the utmoſt regret, upon that action, which, in every light, he conſidered as diſhonourable, and too precipitate. This undoubtedly excited him to meditate revenge upon that nation, which occaſioned ſo falſe a ſtep, and conſequently determined him to embrace the firſt opportunity that offered of attacking the Romans [b].

BUT what the moſt effectually contributed to the war we are going to enter upon, was the injuſtice of the Romans, who, taking advantage of the weakneſs of the Carthaginians, after the Libyan war was terminated, diſpoſſeſſed that nation of Sardinia, and extorted a vaſt ſum of money from them. The great ſucceſs of the Carthaginians in Spain likewiſe heightened the animoſity betwixt the two ſtates, and conſequently diſpoſed both of them to a rupture. The train therefore for a bloody conteſt betwixt them was laid before the ſiege of Saguntum [c].

THE ceſſion of Sardinia to the Romans, and the payment of the vaſt ſums to that rapacious nation, in compliance with their unjuſt demands, after Carthage had been ſo drained by the Libyan war, incenſed Hamilcar Barcas, or, as ſome call him, Boccor, to the laſt degree. He ſaw that there was no end of ſuch extortions, and therefore came to a full reſolution, not only to endeavour at ſecuring his country from ſuch depredations for the future, but even to take ample vengeance of the Romans for their perfidious conduct in this particular. He therefore inſpired his four ſons, Aſdrubal, Hannibal, Hamilcar, and Mago, with an implacable hatred to that proud republic, which was the object of his averſion, declaring publicly, that he looked upon them as four lions whelps brought up for the deſtruction of the Romans. Hannibal only ſurvived nearly to execute the vaſt project his father had formed, and probably was the only one of them endued with a genius fit for the execution of it. From hence it appears, that the grand ſpring, which ſet Carthage in motion againſt Rome at this juncture, was the diſpoſition Hamilcar had transfuſed into his family, as well as the majority of the citizens of Carthage [d].

HAMILCAR's reſentment therefore may be looked upon as the chief impulſive cauſe of the ſecond Punic war. That great general was of too heroic a ſpirit, and too ſtrongly attached to the intereſt of his country, not to make uſe of all proper means to reſtore it to its former grandeur. As this could not be done without humbling the Romans, it is no wonder, eſpecially conſidering the affronts he had in perſon received from them, that he ſhould bend all his thoughts that way. In fine, after his great atchievements had raiſed his reputation to ſo high a pitch at Carthage, that he was looked upon there as a ſecond Mars, it is no wonder he ſhould have intereſt enough to lay the foundations of a ſecond war with the Romans [e].

THE great ſucceſs the Carthaginians had in Spain, we may, with Polybius, likewiſe look upon as a concurring impulſive cauſe of the ſecond Punic war; for this did not only encreaſe the jealouſy of the Romans, and ſtrongly excite them to a rupture, but alſo diſpoſe the Carthaginians thereto, as it furniſhed them with ſuch copious ſupplies both of men and money, which enabled them to put their favourite ſcheme in execution. The Greek writers frequently call this the Hannibalic war. The interval betwixt it and the firſt Punic war conſiſted of twenty-three years.

BUT to return to our hiſtory: The Saguntines were a colony, partly of the Zacynthians, and partly of the Rutuli from the city of Ardea. According to Livy, they were not of long ſtanding in Spain, though they ſoon grew immenſely rich there, the province in which they were ſeated being extremely fertile. Their city was ſituated on the Carthaginian ſide of the Iberus, about a mile from the ſea, near a ridge of mountains, that ſeparated Spain from Celtiberia, and in a country where, by the late treaty, the Carthaginians were permitted to make war, though this city was expreſly excepted from all hoſtilities by that treaty. As ſoon as Hannibal approached their frontiers, he detached a party to lay waſte the territory adjacent to the city, and then made a diſpoſition to attack it in three places at once. With his battering-engines he made the utmoſt efforts to beat down the wall, whilſt his troops were in readineſs to ſtorm the city upon the firſt breach made. The Saguntines defended themſelves with inexpreſſible bravery, making frequent ſallies upon the beſiegers, and deſtroying many of their men, though they were ſcarce ſenſible of this loſs, ſince Hannibal's army conſiſted of an hundred and fifty thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe. The beſieged however ſuffered extremely in theſe actions, loſing as many men as the Carthaginians; which rendered their condition almoſt deſperate. However, their fate was for ſome time reſpited, by a wound Hannibal received in his thigh from a javelin, as he was viewing ſome of the works; which occaſioned ſuch a conſternation amongſt his troops, that the enemy were upon the point of making themſelves maſters of all his works and military machines. Till the wound was cured, a ſort of ceſſation of arms enſued, tho' the beſiegers ſtill maintained their poſts, carried on their approaches, and perfected their works. After Hannibal's recovery, hoſtilities recommenced with double fury, the Saguntines oppoſing the enemy with undaunted reſolution, and Hannibal puſhing on his attacks with the utmoſt vigour. At laſt the beſiegers, after having laid a great part of the wall level with the ground, and demoliſhed three towers, by which the body of the place lay entirely expoſed, made an aſſault with unparallelled bravery, thinking, that now a fair opportunity offered of taking the town ſword in hand. The beſieged, on the other hand, conſidering, that every thing valuable to them lay at ſtake, exerted themſelves in an extraordinary manner. They drew up their forces in order of battle in the ſpace betwixt the ruins of the walls and the town, and diſputed every inch of ground with ſuch incredible valour, that the place where the engagement happened was covered with dead bodies. In ſhort, hope and deſpair ſo animated both parties, that the greateſt efforts were made on each ſide. However, at laſt deſpair prevailed, the Saguntines forcing the Carthaginians not only to abandon the breach, but to flee to their camp with prodigious ſlaughter. Livy tells us, that a kind of dart or miſſive weapon, called falarica (A), was of ſingular ſervice to the Saguntines on this occaſion [f].

In

[f] Iidem ibid. Eutrop. l. iii. c. 7. Sil. Ital. l. i. Plut. & Aur. Vict. in Hannib.

(A) The deſcription of the falarica, as it may be collected from Livy and other authors, is as follows: The falarica was a kind of large dart, or miſſive weapon, diſcharged by the parties poſted in wooden towers upon the enemy. Theſe wooden towers were called falæ, as we learn from Juvenal, Servius, and others; ſo that the weapon undoubtedly derived its name from thoſe machines. It had an oblong ſhaft, round and even every-where, but towards the end, where it had a ſquare piece of iron, bound about with tow, beſmeared with pitch. The iron head, reſembling that of the Roman pilum or javelin, was three foot long, that it might be capable of penetrating the ſtrongeſt armour, and, through it, of doing execution; which it frequently did. As the combuſtible part of it was ſet on fire before it was thrown upon the enemy, and this fire muſt have been greatly encreaſed by the air fanning it in its motion, in caſe it killed not the perſon it fixed upon, but only ſtuck in his armour, it could not fail of throwing him into the greateſt conſternation; ſince, in order to preſerve himſelf from the flames, he muſt have lain under the neceſſity of diſarming himſelf, and conſequently of leaving himſelf entirely expoſed to the future efforts of the enemy. To render this weapon the more terrible, by making the fire inextinguiſhable, the tow, according to Pomponius Sabinus and Vegetius, was anoint-

IT appears from Zonaras and others, that, in purſuance of the reſolution above-mentioned, the Romans ſent

ed or beſmeared likewiſe with ſulphur, reſin, bitumen, and burning oil. This dart was ſometimes diſcharged out of the baliſta with an inconceivable force, and did not only deſtroy men in the manner juſt mentioned, but likewiſe frequently conſumed the enemies wooden towers, againſt which it was levelled. The falarica was either magna or parva, as we have before obſerved of the baliſta. From the particulars already laid down, it cannot but appear probable, that this weapon was of oriental extraction; and therefore it can by no means be deemed abſurd to deduce the name itſelf from the eaſt. Feſtus, as hinted above, intimates, that the dart here deſcribed derived its name from the towers called falæ, from whence it was diſcharged; and that falæ, in the Etruſcan language, ſignified high. We may therefore either deduce it from the verb פלא phála, mirabilis, excelſus, arduus, excellens fuit, or from עלה alah, aſcendit, altus, elevatus fuit, with a completive vau prefixed, which will make it ועלה vealah or phalah. That the eaſtern nations, particularly the Hebrews and Arabs, uſed vau and fe, or phe, ſometimes in ſuch a manner, without any ſignification annexed to it, may be proved by many inſtances; ſo that there is nothing forced or unnatural in the latter etymon, if the firſt ſhould not ſatisfy our readers. From one or both of theſe words, (for it is very poſſible that the former may have been originally formed from the latter) the Greek φάλος, criſta, eminens in mari petra, ornamentum in ſummitate galeæ, &c. is to be drawn. Feſtus and others farther countenance this notion, by calling the wooden towers we are now upon loci extructi. By adding to either of the verbs above-mentioned any of the following radixes, הרג viz. harag, interfecit, חרג hharag, motus fuit, חרך hharac, uſſit, ארך arac, longus fuit, from whence אריכא arica, longa, may be formed the word falarica; in which caſe the name will aptly enough anſwer to the nature and office of the weapon here deſcribed. It is probable, that the Saguntines either learned the uſe of the falarica from their neighbours the Carthaginians, or the Phœnician colonies ſettled antiently in Spain. We ſhall only further obſerve upon this head, that the falarica is called εἶδος λόγχης, a kind or ſpecies of lance, by Heſychius (1).

The Romans expostulate with Hannibal and the Carthaginians upon their proceedings.

sent deputies to Hannibal at his camp before Saguntum (B), who arrived there about the time we are now upon. According to these authors, Hannibal avoided giving them an audience, and that in a refined politic manner. He employed certain Spaniards, whom he could confide in, to meet the Roman ministers at some distance from the camp, and, accosting them as friends, to assure them, that it would on no account be safe to approach nearer the camp, since the general himself was absent, and the barbarous nations, which formed the Carthaginian army, had such an antipathy to the Romans, that they would undoubtedly massacre them, if an opportunity offered. Livy intimates, that Hannibal dispatched messengers to the sea-side to meet the deputies above-mentioned, and acquaint them in his name, that it was by no means proper for them to trust their persons with those fierce nations, of which his army was composed; and that the multiplicity of his affairs would not permit him then to hear their proposals. Polybius, on the other hand, asserts, that the Roman deputation found Hannibal in his winter quarters at New Carthage, a little before he had formed the siege of Saguntum; and that, being admit-

(B) Saguntum being first built and peopled by a colony of Zacynthians; it is no difficult matter to account for its name. It was probably called by the citizens ΖΑΚΥΝΘΟΣ or ΖΑΚΥΝΘΟΝ, Zacynthus or Zacynthon; which, in old latin, was Sacuntus, Sacuntum, or Saguntus, Saguntum, the antient Latins using C. in the same manner as those of the classic period of time did G. as we learn from Terentianus, the columna rostrata of Duilius, Quintilian, &c. In confirmation of this notion, it may be further observed, that some of the oldest editions of Aurelius Victor, for Saguntum, have Zagunthus; which reading receives some strength from Priscian. Silius Italicus likewise calls it Sagunthos; which word approaches very near what we would have the original name. According to Appian, after Hannibal had taken it, he brought thither a colony from Carthage, and called it Spartagene. There seem to have been, in antient times, two cities of this name in Spain, on the ruins of one of which at present stands Siguenza, a city of New Castille, situate upon the river Henares. The inhabitants of Saguntum are greatly celebrated, for their constancy and fidelity to the Romans, by most of the Roman historians (2).

admitted to an audience, they adviſed him not to attack the Saguntines, whom the Romans had taken under their protection; nor infringe the late treaty concluded with Aſdrubal, by paſſing the Iberus. Hannibal, according to the ſame hiſtorian, being then ſucceſsful in all his enterprizes, fired with ambition, and mortally hating the Romans, with ſome emotion, replied, that the Romans themſelves had already given juſt grounds for a rupture, by oppreſſing ſeveral of the principal inhabitants of Saguntum, after the citizens had applied to them, upon the breaking out of a ſedition in the city, to make up all differences between the contending parties by a juſt and impartial arbitration; and that as the Carthaginians, in imitation of their anceſtors, always thought it incumbent upon them to ſuccour the oppreſſed, he would revenge ſo perfidious an action, unleſs the Romans gave immediate ſatisfaction to the perſons injured. At the ſame time he diſpatched an expreſs to Carthage, informing the ſenate, that the Saguntines, grown inſolent by their alliance with Rome, and ſpirited up by their allies, made irruptions into the Carthaginian territories, deſiring inſtructions how to act in ſo critical a ſituation. Livy ſays, that the Roman deputies, being denied acceſs to Hannibal, ſailed directly to Carthage, to demand ſatisfaction there; but that Hannibal took care to ſend advice to the leaders of the Barchine faction of what had happened, and to prepare their minds for giving the Romans ſuch a reception as he deſired; in conſequence of which, they were diſmiſſed from Carthage, without any ſatisfactory anſwer. Whether any of theſe jarring relations be true, or which of them is ſo, we ſhall not take upon us at preſent to determine. However, we cannot avoid obſerving, that Polybius has probability on his ſide; for it is much more likely, that a general, ſo famed for politeneſs and addreſs as Hannibal was, ſhould confer with the Roman deputation, in his turn expoſtulate with them, and impute the approaching rupture to their principals, as is, generally ſpeaking, the practice of civilized ſtates at this day, than to behave in ſo rude and ſavage a manner towards them, as the Roman hiſtorians, and their adherents, ſuggeſt. Certain it is, that theſe laſt authors deſerve very little credit, when they deliver any thing, that affects the character either of Hannibal, or his enemy Hanno, ſince it is their conſtant endeavour to paint the former in the blackeſt colours, and to repreſent the latter, with his partizans, as the only virtuous members of the ſtate of Carthage. They were ſo greatly obliged to Hanno for his kind diſpoſition towards them, or at leaſt his averſion to their enemies, and received ſo much of the treatment they deſerved from Hannibal, that it is no wonder they ſhould labour ſo heartily to depreciate the one, and extol the other; though this was done at the expence of truth, as well as of their own reputation, ſince many of their inſinuations relating to the characters of both theſe Carthaginians are abſolutely inconſiſtent with the accounts of their actions, which they themſelves have handed down to us. As we cannot therefore but look upon Polybius as the moſt impartial and unprejudiced, as well as the moſt rational and probable, hiſtorian, we ſhall ſuperſede that tedious declamatory harangue of Hanno to the ſenate of Carthage, in order to prejudice them againſt Hannibal, and the Barchine family, given us by Livy; notwithſtanding which, in order to preſerve conſiſtency, and render our hiſtory uniform throughout, we muſt follow this laſt hiſtorian with reſpect to order of time, and ſuppoſe the Roman deputies to have found Hannibal employed in the ſiege at preſent under conſideration. The majority of the ſenate and people being cloſely attached to Hannibal, neither the Roman faction in Carthage, nor the deputies ſent from Rome to put them in motion, could prevent the deſtruction of Saguntum [z].

Hannibal carries on briſkly the ſiege of Saguntum.

But to return to the military operations: After the late repulſe, Hannibal, finding his troops greatly fatigued, remained for ſome days in a ſtate of inaction, but diſpoſed guards in proper places to defend his works and machines from all attempts of the enemy. In the mean time, in a ſpeech he made to his ſoldiers, he endeavoured to raiſe their courage, by inſpiring them with a deteſtation of the enemy, by promiſing them great rewards, if they did their duty, and laſtly, by aſſuring them of the plunder of the place, in caſe it was taken by ſtorm. The garriſon likewiſe kept quiet within the town, and took the opportunity of this ceſſation of arms to build a counter-wall oppoſite to the breach the Carthaginians had made. Hannibal's troops, greatly greatly animated by the hopes of ſharing the plunder of the town, made a vigorous attack, being encouraged by their general, who had placed himſelf on the top of a moveable tower, overlooking all the works of the beſieged, and the whole city. In fine, Hannibal, having cleared the breach of the ſoldiers poſted there for its defence, and demoliſhed the new wall, by the aſſiſtance of five hundred Africans appointed to undermine it, entered the town without oppoſition; and poſſeſſing himſelf of an eminence near the citadel, drew a line of circumvallation round it, and planted his artillery againſt it. The Saguntines however did all that could be expected from men animated by deſpair; they erected a new wall to ſupport that part of the city, which the enemy had not yet made themſelves maſters of; they diſputed every inch of ground with the utmoſt bravery; and repulſed the beſiegers in many attacks. However, being not a little ſtreightened for want of proviſions, they found themſelves reduced to great extremities, eſpecially as they had no proſpect of foreign aid, the Romans ſeeming to have entirely deſerted them. But they were, for the preſent, relieved by an expedition Hannibal undertook againſt the Carpetani and Oretani, who ſhewed a diſpoſition to ſhake off the Carthaginian yoke. The beſieged however did not reap any great advantages from this expedition, ſince Maherbal, the ſon of Himilco, whom Hannibal left to command the forces before Saguntum in his abſence, puſhed on the ſiege with as much vigour as Hannibal himſelf could have done. Battering the new wall inceſſantly with his rams, he made ſuch a breach in it, that Hannibal, returning ſooner than was expected, having quaſhed the conſpiracy of the aforeſaid nations in embryo, immediately ſtormed the citadel. After a warm diſpute, Hannibal making a lodgment, poſſeſſed himſelf of part of it, the Saguntines, with no ſmall difficulty, maintaining themſelves in the other [h].

And takes it.

WHILST affairs were in this melancholy ſituation, one Alcon a Saguntine went privately by night, unknown to his countrymen, to the Carthaginian camp, where, by his tears and ſupplications, he endeavoured to move Hannibal's compaſſion towards the unhappy citizens of Saguntum. He could however make no impreſſion upon that general. The conditions he inſiſted upon were; That they ſhould give ample ſatisfaction to the Turdetani; That they ſhould deliver up

up all their treasure to the Carthaginians; and that they should retire, with only their cloaths upon their backs, to the place the Carthaginians should assign them for their habitation. These conditions appeared so intolerable to Alcon, that he durst not propose them to the garrison of Saguntum; and therefore remained in Hannibal's camp. But one Alorcus, a Spaniard, then in the Carthaginian service, though expressing a great regard and esteem for the miserable inhabitants of that unfortunate city, undertook to convey the Carthaginian general's proposals to them. This he did, endeavouring at the same time to prevail upon that unhappy people to embrace them; but they were so harsh, that the Saguntines could not so much as think of accepting them. Before they gave their final answer, the principal senators, bringing their gold and silver, and that of the public treasury, into the market-place, threw both into a fire lighted for that purpose, and afterwards themselves. At the same time a tower, which had been battered by Hannibal's rams, falling with a dreadful noise, the Carthaginians entered the town by the breach, soon made themselves masters of it and the citadel, and cut to pieces all the inhabitants, who were of age to bear arms. Livy relates, that vast numbers of the Saguntines, without distinction of sex or age, were massacred; and that many, taken prisoners, became the property of the soldiery. According to Frontinus, Hannibal, by a stratagem, drew the garrison out of the town, and put them all to the sword. Zonaras tells us, that Hannibal took the city in the following manner: He applied a machine to the wall, which overtopped it, and was filled with armed men, some of whom were in sight, and others concealed. Whilst the Saguntines warmly engaged those in sight, the others concealed undermined the wall; which falling, gave the Carthaginians an opportunity of advancing into the town, and threw the Saguntines into such a consternation, that they immediately retired into the citadel. Upon their application to Hannibal, finding him averse to moderation, and themselves destitute of any prospect of assistance from the Romans, they desired some days to deliberate upon the measures they were to take; which being granted, in that interval they committed every thing valuable to the flames; persuaded the poor helpless people to lay violent violent hands on themſelves; and then, making a ſally on the beſiegers, were all put to the ſword [i]. He finds great ſpoils there.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fire above-mentioned, the Carthaginians got a very rich booty. Hannibal did not reſerve to himſelf any part of this, but applied it ſolely to the carrying on of his enterpriſes. Polybius remarks, that the taking of Saguntum was of ſignal ſervice to him in the execution of the ſcheme he had formed, as it ſtimulated his ſoldiers to further conqueſts by the ſight of ſo much booty, and a proſpect of more; as likewiſe by engaging the principal perſons of Carthage to ſecond his views; which the large preſents he was enabled to make them from ſuch rich ſpoils could not fail of doing. He alſo from hence laid the foundations of a future fund to ſupply all his exigencies in the accompliſhment of the vaſt project he had ſo long been intent upon.

THE news of the taking of Saguntum had ſcarce reached Carthage, when embaſſadors arrived there from Rome, demanding of the ſenate and people, whether the Spaniſh expedition had been undertaken by their order, or Hannibal, contrary to their approbation, had been the ſole author of it. One of the Carthaginian ſenators, the beſt qualified for this purpoſe, by order of the ſenate, endeavoured to vindicate Hannibal's conduct, or rather that of the republic, on this occaſion. He made very ſlight mention of the laſt treaty Aſdrubal had concluded with the Romans, only endeavouring to draw a parallel betwixt it and the peace granted the Carthaginians by the conſul Lutatius after the battle off the iſlands Ægates. He inſiſted, that as the ſenate and people of Rome had taken the liberty to inſert ſome additional articles in that treaty, ſo the Carthaginian ſenate and people had an equal right to make what alterations they thought proper in that Aſdrubal had concluded with the Romans. He further acquainted them, that the Carthaginians were not ſtrangers to the ambitious deſigns of their republic; and that they might enter upon the execution of them as ſoon as they pleaſed, without giving any concern or uneaſineſs to his ſtate. In ſhort, he gave them to underſtand, that the ſenate and people, notwithſtanding the efforts of Hanno and his faction, were of the ſame ſentiments with Hannibal, The Romans ſend freſh embaſſadors to Carthage.

Hannibal, in relation to the affair of Saguntum, and entirely approved of what he had done. Upon which Q. Fabius, the senior of the embassy, declared war against the Carthaginians, in the manner already related by us in a former part of this history [k].

An enquiry into the justice of this war.

In order to give our readers an adequate idea of the justice with which this war was entered upon, we must beg leave to observe, that the Carthaginians had, in reality, a right to call the Romans to an account for their former instances of oppression; but made use of a pretended motive, not so consistent with the dictates of equity, to vindicate, or at least to palliate, their conduct on the present occasion. The iniquitous conquest of Sardinia, and perfidious exaction of the immense sum above-mentioned from the Carthaginians, undoubtedly authorized that nation to make reprisals upon the Romans, whenever they found themselves in a capacity of so doing; and the Romans, by intermedling with the affairs of Spain, without any other cause, than to give check to the Carthaginian conquests there, did, with reason, highly irritate the state of Carthage. But then, on the other hand, it must be allowed, that no just parallel could be drawn betwixt the treaty of peace concluded by the Romans with Asdrubal, and that granted the Carthaginians by Lutatius. In the former, no mention was made of the senate and people of Carthage; but Asdrubal acted, as tho' he had been invested with full powers to sign whatever articles he should judge proper for the good of the republic; which afterwards gave a sort of sanction to what he had done, by an acquiescence in it: whereas to the latter, Lutatius expressly added a clause, importing, that the treaty should be valid, provided the senate and people of Rome thought proper to ratify it. Here therefore, with Polybius, we cannot but acknowledge, that the Carthaginian pretext was mere chicane, void of the least shadow of reason or justice to support it. But, with regard to one of the articles of the treaty of Lutatius, which the Romans urged as a condemnation of the destruction of Saguntum, we own ourselves not so entirely of that author's sentiments. The article was to this effect; "That neither party should "injure or molest the allies of the other," which he extends to all those with whom an alliance might be contracted in any future times, though, in our opinion, no necessity appears pears for admitting ſuch a ſuppoſition, at leaſt except ſuch an alliance had been contracted by the mutual conſent of both parties; for otherwiſe, each nation might have entered into a confederacy with the declared enemies of the other, and then, by virtue of this article, have forced their old friends to make peace with their new confederates; which would undoubtedly have been contrary to the true intent and meaning of it, as well as the general tenor of the treaty; ſince it would have given the more formidable power an opportunity of extorting a compliance with the moſt ruinous conditions from the other. It is probable, notwithſtanding the ſilence of the Roman hiſtorians on this head, that the article we are now upon furniſhed the Romans with a pretext to countenance the Sardinian rebels above-mentioned, and eſpouſe their intereſt, in order to make themſelves maſters of Sardinia; ſince it appears from Livy, that they underſtood it in the ſenſe of Polybius, which ſeems to authorize ſuch an action. It is certain the perfidious conduct they were guilty of towards the Carthaginians at that time, gives ground to ſuſpect them capable of wreſting the treaty of Lutatius in ſuch a manner, to ſerve ſo villainous a purpoſe; and therefore juſtifies our not entirely agreeing with Polybius in the above-mentioned particular. Be that as it will, as the treaty of Lutatius was infringed by the reduction of Sardinia, the Romans had no reaſon to condemn any ſubſequent conduct of the Carthaginians for its not ſquaring with the articles of that treaty. Beſides, as the Sicilian peace bore no relation to the Carthaginian conqueſts in Spain, which were made long afterwards, they had no right to preſcribe limits to thoſe conqueſts, which they did, by obliging Aſdrubal not to paſs the Iberus. Add to this, that it does not appear from hiſtory, that the Carthaginians ever ratified, with an oath, the articles Aſdrubal ſigned by his own authority, but only concealed their diſapprobation of that action, till a proper opportunity of diſcovering it offered; and therefore the Carthaginians could not, with ſo much juſtice, be charged with perjury, by concurring with Hannibal in the deſtruction of Saguntum, as the Romans with a ſecond violation of the treaty of Lutatius, by extorting a compliance with ſuch hard terms from Aſdrubal, when the neceſſity of his affairs would not permit him to refuſe it. In confirmation of what has been advtanced, advanced, it may be farther obſerved, that the Romans had not obliged themſelves, by any implicit covenant prior to the pretended treaty with Aſdrubal, to fix the Iberus as a boundary to any future acquiſitions or diſcoveries they might make in Spain; beſides which, nothing could have the leaſt tendency to palliate their treatment of the Carthaginians on that occaſion. However, it muſt be owned, that the Carthaginians would have acted more generouſly, by aſſigning the unjuſt ceſſion they found themſelves forced to make of Sardinia, and the immenſe ſum of money at the ſame time iniquitouſly exacted from them, as the chief motives that prompted them to deſire a rupture with the Romans. But they were doubtleſs hindered from this by ſome political views, which, they thought, it might be for their intereſt to keep concealed; than which ſcarce any practice has been more common in all ages; and we have had recent inſtances of princes publiſhing a manifeſto, immediately before a declaration of war, filled with frivolous pretexts rather than the real cauſes of their hoſtile intentions [1].

Hannibal undertakes this war to prevent civil diſſenſions at home, according to Appian.

APPIAN ſeems to intimate, that Hannibal, in order toprovide for his own ſafety, was obliged to attack the Saguntines, and come to blows with the Romans. Notwithſtanding he was elected general by the army after the death of Aſdrubal, and had his election confirmed by the ſenate and people of Carthage, yet, according to this author, Hanno's faction, taking advantage of his youth, endeavoured to inſpire the giddy populace with ſentiments to his prejudice. His friends, perceiving the wicked ſuggeſtions of that faction beginning in a ſhort time to take ſome effect, appriſed him of it, deſiring him by no means to forget them, but to exert himſelf in order to promote their intereſt, and conſequently his own. This, adds the ſame author, Hannibal had foreſeen; and being ſenſible, that whatever attacks ſeemed levelled at his friends, were principally intended againſt him, notwithſtanding the great ſervices his family had done the ſtate of Carthage, he thought, that the only expedient to prevent civil diſſenſions, and hinder Hanno's inſinuations from making any impreſſion upon the minds of the populace to his diſadvantage, would be to enter upon a war with Rome. An enterprize of ſuch importance as this, he very well knew, would engage all the public attention, and of courſe greatly contribute towards ſtifling the cabals and ſchemes, that might have been formed formed againſt him, eſpecially as the generality, both of the ſenate and people, were eagerly bent upon ſuch a war. Beſides, the fears and anxieties ariſing in their minds for the ſucceſs of an Italian expedition, would naturally render them cautious of changing hands at home. Appian, we ſay, mentions this as one of the motives that induced Hannibal to lay ſiege to Saguntum; which may poſſibly be true. But we muſt own, that neither Polybius nor Livy takes any notice of it. That another motive, as the firſt author relates, was a deſire to immortalize his name, will be granted by all, who conſider the genius of that general, as deſcribed to us by the beſt writers. But whatever might prompt him to the ſiege above-mentioned, he met with a courage and reſolution in the Saguntines worthy of himſelf. After a moſt gallant defence, they fell in the manner already related, the very women from the ramparts, with aſtoniſhing intrepidity, beholding the ſlaughter of their huſbands and relations, and maſſacring all the children, that had eſcaped the flames, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. Some writers inſinuate, that, before the laſt ſally, the Saguntines melted lead with their gold and ſilver, imagining, that ſuch a mixed maſs could not be of any great ſervice to the Carthaginians; and that Hannibal would have found it more difficult ſtill to have carried the place, had not the citizens been reduced to the laſt extremity by famine. The Carthaginian general did not think proper to raze the city, but tranſplanted thither a colony from Carthage. Thus the Saguntines, after a ſiege of eight months, fell a ſacrifice to Hannibal's reſentment, being marked out for deſtruction, on account of their ſingular fidelity and attachment to the Romans [m].

THE Carthaginians, or at leaſt the Barchine faction, received the Roman declaration of war from Fabius with great joy and acclamations, aſſuring him they would carry it on with the utmoſt vigour and alacrity, and make all poſſible efforts to revenge the repeated extortions, the ſiniſter deſigns, the unjuſt invaſions, and the haughty behaviour of his republic. In conſequence of this ſtep, Fabius, and his companions, returned home, taking Spain in their way, as they had been ordered by the ſenate. Upon their arrival there, they endeavoured to draw the Spaniards ſubject to Carthage from their allegiance, to detach the allies of that ſtate there from its intereſt, and to enter into an alliance with as many of the Spaniſh nations, as were diſpoſed to accept either the friendſhip or protection of the Roman republic, purſuant to the inſtructions they had received before their departure from Rome. The Barguſii, being deſirous of ſhaking off the Carthaginian yoke, gave the Roman embaſſadors a kind reception; which not a little influenced many other neighbouring cantons. But this ſucceſs was not laſting; for the Volſciani, upon Fabius's application to them, made him this ſmart reply: "With what face can you, Romans, offer to "ſolicit us to prefer your friendſhip to that of the Carthaginians, ſince your treachery to the brave Saguntines, who "did ſo, exceeded even the cruelty of that barbarous enemy, "who deſtroyed them? Seek for allies, where the fate of "Saguntum is not known. The deſtruction of that city "will ſerve for a lively leſſon to the people of Spain, to take "care how they ever repoſe any confidence in the Romans." After which, the embaſſadors, being commanded to leave the territories of the Volſciani, found themſelves obliged to retire out of Spain, without accompliſhing their deſign. Neither did they meet with any better ſucceſs in Gaul; for when they deſired the Gauls to refuſe the Carthaginians a paſſage through their country into Italy, they could by no means prevail upon them to grant their requeſt. Hannibal had before prepoſſeſſed them in favour of the Carthaginians; which he found it no difficult matter to do, they having, on various accounts, conceived an averſion to the Romans [n].

Hannibal puts both Spain and Africa into a poſture of defence.

AFTER the reduction of Saguntum, Hannibal put his African troops into winter-quarters at New Carthage; but permitted the Spaniards, in order to gain their affection, to retire to their reſpective habitations. During the winter, he remained in a ſtate of inaction, but made ſeveral very wiſe regulations for the ſecurity of the Carthaginian dominions both in Spain and Africa. He tranſported into Africa, for the defence of that country, a body of Spaniards, conſiſting of Therſitæ, Maſtiani, and Olcades, amounting to twelve hundred horſe, and thirteen thouſand eight hundred and fifty foot, to which were added ſome companies raiſed in the Balearic iſlands. Theſe it was thought proper to place, for the moſt part, in the provinces of Metagonium, and city of Carthage. He poſted four thouſand Metagonitæ likewiſe in Carthage,

Carthage, not noly to defend that metropolis, in caſe of need, but likewiſe to ſerve as hoſtages for the good behaviour of their countrymen. Hannibal appointed his brother Aſdrubal to command in Spain, leaving him, beſides a ſufficient naval force, a powerful army, to preſerve the Carthaginian acquiſitions there. The African corps, deſtined to act in Spain under the command of Aſdrubal, was compoſed of four hundred and fifty African and Libyphœnician cavalry, eleven thouſand eight hundred and fifty Maſſylian, Maſſæſylian, Macian, and Mauritanian foot, beſides three hundred (C) Lorgitæ, eighteen hundred Numidians, three hundred Liguſians, five hundred Balearic ſlingers, and above twenty elephants. Theſe particulars, Polybius tells us, he extracted from ſome tables of records of copper, engraved by Hannibal himſelf when in Italy, and left by him at Lacinium (D). After ſuch a prudent diſpoſition, which had a natural tendency to render both Spain and Africa entirely dependent on Car-

(C) It is evident from Livy, that Polybius's text here ſtands in need of an emendation. We find in no author the word Lorgitæ, [ΛΟΡΓΙΤΑΙ] as the name of a people; but the Ilergetes, whom Livy takes notice of here, and whom Polybius had mentioned juſt before, were a people of Spain, frequently deſcribed by antient writers. In the room therefore of ΛΟΡΓΙΤΑΙ, we ought to ſubſtitute ΙΛΟΤΡΓΗΤΟΙ, nothing being more eaſy, than for ſome letters, and parts of letters, to be defaced by time, or a variety of contingencies. As Livy cloſely followed Polybius, we doubt not but ΙΛΟΤΡΓΗΤΟΙ is the true reading (3).

(D) The Lacinium, here mentioned by Polybius, muſt, we apprehend, have been the name of a town near the Lacinian promontory in Calabria, taken notice of by ſeveral authors. From this curious paſſage of Polybius, as well as from Livy, it ſeems to appear that Hannibal left behind him an account of the principal, if not all the tranſactions he was concerned in there. But here a queſtion may ariſe, in what language was this account left written or engraved? To which we muſt beg leave to anſwer, that our readers may determine for themſelves, when they have conſidered the principal arguments that may be offered in favour both of the Greek and Carthaginian languages which we ſhall here lay down for their peruſal. In behalf of the Greek it may be urged, firſt, that Hannibal intended his tables ſhould be underſtood by the natives of the country wherein they were left. Now the Greek was the tongue of Magna Græcia, and conſequently of the Brutii, in whoſe territory Lacinium was ſituated.

thage, as well as more cloſely to cement the people of thoſe countries by mutual bonds of friendſhip, he made the neceſſary preparations to paſs the Iberus. But before he attempted this, he judged it expedient to win the Ciſalpine Gauls over to his intereſt, that he might not only have a free paſſage through their country, but likewiſe receive a reinforcement from them when there. This he effected, partly by diſtributing ſome gold amongſt their chiefs, and partly by heightening their averſion to the Romans. Having received intelligence, that the Gauls were ready to join him, and before diſcharged

Secondly, Hannibal underſtood Greek, having been taught it by Soſilus the Lacedæmonian, and compoſed ſome pieces himſelf in that language. Thirdly, Soſilus attended Hannibal in his expeditions, and wrote a hiſtory of them in Greek, from whence, it is probable, the inſcriptions on theſe tables of copper, mentioned by Polybius, were taken. Fourthly, as Polybius underſtood theſe inſcriptions, and made extracts from them, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that they muſt have been in Greek. On the other hand, it may be ſaid, firſt, that the Greek language had been expelled Carthage before Hannibal's time; and that the Carthaginians ever retained ſuch an averſion to the Greeks, that it cannot be ſuppoſed the language of that nation ſhould afterwards have been introduced amongſt them. Secondly, that though Hannibal, for his own private amuſement, ſtudied the Greek tongue, he was too wiſe ſo far to thwart the genius of his countrymen, as to leave a journal or hiſtory of his Italian wars in it, eſpecially as he had a faction againſt him at Carthage. Thirdly, that the Carthaginian and Etruſcan languages muſt have been related, the Etruſcans being deſcended from the Pelaſgi and Phœnicians; and it is well known, that the Etruſcan was the antient language of Magna Græcia, that country having been antiently a part of Etruſcan. Fourthly, the Carthaginians had, for many generations, an intercourſe with the people of Magna Græian; and ſeveral coins of that country, particularly of the Thurians, have characters upon them reſembling the Etruſcan, and even the Carthaginian. From hence it is probable, the inhabitants of Magna Græcia underſtood ſomething of the Carthaginian tongue; which renders it likely, that the language of Hannibal's tables muſt have been the Carthaginian. But this we leave ourreaders to decide (4).

diſcharged his vows made to Hercules at Gades, as well as engaged himſelf by new ones, provided ſucceſs attended his arms in the enſuing expedition, he immediately put himſelf in motion. As his emiſſaries, arrived from Gaul, informed him, that tho' the paſſage of the Alps was difficult, it was far from being impracticable, he began to look upon the Carthaginians as already maſters of Italy °.

His remarkable dream.

HAVING therefore completed his military preparations, and got every thing in readineſs for the intended expedition, early in the ſpring he moved out of his winter-quarters, advancing at the head of all his forces to Etouiſſa, and from thence to the Iberus. Here, we are told, Hannibal had a remarkable dream, which gave him great hopes of ſucceſs in the enterprize he was going to enter upon. That general, according to the authors referred to, imagined himſelf, in his ſleep, ſummoned to a council of the gods, who commanded him to begin his march for Italy without delay. At the ſame time there appeared to him a youth incircled with glory, who ſaid, that Jupiter had appointed him his guide, with orders to conduct him and his troops to Italy, ſtrictly enjoining him never to draw his eyes from off him; which injunction he, for ſome time, obeyed: but at laſt, having the curioſity to look behind him, he ſaw a ſerpent of a monſtrous ſize moving with great celerity, overthrowing all the trees, ſhrubs, &c. in its way, and attended by a dreadful tempeſt, with violent claps of thunder. He then aſked his guide, What ſuch a prodigy could portend? who told him, it preſaged the dreadful devaſtations, that ſhould be committed in Italy by his troops, deſiring him to purſue his journey, and not to be too inquiſitive, nor pry too deeply into what the fates had decreed. Upon his paſſing the Iberus, ſeveral beaſts, of a ſpecies utterly unknown, likewiſe appeared to him, ſeeming to ſhew the way to his troops. The Romans, about the ſame time, were as greatly diſpirited by bad omens, as Hannibal found himſelf animated by good ones. An ox ſpoke audibly with an human voice at Rome, juſt before the commencement of this war; another threw itſelf from the top of a houſe into the Tiber, and was drowned, during the public diverſions; many places were ſtruck with lightning; blood flowed from many ſtatues, and from the ſhield of one of the legionaries; and laſtly, a wolf carried off a ſword out of the camp. Whether theſe occurrences are to be eſteemed as ſo many fictions, entirely owing to that credulity and ſuperſtition, to which both the Romans and Carthaginians were ſo much addicted, or as real events, intended by Providence as preſages of thoſe dreadful convulſions, which afterwards happened in the Roman and Carthaginian ſtates, we ſhall not take upon us to determine; but only obſerve, that many arguments may be offered in ſupport of each opinion. However, as the hiſtories of almoſt all nations are interſperſed with ſuch relations, as Scripture itſelf gives countenance to ſome of them, and as the authors cited here are of no mean authority, we doubt not but our curious readers will at leaſt excuſe what has been inſerted in this place [p].

He paſſes the Iberus.

BEFORE Hannibal began the operations of the campaign, he thought it incumbent on him to inſpire life and vigour into the ſoldiery, nothing but that being now wanting, ſince the ſenate and people of Carthage, at the inſtigation of Aſdrubal, had given him an unlimited commiſſion, which left him in full power to act as he ſhould think fit for the good of the republic. In an harangue therefore he acquainted the army, that ſuch was the inſolence of the Romans, that they inſiſted upon having him, and all the general officers, delivered up to them; that Italy was one of the moſt fertile and delicious countries in the world; that he had juſt concluded a treaty with the Ciſalpine Gauls, through whoſe countries they muſt paſs, who would not only ſupply them with all neceſſaries, but join them with a good body of troops, bearing a mortal hatred to the Romans; ſo that they ought to look upon themſelves as morally certain of ſucceſs. The ſoldiers, animated by this ſpeech, loudly proclaimed their confidence in his conduct, at the ſame time declaring themſelves ready to follow him whitherſoever he ſhould think proper to lead them, and to ſpend the laſt drop of their blood in executing the project he had formed. Finding it therefore time to enter upon action, he took a review of his army, conſiſting of ninety thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſe, of various nations, beſides a good number of elephants; and then, without the leaſt obſtruction, paſſed the Iberus [q].

THE Ilergetes and Barguſii were the firſt cantons he obliged to ſubmit to the Carthaginians, and ſoon after the Ærenoſii and Auſetani, people whoſe territories extended as far as the Pyrenees. Nevertheleſs, as he reduced ſeveral towns by force, theſe conqueſts coſt him abundance of men. Before he proceeded farther on his march, he conſtituted Hanno governor of the country betwixt the Pyrenees and the Iberus, which included the territory of the Barguſii, enjoining him to have a watchful eye over that people, whoſe former conduct gave him reaſon to ſuſpect, that ſtill they were ſecretly well-wiſhers to the Romans. To ſupport Hanno in his new poſt, he left him a body of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe; and in order to ingratiate himſelf with the Spaniards, that he might be the more readily ſupplied with what recruits he ſhould want in Italy, he diſmiſſed about the like number of them to their reſpective habitations, and gave the greateſt encouragement to thoſe that continued in the Carthaginian ſervice. Upon a muſter of his forces, after they were weakened by ſieges, deſertion, mortality, and the aforeſaid diſmiſſion and detachment, he found them to amount to fifty thouſand foot, and nine thouſand horſe, all veteran troops, and the beſt in the world. As they had left all their heavy baggage with Hanno, and were light-armed, Hannibal eaſily croſſed the Pyrenees, paſſed by Ruſcino, the Rouſſillon of the moderns, a frontier town of the Gauls, and arrived on the banks of the Rhone without oppoſition [r].

And ſubdues all the nations betwixt that river and the Pyrenees.

FOR ſome time however he was retarded in his march by the jealouſy of the Gauls; for that nation, hearing that the Carthaginian army, then encamped at Illiberis, a city of Gallia Narbonenſis, had reduced the country immediately beyond the Pyrenees, and left ſtrong garriſons there to keep the natives in awe, entertained vehement ſuſpicions, that Hannibal had a deſign upon them, notwithſtanding his pretext of invading Italy. But upon his decamping ſpeedily from Illiberis, giving them the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his amicable intentions towards them, and making a few preſents to their reguli, they permitted him to continue his route without the leaſt moleſtation. Upon his approaching the banks of the Rhone, the greateſt part of the Volcæ (E), a

(E), a nation inhabiting the tract contiguous to that river, withdrew, with all their effects, to the oppoſite bank, the other neighbouring Gauls being his friends, and giving him all the aſſiſtance they were able. The Gauls on the other ſide, taking umbrage at the approach of ſo formidable a power, had aſſembled all their forces, with an intent to diſpute the paſſage of the river; which Hannibal perceiving, and finding it no-where fordable in ſight of the enemy, he began to be in pain for the ſucceſs of the expedition; but his good fortune ſtill attending him, he at laſt carried his point by a ſtratagem, and diſperſed the Gallic forces in the manner by us already related. But, after all, the greateſt difficulty was how to waft over the elephants. Some affirm this to have been done in the following manner: a float of timber two hundred foot long, and fifty broad, was thrown from the bank of the river, being fixed thereto, by large ropes, and quite covered over with earth; ſo that the elephants, deceived with this appearance, thought themſelves upon firm ground. From the firſt float they proceeded to a ſecond, which was built in the ſame form, but only an hundred foot long, and faſtened to the former by chains, that were eaſily looſened. The female elephants were put upon the firſt float, and the males followed. As ſoon as they got upon the ſecond float, it was looſened from the firſt, and, by the help of ſmall boats, towed to the oppoſite ſhore. After this, it was ſent back to fetch thoſe which were left behind. Some threw their guides, and fell into the water, but they at laſt got ſafe to ſhore; ſo that out of forty-eight, not a ſingle elephant was drowned. Others ſay, that Hannibal ordered them all to be drawn together on the bank of the river, when one of the guides, by his direction, having irritated the fierceſt of them, leaped into the river, and ſwam to the oppoſite ſide, being hotly purſued by the enraged beaſt, that immediately ruſhed

(E) The Volcæ, or Volcæ Aricomici, according to Strabo, were a nation, that inhabited the country contiguous to one ſide of the Rhodanus or the Rhone; but had nothing to do on the other, as Livy here aſſerts. Nemauſus, the Niſmes of the moderns, was their capital. Mela, Pliny and Ptolemy, take particular notice of them (5).

ruſhed into the (F) water after him with the utmoſt fury; upon which all the reſt followed. Hannibal ſpent five days in paſſing the river, though vaſt numbers of the Gauls, by their aſſiſtance, facilitated the execution of the plan he had formed.

(F) But this, with Livy, we cannot help thinking improbable; eſpecially ſince it is remarked by Polybius, that elephants were exceedingly afraid of the water; inſomuch that though they were taught an exact obedience to their guides, yet theſe could never prevail upon them to go into the water without the utmoſt difficulty. That excellent author adds, that, on the preſent occaſion, theſe beaſts were at firſt ſo terrified, that they ran from one ſide of the float to the other; but ſeeing themſelves ſurrounded with water, the fear of that element kept them in order. However, ſome of them, he tells us, were ſo extremely ſcared, that, being in the middle of the ſtream, they leaped into it, tho' breathing freely, and diſcharging their ſtomachs of the water taken in, by the aſſiſtance of their trunks, which they held above water, they were thereby preſerved.

Though, according to Polybius here, the elephant is afraid of paſſing deep and rapid waters, yet, if Ælian may be credited, that animal takes delight in the marſhes, being, for the moſt part, in moiſt places. The Indians therefore, employed in taking their whelps, (for vaſt numbers of theſe they train up for uſe) generally go to ſuch places, where they ſeldom fail of finding them. In ſummer-time the elephant covers himſelf with mud, to avoid the heat, receiving more refreſhment from hence, than from being in the ſhade (5).

In confirmation of what Polybius aſſerts, it may be obſerved, that, according to naturaliſts, the elephant is a vaſt animal, of a make entirely unfit for ſwimming. He drinks much, Ariſtotle aſſuring us, that there have been ſome elephants, that have been ſeen to drink fourteen amphoras of the Macedonian meaſure, that is, if we will believe Budæus, about one eighth part of a Paris hogſhead. It is remarkable, that this animal always diſturbs the water before he drinks, as if this was a way to make it more nouriſhing, or to add a certain taſte to it, and take away the ſweetneſs of it, which is not ſufficiently pungent to his tongue. Ælian intimates, that the ſight of the ſea terrifies the elephant; and that, in order to get him on ſhip-board, recourſe is ſometimes had to ſuch an artifice as that here mentioned; which notion he undoubtedly received from the very paſſage of Polybius we are now upon (6).

The wild elephant chiefly feeds upon ruſhes, ivy, the tender tops formed. The elephants were not wafted over, till the day after the defeat of the Gauls, who attempted to diſpute his paſſage. The particulars here laid down, added to thoſe already related in a former part of our hiſtory, make up a full and ample deſcription of this remarkable atchievement[s].

tops of palms, the young ſhoots of other trees, plants, &c. We are told, that when wild elephants find themſelves neceſſitated to paſs a river, that is not extremely deep, the younger ſwim over firſt, after which the others ford it, the females carrying their young on their trunks. Theſe animals herd together in great numbers in India, and are hunted by the Indians, partly on account of the ivory they produce, and partly for other reaſons. We find a full and particular deſcription of the Indian manner of hunting them in Agatharchides Cnidius, and Ælian (7).

Of all quadrupeds the elephant is the largeſt; the male is much higher and ſtronger than the female, being ſometimes in India nine cubits high, and capable of carrying a tower on his back, with thirty two warriors in it. With one ſtroke of his trunk he kills a camel or an horſe, and has been known to draw two caſt cannons faſtened together with cables, and weighing each three thouſand pounds, five hundred paces, with his teeth. The Indian elephants are either black or of a mouſe.colour; but ſome white ones are found in Ethiopia. According to Ptolemy, all the Ethiopian elephants were formerly of that colour. Some few were likewiſe produced in India, and looked upon as great curioſities by the princes of that country. It is remarkable, that this animal has a particular averſion to a ſow. The grunting of that creature, as well as the ſqueaking of a young pig, ſtrikes him with terror. A ram likewiſe he has an antipathy to. But his two worſt enemies are the dragon and the rhinoceros; the latter frequently worſting him in combat, and the former as often deſtroying him by ſucking all the blood out of his veins. Ælian tells us, that theſe dragons ſtrangle the elephant firſt. However, the blood, that they imbibe, kills them. Some authors affirm, that the female elephant goes two years with her young; and that the elephant is reckoned in his prime at ſixty years of age. Some elephants have been known to live above two hnndred, three hundred and fifty, and even four hundred years; for which reaſon that animal was a ſymbol of of eternity amongſt the antients, and, as ſuch, may be ſeen on the reverſes of ſeveral antique coins (8).

WHILST the elephants were croſſing over, Hannibal detached five hundred Numidian horſe to get intelligence of the enemy, who, he was informed, approached the banks of the Rhone with a powerful army, in order to give him battle. Theſe, falling in with a party of three hundred Roman and Gallic horſe, ſent out by Scipio upon the ſame deſign, a rencounter immediately enſued, which, after a briſk diſpute, ended in favour of the Romans, though the loſs was pretty equal on both ſides. As Hannibal had drawn up his troops in order of battle, and the Roman detachment purſued his cavalry to the camp, Scipio was ſoon acquainted with the diſpoſition of the Carthaginian army; which encouraged Hannibal continues his march.

Though the elephant is naturally a quiet and inoffenſive animal, yet he is terrible when provoked: nothing can ſtand before him; he overſets trees, houſes and walls; he tramples under foot every thing that comes in his way; he overthrows whole ſquadrons. His arms are his trunk, and his teeth his horns, for ſo ſome of the antients call them. His trunk is a long, hollow cartilage, like a large trumpet, hanging between his teeth, and frequently ſerves him for hands. His teeth are the ivory ſo well known to us, being of the nature of horn, and may be ſoftened. There have been elephants teeth ſeen as large as a man's thigh, and a fathom in length. When they quarrel amongſt themſelves, they ſtrike one another with their teeth, as bulls do with their horns. However, the elephant never uſes his ſtrength, but when compelled to it. He creates no terror in other creatures. If he is obliged to paſs through a herd of other beaſts, he puts them gently out of his way with his trunk, to make way for him. He feeds in the fields and meadows; and the weakeſt and tameſt animals, with impunity, play before him. If Ælian may be credited, the elephant is quite raviſhed and tranſported at the ſight of a beautiful woman. He takes great delight likewiſe, according couraged him to move with all poſſible expedition towards Hannibal, in order to attack him. That general was, for ſome time, in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould engage the Romans, ing to the ſame author, in beautiful flowers, particularly thoſe that emit fragrant odours, which are exceeding grateful to him (9).

Of all animals the elephant comes neareſt to man in ſagacity, docility, addreſs, clemency, prudence, equity, and, according to ſame authors, even religion. His modeſty, fidelity, chaſtity, &c. are likewiſe greatly celebrated by the antients. He underſtands the language of his guide, and of the country where he is produced. Pliny mentions one that underſtood Greek, and could write that language. Ælian tells us he ſaw another that wrote Latin, and, whilſt writing, behaved with great attention. In Hadrian's time, Arrian ſaw an elephant playing on a cymbal, and others dancing about him. That they worſhip the ſun, moon and ſtars, and even are not void of ſome ſenſe of moral duties, is atteſted by ſeveral good authors. In ſhort, ſo many things of this kind are related of them, as would ſeem fabulous, were they not delivered by grave writers. The antients gave them both names and ſurnames. The names were generally ſuch as great warriors had gone by, viz. Patroclus, Ajax, &c. They frequently bore a ſingular affection to their guides, of which we are ſupplied with ſome ſurpriſing inſtances by antiquity (10).

The natural parts of the elephant are under his belly, like thoſe of a horſe; but his teſticles lie concealed in his loins. The female elephant receives the male lying on her back, contrary to the nature of other beaſts; and he never courts her as long as any one appears in ſight. When he is heated with luſt, he beats down trees, walls, and every thing that approaches him, butting with his forehead like a ram. We are told he copulates but once in his whole life, and that about the twentieth year of his age. Others ſay, that the male is capable of propagating his ſpecies at ten years old, and the female at five; and that the male covers the female once every three years. The females bring forth only one at a time, which immediately ſucks the dam with its mouth, and not the trunk. The elephant ſleeps in an erect poſture; and, when he is tired, leans againſt a tree, which being cut in two, he falls to the ground, and cannot riſe, and by this means is ſometimes times taken by the Indians and Ethiopians. Wild elephants are likewiſe caught ſometimes by the help of a female elephant, which is ready for the male, and put into ſome narrow place between barricades, where the elephant engages himſelf, and is taken. They are alſo taken in deep ditches, dug particularly for that purpoſe, and covered with a little earth ſcattered over hurdles, which cloſe the open part of them. A nation inhabiting that part of Ethiopia to the weſt of the Nile, and not far from the line, uſed formerly to eat great numbers of thoſe they took; for which reaſon they were called Elephantophagi by Agatharchides Cnidius, and others. To what has been before mentioned, with regard to the elephants food, we may add, that ſome of them could eat at once nine Macedonian medimni of barley, beſides a great quantity of leaves and young branches of trees. They feed likewiſe upon legumes, hay, herbs, &c. as the tameſt animals They drink a vaſt quantity of liquor at once, as has been obſerved; but, to make amends for this, they can go eight days, without taking any liquid whatſoever. Though the wild elephants drank only water, thoſe that were trained up for war had either wine mixed with their water, or a liquor compoſed of water, rice, ſugar, &c. which infuſed new life and vigour into them, and made them exert themſelves in ſuch a manner, that nothing could ſtand before them. We read in the Maccabees, that the elephants of Antiochus Eupator's army had the blood of grapes and mulberries ſhewn them, that thereby they might be animated to the combat, to accuſtom them, as is were, to the ſight of blood; as likewiſe that it was uſual to intoxicate them, by giving them wine mixed with incenſe, or with parcels of incenſe; which parcels were dipped in the wine, in order to make the fumes of it the ſtronger, and conſequently more proper to intoxicate the elephants. Ælian ſays, that the only parts of the elephant uſed for food by the Elephantophagi, were his proboſcis, his lips, and the marrow of his horns. The ſame author affirms the fat of the elephant to be a preſervative againſt all venomous animals, which will not approach any thing anointed with it. We read in Philoſtratus of bulls and oxen, reſembling the elephant in ſize, ſkin and colour, common in Ethiopia (11).

quence of the resolution he had taken, the next day he decamped, commanding his horse to move towards the sea-coast, in order to prevent any sudden irruption from thence; the foot followed at some distance, whilst he himself waited for the coming up of the elephants, and the guides that conducted them. That his troops might bear the fatigues of so long and painful a march with the greater alacrity, Hannibal, the day before he began it, in the presence of them all, gave an audience to Magilus, who assured him by an interpreter, that his subjects ardently desired to see him; that both they, and the neighbouring Gauls, were ready to join him upon his first arrival amongst them; that he himself would take care to conduct his army through places where they should meet with a plentiful supply of provisions; and that he would soon bring them safe to Italy, which was one of the finest countries in the world. And then, after the prince was withdrawn, Hannibal, in a speech to them, magnified extremely this deputation from the Boii; extolled,

History affords us surprising instances of the dexterity of the elephant: in the public theatres at Rome, elephants danced upon ropes. They sat down in a formal manner to a feast, helping themselves, in a decent manner, to what they wanted, with their trunks. Forty of them carried lamps or torches before Julius Cæsar to the capitol, and from thence home, a representation of which we have upon an antient coin taken notice of by Spanheim. Some authors tell us, that, notwithstanding the antipathy betwixt swine and the elephant, pork cures that animal of ulcers, and other disorders; and that the tiger, a potent enemy, is frequently too hard for him. Thus we have enumerated the principal qualities and properties of the elephant; which is sufficient to give our readers a general idea of that creature, and consequently answers our purpose; tho' we might fill a volume by repeating what has been laid down by various authors on this subject. We shall conclude the whole by observing, that an elephant is called fyll in the Islandic tongue, and phill in the Turkish; and that Reland seems to derive the word baro or barro above-mentioned from the Persic barou, which signifies a castle, tower, bulwork, &c. (12).

extolled, with juſt praiſes, the bravery which his forces had hitherto ſhewn; and exhorted them to ſuſtain, to the laſt, their reputation and glory. The ſoldiers, greatly animated hereby, proteſted they were ready to execute all his meaſures. Nothing could have happened more favourable to Hannibal's affairs, than the arrival of Magilus, ſince there was no room to doubt the ſincerity of his intentions, the Boii bearing an implacable hatred to the Romans, and having even come to an open rupture with them, upon the firſt news, that Italy was threatened with an invaſion from the Carthaginians [t].

For four days Hannibal continued his march, croſſing through the midſt of Gaul, and moving northwards, with his horſe and elephants poſted in the rear; not becauſe this was the ſhorteſt way to the Alps, but becauſe it kept him at a conſiderable diſtance from the ſea, and conſequently enabled him to avoid Scipio, with whom he choſe to decline an engagement, in purſuance of the advice given him by Magilus, that he might march his army, without any diminution, into Italy. Advancing towards the country of the Allobroges, he found two brothers diſputing about the ſovereignty of a territory, where he encamped. Brancus, the elder brother, was driven from his throne by the younger part of his ſubjects, who eſpouſed his younger brother's intereſt. Hannibal, being made arbiter of this diſpute, reinſtated Brancus in the poſſeſſion of his dominions; who thereupon, out of a ſenſe of gratitude, ſupplied his troops with every thing they wanted, particularly arms, of which they ſtood in great need, their old ones being, in a manner, worn out by long ſervice; which was, as Polybius obſerves, the ſame thing as furniſhing him with a proper number of recruits. He likewiſe eſcorted him through the countries of the Tricaſtini, Vocontii, and Tricorii, as far as the river Druentia, now the Durance; from whence he reached the foot of the Alps without oppoſition [u].

As, in a former part of this work, we have given a large account of Hannibal's paſſing the Alps, we ſhall have no occaſion to expatiate upon that head here. Nothing further is requiſite to be done, than to inſert all the moſt material material circumstances and occurrences, relative to so famous a transaction, that have been hitherto omitted. This we shall do from those writers, whose authority is the most esteemed, and who have been the most particular in their descriptions of it; which, we hope, will not be unacceptable to our readers [w].

He comes to the summit of those mountains.

NOTWITHSTANDING most, if not all, of the barbarous nations, through whom Hannibal was to pass, had a mortal aversion to the Romans, yet, as they were incapable of friendship or fidelity, he frequently found both himself and his army in the most imminent danger of being cut off, and particularly at his beginning to ascend the Alps, soon after his escorte had left him. Being however informed, that the enemy only kept guard in the day-time, he found means to encamp not far from them; and, about the first watch of the night, ordering a great number of fires to be made in his camp, as though all his troops remained there, he moved, at the head of a choice detachment, to some passes in the neighbourhood, which the enemy had abandoned, their main body always retiring at night to a town at some distance. These he immediately seized upon, and soon after gave them a defeat, killing vast numbers of them upon the spot; upon which, advancing to the town, he found it deserted by the inhabitants. Here he met with plenty of cattle, and other provisions, with which, for three days together, he refreshed his forces. Continuing his march to the summit of the Alps, he encountered with many other difficulties. The sight of these mountains, which seemed to touch the skies, that were all covered with snow, and where nothing appeared to the eye but a few tottering cottages, scattered here and there on the sharp tops of inaccessible rocks; nothing but meagre flocks almost perished with cold, and hairy men of a savage and fiery aspect; this dismal spectacle, we say, renewed the terror, which the distant prospect of this ridge of mountains had raised, and struck a prodigious damp on the hearts of the soldiery. Besides which, the whole army was brought upon the verge of destruction by the perfidy of a Gallic nation, who, under the specious appearance of friends, persuaded Hannibal to commit himself to their conduct, promising to shew him the best and most expeditious way to the summit of the Alps. But these faithless guides, having having led him into a ſteep paſs, out of which they thought it would be impoſſible for him to make his eſcape, facing about on a ſudden, charged him with great fury, being ſupported by vaſt numbers of their countrymen, who, till that time, had kept themſelves concealed, but now ruſhed out from an eminence, that commanded this paſs, where they had placed an ambuſcade. However, Hannibal, by the wiſe diſpoſition of his forces, as well as the aſſiſtance of his elephants, and bravery of his infantry, who greatly diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion, at laſt diſperſed them; and, having ſurmounted all other difficulties, the ninth day from his beginning the aſcent, arrived at the top of the mountains. It muſt be obſerved, that Hannibal was, in a great meaſure, obliged to the elephants for his eſcaping all the diſaſters the enemy threatened him with, ſince wherever theſe huge animals appeared, the Gauls were ſtruck with ſuch terror, that they immediately took to their heels; by which means the Carthaginian general gained the ſummit of the Alps with the leſs moleſtation[x].

HERE Hannibal halted for two days, to refreſh his wearied troops, which were greatly diſheartened by the ſnow that had lately fallen. In order to animate them to make another effort with alacrity, from one of the higheſt hills he gave them a proſpect of the fruitful plains watered by the Po, the day before he decamped. He likewiſe pointed towards the place where Rome ſtood, which, he aſſured them, a battle or two would make them maſters of, and conſequently put a glorious period to all their toils. This inſpired them with ſuch vigour, that they ſeemed to have forgot all the fatigues they had undergone, and to think of nothing but taking poſſeſſion of that haughty city, whoſe conduct towards their ſtate had been nothing but one continued ſeries of inſults ſince the concluſion of the Sicilian war[y]. Animates his troops.

THEY therefore purſued their march; but the difficulty and danger encreaſed, in proportion as they approached nearer the end of the deſcent. We are told, that, about this time, Hannibal meditated a return home; but, from the main conduct and genius of that general, this ſeems highly improbable. To omit many particulars, they came Deſcends the Alps.

at laſt to a path naturally very ſteep and craggy, which being made more ſo by the late falling in of the earth, terminated in a frightful precipice above a thouſand foot deep. In fine, Hannibal found it would be impoſſible for him to accompliſh his deſign, without cutting a way into the rock itſelf, through which his men, horſes, and elephants, might paſs; which, with immenſe labour, he effected. Approaching therefore gradually the Inſubrian foot of the Alps, he detached ſome parties of his horſe to forage, there appearing now ſome ſpots of paſture, where the ground was not covered with ſnow. Livy informs us, that, in order to open and enlarge the path above-mentioned, all the trees thereabouts were cut down, and piled round the rock, after which fire was ſet to them. The wind, by good fortune, blowing hard, a fierce flame ſoon broke out; ſo that the rock glowed like the very coals with which it was ſurrounded. Then Hannibal, according to the ſame author, cauſed a great quantity of vinegar to be poured on the rock; which piercing into the veins of it, that were now cracked by the intenſe heat of the fire, calcined and ſoftened it. In this manner, taking a large compaſs about, in order that the deſcent might be eaſier, he cut a way along the rock, which opened a free paſſage to the forces, baggage, and elephants, as above obſerved. As Polybius has paſſed over in ſilence the uſe Hannibal made of vinegar on this occaſion, many reject that incident as fictitious. However, Pliny mentions one extraordinary quality of vinegar, viz. its being able to break rocks and ſtones, after fire had been applied to them, and found ineffectual. And that the walls, or at leaſt a ſtrong tower, of the city Eleuthera in Crete, after a continued operation for ſeveral nights, were thrown down by the force of vinegar, is aſſerted by Dio. Appian likewiſe, and Ammianus Marcellinus, atteſt the fact we have, from Livy, here taken notice of. But, admitting this acid to be endued with ſuch a quality, it ſeems difficult to conceive how Hannibal could procure a quantity of it ſufficient for his purpoſe in ſo mountainous and barren a country [z].

He arrives in Inſubria.

THREE days after this, Hannibal gained the fruitful plains of Inſubria, where, taking a review of his army, he found found, that, in five months and a half's march, (for ſo long was it ſince he had ſet out from New Carthage) he had loſt, by ſickneſs, deſertion, fatigue, and various engagements, thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; ſo that it amounted at preſent to no (G) more than twenty-ſix thouſand effective men. Of the ſoldiers miſſing, above twenty thouſand had periſhed ſince his departure from the Rhodanus. And here, that we may have a clearer idea of Hannibal's march, it will be proper to give the names and diſtances of ſome of the principal places, through which that general paſſed in his way to Italy; which we ſhall beg leave to tranſcribe from Polybius. From New Carthage to the Iberus were computed two thouſand ſix hundred ſtadia; from the Iberus to Emporium, a ſmall maritime town, which ſeparated Spain from the Gauls, according to Strabo, ſixteen hundred ſtadia; from Emporium to the banks of the Rhodanus, ſixteen hundred ſtadia; from the Rhodanus to the Alps, fourteen hundred ſtadia; from the Alps to the plains of Inſubria, twelve hundred ſtadia. In all eight thouſand four hundred ſtadia, making much about a thouſand Engliſh miles [a].

Upon Hannibal's arrival in Italy, he, for ſome time, encamped at the foot of the mountains, in order to give his troops ſome reſt, they having ſuffered extremely in their paſſage over the Alps. He firſt took care to refreſh them, Takes Taurinum.

(G) We have followed Polybius in this particular, ſince he tells us, he extracted this account from the column at Lacinium, which ſpecified the number of forces here mentioned. It is highly probable, as Livy followed Polybius in moſt points, that this column is the altar, that author tells us, Hannibal erected in the temple of Juno Lacinia, whereon he engraved the general account of his great atchievements in Greek and Punic letters. We do not learn from this teſtimony of Livy, in what language theſe memoirs were written; but as either the Greek or Punic, or rather both, bids the faireſt for it, Livy's authority confirms what we have lately ſuggeſted on that head. Polybius, it is certain, has been entirely ſilent as to this particular; and therefore Livy's authority is not deciſive. However, with what we have lately advanced, it is nearly, if not abſolutely, ſo (13).

(13) Polyb. in loc. citat. Liv. l. xxviii. ſub fin. Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xvii. p. 341. not. (D).

and afterwards to recruit his cavalry, that he might be ready to enter upon action. He then ſolicited the Taurini, who were at war with the Inſubres, to enter into an alliance with him. Upon their refuſal to conclude a treaty with him, he entered their territories in an hoſtile manner; and ſitting down before Taurinum, their capital city, after a ſiege of three days, took it by ſtorm, putting all, that made any reſiſtance, to the ſword. This ſtruck all the neighbouring Gauls with ſuch terror, that coming in to him as one man, they ſurrendered at diſcretion. By this firſt inſtance of ſucceſs, he had not only his army plentifully ſupplied with all kinds of proviſions, but likewiſe ſtrongly reinforced by great numbers of theſe Gauls, who took on in the Carthaginian ſervice. The reſt of the Gauls would, in all probability, have done the ſame thing, had they not been awed by the terror of the Roman arms, which were now approaching. Hannibal therefore thought his wiſeſt courſe would be to march up directly into their country without loſs of time, and make ſome important attempt; ſuch as might encourage thoſe, who ſhewed a diſpoſition to join him, to put themſelves under his protection [b].

And advances towards the Romans.

In the mean time, Hannibal received intelligence, that Scipio had paſſed the Po with his legions, and was advancing, with all poſſible celerity, to give him battle. This, at firſt, he could ſcarcely believe, thinking it impoſſible, that he ſhould return from Gaul to Italy, croſs Etruria, paſs the Po, and be ready to receive him, in ſo ſhort a time. What gave him this notion, was an information from thoſe he could confide in, that the paſſage from Maſſilia, now Marſeilles, to Etruria, by ſea, was extremely difficult and tedious; and the way to the laſt place from the Alps, by land, almoſt impracticable. Scipio, on his ſide, was as much ſurpriſed at Hannibal's expeditious march, and rapid progreſs. The news of his arrival in Italy, and the conqueſts he had already made there, ſo alarmed the people at Rome, that they diſpatched an expreſs to Sempronius at Lilybæum, to repair, with the utmoſt expedition, to the relief of his diſtreſſed country. Having received an account of the poſture of affairs, he embarqued immediately for Rome with the naval forces, leaving orders with the reſpective tribunes to draw together what troops they could out

out of their ſeveral garriſons, fixing a day for them to rendezvous at Ariminum, now Rimini, a town ſituated near the coaſt of the Adriatic, on the edge of the plains watered by the Po on the ſouth. Hannibal, beſides the method made uſe of to animate his ſoldiers formerly mentioned, in a ſet ſpeech, put them in mind of their glorious atchievements, and of the great difficulties they had ſurmounted. He told them, the Romans had never yet engaged men acted by deſpair, nor ſuch warriors as themſelves, who had marched from the pillars of Hercules, through the fierceſt nations, into the very heart of Italy. His own ſuperiority to Scipio in military experience and exploits, he inſinuated, they were not ſtrangers to. They could not but be ſenſible, he went on, that he was almoſt born, at leaſt educated, in his father Hamilcar's tent; that he was the conqueror of Spain, of Gaul, of the inhabitants of the Alps, and, what is ſtill more, of the Alps themſelves; that, by a little bravery, they would make themſelves maſters of Rome, and conſequently of all the Roman acquiſitions in Sicily, of which that ambitious republic had deprived their anceſtors. Laſtly, he rouſed their indignation againſt the inſolence of the Romans, who had the aſſurance to demand, that both he, and the other officers employed in the reduction of Saguntum, ſhould be delivered into their hands, in order to be put to the moſt exquiſite torture; endeavouring to inſpire them with a juſt abhorrence and deteſtation of ſuch a proud and imperious people, who imagined, that all things ought to obey them, and that they had a right to give laws to the whole world [c].

He defeats the Romans near the Ticinus.

In the mean time, Scipio, advancing to the Ticinus, threw a bridge over that river, and immediately erected a fort to defend it againſt all attempts of the enemy. It is not improbable, that he called it Ticinum, after the name of the river, and that this was the original of the city of Pavia, which, in the moſt antient authors, is called Ticinum. Whilſt the Romans were employed in raiſing this fort, Hannibal detached Maherbal, with a body of five hundred Numidian horſe, to lay waſte the territories of thoſe nations, that were in alliance with Rome; but gave him orders to ſpare the Gauls, and excite the various princes of that people, if poſſible, to a revolt. The Roman army, having having paſſed the Ticinus, advanced to a village of Inſubria, five miles from the fort they had built, and there encamped upon ſome heights, in ſight of the Carthaginians. Hannibal, upon this motion, called in the Numidian detachment under Maherbal, and made the proper diſpoſitions to attack the enemy. Before the ſignal was given, he thought it requiſite to animate his troops with freſh promiſes; which having done, cleaving with a ſtone the ſkull of the lamb he was ſacrificing, he prayed to Jupiter to daſh to pieces his head in like manner, in caſe he did not give his ſoldiers the rewards he had promiſed them. This rendered his troops impatient to come to blows with the enemy, eſpecially as two ill omens had juſt filled their army with terror and conſternation. In the firſt place, a wolf had ſtolen into the Roman camp, and cruelly mangled ſome of the ſoldiers, without receiving the leaſt harm from thoſe who endeavoured to kill it; and ſecondly, a ſwarm of bees had pitched upon a tree near the prætorium, or general's tent. However, Scipio moved at the head of his forces into the plain, where Hannibal had drawn up his troops in order of battle; and, advancing with his dartmen and cavalry to take a view of the number and poſture of the enemy, fell in with the whole body of the Carthaginian horſe, commanded by Hannibal himſelf; upon which the fight immediately began. As we have already given a full account of this battle, it will be unneceſſary to be prolix here in our deſcription of it. We ſhall therefore only obſerve, that Hannibal poſted in the centre of his cavalry the troopers who rode with bridles, and the Numidian horſe on the wings, in order to ſurround the enemy; that the action was very hot and bloody, victory continuing, for a long time, in ſuſpenſe; that many troopers on both ſides, in the heat of the action, diſmounted, and fought on foot; but that at laſt the Numidians charged the Romans in flank with ſuch fury, that they broke them, put their centre into diſorder, and wounded the conſul himſelf; which obliged the Romans, after having loſt the greateſt part of their army, to betake themſelves to a precipitate flight. The immediate conſequence of which victory was, that Scipio repaſſed the Ticinus in great confuſion, broke down the bridge he had lately thrown croſs that river, and left ſix hundred men in the fort to the mercy of the enemy, who ſurrendered at diſcretion to Hannibal upon his approach. It is agreed that Hannibal owed this firſt victory to his ſuperiority in cavalry, and the diſpoſition of the ground where the engagement happened, no place being more proper for ſuch troops to act in, than thoſe large open plains lying between the Po and the Alps [d].

And purſues them as far as the Trebia.

HANNIBAL, having thus driven the enemy out of the field, purſued them as far as the bridge above-mentioned; but finding it broke down, he marched up the river for two days, till he came to the banks of the Po. Here he diſpatched Mago, with the light Spaniſh horſe, to move after the Romans; who, having rallied their ſhattered forces, and repaſſed the Po, were encamped at Placentia. Aſdrubal immediately croſſed that river on a bridge of boats, and was followed by Hannibal with the groſs of the army, after he had given an audience to the deputies that came to him from ſeveral Gallic nations. Theſe nations, immediately upon Scipio's defeat, entering into an alliance with Hannibal, not only reinforced the Carthaginians by inliſting in their army, but ſupplied them plentifully with all ſorts of neceſſaries. Having given a moſt kind reception to the deputies above-mentioned, and concluded a treaty with them, he purſued his march with great expedition, ſoon joining Mago, who had advanced a days march beyond the Po, towards Placentia, where he halted, till Hannibal came up. Upon the junction of their forces, the two Carthaginian generals advanced to Placentia, and offered the Romans battle. But they judging it proper to decline accepting the challenge, the Carthaginians encamped ten miles from them, where a body of Gallic deſerters from the conſul's army came over to them, after they had cut to pieces a good number of the Romans. As the Boii likewiſe, about the ſame time, were guilty of an action equally black and perfidious, Scipio feared a general inſurrection of the Gauls; and therefore removing from the neighbourhood of their country, he paſſed the Trebia, a ſmall river which falls into the Po, taking poſt on an eminence near that river, on the frontiers of his allies. Here he encamped, being determined to remain in a ſtate of inaction, till the arrival of his collegue Sempronius with the forces from Sicily [e].

HANNIBAL, being apprised of the consul's departure from Placentia, sent the Numidian horse to harass him in his march, himself moving, with the main body of the army, to support them, in case of need. The Numidians, finding the Roman camp deserted, set fire to it; which gave the consul an opportunity of making his retreat without any loss: whereas, had not the Numidians spent their time in so trifling an action, they might have cut off a great part of the Roman army. However, they made such speed, that they arrived upon the banks of the Trebia, before the rear of the Romans had entirely passed that river, and put to the sword, or made prisoners, all the stragglers they found upon their arrival there. Soon after, Hannibal coming up, encamped in sight of the Roman army, on the opposite bank; and having, by his spies, soon learned the character of Sempronius, who had joined Scipio, and, during the disorder that general laboured under by reason of his wound, had the sole command of the Roman forces, formed a scheme to intrap him. In fine, Sempronius, being of a rash, though ambitious, disposition, contrary to the sentiments of Scipio, was resolved, at all events, to venture an engagement with Hannibal. To this he was farther excited by the scarcity of provisions prevailing in the Roman camp; whilst the Carthaginians enjoyed the greatest plenty and affluence, Hannibal having lately seized the principal Roman magazine at Clastidium, a city betrayed to him by Publius a Brundusian. As a body of Numidians, by Hannibal's orders, were ravaging the country of the Gauls in alliance with the Romans, he detached his cavalry in quest of them, who, coming up with them, gained an inconsiderable advantage over them; which so puffed up the consul, that, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, it being now about the winter solstice, he commanded his troops to be ready at an hour's warning to pass the river, and attack the Carthaginian camp. Hannibal, in the mean time, posted Mago, with a detachment of two thousand horse and foot, in ambuscade, on the steep banks of a rivulet running between the two camps; and then detached a body of Numidian cavalry to pass the Trebia, and insult the enemy, with orders to repass it upon the first motion of their army, and, if possible, to draw the Romans after them. This stratagem had the desired effect; for Sempronius, not being able to bear seeing himself braved in this manner, dispatched all his horse, supported by his his dart-men, after the Numidians, himſelf following with the reſt of the army. Upon this motion, a battle enſued, wherein, partly by the wiſe diſpoſition of the Carthaginian forces Hannibal had made, partly through the great imprudence of Sempronius, and partly by the bravery of his troops (H), Hannibal entirely defeated the Romans, in the manner by us already related. Almoſt the whole Roman army, except a body of ten thouſand men, who made their retreat to Placentia, were either ſlain, or taken priſoners. The Gauls, in the Carthaginian ſervice, ſuffered pretty much in the action; but the Carthaginians ſuſtained no conſiderable loſs, except that of their horſes and elephants, all of which laſt, but one, periſhed by the cold and in the battle. The Roman army conſiſted of ſixteen thouſand legionaries,

(H) We are told by the Roman authors, that the Carthaginians, at Hannibal's command, anointed their bodies with oil before the engagement began, making uſe of this expedient as a preſervative againſt the cold, a vaſt quantity of ſnow having fallen the day before. In like manner Xenophon tells us, that Cyrus's troops anointed themſelves with oil before large fires, when ſnow two cubits deep had fallen in Armenia. Frontinus inſinuates, that, on ſuch occaſions, the antients ſometimes uſed oil and wine mixed. It appears from Virgil, Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis, &c. that wreſtlers encreaſed their ſtrength and vigour, by applying oil to their bodies in the manner above-mentioned. In alluſion to which cuſtom, the antient chriſtian writers ſometimes called the Holy Spirit ΑΛΕΙΠΤΗΣ, or The Anointer; becauſe he ſupplies good chriſtians with an ample degree of courage and power in their ſpiritual warfare. The paſtors of the chriſtian church have likewiſe that name given them by ſome of the Greek fathers, on account of the aſſiſtance they afford the flocks committed to their care, in their ſtruggle with their ſpiritual enemies. That the antient Romans, as well as the Carthaginians, uſed oil for the ends juſt hinted at, is evident from many authors. Pliny relates, that when a perſon aſked Auguſtus in his extreme old age, how he came to preſerve ſuch vigour of body and mind ſo long? he anſwered, Intus mulſo, foris oleo, i. e. By refreſhing myſelf inwardly with wine, and outwardly with oil (14).

naries, twenty thouſand auxiliary forces, ſome companies of the Cœnomani, and four thouſand Roman horſe; Hannibal's of twenty thouſand Gallic, Spaniſh and African infantry, eight thouſand Spaniſh and Balearic ſlingers, and ten thouſand Gallic and Numidian cavalry. The Carthaginians purſued the routed enemy, with great ardour, as far as the Trebia; but did not think proper to paſs that river immediately, on account of the exceſſive cold. The next night Scipio decamped, and retired likewiſe with great precipitation to Placentia [f].

One cauſe of the defeat of Sempronius was his weakneſs in horſe.

It is evident, that what principally contributed to the defeat of the Roman army, was their inferiority in horſe; for the Carthaginian cavalry amounted to ten thouſand, whereas that of the Romans did not exceed four thouſand; and this body, ſmall as it was, could not act with vigour, being ſoon thrown into confuſion by the enemy's elephants. The horſes could neither bear the ſight nor ſmell of thoſe monſtrous animals, and therefore were, in the higheſt degree, terrified upon their approach. Scipio undoubtedly had acquainted Sempronius with the danger he was in from the enemy's ſuperiority in horſe, ſince he had loſt the battle of Ticinus juſt before by the weakneſs of his cavalry, and urged this among other topics, as a reaſon for him to decline an engagement. But Sempronius, being infatuated by his raſhneſs, as well as ambition, was deaf to all ſalutary admonitions, and, in conſequence of this infatuation, brought upon the Romans the ſignal loſs and diſgrace above-mentioned [g].

The Carthaginian operations by ſea.

The Carthaginians, upon Fabius's declaration of war, propoſed to act by ſea as well as land, againſt the Romans, and their allies; and therefore, beſides all their military preparations above-mentioned, fitted out twenty galleys, with a thouſand ſoldiers on board, to ravage the coaſts of Italy. Nine of theſe ſeized upon the iſlands of Lipari, and eight upon the iſland of Vulcania, the other three not being able to approach the ſhore, by reaſon of the tide's being againſt them. They likewiſe equipped a fleet of thirty-five quinqueremes, with a ſufficient land-force on board, to poſſeſs themſelves themſelves of Lilybæum. This laſt attempt however miſcarried, the Carthaginians being defeated by the Romans, and loſing ſeven of their veſſels, together with ſeventeen hundred of their men taken priſoners, amongſt whom were three Carthaginian noblemen. From the coaſt of Sicily, Sempronius, with the Roman and Syracuſian ſquadrons, ſailed to Melita, now Malta, and had the iſland, together with the Carthaginian forces in it, ſurrendered to him by Hamilcar, the ſon of Giſco, the governor. From Melita the conſul ſteered his courſe to the iſland of Vulcania, thinking to meet with the Carthaginian fleet; but he was diſappointed in his expectation, the Carthaginians having before ſailed to the coaſts of Italy, and plundered the territory of the city of Vibo, threatening at the ſame time to attack that city itſelf; which the conſul being appriſed of when he returned to Sicily, and likewiſe receiving letters from Rome by an expreſs, notifying to him Hannibal's arrival in Italy, with orders to return home with all poſſible expedition, he found himſelf obliged to alter his meaſures. He immediately therefore diſpatched Sextus Pomponius, with twenty-five long ſhips, to protect the maritime coaſts of Italy from the inſults of the Carthaginian ſquadron; and haſtened himſelf to Ariminum, from whence he proceeded to the Trebia, where he met with the misfortune above related [h].

The tranſactions in Spain this campaign.

WHILST Hannibal was puſhing on his conqueſts in Italy, Hanno, who commanded in Spain, received intelligence, that the Romans, under the command of Cneius Scipio, had advanced as far as the Iberus, and reduced all the country betwixt that river and the Pyrenees. Upon this advice, Hanno aſſembled his forces, and marched to the city of Ciſſa, where he encamped in ſight of the Romans. The vicinity of the two armies ſoon brought on a general action, wherein the Carthaginians were totally routed. Hanno himſelf was taken priſoner, together with Indibilis, a Spaniſh prince, entirely devoted to the Carthaginians. Their camp was forced, ſix thouſand of them ſlain, and two thouſand taken priſoners. All the heavy baggage Hannibal left with Hanno before his departure for Italy, fell a prey to the Romans; and many of the Spaniſh nations concluded an offenſive and defenſive alliance with Scipio upon this defeat. However, this did not diſcourage the Carthaginians; for Aſdrubal, another Carthaginian ginian commander, hearing that the Roman ſeamen and marines had diſperſed themſelves about the country, without any order or diſcipline, immediately paſſed the Iberus with a body of eight thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, fell upon them unexpectedly, and put the greateſt part of them to the ſword, purſuing the reſt to their fleet. Nothing of moment happened afterwards this campaign in Spain, Aſdrubal taking up his winter-quarters at new Carthage, as ſoon as he had ended this expedition; and the Romans theirs at Tarraco, after Scipio had divided the booty got from the Carthaginians by the late victory amongſt his troops [i].

Hannibal's policy to win over to his intereſt the allies of the Romans.

THE Romans, having received an account of the two terrible blows given them by Hannibal upon the Ticinus and the Trebia, were ſtruck with the utmoſt terror and conſternation. However, they made vigorous preparations to continue the war. In the mean time Scipio removed from Placentia to Cremona, where he put his troops into winter-quarters. Hannibal, after the action upon the Trebia, ordered the Numidians, Celtiberians, and Luſitanians, to make incurſions into the Roman territories, where they committed great depredations: and not contented with this, he formed a deſign to make himſelf maſter of a Roman fortreſs in the neighbourhood of Placentia; but miſcarried in the attempt. He likewiſe reduced Victumviæ, making the garriſon priſoners of war; which concluded the operations of this campaign. But, during his ſtate of inaction, he took care to refreſh his troops, and win the affections of the Gauls, as well as the allies of the Romans. He therefore declared to the Gallic and Italian priſoners he had taken, that he had no intention to make war upon their nations, being determined to reſtore them to their liberty, and protect them againſt the Romans. To confirm them in the idea he was deſirous they ſhould entertain of him, he diſmiſſed them, without demanding the leaſt ranſom [k].

He marches into Etruria.

DURING the winter, Hannibal's troops were reinforced by a conſiderable body of Gauls, Ligurians, and Etruſcans, who, for various reaſons, thought proper to abandon the Romans. Hannibal however repoſed no great truſt in his auxiliaries, but rather entertained a ſuſpicion of them; on which account he diſguiſed himſelf this winter in the manner already related. He was the better enabled to do this by the variety variety of languages he underſtood, amongſt which Zonaras mentions the Latin. By this conduct he found, that the moſt effectual way for him to ſecure himſelf, was to change the theatre of the war, and march into Etruria. This he did, after a briſk rencounter with Sempronius, wherein many fell on both ſides, as we have already obſerved in a former part of this hiſtory [1].

And advances to Arretium.

HANNIBAL having, to the great ſurprize of all, croſſed the Apennines, and penetrated into Etruria, received intelligence, that the new conſul Flaminius lay encamped, with the Roman army, under the walls of Arretium. Purſuant to the plan of operations laid down, he moved directly that way, in order to inform himſelf of the Roman general's capacity and deſigns, as well as the courſe and ſituation of the country. As his troops had been greatly haraſſed by the late fatiguing march, he halted ſome time in the neighbourhood of Fæſulæ to refreſh them. Here he learned the true character of Flaminius, that he was a good orator, but entirely ignorant of the military art: in fine, that he was raſh, proud, and of a fierce diſpoſition. This gave Hannibal no ſmall encouragement, not doubting but he ſhould ſoon be able to bring him to a battle. Hannibal, in the firſt ſtep he took, ſays Polybius, acted like a wiſe commander, ſince it ought to be the chief ſtudy of a general to diſcover the genius of his antagoniſt, in order to take advantage of his foible. To inflame the impetuous ſpirit of Flaminius, the Carthaginian general advanced towards Arretium, taking the way to Rome, and leaving the Roman army behind him, deſtroying all the country, through which he moved, with fire and ſword. As that part of Etruria abounded with corn, cattle, all ſorts of proviſions, in fine, with all the elegancies, as well as neceſſaries, of life, being one of the richeſt and moſt fertile ſpots of ground in Italy, the Romans, and their allies, ſuſtained an incredible loſs on this occaſion.

Flaminius purſues Hannibal.

FLAMINIUS was not of a temper to continue inactive in his camp, though Hannibal ſhould have lain ſtill, and given him no provocation; but when he beheld the territories of the allies of Rome ravaged in ſo dreadful a manner, he loſt all patience, thinking it would reflect the greateſt diſhonour upon him, him, ſhould he permit Hannibal to continue his devaſtations with impunity, and even advance to the very walls of Rome without oppoſition. He reſolved therefore immediately to attack the Carthaginians; and ſo furiouſly was he bent upon this, that when the officers of the army, in a council of war, endeavoured to prevail upon him to wait the arrival of his collegue, he ruſhed out of the council in a rage, giving orders to the army inſtantly to begin their march. "Yes truly, "ſaid he, we ought to ſit ſtill before the walls of Arre-"tium, ſince this is our native country, and here are our ha-"bitations! We ought to let Hannibal eſcape out of our hands, "and deſtroy all the country, to the very walls of Rome, "with fire and ſword! We ought, by no means, to move "from hence, till the conſcript fathers ſend for C. Flaminius "from Arretium, as they formerly did for Camillus from "Veii!" He mounted his horſe in ſuch a hurry, that he fell from him; which was conſidered as a bad omen. This, however, made no impreſſion upon him. Immediately after this, a meſſenger came to acquaint him, that the enſigns ſtuck ſo faſt in the ground, that the ſoldiers could not pull them out. Upon which, turning towards him, "Doſt thou bring me a "letter likewiſe, ſaid he, from the ſenate, prohibiting me "to act againſt the Carthaginians? Go tell them, they may "dig the enſigns up, if their hands are ſo benumbed with "fear, that they cannot pull them out". As though therefore he had been certain of victory, he immediately decamped, approaching Hannibal with the utmoſt temerity, in order to attack him [m].

In the mean time Hannibal kept on, ſtill advancing towards Rome, having Cortona on the left-hand, and the lake Thraſymenus on the right. At laſt, obſerving the diſpoſition of the ground to be very commodious for his purpoſe, he put himſelf into a poſture to receive Flaminius, who was upon the point of coming up with him. The lake Thraſymenus, and the mountains of Cortona, form a very narrow defile, which leads into a large valley, lined on both ſides with hills of a conſiderable height, and cloſed at the outlet by a ſteep hill, of difficult acceſs. Upon this hill Hannibal encamped with his Spaniſh and African troops, poſting the Baleares and light-armed infantry, which were drawn up in one long line, in in ambuſcade, at the foot of the hill on the right-ſide of the valley, and lining with the Gallic cavalry the left-ſide of it, in ſuch manner, that they extended as far as the entrance of the defile. Hannibal, having thus in the night ſurrounded the valley with his forces, lay ſtill, as though he had no intention to engage. This farther excited the conſul to fall upon the Carthaginians as ſoon as poſſible; for which end he ſo eagerly purſued them, that the following night he advanced to the valley, and entered it the next morning, moving with his vanguard at a ſmall diſtance from the lake Thraſymenus above-mentioned. Hannibal, now obſerving, that the greateſt part of Flaminius's troops marched in diſorder, and were ſo near him, that his men could not fail of doing great execution amongſt them, provided they inſtantly charged them with vigour, ordered them to be attacked in front, in rear, and in flank, at the ſame time. As the Roman officers could not ſee which way to lead their men, nor diſcover the enemy that charged them, by reaſon of a thick fog from the lake, the conſular army was, in a moment, thrown into confuſion. Flaminius however did his utmoſt to animate his men, exhorting them to cut themſelves a paſſage with their ſwords through the midſt of the enemy; but the tumult, which reigned eevry-where, the dreadful ſhouts of the enemy, and the fog that was riſen, prevented his being ſeen or heard. However, the Romans, ſeeing the impoſſibility of ſaving themſelves by flight, and a little recovering themſelves upon the diſſipation of the fog, for ſome time fought with unparallelled bravery; but Flaminius himſelf being ſlain by an Inſubrian, they began to give ground, and at laſt betook themſelves to a precipitate flight. The Roman army, according to Appian, conſiſted of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; of which fifteen thouſand (twenty thouſand, ſays Appian) fell upon the field of battle, and ſix thouſand, that retreated to a town in Etruria, ſurrendered the next day at diſcretion to Maherbal. According to Valerius Maximus, Eutropius, and Oroſius, five-and-twenty thouſand Romans periſhed in this action. Hannibal loſt only fifteen hundred men on this occaſion, moſt of whom were Gauls, though great numbers, both of his ſoldiers and the Romans, died afterwards of their wounds. He commanded the ſtricteſt ſearch to be made for the body of Flaminius, in order to give it a decent interment; but it could not be found.

He

He likewiſe ſolemnized the funerals of thirty of his chief officers, who had been ſlain in the action; but was at a loſs how to diſpatch a courier to Carthage, with an account of the glorious victory he had gained. All the other principal particulars relating to the defeat of the Romans at the lake Thraſymenus, our readers will find in a proper place.

Maherbal routs Centenius.

HANNIBAL, being informed, that the conſul Servilius had detached a body of four, or, according to Appian, eight thouſand horſe from Ariminum, to reinforce his collegue in Etruria, ſent out Maherbal, with all the cavalry, and ſome of the infantry, to attack him. The Roman detachment conſiſted of choſen men, and was commanded by (I) Centenius a patrician. Maherbal had the good fortune to meet with him, and, after a ſhort diſpute, entirely defeated him. Two thouſand of the Romans were laid dead upon the ſpot, the reſt retiring to a neighbouring eminence, where being ſurrounded by Maherbal, they were obliged the next day to ſurrender at diſcretion. This blow, happening within a few days after the defeat at the lake Thraſymenus, almoſt gave a finiſhing ſtroke to the Roman affairs. Appian tells us, that the people in Rome were ſo alarmed on this occaſion, that they expected an immediate viſit from Hannibal; and therefore not only poſted great numbers of dartmen on the ramparts to defend them, but likewiſe armed even the old men with the arms taken from their enemies in former wars, and hung up as trophies in their temples. Hannibal however, now thinking himſelf ſo much ſuperior to the Romans, that they would not be able hereafter to make head againſt him, did not advance to Rome, but moved towards the territory of Adria, taking his route through Umbria and Picenum. As he plundered all the country through which he marched, upon his arrival in the territory of Adria, he was loaded with booty.

(I) We cannot forbear expreſſing our ſurprize, that Iſaac Caſaubon, in his Latin verſion of Polybius, ſhould prefer the name Centronius to Centenius, ſince, in the original, it is Centenius. That very learned man might have been convinced by Sigonius, in his excellent ſcholia upon Livy, that, tho' ſome antient copies of this laſt author have in one place Centronius, Centenius was the name of the general here mentioned. To what Sigonius has ſaid, we ſhall only beg leave to add, that Appian and Zonaras both call this proprætor Centenius; which is a confirmation of that great man's opinion (15).

booty. Spoletum he attacked in his march; but was repulſed with great loſs. From thence approaching the frontiers of Apulia, he ravaged the adjacent territories, viz. the country of the Marſi, Marrucini, Peligni, together with the diſtricts of Arpi and Luceria. The conſul Cn. Servilius did nothing memorable this campaign. He had only a few ſlight ſkirmiſhes with the Gauls, and made himſelf maſter of an inconſiderable town. However, he thought proper to move towards Rome, to cover that capital from any attempts of the Carthaginians. Polybius tells us, that Hannibal treated the allies of the Romans with the utmoſt cruelty in this expedition, which that author attributes to the invincible averſion he had been inſpired with by his father Hamilcar to the Romans.

THE Carthaginian army at this time was very ſickly, being troubled with a ſcorbutic diſorder, called by the Greeks Lemopſoros. This ſeemed owing to the unwholſome encampments they had been obliged to make, and their march through ſo many moraſſes. As both the horſes and men were infected with it, Hannibal found it abſolutely neceſſary to repoſe his troops for ſome time in the territory of Adria, which was a moſt pleaſant and fruitful country. In his various engagements with the Romans, he had taken a great number of their arms, with which he now armed his men after the Roman manner. Being now likewiſe maſter of that part of the country bordering on the ſea, he found means to ſend an expreſs to Carthage, with the news of the glorious progreſs of his arms. The Carthaginians received this news with the moſt joyful acclamations, at the ſame time coming to a reſolution to reinforce, with a proper number of troops, their armies both in Italy and Spain. They alſo had frequent conſultations how they might ſend them a plentiful ſupply of all neceſſaries with the utmoſt expedition, being determined to proſecute the war with all poſſible vigour [n].

Hannibal arms his ſoldiers after the Roman manner.

HANNIBAL, having refreſhed his army, and over-run the territory of the Prætutii, Ferentani, Daunii, Meſſapii, and, in fine, the whole province of Apulia, encamped near Ibonium. In the mean time Fabius, for his ſingular virtue and abilities ſurnamed Maximus, was elected dictator at Rome, and had the abſolute command of the Roman army given him. Fabius ordered the conſul Servilius to watch the motions of the Carthaginians by ſea, whilſt he, with the legions, and his general of the horſe, advanced to Ægæ, to have an eye upon Hannibal. The cunning Carthaginian made a great variety of movements, and had recourſe to an infinity of ſtratagems, in order to draw the Roman general to a battle, which it was his higheſt intereſt to do; but all his endeavours proved ineffectual. Hannibal therefore, having before ravaged all the country bordering on the Adriatic, croſſed the Apennines, and entered into Samnium, where he likewiſe committed great devaſtations. He plundered the territory of Beneventum, took the ſtrong city of Venuſia, and laid ſiege to Teleſia, a town at the foot of the Apennines. Fabius ſtill kept pace with him, tho' he did not think proper to approach the Carthaginians nearer than a day's march, being determined to decline an engagement. Hannibal, being convinced, that a ſtate of inaction muſt prove fatal to him, in order to draw Fabius to a battle, marched his army into Campania, by the advice of ſome of the Italian priſoners he had diſmiſſed after the late battle, and who now had joined him. Accordingly he ordered his guides to conduct him to the territory of Caſinum, being informed, that, if he could make himſelf maſter of this, he ſhould cut off all communication betwixt the Romans and their allies on that ſide. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, not having the true pronunciation of the Latin, named Caſilinum, inſtead of Caſinum, to his guides; who thereupon purſued a different route, leading him through the diſtricts of Allifæ, Calatia, and Cales, into that of Stella, where finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides by mountains and rivers, he enquired in what part of the world he was; and received for anſwer from his guides, that he ſhould lodge that night at Caſilinum; when diſcovering the miſtake, he put to death the principal of them, and detached Maherbal, with a body of horſe, to plunder the territory of Falernum. That general, penetrating as far as the waters of Sinueſſa, deſtroyed all the country, as he advanced, with fire and ſword, the Numidians making a terrible ſlaughter of the poor country people. However, the Campanians continued firm in their obedience to the Romans. Hannibal afterwards, encamping upon the Vulturnus, ravaged the whole province in a moſt dreadful manner, Fabius not offering to ſtir, though he beheld beheld theſe devaſtations from the top of mount Maſſicus, where he had poſted himſelf to obſerve the motions of the Carthaginian army. This greatly incenſed both the Roman troops, and his general of the horſe, againſt him [o].

He cannot bring Fabius to a battle.

ALL methods had been now tried in vain by Hannibal to bring Fabius to a battle. He had at firſt advanced to his very intrenchments at Ægæ, and braved him; he had upbraided him and his troops with having loſt the valour of their anceſtors, tho' at the ſame time he inwardly fretted to find himſelf engaged with a general of ſo different a genius from Sempronius and Flaminius; he had endeavoured to rouze him by frequent removals from place to place, by laying waſte the lands, plundering the cities, and burning the villages and towns. He, at one time, would decamp with the utmoſt precipitation, and at another quite ſtop ſhort in ſame remote valley, to ſee whether he could not ruſh out, and ſurpriſe him in the plain; but, notwithſtanding all his artifices, all his marches, countermarches, and fineſſes, the dictator inflexibly adhered to his firſt reſolution, and thereby gave the crafty Carthaginian to underſtand, that the Romans, inſtructed by their defeats, had at laſt made choice of a general capable of oppoſing Hannibal [p].

He retires from Campania.

As Campania was a country more agreeable to the eye, than proper for the ſubſiſtence of an army, and the Carthaginians would have been forced to have taken up their winter-quarters amongſt moraſſes, rocks and ſands, had they remained any conſiderable time longer there, Hannibal began to think of decamping. To this he was farther excited by an apprehenſion, that the Romans would receive plentiful ſupplies from Capua, and the richeſt countries in Italy. That he might not therefore conſume idly the proviſions he had amaſſed for the winter-ſeaſon, nor loſe the immenſely rich ſpoils gotten in the provinces he had ravaged, he began his march out of Campania towards the decline of ſummer, and purſued it for ſome time with great expedition [q].

And with great difficulty arrives on the confines of Samnium.

IT being natural to ſuppoſe, that Hannibal would return the ſame way he came, and Fabius being appriſed of this by his ſpies, the Roman general ordered a detachment of four thouſand men to advance, and poſſeſs themſelves of the paſs on mount Eribanus, exhorting them to behave with bravery, when an opportunity of engaging the Carthaginians offered. After this, Fabius, that he might the more eaſily annoy Hannibal in his march, threw another body of troops into Caſilinum, a ſmall town ſituated on the Vulturnus, which ſeparated the territories of Falernum from thoſe of Capua, and at the ſame time took poſt with the main body of his army on mount Callicula. From hence he ſent a party of four hundred horſe, under the command of L. Hoſtilius Mancinus, to reconnoitre the enemy, with orders to retire upon the firſt news of their approach. Mancinus, paying no regard to his orders, ſkirmiſhed with ſeveral ſtraggling parties of Numidians, who, retiring before him, drew him on by degrees nearer the Carthaginian camp; which Cartalo, general of the Carthaginian cavalry, obſerving, purſued him, at the head of a good body of horſe, five miles, and at laſt coming up with him, cut him off, with the greateſt part of his men. The reſt fled to Cales, from whence, through ſeveral by-paths, they made their eſcape to Fabius, bringing him the melancholy news of the diſaſter that had befallen them[r].

HANNIBAL, with his forces, ſoon arrived at the foot of the mountains, where he encamped. Soon after, an action happened between him and Fabius, wherein he loſt eight hundred men, and the Romans two hundred. But here he found himſelf involved in great difficulties, being pent up in ſuch a manner, by reaſon of the Romans having ſeized upon Caſilinum and Callicula, that it ſeemed impoſſible for him to make his eſcape. Now he found, that his own arts were put in practice againſt him, and that he had fallen into much the ſame ſnare he had laid for Flaminius at the lake Thraſymenus. Fabius, in the mean time, thinking he had his enemy in his power, was making the proper diſpoſitions for an attack the next morning. At this critical conjuncture, Hannibal, by the aſſiſtance of two thouſand wild and tame oxen, with torches, faggots, and dry vine-branches, tied to their horns, and driven quietly in the dead of the night, to the top of the hills where the Romans lay encamped, found means to gain the paſs above-mentioned, which opened a way for him to Allifæ. We are told, that, before he communicated this ſtratagem to his general officers, he maſſacred five thouſand Italian priſoners, to prevent its taking air by their means, as well as to hinder their joining the enemy, if his deſign ſhould ſhould miſcarry. By this ſingular contrivance, Hannibal eluded all the efforts of Fabius, and preſerved both himſelf and his army, when they were upon the very brink of deſtruction. It is certainly glorious for a general to turn his very errors to his advantage, and make them ſubſervient to his fame. For the particulars of this ſtratagem we muſt refer our readers to the Roman hiſtory [s].

His motions afterwards.

As ſoon as day-light appeared, Hannibal obſerved, that his light-armed troops were advanced to the ſummit of the mountain, on which was the defile he had forced the Romans to abandon by the ſtratagem above-mentioned. Here they met with a ſtrong body of the Romans, who had aſcended the hill in the night; ſo that they were in danger of being all cut to pieces, eſpecially as the enemy had found means to ſurround them. Upon this, Hannibal detached a party of Spaniards to bring them off, which he imagined them capable of doing, as they were more uſed to craggy rocks and precipices, as well as more active and nimble, than the Romans. Accordingly, the Spaniards charged the Romans with ſo much bravery, that they put them to flight, killed a thouſand of them upon the ſpot, and covered the retreat of their companions in ſuch a manner, that ſcarce a man was loſt on this occaſion [t].

HANNIBAL, upon his arrival near the confines of Samnium, made a motion, as tho' his intention had been to paſs through that province towards Rome; but, wheeling about on a ſudden, he fell into the country of the Peligni, which he ravaged a ſecond time. From thence he retired into Apulia, and took poſſeſſion of a defenceleſs town called Gerion; which the inhabitants abandoned upon his approach. This is Livy's account. But, according to Polybius, who calls the place (K) Gerunium, making it

(K) We believe, with Gronovius, that the true name of this town was Gerunium, and conſequently that Livy's text ought to be emended. This ſeems to appear, not only from the ſuperior authority of Polybius, but likewiſe from Peutinger's table, in which the place under conſideration is called Geronium. Other reaſons might be offered, were there any occaſion for them (16).

about twenty-five miles diſtant from Luceria, it ſtood a ſiege, and was at laſt taken by ſtorm. Hannibal, if we chuſe to follow the ſame author, put all the inhabitants to the ſword; but made granaries of the houſes, lodged his troops under the walls, and fortified his camp with a retrenchment. From hence he ſent two thirds of his army to gather in the corn of the province, which was extremely fertile, ordering them by turns to relieve daily the other third part that remained with him. This he had always drawn up in battalia, not only to protect the others, but likewiſe to prevent the enemy from making any attempt upon his camp. In the mean time Fabius, being ſent for to Rome, left the command of the army to Minucius, his general of the horſe, with orders to obſerve the motions of Hannibal at a proper diſtance; but by no means to engage him [u].

Minucius gains ſome ſlight advantages over Hannibal.

MINUCIUS, being of a contrary diſpoſition to Fabius, reſolved not to keep in the path, which that general had chalked out for him. Being therefore informed, that the greateſt part of the Carthaginian army was diſperſed over the territory of Gerunium, in order to forage, and that Hannibal himſelf lay encamped with the other part under the walls of that place, he took poſt on an eminence called Calela, in the neighbourhood of Larinum, not far from Hannibal's camp. Hannibal, receiving intelligence of the enemy's approach, recalled part of his foragers, and poſſeſſed himſelf of an aſcent about two miles from Gerunium, imagining, that this poſt would enable him to ſecure his other foragers from all inſults. The night after his arrival here, he ſent two thouſand of his light-armed troops to ſeize upon a riſing ground cloſe by the Roman camp; which they effected without oppoſition. But, the next morning, Minucius detached a body of his light-armed forces to diſlodge them from thence; which, after a briſk action, they did, putting many of them to the ſword, and diſperſing the reſt. Animated by this firſt inſtance of ſucceſs, Minucius attacked the Carthaginian foragers, cut many of them to pieces, and, in a rencounter, had the advantage over Hannibal. Theſe things being known at Rome, greatly ſunk the credit of Fabius, and occaſioned there there a general condemnation of his conduct; nay, as Hannibal had artfully ſpared his lands in the general devaſtation, ſome began to entertain a ſuſpicion of his having kept a ſecret correſpondence with the Carthaginians. The people and ſenate of Rome however did not take the command of the army abſolutely from him; but gave Minucius an equal authority with the dictator. After Fabius's return to the army, the two generals agreed to divide the forces, that each of them might have his ſeparate corps, Fabius, on account of his ſuperior ſkill in the military art, and that he might be able to preſerve at leaſt one part of the army, not being diſpoſed to give his conſent to an alternate command [w].

NOTHING could be more agreeable to Hannibal, than to hear of the diſgrace of Fabius, whoſe meaſures he ſo much dreaded. He flattered himſelf, that the diſſenſion between the two commanders, and the raſhneſs of Minucius, would throw an opportunity into his hands of embaraſſing the Roman affairs more than ever. He reſolved therefore to lay a ſnare for Minucius; which fortune ſoon pointed out to him a method of doing. Fabius encamped on the hills, after his uſual manner; and Minucius in the plain, near the Carthaginians. Hannibal in the mean time obſerving a ſmall riſing ground between him and Minucius, by which either might incommode the other, formed a deſign to make himſelf maſter of it, not doubting but this would bring on an action between them. In order to which, he laid an ambuſcade of five thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, divided into parties of two and three hundred men each, poſted in different places near this eminence. He then commanded a body of his light-armed men to advance, and take poſſeſſion of that poſt; which Minucius endeavouring to prevent, fell into the ambuſcade, and had been cut off with all his men, if Fabius had not ruſhed from the hills, like a torrent, to his aſſiſtance in the critical moment, and forced Hannibal to retire. Hannibal is reported to have ſaid on this occaſion, "That he had overcome Minucius, and Fabius him." Hannibal, after this action, fortified his camp, ſeized upon the eminence above-mentioned, mentioned, drew a line round it, and then continued in a ſtate of inaction till the following campaign [x].

The Romans defeat the Carthaginians in Spain.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Italy, Cneius Scipio, having, as we obſerved, conquered all the Spaniſh cantons from the Pyrenees to the Iberus, put his troops into winter-quarters at Tarraco. Aſdrubal however, as we at the ſame time informed our readers, gave the Romans a conſiderable blow towards the cloſe of the campaign; the conſequence of which, according to Livy, was, that the Ilergetes, who had left in Scipio's hands hoſtages for their fidelity, declared for the Carthaginians. Scipio, being appriſed of this, aſſembled a body of forces, and immediately inveſted their capital city Athanagia. He puſhed on the ſiege with ſuch vigour, though in the midſt of winter, that the Ilergetes found themſelves obliged to have recourſe to his clemency, Aſdrubal being then at too great a diſtance to afford them ſpeedy ſuccours. As the principal author of the revolt was fled, Scipio was the more readily induced to pardon them. Having therefore exacted a good ſum of money from them for their perfidy, and compelled them to give him new hoſtages for their future good behaviour, he took them again into favour. From hence he marched againſt the Auſetani, allies of the Carthaginians, ſeated near the Iberus, and ſat down before their metropolis. During this ſiege, he drew a great body of the neighbouring Spaniards, particularly of the Lacetani, who came to the aſſiſtance of the Auſetani, into an ambuſcade he laid for them, putting twelve thouſand of them to the ſword, and diſperſing the reſt. However, he could not reduce the city for the ſpace of thirty days, on account of the rigour of the ſeaſon, which was ſuch, that the Roman engines of battery could not play upon it. At laſt, Amuſitus, their prince, having found means to retire to Aſdrubal, the garriſon delivered up the place to Scipio for twenty talents of ſilver; after which that general moved again into his winter-quarters. In the mean time Aſdrubal reinforced the ſquadron, his brother had left him, with ten galleys, ſo that it now conſiſted of forty-five ſhips of the line; and gave the command of it to one Hamilcar, an officer who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf on various various occaſions. Hamilcar, purſuant to his orders, put to ſea, with an intention to coaſt along, till he came to the mouth of the Iberus, where Aſdrubal was to meet him at the head of the land-forces, that they might in concert, begin the operations of the campaign. Scipio, receiving intelligence of their deſign, and at the ſame time hearing, that Aſdrubal was already in motion, immediately fitted out a fleet of five-and-thirty ſail, putting the flower of his land-forces on board. Upon his arrival near the mouth of the Iberus, he diſpatched two Maſſilian veſſels to reconnoitre the enemy, who brought him advice that their ſquadron of galleys actually rode at anchor in the mouth of the river; upon which he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to attack it. Aſdrubal, receiving timely notice of this, drew up his army in order of battle on the ſhore, to aſſiſt, or at leaſt to animate, his naval forces; but they were not able to withſtand the efforts of the Romans, who, after a warm diſpute, entirely defeated them, forced all the veſſels on ſhore, killed great numbers of the ſeamen and marines, and carried off thirty-five galleys. From this time, the Carthaginian affairs began to wear a bad aſpect in Spain [y].

And gain ſeveral other advantages over them in Spain and Africa.

THE Carthaginians, receiving intelligence of this blow, equipped another fleet of ſeventy ſail with the utmoſt expedition, knowing of what vaſt conſequence it was to them to be maſters of the ſea. With this, according to Polybius, they put in at one of the ports of Sardinia, and proceeded from thence to Piſa; where the admiral propoſed to have a conference with Hannibal. But Servilius, who commanded a Roman ſquadron of an hundred and twenty galleys, prevented that intercourſe, the Carthaginians thinking proper to ſheer off upon his approach, and return to Carthage. Servilius, for ſome time, gave them chace; but finding himſelf not able to come up with them, he left off the purſuit, and ſteered his courſe for Cercina, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of the Regio Syrtica; which he laid under contribution. From thence he ſailed to Coſſyrus, another little iſland, not far from Carthage; which he eaſily made himſelf maſter of, and left a garriſon in the town. After this he ſet ſail for Sicily, and arrived ſafe with his ſquadron in the harbour of Lilybæum [z].

The consequences of the defeat in Spain.

In the mean time Scipio made a good use of his late naval victory. He first advanced to Honosca, which he closely besieged both by sea and land, took it by storm and levelled it with the ground. Then he made a descent in Africa, ravaged all the country about Carthage, and burnt several houses adjoining to the haven and the wall. Loaded with spoil, he departed from thence to Longuntica, where he found a vast quantity of spartum, a shrub much used in the navigating of ships, amassed by Asdrubal, which he either carried off for his own use, or burnt. Afterwards he landed a body of forces in the island Ebusus, now Yvica, plundered it, and burnt some streets of its capital city; but could not reduce the town. However, he concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of this, and the other Balearic islands. Upon the fame of these exploits, Livy tells us, an hundred an twenty different cantons of Spaniards submitted to the Romans, who penetrated as far as the Saltus Castulonensis, Asdrubal retiring before them into Lusitania, and those parts of Spain bordering upon the ocean [a].

Asdrubal reduced to great difficulties.

Whilst the Carthaginian affairs were in such a melancholy situation in Spain, Mandonius, a person of distinction amongst the Ilergetes, advanced to the frontiers of some of the allies of Rome, with a design to plunder them. Scipio, being apprised of this, detached a body of three thousand Romans, with some Spanish auxiliaries, to attack him; which they did so effectually, that they overthrew him, and drove him from those frontiers with great loss. Upon this, he applied to Asdrubal for assistance, who presently marched with all his forces to support him. Scipio, being acquainted with this motion, ordered all the Celtiberian princes in the Roman interest to assemble their forces, and fall upon the Carthaginians. In compliance with this order, they made an irruption into the Carthaginian territories with a powerful army, took three fortresses there by assault, and gave Asdrubal two notable overthrows, killing him above fifteen thousand men, and taking four thousand prisoners. Nothing further material happened in Spain this campaign, except that the two Scipios passed the Iberus, and penetrated into the Carthaginian dominions as far as the gates of Saguntum, a particular account of which has been already given [b].

Hannibal in great diſtreſs.

BUT to return to the armies in Italy: Hannibal remained quiet in his winter-quarters, till the following ſpring, and before the ſeaſon for action came on, had the pleaſure to hear of Fabius's being recalled to Rome, upon the expiration of his office, which was limited to ſix months. The conſuls, Cn. Servilius Geminus, and M. Attilius Regulus, who ſucceeded him, in all things regulated their conduct according to the model Fabius had laid down. Upon their arrival in the army, they cut off ſeveral parties of Hannibal's foragers; but declined a general action, though he made uſe of all the art and cunning he was maſter of to draw them to one. Hannibal therefore found himſelf ſo ſtreightened for want of proviſions, that he had once thoughts of retiring into Gaul; but was diverted from this deſign by a ſuſpicion, that ſuch a retreat would look ſo much like a flight, that it might be an inducement to his allies to deſert him. His ſafety now ſeemed entirely to depend upon the meaſures the two new conſuls, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Æmilius Paulus, ſhould purſue. If they ſteadily adhered to Fabius's plan of operations, he muſt be irrecoverably loſt; whereas, by a departure from it, they might throw the game once more into his hands. His hopes were not a little raiſed, when he received intelligence from his ſpies, that Varro in diſpoſition and genius, nearly reſembled Sempronius, Flaminius, and Minucius; that there was a perfect want of harmony betwixt him and his collegue Paulus; and that he was obtruded by the plebeians upon the ſenate, who had a very indifferent opinion of him. Notwithſtanding therefore the Roman army this year conſiſted of eight legions, beſides the troops of their allies, in all making about eighty-ſix thouſand effective men, he was far from deſponding, eſpecially as he believed, that however numerous it might be, two thirds of the troops compoſing it, being new levies, would not be capable of coping with his veterans. The event juſtified the ſentiments he entertained, as we ſhall ſee immediately [c].

The Romans defeat a body of Carthaginians.

HANNIBAL had not only learned the true character of Varro, but likewiſe diſcovered his grand deſign. He had received advice, that this conſul, before he left Rome, declared in public, that he would fall upon the enemy the very firſt opportunity, and put an end to the war; adding, that that it would never be terminated, ſo long as men of Fabius's complexion ſhould be at the head of the Roman armies. He had not been long in the Roman camp, before one of his detachments routed a body of Carthaginians, killing ſeventeen hundred of them upon the ſpot; which greatly encreaſed his boldneſs and arrogance. Hannibal conſidered this loſs as a real advantage, not doubting but it would ſpur him on to a battle, which he wanted extremely; for he was reduced to ſuch a ſcarcity of proviſions at Geruniun, that he found it impoſſible to ſubſiſt there ten days longer; and the Spaniards already meditated a deſertion, which could not but prove fatal to him. But his good fortune at this criſis interpoſed, and threw in his way an antagoniſt, that extricated him out of all the difficulties in which he was involved [d].

The Roman and Carthaginian armies meet near Cannæ in Apulia.

AFTER ſeveral movements, the two armies came in ſight of each other near Cannæ, a village and caſtle of Apulia, ſituated on the river Aufidus. Hannibal had taken the caſtle, which commanded all that part of Apulia, and ſeized therein one of the enemies principal magazines, before the approach of the Roman army. He had likewiſe taken care to encamp in a ſmooth and open plain, proper for his cavalry, in which the main ſtrength of his forces conſiſted, to act in. Paulus, conſidering Hannibal's great ſuperiority in horſe, was for drawing the Carthaginians to an irregular ſpot of ground, where the infantry might have the principal ſhare in the action; but Varro being of another opinion, that ſalutary deſign was dropped; which proved the total ruin of the Romans. As ſoon as the conſuls appeared, Hannibal moved towards them at the head of his horſe, and began an attack with great bravery; but the Romans, intermixing ſome of the legionaries with their light-armed troops, ſuſtained the firſt ſhock of the enemy with much firmneſs, and, being duly ſupported by their cavalry, repulſed them with conſiderable loſs. This a little diſcouraged Hannibal, eſpecially as the night rendered him incapable of renewing the charge. However, to remove all impreſſions of terror, that might have ſeized upon his ſoldiers minds upon that event, he judged it expedient to re-animate them the next day by an harangue, which was to the following effect: "Return thanks to the gods, ſaid he, for having "brought

" brought the enemy hither, that we may triumph over
" them; and, in the next place, make proper acknow" ledgements to me, for having forced them to come to a " battle with us upon the most disadvantageous terms.
" After three glorious victories already won, is not the re" membrance of your own actions sufficient to inspire you
" with courage? By your former renowned atchieve-
" ments, you have made yourselves masters of the open " country; but another victory will put all the cities, as " well as all the riches and power, of the Romans into " your hands. It is not words that we stand in need of,
" but action; and I doubt not but, by the favour of the " gods, you will soon find my promises fulfilled, and your
" most sanguine expectations answered." The army, receiving fresh life and vigour from this speech of their general, both by their voice and gesture, declared themselves to be entirely at his devotion. After which, remanding them all to their respective posts, he commanded them to be ready the next morning to enter upon action [e].

HAVING already given a full and particular account of the battle of Cannæ as well as of the dispositions of both armies at that battle, we shall here only endeavour to revive in our readers minds a general idea of that most memorable event, by reciting some of the most remarkable circumstances of it, and pointing at some of the principal causes, that determined victory to declare in favour of the Carthaginians [f].

The battle of Cannæ.

WE have before observed, that Paulus was for declining an engagement, being well assured, that a state of inaction must ruin Hannibal; but not being able to prevail upon his collegue to fall in with his sentiments, he then proposed fighting the enemy on such a spot of ground, as would enable the infantry, in which the Romans were much superior to Hannibal, to have the principal share in the action; but Varro, hurried away by his rashness and impetuosity of mind, was deaf to both these salutary proposals; and, being greatly exasperated, that a party of Numidians should dare to insult his camp, the next day of his command, he advanced into the plains of the Aufidus, to attack the Carthaginian army. This was the very thing that Hannibal wished for, who therefore moved towards him with great alacrity.

alacrity. He had before paſſed the river, and drawn up his army in order of battle at a ſmall diſtance from the Romans, having poſted himſelf in ſuch a manner, that the (L) wind Vulturnus, which riſes at certain ſtated times, ſhould blow directly in the faces of the Romans during the fight,

(L) The wind Vulturnus blew ſouth-ſouth-eaſt, or ſouth-eaſt, and was the moſt common of all other winds at Capua. The old Etruſcan name of that city, as we learn from Livy and others, was Vulturnus, or Vulturnum, being, in all probability, ſo called from its founder. This founder was undoubtedly deified by the inhabitants of his city after his death, and looked upon there, and perhaps through all Campania, as a tutelar deity. That the Etruſcan inhabitants of Campania worſhipped the god Vulturnus, or Volturnus, is paſt all doubt, as likewiſe that he was a deity peculiar to them. As Capua or Vulturnum lay ſouth-eaſt of Etruria, it is no wonder the Etruſcans ſhould call the ſouth-eaſt wind, eſpecially ſince it blew ſo frequently there, Vulturnus; and from them that name paſſed to the Romans. That it was an Etruſcan proper name, appears both from what we have juſt obſerved, and from its beginning with the word Vul or Vol, in common with many other Etruſcan proper names, viz. Volumnus, Voltumna, Volta, &c. The Etruſcans wrote it, in all likelihood, Ful-Turne, or Fal-Turne; ſince, inſtead of the V conſonant, they uſed the Æolic digamma, as appears from the Eugubian tables; and terminated thoſe words in E, that the Romans did in US. Let this be admitted, and it muſt be allowed probable, that Ful, or Fal, was a term of honour, ſignifying high, ſublime, &c. eſpecially as we have evinced in a former note, that this word, in the Etruſcan language, had that ſignification. Our notion, in this particular, will appear ſtill more agreeable to truth, if we farther conſider, that all the proper names, of which this word makes one part of the compoſition, were either applied to deities, great men, or ſomething which apparently bore an analogy to the aforeſaid ſignification. And as for the word Turne, or Turnus, that was a proper name of Latium in the ages preceding the Trojan war, when the language of that country agreed in many, if not moſt, points with the Etruſcan; and conſequently it might have been a proper name in uſe likewiſe amongſt the Etruſcans. Be that as it will, it is certain Turan, which comes extremly near it, as conſiſting of the ſame radicals, was an Etruſcan proper name, as we learn from an inſcription upon an antique Etruſcan patera. We own indeed, that Raphael Maffæus Volaterranus aſſerts the word Vola to have ſignified a city in the old Etruſcan tongue, which runs counter to what we have offered; but as this aſſertion has nothing to ſupport it but that writer's bare authority, which, in the point before us, is of no weight, we cannot adviſe our readers to pay any regard to it. That the word fight, and cover them with duſt. On his left he had the river Aufidus, and placing his cavalry in the wings, he formed his main body of the Spaniſh and Gallic infantry, which he poſted in the centre, with half the African heavy-armed foot on their right, and half on their left, on the ſame line with the cavalry. Having made this diſpoſition, he cauſed the Spaniſh and Gallic infantry to move towards the enemy in ſuch a manner, as to form a large creſcent, that there might be no interval between them and the African foot, that were to ſupport them. Aſdrubal was poſted on the right, Hanno on the left, and Hannibal, with his brother Mago, commanded the main body. The Africans, ſays Livy, ſeemed to be a body of Romans, Hannibal having been enabled to arm them after the Roman manner by the word Fal or Ful ſignified high, as likewiſe that the old Etruſcan language was at firſt oriental, is confirmed by the proper name Volaterræ, or, as the Etruſcans probably wrote it, Ful-tur, Ful-tir, Fultera, i. e. an height or eminence, or an height or eminence ſtrong by its ſituation; which exactly anſwers to the ſituation of that place, as deſcribed by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis and Strabo (17).

Zonaras obſerves, that the wind Vulturnus greatly contributed to the defeat of the Romans; ſince, till that began to blow, which, he ſays, was about noon, the Carthaginians had no proſpect of victory. Hannibal, according to the ſame author, ſoon after he arrived upon the banks of the Aufidus, ploughed up all the ſandy ſoil there, that, by having it more immediately expoſed to the heat of the ſun, clouds of duſt and ſand from thence might the more eaſily be blown into the faces of the Romans (18).

The Sirocco, anſwering to the Vulturnus, at preſent blows in ſeveral parts of Italy for many days together; and when this happens, the atmoſphere is extremely heated, which renders the place moſt diſagreeable, and ſometimes almoſt intolerable. A Tramontana, or cold north-eaſt wind, frequently ſucceeds the Sirocco; which occaſions a great mortality amongſt the Italians from the mal di petto, &c.

the ſpoils taken from the enemy in the battles of Trebia, and the lake Thraſymenus. The Gauls and Spaniards uſed the ſame ſort of ſhields; but their ſwords were different, thoſe of the Spaniards being ſhort, and well-pointed, fit either to cut or thruſt; whereas thoſe of the Gauls were long and broad, deſigned for a downright cutting blow. The Gauls were naked from their waiſt upwards, and thereby rendered capable of giving a blow with the greater force. The Spaniards were clad in white linen-caſſocks, bordered with purple, after the manner of their country; which ſtrange habits, together with the vaſt ſize of body theſe nations were eminent for, exhibited an appearance, that not a little intimidated the Romans. Five hundred Numidians came over in a body to the Romans, with their ſhields thrown behind their backs, in the form of deſerters, before the beginning of the action. Upon their arrival at the Roman camp, they diſmounted, and laid down all their arms, except the ſwords they had concealed under their coats of mail. The conſuls had not then time to examine them; and therefore Varro ordered them to be placed behind the army, till the concluſion of the engagement. Here they remained quiet, till the diſpute grew very warm, when the Romans were ſo preſſed on all ſides, that they could not obſerve them; but then, ſupplying themſelves with the bucklers, that lay ſcattered on the field of battle amongſt the heaps of the ſlain, and making uſe of their own ſwords, they attacked the enemy's rear, killing many, and ſtriking the reſt of the Romans poſted there with the greateſt terror. Thus Hannibal, by this refined artifice, found means to lay an ambuſcade for the enemy in a plain, and behind their backs, when ſuch a ſtratagem ſeemed abſolutely impracticable. The conſular army was diſpoſed much in the ſame manner as in other engagements: Paulus commanded the right wing, Varro the left, and the proconſuls, Marcus Attilius and Cneius Servilius, the main body. The ſignal of battle being given, both armies moved with great ardour to the attack; but the wind Vulturnus blew ſo ſtrongly in the faces of the Romans, that they had their eyes filled with duſt, and could ſcarce ſee the enemy. After the light-armed troops had engaged, Aſdrubal, at the head of the Spaniſh and Gallic horſe in the left wing, charged the Roman in the right wing, commanded by Paulus, with ſuch fury, that, after a warm diſpute, he broke and diſperſed them; and having left, to purſue the

ſcattered ſquadrons, only ſuch forces as were neceſſary to prevent them from rallying, he advanced to the relief of the main body. Paulus, being wounded, at the firſt onſet, by a Balearic ſlinger, found himſelf obliged to diſmount; which induced the cavalry under his conduct to do the ſame. Hannibal, obſerving this motion, is reported to have ſaid, "I would much rather the conſul had delivered "his men to me bound," intimating thereby, that he looked upon them now as in his power and himſelf as ſure of victory. Nor can it be doubted but that this accident was of fatal conſequence to the Roman cavalry poſted in the right wing. In the mean time the Spaniſh and Gallic infantry, forming the large creſcent abovementioned, being hotly charged by the Roman legions, after a brave reſiſtance, by Hannibal's direction, gave ground, and retired through the interval they had left in the centre of the line. The Romans purſued them with the utmoſt eagerneſs and confuſion, as Hannibal had foreſeen; whereupon the African infantry, which was freſh, well-armed, and in good order, wheeled about on a ſudden towards that void ſpace, in which the Romans, who were already fatigued, had thrown themſelves in diſorder, and attacked them vigorouſly on both ſides, without allowing them either ſpace or time to form themſelves. Whilſt matters were in this ſituation, Aſdrubal, with his victorious horſe, coming up, charged the rear of the Roman infantry, which, being puſhed on all ſides by the enemy's horſe and foot, was at laſt almoſt entirely cut to pieces, after having fought with unparallelled bravery. Two quæſtors, twenty-one military tribunes, many who had either been conſuls or prætors, Minucius, late general of the horſe to Fabius, Servilius, one of the proconſuls that commanded the main body, and the conſul Æmilius Paulus, all fell in the action, covered with wounds and glory. Neither did the left wing of the Roman army meet with a much better fate; for Aſdrubal, according to ſome authors hinted at by Polybius, before he advanced to the relief of the main body, by reinforcing the right wing under Hanno, enabled the Numidian cavalry poſted there entirely to defeat it. Varro, the author of this terrible deſtruction, eſcaped to Venuſia, with only ſeventy horſe, being ſoon after joined by three hundred of the allies. Of the ten thouſand men left by Paulus to guard the camp, immediately after the battle, two thouſand were put to the ſword, and the reſt ſurrendered at diſcretion.

In fine, very few of the Romans eſcaped either the carnage or captivity. Hannibal, upon a review of his forces after the battle, found, that he had loſt only four thouſand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and about two hundred horſe. Such was the defeat at Cannæ, the greateſt the Romans had hitherto ever received [g].

Cauſes of the defeat the Romans received there.

THE ſuperiority of the Carthaginians in horſe muſt be allowed to have been the principal cauſe of this terrible overthrow. Hannibal's army conſiſted of ten thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot; whereas the Roman cavalry did not exceed ſix thouſand, though, in the conſular army, the infantry amounted to eighty thouſand men. The ſtrange and aſtoniſhing figure made by the Spaniards and Gauls, together with the activity of the former, and fierceneſs of the latter, did not a little contribute towards throwing the enemy into confuſion, as is even allowed by Livy himſelf. The body of Numidians, that attacked the Roman rear, and the accident, which attended Paulus's wound above-mentioned, were alſo of ſingular ſervice to Hannibal on that auſpicious day the battle of Cannæ was fought. The confidence the Carthaginian troops repoſed in Hannibal, looking upon him as a general abſolutely invincible, likewiſe animated them to a prodigious degree, and conſequently enabled them to exert themſelves in a moſt extraordinary manner. Hannibal did his utmoſt to inſpire them with a contempt of the Romans on all occaſions; which had the deſired effect. We are told, that when Mago, whom he had ſent to view the enemy, aſſured him, that the Romans were extremely numerous, he replied, "As numerous as they are, I give thee my word, brother, "thou canſt not find one amongſt them, whoſe name is "Mago." And having thus ſaid, he burſt out into a great laughter, as did all the general officers that attended him; which induced the ſoldiers to believe, that he thought himſelf ſure of victory, and of courſe ſo raiſed their ſpirits, that nothing could ſtand before them. The arming his Africans in the Roman manner was alſo a wiſe expedient made uſe of by Hannibal, as it enabled thoſe troops to attack tack and reſiſt the Romans in their own way, and, of courſe, not a little conduced to the victory. Theſe, we ſay, and many more concurring cauſes of the defeat at Cannæ, might be produced, and expatiated upon; but we think it ſufficient barely to have touched upon the circumſtances here mentioned, not at the ſame time forgetting to obſerve, that Hannibal himſelf, by the wiſe diſpoſition of his forces, by his ſingular addreſs, preſence of mind, vigilance, and perſonal bravery, during the heat of the action, contributed more towards this unparallelled overthrow, than all the other concurring cauſes that can be aſſigned [h].

Hannibal's motions after his victory at Cannæ.

THE immediate conſequence of this victory, as Hannibal had foreſeen, was a diſpoſition of that part of Italy, called The old province, Magna Græcia, Tarentum, Arpi, and part of the territory of Capua, to ſubmit to him. The neighbouring provinces likewiſe diſcovered an inclination to throw off the Roman yoke; but had a mind to ſee, whether Hannibal was abſolutely in a condition to protect them, before they declared themſelves. All the Carthaginian officers, except Maherbal, adviſed Hannibal to give his troops ſome repoſe after the great fatigues and hard ſervice they had lately gone through; but Maherbal, on the contrary, preſſed him to take directly the route to Rome at the head of his horſe, promiſing him, that, within five days, they ſhould ſup in the capitol. Hannibal anſwered, "That he deſerved commendation for the ardour he ſhewed; but that an affair of ſuch importance required ma- "ture deliberation." To whom Maherbal replied, "I "perceive the gods have not endued the ſame perſon with "all ſhining talents. You know, Hannibal, how to "conquer; but not how to make the beſt uſe of a victory." Livy (M) ſeems to fall in with Maherbal's notion, and looks

(M) Moſt of the Roman hiſtorians follow Livy in this particular, though this adds no weight to that author's notion. Zonaras tells us, that Hannibal himſelf was ſo chagrined afterwards at his conduct on this occaſion, that he fell into a deep melancholy, often crying out in a doleful tone, O Cannæ! Cannæ! However, Zonaras's authority is not capable of overthrowing the reaſons offered to prove this improbable (19).

looks upon Hannibal as guilty of a capital error on this occaſion; but others, as we have elſewhere taken notice, entertained different ſentiments of this point of that renowned general's conduct; for which, beſides thoſe already mentioned, they aſſign the following reaſons: 1. Hannibal was one of the moſt conſummate generals antiquity ever produced; a vaſt military genius; a perſon of the greateſt prudence, forecaſt and penetration, as the whole ſeries of his actions, as well as the character of him, that may be gathered from the Roman writers themſelves, prejudiced as they were, clearly demonſtrates. It is therefore highly improbable, that, in this ſingle inſtance, he ſhould either have failed to make choice of the beſt expedients, or been wanting in readineſs to put his deſigns in execution. 2. They are diſpoſed to judge favourably of him from the authority, or, at leaſt, the ſilence, of Polybius, who, ſpeaking of the memorable conſequences of this famous battle, ſays, that the Carthaginians believed they ſhould poſſeſs themſelves of Rome at the firſt aſſault; but he gives us no room to ſuppoſe, that ſuch a project was feaſible, nor that Hannibal did wrong in not attempting to put it in execution. 3. That as his infantry, before the battle of Cannæ, did not amount to above forty thouſand men, he had not ſtrength ſufficient to undertake the ſiege of Rome, eſpecially as that city was very populous, ſtrongly fortified, and defended by a garriſon of two legions. This will appear in a ſtronger light, if we conſider, that his infantry muſt have been conſiderably weakened by the loſs he ſuſtained in the action at Cannæ, which amounted, on their part only, to five thouſand five hundred men. 4. Hannibal was deſtitute of battering-engines, ammunition, and all things neceſſary for the carrying on of a ſiege; and conſequently, on this account, as well as the paucity of his troops, he muſt have been incapable of attacking in form ſo large a city as Rome. In proof of what is here advanced, it may be obſerved, that, for want of the neceſſaries abovementioned, even after his victory at the lake Thraſymenus, he miſcarried in his attempt upon Spoletum, a town of no great ſtrength; and after this at Cannæ, was forced to raiſe the ſiege of Caſilinum, a little inconſiderable city. 5. Not any of the Italian nations had yet declared for him; ſo that, had he miſcarried in the attempt, he muſt have been utterly ruined. Theſe reaſons, with others that might be offered, ſeem to render dubious the opinion of thoſe, who have eſpouſed Maherbal's ſide of the queſtion [i].

He advances to Capua.

WHEN Hannibal had thoroughly pillaged the Roman camp, he thought proper to march into Samnium, being informed, that the Hirpini, and other neighbouring nations, were diſpoſed to enter into an alliance with the Carthaginians. He firſt advanced to Compſa, which opened its gates to him, and admitted a Carthaginian garriſon. In this place he left his heavy baggage, as well as the immenſe plunder he had amaſſed. After which, ordering his brother Mago, with a body of troops deſtined for that purpoſe, to poſſeſs himſelf of all the fortreſſes of that country, he moved into Campania, the moſt delicious province of Italy. The humanity Hannibal had all along ſhewn the Italian priſoners, as well as the fame of the complete victory lately obtained, wrought ſo powerfully upon the Lucani, Brutii, and Apulians, that they expreſſed an eager deſire of being taken under his protection; nay, even the Campanians themſelves, a nation more obliged to Rome than any in Italy, except the Latins, being ſtrangely affected with the gallant behaviour and good fortune of Hannibal, diſcovered an inclination to abandon their natural friends; of which the Carthaginian general receiving intelligence, he bent his march towards Capua, not doubting but that, by means of the popular faction which then prevailed there, he ſhould eaſily make himſelf maſter of that important place [k].

And has the city ſurrendered to him.

SOME of the leading men in Capua had offered to deliver the city into Hannibal's hands immediately after the battle of the lake Thraſymenus; which induced that general to march his army to their frontiers, inſtead of advancing to Rome, as ſome think he might have done; tho', at that time, he was ſo narrowly watched by Fabius, that his partizans in Capua could not find an opportunity of executing the deſign they had formed. But, at the preſent juncture, the popular faction bearing an abſolute ſway in the city, and being entirely at the devotion of one Pacuvius Calavius, an ambitious nobleman, on account of his known attachment to Hannibal, the Carthaginian party put themſelves again in motion. Calavius having, by artful management, brought the ſenate under the power of the populace, and prevented the latter from maſſacring the former, as they intended to do, by this means united the whole city in favour of the Carthaginians; and the battle of Cannæ happening ſoon after this union was effected, Calavius thought he might, without any obſtruction, introduce them into the city. However, three hundred Capuan youths being at that time ſerving the Romans in Sicily, it was agreed to ſend a deputation to Varro, to learn the ſituation of the Roman affairs, that they might not only go upon ſure grounds, but likewiſe have an opportunity of obliging the parents of the above-mentioned youths, by getting them out of the hands of the Romans. Varro continued ſtill to act in character, that is, with the utmoſt imprudence; for he repreſented the Roman ſtate as unable to ſupport itſelf, much leſs to furniſh them with the neceſſary ſuccours; and therefore adviſed them to make war upon the Carthaginians with their own forces, that, by ſuch a ſeaſonable diverſion, they might adminiſter ſome relief to their old and faithful friends. This ill-judged repreſentation and advice made ſuch an impreſſion upon the deputies, that, when they returned home, they adviſed their fellow-citizens immediately to conclude a treaty with Hannibal. They therefore entered into an alliance with him upon the following conditions: That the Campanians ſhould be governed by their own laws; that the Carthaginians ſhould not arrogate to themſelves the leaſt dominion in Capua, but live there upon the foot of friends; and laſtly, that Hannibal ſhould give them three hundred Roman priſoners, ſuch as they ſhould chuſe, to be exchanged with the ſame number of Capuan youths in the ſervice of Rome. One Decius Magius however, a perſon of diſtinction in the city, did his utmoſt to obſtruct the negociation, by reminding his countrymen of the fatal conſequence of changing old friends with new ones, from the example of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines; nay, when the Carthaginian troops were about to enter the town, he would fain have prevailed upon his countrymen to ſally out upon them, and cut them to pieces, that they might thereby have made ſome ſort of reparation to the Romans for the great injury offered them. Hannibal was ſo incenſed at this conduct of Magius, that he inſiſted upon having him delivered into his hands; which being granted, he put him on board a ſhip, in order to ſend him to Carthage; but being driven by ſtreſs of weather into the port of Cyrene, Ptolemy Philopater took him under his protection. Perolla, the ſon of Calavius, likewiſe for ſome time expreſſed a great averſion to Hannibal, and was even upon the point of aſſaſſinating him. However, Hannibal at laſt look peaceable poſſeſſion of Capua, and fixed there his winter-quarters. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, in his march to Capua, paſſed by Neapolis, now Naples; and that a body of horſe ſallying out of the town upon one of the Carthaginian parties, that advanced to the walls, was drawn into an ambuſcade, and almoſt entirely cut off, with one Hegeas, who commanded it; but that Hannibal could not form the ſiege of the place; which ſufficiently juſtifies what has been hinted above. The ſame author likewiſe informs us, that Virius Sabius, one of the Campanian deputies ſent to Varro, endeavoured to perſuade the Capuans to a rupture with the Romans, by urging, that they had now not only a fine opportunity of ſhaking off the Roman yoke, but likewiſe of making themſelves maſters of all Italy; ſince Hannibal would undoubtedly return to Africa, when he had demoliſhed that proud republic he had ſo juſtly contracted ſuch an averſion to, and conclude a treaty with them upon their own terms. It was however agreed, our author goes on, that the ſame deputies ſhould be diſpatched to Rome, and propoſe this condition as the baſis of a future friendſhip between the two cities, viz. that from thenceforth one of the conſuls ſhould be a Campanian; which was rejected with the utmoſt indignation, and the deputies ordered immediately to depart Rome. Marius Bloſius, prætor of the city, greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Hannibal's entry into Capua, commanding the citizens, with their wives and children, in a body, to meet him at ſome diſtance from the town. The night after his entry, Hannibal invited Calavius, with his ſon Perolla, and Jubellius Taureas, an officer of uncommon merit, to ſup with him; and the day following gave the Campanians flattering aſſurances of making their city the metropolis of Italy. By theſe ſteps, and in this manner, did Hannibal make himſelf maſter of Capua; which being an event of no ſmall importance to him, and the boundary, as we may ſtyle it, of his great ſucceſs, we could not avoid being thus explicit and particular in our account of it [k].

WHILST

[k] Liv. l. xxiii. c. 2—11. Zonar. ubi ſup. c. 3. Plut. in Hannib.

The Carthaginians ravage the maritime part Hiero's dominions.

WHILST Hannibal was puſhing on the war in Italy with the utmoſt vigour, the ſtate of Carthage ſent two fleets to the coaſts of Sicily. One of theſe ravaged the maritime part of Hiero's territories, becauſe that prince was in alliance with Rome, whilſt the other ſtood off of the iſlands Ægates, in order to obſerve the motions of the Romans. The admiral of this laſt ſquadron had orders to attack Lilybæum both by ſea and land, as ſoon as the Romans advanced to the relief of king Hiero; of which T. Otacilius, the proprætor, being appriſed, he diſpatched an expreſs to Rome for a ſpeedy reinforcement of ſhips; but the ſenate, conſidering the deplorable condition the republic now was in, did not think proper to comply with his requeſt. He therefore found himſelf obliged to ſtand upon the defenſive, leſt he ſhould expoſe the Roman dominions in Sicily to an invaſion [l].

Hannibal cannot prevail upon the Romans to redeem their countrymen taken priſoners in the battle of Cannæ.

NOTWITHSTANDING the implacable hatred Hannibal bore the Romans, he diſpatched Carthalo to Rome, to treat with the ſenate there about a redemption of the priſoners taken in the battle of Cannæ. Though the ſum demanded for theſe priſoners was far from being exorbitant, the conſcript fathers refuſed the payment of it. The reaſons alledged for this refuſal by the Romans, have been already given; but the true one ſeems to have been the extreme poverty of the Roman ſtate at this melancholy juncture. Hannibal, upon Carthalo's return, ſent all the Roman priſoners of diſtinction to Carthage, and treated the others in the manner by us related in a former part of this hiſtory [m] (N).

(N) Appian and Zonaras intimate, that Hannibal ſold ſome of the Roman captives for ſlaves, and ſlew a vaſt number of the meaner ſort of them, with whoſe bodies he made a bridge over a river, which facilitated a paſſage for his troops. But this laſt inſtance of cruelty ſeems highly improbable, eſpecially conſidering the partiality of the hiſtorians from whom it comes, and that it is paſſed over in ſilence by Polybius. That excellent author, amongſt other things, obſerves, that the ſenate at Rome imagined, that a compliance with Hannibal's propoſal would look like a tacit acknowledgment of his great ſuperiority, and therefore declined

SOON after Capua had made its ſubmiſſion, many cities of the Brutii opened their gates to Hannibal, who ordered his brother Mago to take poſſeſſion of them. Mago was then diſpatched to Carthage, with the important news of the great victory obtained at Cannæ, and the happy conſequences of it. Upon his arrival there, he acquainted the ſenate, that Hannibal had defeated ſix Roman generals, four of which were conſuls, one dictator, and the other general of horſe to the dictator; that he had engaged ſix conſular armies, killed two conſuls, wounded one, and driven another out of the field, with ſcarce fifty men to attend him; that he had routed the general of the horſe, who was of equal power with the conſuls; that the dictator was eſteemed as the only general fit to command an army, merely becauſe he had not had the courage to engage him. As a demonſtrative proof of what he advanced, he produced, according to ſome authors, three buſhels and an half of rings of Roman knights and ſenators. He likewiſe ſubjoined, that Capua, a city that was not only the metropolis of Campania, but, ſince the defeat of the Romans at Cannæ, of Italy itſelf, had ſubmitted to Hannibal. For ſuch unparallelled ſucceſſes, he moved, that thanks ſhould be returned to the immortal gods, and that an immediate reinforcement ſhould be ſent to Hannibal, who, being in the cloſing with it. Livy affirms, that many of the Roman priſoners were bought of Hannibal by the Greeks; which may poſſibly be true. But that great numbers of them were put to a vaſt variety of the moſt exquiſite tortures, purely to gratify the cruel and vindictive diſpoſition of that general, as Eutropius ſuggeſts, will not be ſo eaſily admitted by our candid readers, for the reaſons above aſſigned. We muſt beg leave to remark here, that, according to Diodorus Siculus, none of the Roman captives could be forced, by the moſt grievous ſufferings, to lift up their hands againſt their friends and relations, when Hannibal would have obliged them to act the part of gladiators, for the entertainment of his troops; though Livy aſſerts the contrary, as will further appear from what we have extracted from that hiſtorian on this occaſion, in the paſſage of the Univerſal hiſtory here referred to. The diſagreement therefore of two ſuch eminent authors, and the ſilence of Polybius on this head, ſeem to evince many, if not all, the inſtances of cruelty laid to Hannibal's charge at this juncture, to have been entirely fabulous (20).

He diſpatches Mago to Carthage, with an account of his great ſucceſs

the heart of an enemy's country, wanted both men and money, eſpecially as his troops muſt have greatly ſuffered in the various engagements they had had with the enemy. All ranks and degrees of people being ſtruck with an extraordinary joy on this happy occaſion, Himilco, the chief the Barcan faction, fanſying, that a fair opportunity of inſulting Hanno now offered, addreſſed himſelf to him in the following terms: "Do you ſtill, Hanno, repent of the war we are embarqued in with Rome? Forbid, by all means, the appointment of a day of thankſgiving to the immortal gods, for ſo many ſignal advantages obtained! Come, for once let us hear a Roman ſenator declaim in the ſenate-houſe at Carthage"! Hanno, notwithſtanding this provocation, without any emotion, according to Livy, replied, "That he ſtill entertained the ſame ſentiments as formerly, in relation to the war; that he ſhould not ceaſe blaming their invincible general's conduct, till his glorious victories had procured them a tolerable peace; that the mighty exploits, on which Hannibal's creatures expatiated ſo much, ſuppoſing them real, could only give him joy, in proportion as they were made ſubſervient to ſuch a peace; that however, as it was prepoſterous in Hannibal to ſolicit ſuch ſuccours, as could only be deemed neceſſary for a general in deſperate circumſtances, at the ſame time that he was amuſing them with an account of the rapid conqueſts he had made, he could not help looking upon thoſe exploits as perfectly chimerical and imaginary". Then turning to Mago and Himilco, he aſked them, "Whether a ſingle member of any one of the thirty-five tribes had come over to Hannibal, or any of the Latin nations declared for him, after the ſo-much cried up victory at Cannæ"? To which Mago anſwering in the negative; "It is evident then, replied Hanno, that the Romans are ſtill very ſtrong. But, pray, what degree of courage are they inſpired with? What hopes or expectations have they of carrying on the war with ſucceſs, to animate them"? Of which queſtion Mago profeſſing himſelf incapable of giving a proper ſolution; "How! ſays Hanno; nothing can be more eaſy than this. Have the Romans ſent embaſſadors to enter into a negotiation with Hannibal? Has any mention been made of a peace at Rome"? No, replied Mago. Why then I find, ſubjoined Hanno, "we have the ſame happy proſpect before us now, that we had the firſt day Hannibal entered Italy. In what a fine ſituation were we, when

" Lutatius gave us that memorable defeat off of the iſlands " Ægates, which deſtroyed all our hopes, and reduced us to " the neceſſity of ſuing for an ignominious peace? This " may be again our caſe; and therefore I am for concluding " an advantageous peace with Rome, whilſt our affairs wear " a tolerable aſpect, leſt, upon ſome diſaſter, it ſhould not " be in our power to do ſo". Hanno therefore, with all his adherents, oppoſed the continuation of the war, and conſequently voted againſt ſending Hannibal any ſuccours; but the majority of the ſenate conſidering this merely as the effect of prejudice and jealouſy, the Barcan faction prevailed, and orders were given to furniſh the army in Italy with a proper reinforcement of troops, as well as an ample ſupply of money and proviſions. A body of four thouſand Numidians, with forty elephants, was firſt deſtined for that country; a large detachment of Spaniſh forces was appointed to follow the Numidians; and that theſe laſt troops might be ready in due time, Mago ſet out immediately for Spain, to raiſe twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, there. The Carthaginians propoſed to recruit, with theſe new levies, not only Hannibal's army, but that likewiſe which acted in Spain [n].

The tranſactions in Italy immediately after the battle of Cannæ.

As ſoon as Hannibal had poſſeſſed himſelf of Capua, he attempted, both by promiſes and menaces, to make himſelf maſter of Naples; but the Neapolitans being proof againſt all his efforts, he advanced to Nola, and ſummoned that city, threatening its inhabitants with the utmoſt extremities, if they did not immediately ſurrender. The ſenate, at leaſt the leading men in it, was wholly in the Roman intereſt; but the Carthaginians being maſters of the open country, and in high reputation by the advantages they had gained, the populace was entirely at Hannibal's devotion. The former therefore, in order to carry their point, pretended to be in a diſpoſition to ſurrender the city to Hannibal; but at the ſame time inſinuated, that, before this could be done, it would be proper to come to ſome terms of agreement with him. Under the pretence therefore of entering into a negotiation with the Carthaginian general, the ſenate of Nola found means to ſpin out the time, and ſend, with all poſſible expedition, meſſengers to Marcellus, the Roman prætor, acquainting him with the ſituation of affairs, and that the city would be obliged to capitulate, except except he instantly marched to its relief. Marcellus, leaving Casilinum, where he was then posted, advanced to Calatia; and having passed the Vulturnus, moved, with surprising celerity, through the districts of Satricula and Trebia, in order to succour Nola. Hannibal drew off upon his approach, and made a fresh attempt upon Naples; but without effect. After this, he laid siege to Nuceria, and starved it to a surrender. One of the articles of the capitulation was, that the inhabitants should be permitted to march out with all their cloaths, though disarmed. Thirty senators, and most of the people of fashion, retired to Capua; but were refused admission there, because they did not at first open their gates to Hannibal; but they met with a kind reception at Cumæ. Hannibal gave Nuceria up to his soldiers to be plundered, and afterwards burnt it. Marcellus, the Roman prætor, having thrown himself with a body of troops, into Nola, was under no apprehension for the safety of that place, though the Carthaginian army, after the destruction of Nuceria, encamped before it. The populace ardently desired to deliver it up to Hannibal; but Marcellus prevented the Carthaginian from possessing himself of it, by gaining over to the Roman interest L. Bantius, the chief of the Carthaginian faction. This he did, partly by the force of adulation and condescension, ordering the lictors to give him admission, as often as he desired it, and partly by dint of presents, desiring him to accept of a fine horse, and five hundred bigati (O). Hannibal drew up the Carthaginian army in order of battle before the walls, as Marcellus did the Roman forces within the town. His parties had frequent skirmishes with those of the Romans,

(O) The bigati, or nummi bigati, were silver pieces of money, with the figure of a chariot drawn by a pair of horses stamped upon them; and the quadrigati, or nummi quadrigati, others with that of one drawn by two pair of horses, as we learn from Pliny. According to the same author, the Phrygians invented the former kind of chariots, and Erichthonius the latter. Let this be admitted, and it will seem to follow, that the Romans had these chariots introduced amongst them by their neighbours the Etruscans, who were descended from the Lydians and Phrygians, since they were used at Rome before that city had any intercourse with the Greeks. Many Roman denarii, particularly of those coined in the times of the republic, with such images on their reverses, are mans, though neither ſide ſuſtained any conſiderable loſs. By his emiſſaries, he engaged the populace to ſeize upon the gates, as ſoon as Marcellus had ſallied out of them with his whole force, as he had received intelligence the Roman general deſigned to do; by which means the Romans would have been hemmed in betwixt the garriſon and the Carthaginian army, and conſequently muſt all have been cut off. Marcellus, being informed of this, divided his army into three bodies, which he poſted at three gates fronting the enemy; having before iſſued out an order, forbidding any of the citizens to ſtir out of their houſes. Hannibal, in the mean time obſerving, that no parties were poſted on the ramparts for their defence, immediately concluded, that his whole ſcheme was unravelled, and Marcellus now engaged with the citizens. He therefore ordered his ſcaling-ladders to be brought immediately to the walls, and began the attack. The moment this happened, Marcellus, at the head of a choice body of veterans, ſallying out of the middle gate, fell upon the Carthaginians with ſuch fury, that he put them into diſorder. Hannibal, little dreaming of ſuch a ſally, with ſome difficulty rallied his troops, and made head againſt the enemy. During this conflict, the two other bodies ſallied out of the other gates, and attacked the rear of the Carthaginians; which ſtruck Hannibal with ſuch terror, that he retired into his lines, and ſoon after drew off from before the town. Though the Carthaginians, even according to the Roman accounts, did not loſe much above two thouſand men on this occaſion, yet the Romans looked upon this action, as one of the moſt conſiderable in its conſequences to them, of all that happened during the whole courſe of the war, ſince it demonſtrated Hannibal not to be invincible. Hannibal, advancing to Acerræ, made the proper diſpoſitions to beſiege it; but the inhabitants abandoning it, he laid it in aſhes. From thence he moved to Caſilinum, to be ſeen in the cabinets of the curious. Tacitus, and other Roman authors, as well as Livy, mention the coins we are now treating of (21).

Caſilinum, which he immediately inveſted. The garriſon defended itſelf with inexpreſſible bravery; neither could Hannibal have ever made himſelf maſter of it, had not famine forced it to ſurrender. Before the Carthaginian general preſented himſelf before the town, he detached a body of Gætulians, under the command of their captain Iſalca, to prevail upon the inhabitants, if poſſible, by fair means, to receive a Carthaginian garriſon; but, if this could not be effected, they had orders to attempt ſtorming it. Iſalca, upon his approach, finding a profound ſilence, and no enemy appearing, imagined the place to be abandoned; and therefore made the neceſſary preparations to force open the gates: which being obſerved by two cohorts that garriſoned the city, they, according to orders received, iſſued out in a moment, repulſed the Gætulians, and made great ſlaughter of them. Maherbal afterwards aſſaulted it with a greater force; but was obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs. Laſtly, Hannibal himſelf, with his whole army, formed the ſiege of it; but loſt abundance of men, without making any conſiderable progreſs. However, he at laſt found means to ſurround almoſt the whole garriſon, in a ſally they made, with his elephants, and cut to pieces moſt of them, the reſt ſecuring their retreat by favour of the night. The next day Hannibal to inſpire his troops with the greater ardour, promiſed to the ſoldier, who firſt mounted the ramparts, a golden mural crown; and declared, "That it was matter of ſurprize to him, that an inconſiderable town, ſituated in a plain, ſhould be able to baffle the efforts of that army which took Saguntum, and defeated the Romans at Cannæ, Thraſymenus, and Trebia." Notwithſtanding which, the garriſon made ſo vigorous a defence, that he found himſelf obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade, and, after leaving a ſmall body of troops to guard his lines, to put his army into winter-quarters at Capua [o].

The pleaſures of Capua prejudicial to Hannibal.

It is intimated by the Roman hiſtorians, that Capua proved the deſtruction of Hannibal. Here it was, according to theſe authors, that thoſe ſoldiers, who had been long inured to the greateſt fatigues, and braved the moſt formidable dangers, were vanquiſhed by luxury, and a flow of pleaſures, with which the minds of the Capuans, who were immerſed merſed in a profuſion of the moſt charming delights, had long been corrupted. Livy in particular intimates, that Hannibal's delicious abode at Capua was a reproach to his former conduct, and infinitely more prejudicial to his affairs, than the falſe ſtep he was guilty of, in not marching directly to Rome after the battle of Cannæ; for this laſt error, according to that hiſtorian, might ſeem only to have retarded his victory; whereas the former rendered him abſolutely incapable of conquering. This, we ſay, is the ſentiment of Livy, and has been adopted by ſeveral later writers; but whether or no it is entirely agreeable to truth, will, if we conſider things with due attention, perhaps admit of ſome diſpute [p].

For though we ſhould allow, that the martial genius of the Carthaginians was impaired by the bewitching retirement at Capua, yet it cannot reaſonably be ſuppoſed, that the bad ſucceſs, which afterwards attended Hannibal's arms, ought to be aſcribed to this, as its principal cauſe. The frequent defeats that general afterwards gave the Romans, the ſeveral towns he reduced in ſight of the Roman armies, the bravery with which he maintained himſelf in Italy for fourteen years after this event, in ſpite of the continued efforts of the enemy, will not admit of ſuch a ſuppoſition. But Livy himſelf puts this beyond diſpute; that author points out to us a cauſe of the declenſion of the Carthaginian affairs in Italy, different from the delights of Capua [q].

The principal cauſe of the decay of Hannibal's affairs.

We have before obſerved from him, that the ſenate and people of Carthage ordered four thouſand Numidian horſe, forty elephants, and a conſiderable body of Spaniſh infantry, with a proper ſum of money, to be ſent to Italy, in order to enable Hannibal to maintain and extend his conqueſts there. Had this ample ſupply been ſent him with an expedition equal to the ſpirit with which it was granted, the Romans would have had no opportunity of reflecting upon Hannibal, on account of his conduct at Capua. That general would, in all human probability, have obliged the haughty haughty rival of the Carthaginian republic to have submitted to the superior force of his arms the next campaign. But, notwithstanding the influence of the Barcan faction, Hanno, and his adherents, found means not only to retard the march of the intended succours, but even to diminish them. Mago, through the artifices of that infatuated party, could obtain an order for only twelve thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; and even with this body of troops, inconsiderable as it was, he was sent to Spain. Hannibal, being thus deserted by his country, through the intrigues of a profligate and abandoned faction, who had come to a resolution to sacrifice the state, of which they were members, to their private resentment, found himself obliged to be on the defensive, his army being reduced to twenty-six thousand foot, and nine thousand horse. As the Romans therefore, notwithstanding the difficulties they were reduced to, sent every year two consular armies into the field, fully recruited, and in good order; as neither the Gauls nor Italians were natural allies of the Carthaginians, and consequently would scarce fail of abandoning them, as soon as fortune began to declare against them; there is no need to have recourse to the pleasures of Capua, in order to account for Hannibal's being driven out of Italy[r].

At the return of the spring, Hannibal drew his forces out of their winter-quarters, and resumed the siege of Casilinum. He did not however push this on with vigour, as knowing, that the place must soon surrender through want of provisions. The famine raged so grievously amongst the citizens, that they were obliged, for some time, to feed upon the most loathsome animals. Valerius Maximus tells us, that one of them gave another an hundred Roman denarii for a single mouse; which supported him, till Hannibal granted the garrison a capitulation; but the person who sold it, in the mean time, perished with hunger. Pliny and Frontinus affirm, that this mouse was purchased with two hundred Roman denarii; and with these authors Livy, in the main, agrees. Marcellus, not being able to attempt raising the siege, by reason of an inundation of the Vulturnus, the troops in garrison were forced to have recourse to Hannibals clemency, who, induced thereto by their brave defence, permitted them to march out of the town, upon the the freemen's paying seven ounces of gold an head. Livy says, that, till the gold was paid, the Carthaginian general kept them in chains; but afterwards, with great honour, conducted them to Cumæ. Of the Prænestine garrison, which, at the beginning of the siege, consisted of five hundred and seventy men, near one half arrived safe at Prænestе, with their prætor Manicius, the rest having been destroyed by sickness, famine, and the other casualties of war. Hannibal restored Casilinum to the Campanians, leaving there a Carthaginian garrison of seven hundred men, to defend the place against the Romans, in case they should think proper, after his departure, to attack it. Then, to complete the reduction of that part of Italy, in conjunction with the greatest part of the Brutii, he laid siege to Petilia, the only city of that nation, which held out against him. The Petilini immediately applied to the Romans for succours in the most pressing manner; but the perplexed state of affairs would not permit the republic to assist them. Notwithstanding which, they defended themselves for several months against the reiterated attacks of the whole Carthaginian army, with incredible bravery and resolution [s].

The state of affairs in Spain.

During these transactions in Italy, the war was carried on with great vigour in Spain. For some time Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general there, kept himself upon the defensive, not being in a condition to face either the Roman fleet under Publius Scipio, or the land-forces commanded by Cneius. However, at last receiving a reinforcement of four thousand foot, and five hundred horse, from Carthage, he ventured to move out of the fastnesses, wherein he had before posted himself, and advanced towards the enemy's camp. He likewise gave orders to have his fleet repaired, to protect the maritime parts of the Carthaginian provinces, and the islands adjacent to them, from all insults of the enemy; but, before this was in a condition to put to sea, he received intelligence, that several captains of ships had gone over to the Romans. These captains, it seems, had been severely reprimanded for abandoning the fleet upon the Iberus, through cowardice, the last year; which they not being able to brook, had, from that time, meditated a revolt from the Carthaginians. Not content with what they had already done, they endeavoured to excite the Carpesi to a defection; in which they so far succeeded, that several towns were drawn off from their obedience to the Carthaginians, and another, that refused to join them, reduced by force. This unexpected rebellion proved very prejudicial to Asdrubal, and a seasonable diversion in favour of the Romans; for the Carthaginian general, leaving the Romans to themselves, advanced, at the head of his whole army, into the enemy's territories, with a design to attack Galbus, the Carpesian general, who lay encamped under the walls of the town he had lately possessed himself of. He therefore first sent away his light-armed troops to reconnoitre the rebels, and draw them to an engagement, detaching immediately afterwards part of his infantry to ravage the neighbouring country, and cut off all the straggling parties of the enemy, that should be found dispersed there; by which means many of the Carpesii were killed, others put to flight, and their camp alarmed at the same time. However, their forces being very numerous, they were so far from being terrified at this motion, that they instantly issued out of their camp in a body, dancing and skipping after their manner, with an intention to fall directly upon the Carthaginians. This sudden instance of courage so damped the spirits of Asdrubal's main body, with which he was advancing to attack Galbus's camp, that he thought it proper to take post on an eminence, in itself of difficult access, but rendered more so by a river, which secured him from the enemy. Here he was rejoined by the two above-mentioned detachments, equally struck with terror at the enemy's approach; nay, under such terrible apprehensions were the Carthaginians at this juncture, that, notwithstanding their camp might have been looked upon as inaccessible, Asdrubal fortified it with an intrenchment, in order to cover it the more effectually from all attempts of the barbarians. Some skirmishes happened whilst the two armies lay so near one another; but without any considerable loss on either side. Livy tells us, that the Numidian cavalry were not so good as the Carpesian; nor the Mauritanian dartmen as the Carpesian targeteers, who, in activity, were equal to them, and in strength, as well as courage, excelled them. Galbus, finding it impossible either to draw the enemy out of their camp, or force the intrenchment that covered it, seized upon Asena, a town where Asdrubal had fixed his principal magazine, when he first first entered upon the Carpesian frontiers, and easily made himself master of the open country round about it. Asdrubal, finding the enemy, not a little elated with their late success, soon after to disperse themselves in small parties over the country, and to lay aside all discipline, both in their detachments and their camp, advanced out of his trenches, with his army drawn up in order of battle, and immediately fell upon them. The Carpesians, not expecting so sudden an onset, being in confusion, and having a good part of their forces then roving about the country, were easily routed by the Carthaginians, who continued the slaughter a great part of the day. In fine, the whole body of the barbarians in the camp, except a small party, that escaped, by a vigorous sally, to the mountains and woods, was put to the sword; which threw the Carpesii into such a consternation, that the next day the whole nation submitted to Asdrubal. Soon after a courier arrived from Carthage, with orders to Asdrubal to begin his march for Italy without delay. This changed the face of affairs in Spain; for the Spaniards, upon the publication of this news, considered the Carthaginians as not in a condition to protect them; and of course began to turn their eyes towards the Romans. Asdrubal therefore dispatched an express to Carthage, giving the republic an account how prejudicial the bare rumour of his departure had been to it; at the same time adding, that if the late orders were put in execution, the Romans would be masters of Spain, before he had passed the Iberus. To support what he advanced, he declared, that after he had drawn the forces assigned him out of the Carthaginian provinces there, neither garrisons nor a general would be left capable of giving any opposition to the Romans; that, besides this, the natives were not well affected to the Carthaginians; and that therefore it would be at least proper for him to defer his march, till a successor arrived in Spain, with a strong body of forces, to preserve the Carthaginian acquisitions there; since, whatever success might attend their arms against the Romans, the disposition of the Spaniards themselves would require no small number of troops to be distributed amongst them. But, notwithstanding this just remonstrance, the state of Carthage persisted in its former resolution, looking upon it as a matter of the utmost consequence to support Hannibal. However, it so far complied with Asdrubal's request, as to send Himilco, with a competent army, and a considerable naval reinforcement,

HIMILCO, having transported his forces to Spain, took care immediately to put himself into a situation not to fear any insults of the Spaniards. He fortified his camp, drew his ships on shore, and surrounded them with a ditch and a wall. After this, he hastened with the utmost expedition through the territories of several cantons, either open enemies to the Carthaginians, or disposed to be so, to Asdrubal's camp, escorted by a choice detachment of horse. After he had imparted the orders of the senate to that general, and received from him instructions how to carry on the war in Spain, he returned to his own camp in safety, the extreme celerity, with which he posted through the territories of the above-mentioned Spanish cantons, not giving any of them an opportunity of discovering him. Before Asdrubal began his march for Italy, he furnished himself with large sums of money, which he exacted from the Spaniards subject to, and in alliance with, Carthage, being sensible, that Hannibal could never have reached the Alps, had he not been powerfully supported by gold. At last, having got all things in readiness for the enterprize he was going upon, he assembled all his forces, and advanced to the Iberus. In the mean time he received intelligence, that the Romans, apprised of his approach, had laid siege to Ibera, a town deriving its name from the river on which it stood, and the richest in all that part of Spain. To induce them therefore to raise that siege, he sat down before another town, which had lately submitted to the Romans. This had the desired effect; for the Romans, leaving Ibera, immediately moved towards him, and encamped upon a spot about five miles distant from him. The consequence of this action was a decisive battle, wherein Asdrubal gave proofs of an extraordinary military genius, though fortune declared against him. The Spaniards in his army, not relishing an Italian expedition, took to their heels at the first onset; the Mauritanian and Numidian horse made but a faint resistance; so that the rout was general, and the slaughter dreadful. Asdrubal did all that could be expected from the most consummate general; he continued to give his orders with the greatest presence of mind, and to animate his men by his example, example, till all things became deſperate; but, not being able to rally his troops, he found himſelf obliged to leave the field of battle and his camp to the enemy, together with the vaſt ſums of money he had amaſſed for the Italian expedition. According to Eutropius and Oroſius, the Carthaginians had twenty-five thouſand men killed, and ten thouſand taken priſoners, in the action. Zonaras intimates, that Cneius was ſo poſted with a body of troops, that very few of the Carthaginians found it poſſible to make their eſcape. After this blow, all the Spaniards, who had before been wavering in their fidelity to Carthage, declared for the victors. Aſdrubal, in the mean time, collecting the remains of his ſhattered army, was ſo far from being in a condition to attempt ſuccouring Hannibal, that, with great difficulty, he maintained himſelf in Spain [u].

Livy partial in his relation of the tranſactions in Spain.

OUR readers will eaſily perceive, that this account of the Spaniſh affairs, during the period we are now upon, is chiefly extracted from Livy; though they may at the ſame time diſcover, that we have inſerted ſeveral circumſtances not taken notice of by that hiſtorian, with which we have been ſupplied by other antient writers. They are not therefore to be ſurpriſed, if they ſhould meet with ſeveral improbabilities, and even inconſiſtencies, in the relation; ſince Livy muſt be allowed to have been moſt unreaſonably prejudiced againſt the Carthaginian republic, as well as in favour of his own. Fabius Pictor, Valerius Antias, and others, from whom he compiled his hiſtory, were of the ſame diſpoſition with himſelf in this particular. What truth therefore can be expected from them in a deſcription of any great tranſactions, wherein the Carthaginians bore a principal part? The improbabilities and inconſiſtencies juſt hinted at are ſo glaring, that they cannot eſcape the eye of any attentive reader; for which reaſon it is ſuperfluous, would the nature of our deſign permit, to recite them. However, thus much is apparent from what the above-menſioned authors have tranſmitted to poſterity in the point before us, viz. that the defeat of Aſdrubal, in a great meaſure, ruined Hannibal's affairs in Italy, though it was not attended with ſuch fatal conſequences in Spain as Livy ſuggeſts. That hiſtorian himſelf puts this laſt obſervation beyond dispute, in some subsequent parts of his work. How greatly then are we to regret the loss of that part of Polybius's excellent history treating of these campaigns in Spain! This, had it been extant, would undoubtedly have set us right in every important particular relating to them. But to return to the Carthaginian affairs in Italy [w].

[u] Liv. ubi ſup. c. 29. Diod. Sic. l. xxvi. in excerpt. Val. & Appian. Flor. Eutrop. Oroſ. Zonar. &c. ubi ſup.

The Carthaginians reduce Petilia.

HIMILCO, who commanded the Carthaginian forces before Petilia, carried on the siege of that place with great vigour, battering the walls with the utmost fury, and harassing the garrison by continual assaults. However, the Petiliani defended themselves in a very gallant manner, destroying great numbers of the besiegers, though they were but an handful of men. But what not a little contributed to the defence of the place, was the bravery of the women, who distinguished themselves as much as the men on this occasion. They made frequent sallies, burnt the enemy's works, and retired triumphantly into the town. Notwithstanding which, Hannibal, having cut off all communication betwixt them and the neighbouring country, they were so greatly pressed by famine, that they found themselves obliged to send all the useless people out of the city, who, according to Appian, were immediately butchered by the Carthaginians in the sight of the garrison. At last, they resolved to make a sally with their whole force, which they accordingly did; but the greatest part of them, through hunger and fatigue, not having strength enough either to make use of their arms, or retire into the town, were put to the sword. However, eight hundred of them cut their way through the enemy, and escaped in a body to the Romans, who, after the conclusion of this war, reinstated them in their former possessions, and always took care to distinguish them by such marks of esteem, as their singular fidelity intitled them to [x].

As likewise Consentia, Croton, Locri, and other cities.

AFTER the reduction of Petilia, Hannibal, having been rejoined by Himilco's detachment, advanced to Consentia; which soon surrendered to him. Locri opened its gates upon the first summons, the principal citizens having, for some time, kept a secret correspondence with the Brutii, who had united themselves with the Carthaginian army. Croto, which was, in a manner, deserted by its inhabitants, tants, and ſeveral other cities of Magna Græcia, did the like. Rhegium, though attacked by Hannibal with all his forces, held out bravely, and baffled all the efforts of the Carthaginians. Sicily in the mean time wavered in its fidelity to the Romans, the defeat at Cannæ giving it ſuch an idea of the Carthaginian power, that it could not avoid diſcovering an inclination to follow the example of the Italians. Even the family of Hiero was not entirely free from this diſpoſition; for Gelon, the heir apparent to the crown of Syracuſe, deſpiſing Hiero's old age, declared for Hannibal; and had not death taken him ſo opportunely, that Hiero himſelf was ſuſpected of haſtening his fate, he might have made a powerfull diverſion in favour of the Carthaginians [y].

Hannibal outwits the dictator Junius.

ZONARAS intimates, that ſomewhere about the period we are now upon, the dictator Junius, with a powerful corps, attended Hannibal, and mimicked all his motions. He encamped, decamped, refreſhed his troops at the ſame time, and in the ſame manner, the ſubtle Carthaginian did; inſomuch that the movements of both armies correſponded in every particular. Hannibal, obſerving this, immediately began to conſider, how he might reap ſome advantage from the whimſical conduct of the dictator. He was not long at a loſs for a ſtratagem on this occaſion: the firſt dark, tempeſtuous night that happened, he detached a good body of forces out of his camp, ordering them to take poſt in ſome place at a ſmall diſtance from it, and to haraſs the Romans all night with continual ſkirmiſhes and alarms, if Junius made the ſame movement. With the other part of the army he repoſed himſelf in the camp till morning, and then recalled the above-mentioned detachment, commanding every man of it immediately to take his natural reſt. This artifice, according to our author, had the deſired effect; for Junius, at the beginning of the night, obſerving a large body of troops to march out of Hannibal's camp, and perceiving every thing there ſtill afterwards, imagined the whole Carthaginian army to have been in motion; and therefore drew all the forces out of his own camp, to obſerve the enemy. The commander of the Carthaginian detachment, in purſuance of his orders, kept the Romans in action the whole night, and then retired into the camp, to repoſe his troops. Upon Junius's doing doing the ſame, Hannibal, with his freſh corps, fell upon the wearied Romans, now aſleep, and not dreaming of any attack, forced their camp, put great numbers of them to the ſword, and diſperſed the reſt. The darkneſs of the night, as well as the tempeſtuous weather, did not a little contribute to the happy ſucceſs of this ſtratagem, ſince the Roman general was thereby rendered incapable, either of diſcovering the number, or penetrating the deſign, of the Carthaginians [z].

The Carthaginians prepare to invade Sardinia.

In the mean time a courier arrived at Carthage from the army in Spain, with letters from Aſdrubal, importing, that he had received a total defeat, and that the greateſt part of Spain had revolted to the Romans. The ſenate and people were thunderſtruck at this melancholy advice, which, for the preſent, diſconcerted all their meaſures. Mago was upon the point of ſetting out for Italy, with a reinforcement of twelve thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, and twenty elephants, beſides a pecuniary ſupply of a thouſand talents in ſilver; but his departure, upon the reception of this mortifying news, was countermanded, and he ordered to hold himſelf in readineſs to embarque for Spain at a minute's warning. Whilſt matters were in this ferment at Carthage, embaſſadors arrived there from Sardinia, inviting the Carthaginians, in the name of Hamſicora, who, at that time, bore the chief ſway there, and the other Sardinian prime nobility, to ſend over a body of troops, in order to take poſſeſſion of that iſland. Theſe embaſſadors inſinuated, "That the Romans had ſcarce "any forces there; that the prætor Cornelius, a perſon "of diſtinguiſhed merit, had left the iſland; that a new "one, perfectly raw and unacquainted with the genius of "the Sardi, as well as their manners and conſtitution, was "expected; that the Sardi were tired of the Roman go-"vernment, and extremely incenſed againſt their imperi-"ous and avaritious maſters, for their grievous exactions "the laſt year; in fine, that nothing was wanting to in-"duce them to ſhake off the Roman yoke, but an encour-"agement thereto from ſome powerful ſtate, that would "take them under its protection." This embaſſy a little revived the drooping ſpirits of the Carthaginians, who thereupon immediately ſent Mago to Spain with the aboveſaid ſuccours, succours, and dispatched Asdrubal, surnamed Calvus [a], with the like number of forces to support the Sardi.

Hannibal concludes a treaty with Philip king of Macedon.

WHILST the two potent republics of Carthage and Rome were thus contending for superiority, the eyes of all the neighbouring states were fixed upon them. Amongst the rest, Philip, king of Macedon, had observed, with great attention, the progress of this war. This in point of prudence, he thought himself obliged to, as he was a neighbour to Italy, being separated from it only by the Ionian sea. At first, he was equally inclined to both parties; but finding Hannibal the favourite of fortune, he came to a resolution to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Carthaginian. To this end he sent an embassy, with Xenophanes, one of his ministers, at the head of it, to Hannibal's camp in Campania. This embassy happened to fall into the hands of the Romans, and was conducted to the prætor Valerius Levinus, in his camp at Nuceria; but Xenophanes, by his address, pretending he came to propose a treaty of friendship to the Romans, found means to pursue his rout; and, upon arriving at Hannibal's headquarters, concluded a treaty with him, which, together with the preamble to it, was couched in the following terms: "Copy of the treaty concluded between Hannibal, "general of the Carthaginian army, Mago, Myrcan, Bar-"mocar, all the senators of Carthage, together with the "whole body of forces then present, on the one side; and "Xenophanes, son of Cleomachus, an Athenian, mi-"nister plenipotentiary of Philip, son of Demetrius, king "of Macedon, the Macedonian nation, and their allies, "on the other. The articles of this treaty are agreed upon "in the most solemn manner by both the contracting "powers, in the presence of Jupiter, Juno, and Apollo; "of the Dæmon of Carthage, Hercules, and Iolaus; of "Mars, Triton, and Neptune; of those divinities who "are confederates with Carthage; of the Sun, Moon, "and Earth; of the Rivers, Meadows, and Waters; "of the tutelary deities of Carthage, Macedon, and "Greece; and lastly, of those deities, who, presiding "in war, assist at, and superintend, the signing of the "present treaty, Hannibal, general of the Carthaginian "forces, the senators above-mentioned, and the whole "Carthaginian

(P) We have translated here the OI KYPIOI KAPXHΔONIOI of Polybius, the lords the Carthaginians, and not Carthaginian lords; since the last expression seems to refer only to the senate and the suffetes; whereas the former includes likewise the people, who, at the signing of this treaty, were the most powerful part of the republic of Carthage; and that this alliance was concluded by Philip's ministers with the whole republic of Carthage, not with the senate and suffetes, in exclusion of the plebeians, no one can doubt. So we see in the treaty of Utrecht, to omit several others of late date, the states general are styled the lords the states general. However, we do not pretend to insist upon the truth of this translation, only offer it as a conjecture to our learned readers, leaving it to them either to admit of it, or reject it, as they shall think proper (22).

THIS copy of the articles of the offenſive and defenſive alliance concluded betwixt the Carthaginians and Philip king of Macedon, preſerved to us by Polybius, is a moſt curious and valuable fragment of antiquity, as ſerving not only to give us a good idea of the moſt noted objects of the Carthaginian worſhip, but likewiſe to exhibit to our view the form and manner in which that nation drew up their treaties; for it appears pretty plain from Polybius, that the Carthaginians were looked upon as the chief party concerned in this engagement; and that the preparing of the inſtrument we have given our readers here a tranſlation of, was entirely left to Hannibal. It likewiſe further appears, that Livy has not ſo much given us the articles of this treaty, as certain inferences and concluſions drawn from thoſe articles, ſome of which were,

were, in all probability, falſe, taken from Fabius Pictor, Valerius Antias, and others, who, in few particulars relating to the Carthaginians, paid the greateſt regard to truth. For theſe reaſons, we could not prevail upon ourſelves to omit the inſertion of a tranſlation of the copy above-mentioned in this work, which, we doubt not, will oblige all the curious and inquiſitive among our readers [c].

Philip's embaſſadors intercepted by the Romans.

WHEN the Macedonian embaſſadors returned home, Hannibal ſent three miniſters with them, viz. Giſco, Boſtar, and Mago, in order to bring him king Philip's ratification of the above-mentioned treaty. They had a veſſel waiting for them, privately ſtationed near the temple of Juno Lacinia in Calabria; but were ſcarce got out to ſea, when they were deſcried by the Romans. Some light galleys of Corcyra, being detached from the Roman ſquadron, then cruiſing off the coaſts of Calabria, ſoon came up with them, and obliged the veſſel they were on board immediately to ſurrender. In this emergency, Xenophanes had recourſe to another falſhood, aſſerting, "That all the paſſes and high ways in Campania "were ſo guarded by the Carthaginian parties, that he found "it impoſſible to go to Rome, as he was ordered," but without effect; for the Carthaginian miniſters were betrayed by their language and habits, by which means the Romans diſcovered the whole ſecret, ſent both the Carthaginian and Macedonian embaſſadors priſoners to Rome, and diverted the impending ſtorm this formidable league threatened them with, in the manner related by us in a former part of this hiſtory [d].

The Carthaginian affairs go to decay both by ſea and land.

ABOUT this time Hannibal received intelligence, that the Campanians, who had aſſembled an army of four thouſand men to act in favour of the Carthaginians, had been entirely defeated by Gracchus at Hamæ, to which place they had advanced, in order to ſeize upon Cumæ, with the loſs of above two thouſand men, together with Marius Alfinus their commander, and thirty-four colours. He therefore, without loſs of time, marched to Hamæ; but, upon his arrival there, found only the carcaſſes of the Campanians who fell in the laſt action, with which the ground was ſtrewed, the enemy having retired, immediately after the battle, to Cumæ. For the

the preſent, Hannibal re-occupied his former camp upon mount Tifata; but, at the ſolicitation of the Campanians, after having ravaged all the country about Cumæ, he laid ſiege to that city. Having applied an high moveable tower to the walls of the place, he made a vigorous aſſault; but the Roman conſul, who had thrown himſelf into the town, having raiſed one upon the walls, that overtopped this, and poſted ſome men in it, who diſcharged a great number of flaming torches, beſides a vaſt quantity of other combuſtible materials ſet on fire, upon the beſiegers, the Carthaginians were put into diſorder; which being obſerved by the garriſon, a ſtrong party ſallied out of the town, put them to the rout, and purſued them as far as their camp, which was about a mile diſtant. Livy tells us, that Hannibal loſt fourteen hundred men on this occaſion upon the ſpot, beſides forty taken priſoners. However, the next day the Carthaginian drew up his army in order of battle betwixt his camp and the town, in order to draw the Romans to an engagement; but the conſul declining this, he immediately decamped, and took poſt again upon mount Tifata. Whilſt theſe things happened, Hanno was defeated at Grumentum in Lucania by T. Sempronius Longus, and loſt four thouſand men upon the field of battle, beſides forty-one colours. After this blow, Hanno abandoned Lucania to the enemy, and retreated into the country of the Brutii. Upon theſe repeated inſtances of ill ſucceſs, three towns of the Hirpini revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, who took a thouſand priſoners there, and cauſed them all to be ſold under the ſpear. A little before theſe diſaſters happened, Aſdrubal, ſirnamed Calvus, ſet ſail from Carthage, with the armament under his command, for Sardinia; but received great damage from a ſtorm he met with in his paſſage, and was obliged to put in at one of the ports of the Balearic iſlands. Here he ſtaid a while, in order to refit his fleet; which gave the Romans time to make head againſt the Carthaginians in Sardinia, and conſequently not a little contributed to the ſignal overthrow Aſdrubal ſoon after received in that iſland [e].

Marcellus gains another conſiderable advantage over Hannibal.

PHILIP, king of Macedon, being informed, that his embaſſadors, together with the Carthaginian miniſters ſent by Hannibal, had fallen into the hands of the Romans, ſent Heraclitus Scotinus, Crito Berræus, and Soſitheus Magnes, three three noblemen he could confide in, to conclude a freſh treaty with that general. This they happily performed; but, as the ſummer was ſpent in this negotiation, Philip could not put himſelf ſoon enough in motion to make any diverſion in favour of the Carthaginians. Hannibal therefore now began conſiderably to loſe ground. Fabius, having paſſed the Vulturnus, in conjunction with his collegue, took the cities of Combulteria, Trebula, and Anſticula, by aſſault, making the Carthaginian garriſons therein priſoners of war. In the mean time Hannibal kept a ſecret correſpondence with the populace of Nola, who were at his devotion, engaging them to deliver the city into his hands; which being communicated to Fabius, he ſent the proconſul Marcellus with a body of troops thither, to garriſon the place, and protect the nobility, who were in the Roman intereſt; and, in the mean time, poſted himſelf betwixt Nola and the Carthaginian camp upon mount Tifata, in order to cut off all communication betwixt them. Marcellus likewiſe made frequent incurſions into the territories of the Hirpini and the Samnites Caudini, where he committed great depredations. This induced the Hirpini and the Samnites to ſend deputies to Hannibal, reproaching him with his indolence, and telling him, That Marcellus ſeemed rather to be the conqueror at Cannæ than Hannibal. To whom Hannibal replied, That as the blow given the Romans at Cannæ had eclipſed all his other victories, ſo they ſhould ſoon ſee the glory of that obſcured by another more illuſtrious atchievement; and then, diſmiſſing them with magnificent preſents, he advanced towards Nola, after having left a ſufficient body of troops to guard his camp on mount Tifata. Upon his approach, he ſent Hanno, with a detachment of the forces, to perſuade the Nolans to ſurrender their city to the Carthaginians. To which end, by Marcellus's permiſſion, he had a conference with Herennius Baſſus, and Herius Petrius, two perſons of the firſt diſtinction in the place; but without effect. Hannibal therefore, ſitting down before the city, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking it with the utmoſt vigour; which Marcellus obſerving, ſallied out upon his forces with ſuch fury, that the action then had become general, had not the combatants on both ſides been obliged to draw off by a violent ſtorm. On this occaſion the Carthaginians, according to Livy, loſt thirty men; but the Romans not one. Two days afterwards, a bloody engagement happened within a mile of Nola, wherein the Carthaginians were worſted, being driven out of the field of battle, with the loſs of a thouſand men killed, and ſixteen hundred made priſoners, beſides nineteen military enſigns, two elephants, &c. taken, and four of the laſt-mentioned animals ſlain. A body of near thirteen hundred Spaniſh and Numidian horſe, immediately after this defeat, deſerted to the Romans; which was a great loſs to Hannibal, as theſe were ſome of his veteran troops, that had attended him in all his expeditions. Fabius, now laying aſide his uſual caution, penetrated into the very heart of Campania; and hearing of Hannibal's retreat into Apulia, moved towards Capua, deſtroying all the country, as he advanced, with fire and ſword; which concluded the operations of this campaign in Italy [f].

In the mean time, Aſdrubal being detained in one of the ports of the Balearic iſlands by the accident above-mentioned, Manlius landed his forces at Caralis, and, upon taking a review of them, found them to conſiſt of twenty-two thouſand foot, and twelve hundred horſe. At the head of this army he marched into the enemy's territories, and encamped near Hamſicora, the Sardinian general, who, being gone into the diſtrict of the Pellidi Sardi, to aſſemble all the youth there able to bear arms, in order to reinforce his troops, had left his ſon Hioſtus to command in his abſence. Hioſtus, being a raſh young man, ventured an engagement with Manlius, wherein he had the misfortune to be overthrown, having thirty thouſand of his men killed upon the ſpot, and thirteen hundred taken priſoners. The body aſſembled by Hamſicora, upon this melancholy news, immediately diſperſed itſelf over the fields and woods; but, at laſt, retired to a city called Cornus, the capital of the aforeſaid diſtrict. Sardinia now muſt have been totally loſt, had not Aſdrubal arrived in the critical moment with his forces ſent from Carthage for the ſupport of the Sardi. Hamſicora ſoon joined him with all the Sardinian troops he could draw together; and, immediately after this junction, the confederates advanced into the territories of the Roman allies, laying waſte the whole country through which they moved. Their intention was to have marched marched directly to Caralis, and seized upon that capital but Manlius came up with them before they could put their design in execution. After some slight skirmishes betwixt the advanced guards of the two armies, a general action ensued, wherein the Sardi were soon put to the rout; but the Carthaginians continued the fight with extraordinary bravery, insomuch that victory hung in suspense for above the space of four hours. However, they were at last entirely defeated, and dispersed beyond a possibility of rallying. Twelve thousand of the Sardi, and three thousand Carthaginians, fell in this battle; seven hundred of both nations were made prisoners, and nineteen colours taken. Mago, a near relation of Hannibal, Hanno, another Carthaginian nobleman, the chief fomenter of all these troubles in Sardinia, and Asdrubal the general, were in the number of the latter; but Hiostus, the son of Hamsicora, in that of the former, which threw his father into such an excess of grief, that he laid violent hands on himself. The shattered remains of the Carthaginian and Sardinian army fled to Cornus, and, upon the first summons of the conqueror, surrendered at discretion. All the cities and fortresses likewise, either in the Carthaginian jurisdiction, or that of Hamsicora, in a few days made their submission to Manlius: who soon set sail from Caralis for the coast of Italy, with the prisoners, as well as vast booty, he had acquired in this successful expedition [g].

The Carthaginians worsted at sea.

ASDRUBAL had no sooner landed his troops in Sardinia, as already related, than he sent the fleet back to Africa, the admiral of which, in his passage, was attacked by a Roman squadron of fifty sail, under the command of T. Otacilius the prætor; who, having ravaged the maritime part of the territory of Carthage, was steering his course towards Sardinia, in quest of this very fleet. The Romans, took seven Carthaginian galleys, with their crews, the rest escaping by sheering off in time, and by favour of a tempest, that arose during the heat of the action. About this time Bomilcar arrived at Locri with a reinforcement of troops, forty elephants, and a considerable supply of provisions and military stores, from Carthage. After a short stay here, he joined Hanno, who, at that time, lay encamped in the country of the Brutii, having narrowly escaped being cut off by Appius, who,

who, having ſuddenly paſſed the ſtreights of Reggio, unexpectedly advanced to the gates of Locri, in order to have ſurpriſed him. Appius took poſt in the neighbourhood of Locri immediately after Bomilcar's departure; ſo that the city, being abandoned by the Carthaginians, opened its gates to him. However, he miſſed his principal aim, and, without making any new attempts, ſoon after returned to Meſſana [h].

State of affairs in Spain.

THE Carthaginians, according to Livy, ſuſtained this year a very conſiderable loſs in Spain. Aſdrubal, Mago, and Hamilcar the ſon of Bomilcar, three Carthaginian generals, laid ſiege to Illiturgi, which had revolted to the Romans. The Romans, with no ſmall difficulty, forced their way through the enemy's three camps, and ſupplied their allies with all things neceſſary, when they were upon the point of ſurrendering for want of ſuch a ſupply. This encouraged the Scipios to venture a battle with the Carthaginians, whoſe army conſiſted of ſixty thouſand men, though theirs did not amount to above ſixteen thouſand. Aſdrubal's camp, being by far the moſt conſiderable, was firſt attacked by the Romans; which being obſerved by Mago and Hamilcar, they advanced, each of them at the head of his reſpective corps, to ſupport him. But, notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, according to the ſame author, all the Carthaginian camps were forced, and their army overthrown, with the loſs of above ſixteen thouſand men upon the ſpot, three thouſand made priſoners, five elephants ſlain, beſides a thouſand horſes, ſixty military enſigns, and five elephants taken. The conſequence of this defeat was the raiſing the ſiege of Illiturgi, from whence the Carthaginians retired with great precipitation to Incibili, and in a ſhort time found means ſo to recruit their forces out of the Spaniſh provinces, that they ventured another engagement with the Scipios; but their unhappy fate ſtill attending them, they were routed again, and driven out of the field of battle, with the loſs of thirteen thouſand men killed in the action and the purſuit. Three thouſand priſoners, above forty colours, and nine elephants, fell into the hands of the victors. After this battle, adds Livy, all the different nations of Spain revolted to the Romans [i].

OUR readers will be beforehand with us in obſerving with what improbabilities, not to ſay abſurdities, this narration of Livy is clogged. How can it be ſuppoſed poſſible for Aſdrubal, after the complete defeat he met with in Spain only the laſt year, to aſſemble another army of ſixty thouſand men ſo ſoon in the ſame country, eſpecially ſince the Carthaginians had reinforced their troops in Italy, and ſent a very conſiderable body of forces to invade Sardinia? If Aſdrubal, after the terrible blow he received laſt year, could ſcarce maintain himſelf in any part of Spain, as this author himſelf expreſly aſſerts, what probability is there, that, in the ſpace of a very few months only, he ſhould have become ſo prodigiouſly ſuperior in ſtrength to his conquerors the Romans, eſpecially ſince the Spaniards in general had declared againſt him? Laſtly, admitting all this to be true, can it be imagined, that immediately after the ſecond fatal overthrow mentioned here by our author, the Carthaginian general could form ſo numerous an army out of the Spaniſh nations, who had before eſpouſed the Roman intereſt? The inconſiſtencies couched in theſe queries are certainly ſo glaring, that it would be entirely needleſs to expatiate upon them; and therefore we ſhall content ourſelves with having barely hinted at them here, as thinking this ſufficient to confirm what we have elſewhere obſerved of the partiality of this hiſtorian, or at leaſt of thoſe he extracted his materials from [k].

The troops in Italy on both ſides go into winter-quarters.

NO conſiderable movements happened during the time the troops on both ſides lay in winter-quarters. The citadel of Croton however was abandoned to the people of Locri, allies of the Carthaginians, after the concluſion of the campaign. Hannibal took up his winter-quarters at Arpi, and the conſul Sempronius his at Luceria. Each commander kept a watchful eye upon his antagoniſt, and endeavoured to animate his men, the Carthaginian and Roman parties frequently ſkirmiſhing with one another [l].

Hannibal raiſes commotions in Sicily.

ABOUT this time Hannibal found means to raiſe commotions in Sicily, which turned out not a little to his advantage. After the death of Hiero, by ſeveral artful ſteps, he fixed his grandſon Hieronymus, who ſucceeded him in the kingdom of Syracuſe, in the intereſt of the Carthaginians. Some authors relate, that this young prince reigned only thirteen thirteen months; that, after he came to the crown, he ſhewed a moſt abandoned diſpoſition; and that many prodigies at Syracuſe preceded his acceſſion. Polybius however differs from theſe authors, in relation to his character; though he allows, that he was a weak and unjuſt prince. Soon after he had entered into a league with Hannibal and the ſtate of Carthage, he was aſſaſſinated by the direction of Indigemenes, one of the officers of his guards. But, for the particulars of this horrid action, as well as the effect it had upon the affairs of Carthage and Syracuſe, we muſt refer our readers to former parts of this hiſtory [m].

The Romans gain ſome advantages over Hannibal.

THE Capuans, hearing of the vaſt preparations made in all the Roman provinces for the vigorous proſecution of this war, no leſs than eighteen legions being deſtined for the ſervice of the current year, were thrown into a great conſternation, eſpecially as they knew themſelves, to be above all others, obnoxious to the Romans. They therefore, in the moſt preſſing terms, entreated Hannibal to move immediately to their aſſiſtance, and prevent the Romans from taking poſt before their city. Hannibal, in compliance with their requeſt, advanced with all expedition to mount Tifata near Capua, where the former year he had encamped; and, after leaving one body of Spaniards and Numidians to defend the advantageous ſpot of ground he had then poſſeſſed himſelf of, and another to reinforce the garriſon of Capua, he marched to the lake Avernus, under the pretence of ſacrificing to the gods, but, in reality, to attempt making himſelf maſter of Puteoli, into which Fabius had, ſome time before, thrown a body of troops. Having ravaged the territory of Cumæ, as far as the promontory of Miſenum, he preſented himſelf before Puteoli, and ſummoned the garriſon, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men, to ſurender; but finding the Romans determined to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of blood, and that the place was, in a manner, impregnable, he thought proper to retire. Soon after this repulſe, the populace of Nola, upon his approach towards their city, ſent to Hannibal, deſiring of him ſome forces to defend them againſt the ſenate, who were friends to the Romans. But Marcellus, having with great difficulty paſſed the Vulturnus, reinforced the garriſon of Nola with ſix thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe, and thereby prevented the Carthaginian from been admitted into the place. In the mean time Hanno, marching out of the country of the Brutii, encamped within three miles of Beneventum, upon the river Calor; which Gracchus being informed of, moved at the head of a large detachment, conſiſting chiefly of ſlaves, and pitched his tents within a mile of him. This vicinity of the two camps ſoon brought on a general action, wherein the Carthaginians were defeated, with very conſiderable loſs. During theſe tranſactions in the neighbourhood of Beneventum, Hannibal appeared again before Nola; but Marcellus, having joined the proprætor Pomponius, and ordered Claudius Nero, with a ſtrong body of horſe, to fall upon the enemy's rear, attacked him. After a briſk diſpute, the Roman gained the advantage, and might have entirely overthrown the Carthaginian, could Nero have executed his orders; but the commander having, by ſome unforeſeen accident, been hindered from coming up with the enemy in time, nothing deciſive happened on either ſide. Hannibal ſoon after drew his forces from before Nola, and retreated towards Tarentum [n].

Hanno defeats Gracchus.

HANNO, after the diſgrace he had received near Beneventum, retired into Lucania, where meeting with a body of Romans ſent by Gracchus to ravage the country, ſoon diſperſed them, putting a great number of them to the ſword; which made him ſome amends for his former diſaſter. Fabius and Marcellus now jointly carried on the ſiege of Caſilinum, which they puſhed ſo vigorouſly, that it was at laſt obliged to capitulate. Fabius granted them a capitulation, the chief article of which was, that they ſhould have leave to retire to Capua; but Marcellus, Roman like, broke this, maſſacring many of them, and ſending all the reſt, except fifty, that eſcaped to Fabius, priſoners to Rome. After this exploit, the Romans, in a very heroic manner, deſtroyed with fire and ſword the whole country of the Caudine Samnites, carried off from thence an immenſe quantity of plunder, and took by ſtorm the cities Compulteria, Teleſia, Compſa, Melæ, Fulfulæ, and Orbitanium. Blandæ in Lucania, and Ancæ in Apulia, likewiſe underwent the ſame fate. Hanno, with the booty he

he got in the late action, arrived ſafe in the country of the Brutii, the Roman forces in thoſe parts not being ſtrong enough to intercept him [o].

Hannibal advances to Tarentum, but without any effect.

WHILST Hannibal was encamped on the lake Avernus, five young Tarentine noblemen, that had been taken priſoners in the battles of the lake Thraſymenus and Cannæ, and diſmiſſed, with great politeneſs, by that general, arrived there as embaſſadors from the city of Tarentum. They told him, "That, in return for his kindneſs to "them, they had prevailed upon the Tarentines to prefer "his friendſhip to that of the Romans; and that they "would open their gates to him upon his preſenting him-"ſelf before the town." Hannibal, relying upon this aſſurance, ſoon after advanced into the neighbourhood of Tarentum; but finding that nobody offered to ſtir, the proprætor Valerius having thrown a body of troops into the place juſt before, he bent his march to Salapia, ordering vaſt quantities of proviſions, amaſſed in the territories of Metapontum and Heraclea, to be brought thither. Having an intention to fix there his winter-quarters, he likewiſe ſent detachments of Moors and Numidians to carry off every thing valuable, that could be found in the diſtrict of Salentum, and the adjacent woody parts of Apulia. Amongſt other things, that were the produce of the country, they brought off a large number of wild horſes, four thouſand of which, being tamed, were very ſerviceable to Hannibal in the remounting of his cavalry [p].

FROM the continent of Italy, we ſhould now paſs over to the iſland of Sicily, which was the theatre of very conſiderable tranſactions during this period, according to Polybius, Livy, and Plutarch. But as ſo full and ample an account of theſe tranſactions has been given in a former part of this work, that not a ſingle circumſtance of note relative thereto has been omitted, we cannot ſo much as touch upon them, without being guilty of a repetition. We hope therefore it will be deemed ſufficient for us to have hinted to our readers, that the affairs of Sicily, however interwoven with thoſe of other nations, do moſt properly belong to the hiſtory of Syracuſe [q].

The transactions in Spain.

NOTWITHSTANDING the losses the Carthaginians sustained the last year in Spain, Asdrubal and Mago, the beginning of this campaign, defeated a strong body of Spaniards; which might have been of bad consequence to the Romans, had not Publius advanced with all expedition to the Iberus, in order to support his confederates. The Romans encamped at Castrum Altum, a place famous for the death of the great Hamilcar. Though this was a fortress of great strength, and abundantly stored with provisions, Publius, finding all the adjacent country possessed by the enemy, and his troops greatly harassed by their horse, soon decamped, and posted himself on a spot not so much exposed to their insults. The Carthaginians cut off above two thousand Romans, in various rencounters, during Publius's short stay at Castrum Altum. Publius, soon after his arrival in his new camp, which he immediately fortified with a retrenchment, went, with a detachment of his light-armed troops, to reconnoitre some of the neighbouring places; which being observed by the Carthaginian general, he advanced, at the head of his forces, to attack him, and had surprised him in a plain, had he not had the precaution to retire in time to an eminence, where he defended himself, till his brother Cneius came to his relief. Castulo, a strong and noble city of Spain, and so strictly allied with the Carthaginians, that Asdrubal had taken him a wife from thence, now revolted to the Romans. The Carthaginians, not discouraged at this, laid siege to Illiturgi, wherein was a Roman garrison, which was in great danger of surrendering to them for want of provisions. Cneius, hearing of this, forced his way through the enemy's camp into the town, supplied it plentifully, with every thing needful, and the next day sallying out upon the enemy, killed so many of them, that, in the two actions, they lost twelve thousand men upon the spot, and took above ten thousand prisoners, together with thirty-two colours; and all this with a single legion only. The Carthaginians, being thus obliged to abandon the siege of Illiturgi, marched from thence to attack Bigerra, another city in alliance with Rome; but Cneius forced them to raise this likewise, without striking a stroke. Afterwards the Carthaginian general moved to Munda, whither he was followed by the Romans. Here both armies engaged for four hours, when the Romans would have been victorious, had not Scipio been wounded in the thigh by a javelin; which so disheartened tened his troops, that he was obliged to ſound a retreat. In this action the Carthaginian troops, according to Livy, as well as the elephants, were driven back to their retrenchment, where thirty-nine of thoſe huge animals periſhed by the enemy's darts. Twelve thouſand Carthaginians loſt their lives on the field of battle, and three thouſand of them, with fifty-ſeven military enſigns, fell into the enemy's hands. Then the Carthaginians retreated with great precipitation to Oringis, and were purſued by the Romans. There Cneius, being carried in a litter, again attacked Aſdrubal, and entirely routed him; but did not make ſuch a carnage as in the former engagements, becauſe the Carthaginian forces were not at that time ſo numerous. Notwithſtanding all the diſaſters, Mago ſpeedily raiſed ſuch a number of recruits, as enabled his brother to look the Romans again in the face. Another battle enſued, wherein the Romans met with their uſual ſucceſs. Above eight thouſand Carthaginians, with eight elephants were ſlain, and about one thouſand, with fifty-eight military enſigns, and three elephants taken. Mænicapto and Civiſmaro, two famous kings of the Gauls, who came to aſſiſt their allies the Carthaginians, likewiſe fell in this battle. A vaſt number of gold rings, chains for the neck, bracelets, and other Gallic ſpoils, alſo came into the poſſeſſion of the victors. The Romans, having now driven the enemy out of the field, advanced to Saguntum, forced the Carthaginian garriſon to abandon it, and then reſtored it to the antient inhabitants, that had ſurvived the calamities of their country. As for the Turdetani, who had been the occaſion of this bloody war, Cneius cauſed them to be ſold by auction, and afterwards razed their city. Such is the account Livy has given us of the military operations this year in Spain; which is juſt as conſiſtent with itſelf, as that extraordinary relation of the action near Syracuſe, in the beginning of the firſt Punic war, Philinus vouchſafed his countrymen, according to which, the conquered were victors, and the conquerors vanquiſhed; or, as the conduct of ſome of our neighbours in a late war, when they ſung Te Deum for a defeat. In ſhort, our readers will, from a curſory view of this account, be fully convinced, that conſiſtency and impartiality are qualifications not eſſential even to thoſe, who are reputed the beſt Roman hiſtorians [r].

The campaign in

THE following ſpring Hannibal received intelligence, that Caſſius Altinius, who abandoned the Roman intereſt after the battle of Cannæ, had offered to deliver up Arpi into the hands of the Romans for a ſum of money. This news did not at all diſpleaſe the Carthaginian, who had long ſuſpected Altinius of holding a correſpondence with the enemy; ſince ſuch a conduct could not fail of giving him an opportunity of ſeizing upon the immenſe treaſures that wealthy citizen of Arpi poſſeſſed; but, that he might ſeem not ſo much influenced by avarice as reſentment, as ſoon as he got Altinius's riches into his coffers, he burnt his wife and children alive. This ſtory depends upon the authority of Livy, and is as probable as ſome of the preceding. Appian calls this traitor Daſius, and tells us, that he was deſcended from Diomedes of Argos, the founder of Arpi. According to the ſame hiſtorian, he had like to have been deſtroyed by the Romans, for making ſuch a villainous propoſal to them, and afterwards wandered about as a vagabond, in continual fear of being cut off either by the Carthaginian or Roman parties. Hannibal immediately put a garriſon of five thouſand Carthaginians into the city above-mentioned, who were joined by a body of three thouſand citizens, in order to ſecure it againſt any attack of the Romans. However, the Fabii, having guarded all the avenues to it, ſurpriſed it in the manner already related. About a thouſand Spaniards, at the beginning of the attempt, went over in a body to the Romans, and prevailed upon them to permit the Carthaginian garriſon to retire. In purſuance of the capitulation, thoſe troops were conducted by a Roman eſcorte to Hannibal's camp at Salapia, without the leaſt injury offered them. This is Livy's account. But Appian relates, that the Fabii did not reduce Arpi by force, but, by means of ſome traitors, had it delivered to them; and that they put all the Carthaginians found therein to the ſword. Nothing further very material, except what has been already taken notice of in the Roman hiſtory, happened this campaign in Italy [s].

Some motions in Africa.

THE Romans this year entered into an alliance with Syphax, a Numidian prince, who had ſuddenly conceived an averſion to the Carthaginians. In conſequence of the treaty concluded betwixt the two powers, the Romans ſent

Q. Statorius into Africa, to train up a body of Numidian infantry after the Roman manner. This, above all things, Syphax deſired, the Numidians having, till that time, brought only cavalry into the field; which rendered them incapable of coping with the Carthaginians. Statorius, upon his arrival in Numidia, ſoon inrolled a conſiderable body of foot out of Syphax's youth. Theſe he taught to keep their ranks, follow their colours, advance or retreat with order and ſwiftneſs, and, in fine, to form all the evolutions and movements of the military art after the Roman model; ſo that in a ſhort time Syphax had a body of infantry, which he could entirely depend upon. The Carthaginians, finding the Numidian forces beginning to deſert in great numbers, and fearing the fatal effects ſuch a formidable union might produce, diſpatched embaſſadors to Gala, king of the Maſſyli, another Numidian prince, to propoſe an offenſive and defenſive alliance to him. They inſinuated, "That, out of regard to his own ſafety, he "ought to join them without loſs of time, before either "Syphax could tranſport any troops into Spain, or the "Romans into Africa; that Syphax was, at preſent, void "of all ſupport from the Romans, and might therefore "be eaſily cruſhed." Gala, at the inſtigation of his ſon Maſiniſſa, then but ſeventeen years of age, cloſed with the propoſal, and ſent an army to aſſiſt his new allies. Maſiniſſa, to whoſe conduct that army was committed, gave Syphax two ſuch total overthrows, the firſt in conjunction with the Carthaginians, and the ſecond with the Maſſylian forces only, that he found it impoſſible to make a diverſion afterwards in favour of the Romans [t].

THE tranſactions in Spain this year are ſcarce worth relating. Nothing of the leaſt moment paſſed there, except that the Romans took a body of Celtiberians into their ſervice, and ſent three hundred perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed families in Spain to Italy, to encourage a deſertion amongſt their countrymen in Hannibal's army. Appian relates, that this ſcheme took ſome effect; but at the ſame time intimates, that Hannibal himſelf made uſe of the ſame method of acting, in order to draw off the Spaniards incorporated with the Roman forces with equal ſucceſs. The Celtiberians, who took on in the Roman ſervice, were allowed lowed the ſame pay, that their countrymen received from the Carthaginians [u].

Hannibal has Tarentum delivered up to him.

THOUGH Hannibal ſtood upon the defenſive the laſt campaign, towards the cloſe of it, ſome inconſiderable cities of the Salentines ſurrendered to him. However, to compenſate this, the Thurians and Conſentini revolted from him to the Romans. This revolt might have been attended with more fatal conſequences, had not Hanno overthrown a body of Roman forces under the command of L. Pomponius Veientanus in Lucania, after they had made dreadful incurſions into the country of the Brutii, pillaging and laying waſte all before them. The commander himſelf was taken priſoner in the action, and a great part of his men cut off; which prevented ſeveral petty ſtates from abandoning the Carthaginian intereſt, though a few ſmall towns of Lucania, after that defeat, opened their gates to Sempronius. In the mean time Phileas, who had a long time reſided at Rome as miniſter from Tarentum, a man of a turbulent and reſtleſs diſpoſition, retired privately from Rome, with ſome Tarentine hoſtages, whom he had aſſiſted to make their eſcape; but being cloſely purſued, they were all taken near Tarracina, brought back to Rome, whipped publicly there in the comitium, and afterwards thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock. This barbarity extremely incenſed the Tarentines, who before were far from being well affected to the Romans. Some of their young nobility therefore, the principal of whom were Nicon and Philomenes, formed a deſign to maſſacre the Roman troops in garriſon, and deliver the city up to the Carthaginians. Hannibal, being informed of this, moved with his forces towards Tarentum. As ſoon as the approach of the Carthaginian army reached the ears of the conſpirators, Nicon and Philomenes, with a party that they could confide in, went privately by night out of the city, under pretence of being engaged the next day in a hunting-match. Nicon and Philomenes, as had been before concerted, rode up ſo near Hannibal's lines, that they were ſeized by one of his advanced guards, their aſſociates having taken care before to diſperſe themſelves in the neighbouring woods. At firſt they refuſed to give any account of themſelves; but only intimated, that they had ſomething of moment to impart to the general. Being therefore fore conducted to him, they deſired to have a private conference with him; which was immediately granted. They then gave him a full account of the diſpoſition of the Tarentines, exclaiming bitterly at the ſame time againſt the Romans. Hannibal received them with great kindneſs, commended their reſolution, loaded them with promiſes, and agreed to have a ſecond conference with them. In order to blind the Romans, as well as the people of Tarentum, and conceal the true end of this excurſion, he ordered ſeveral head of cattle to be driven out of the camp, that they might fall into the hands of his new friends, and be carryed by them into the town; which being done, both the Romans, and the citizens, were extremely pleaſed at the ſucceſs that had attended the ſuppoſed hunting-match, as well as excurſion upon the enemy (for this likewiſe Nicon and Philomenes related to them); inſomuch that neither of them entertained the leaſt ſuſpicion of what had been really tranſacted. So conſiderable a booty as they brought with them, enabled them to invite both their countrymen, and the Romans, to frequent entertainments; which not only paved the way to a ſecond hunting-match, but likewiſe excited great numbers of the citizens to turn marauders in hopes of meeting with the ſame ſucceſs; and this ſerved to render the deſign of the Tarentine leaders ſtill more impenetrable. At the ſecond conference, Nicon and Philomenes concluded a treaty with Hannibal on the part of the Tarentines, the terms of which were to the following effect: "That the "Carthaginians ſhould not exact any tribute from the Ta- "rentines, nor exerciſe any dominion over them; but, on "the contrary, maintain them in the poſſeſſion of all their "privileges; that they ſhould ſend a garriſon into the city, to "deliver the inhabitants from the Roman yoke; that it ſhould "be lawful for them to plunder all the Roman houſes in "Tarentum, and put every Roman they could meet with "to the ſword; and laſtly, that the Tarentines ſhould have "free acceſs to Hannibal, whenever they approached his "camp, in order to confer with him." By virtue of this laſt article, Nicon and Philomenes often viſited Hannibal; which they found it no difficult matter to do, as Philomenes had contracted an intimacy with Caius Livius, the Roman commandant, by the veniſon he gave him, as well as the ſplendid manner in which he frequently regaled him, and won over to his intereſt the captain of the Roman guard

poſted at the gate Temenis. That he might effectually ſecure that guard, his conſtant practice was to make a preſent to the captain, as well as the ſoldiers, either of ſome veniſon he took in hunting, or ſome cattle, that he was ſupplied with by Hannibal; inſomuch that he had ingreſs and egreſs at pleaſure, the gate being opened to him whenever he approached it, upon a whiſtle, or ſome other ſignal given. The heads of the conſpiracy receiving intelligence, that Livius had appointed a day for a feaſt, to which all his officers and friends were invited, in the muſeum, a place near the forum, they, after having held a conſultation with Hannibal, pitched upon that day for the execution of their deſign. According to the plan of operations agreed upon between the Carthaginian and his new allies, when the time drew nigh, he ordered a body of ten thouſand men, horſe and foot, to hold themſelves in readineſs to march at a moment's warning. To hinder the Romans from conceiving any diſtruſt from the long ſtay he made in his preſent camp, he cauſed it to be given out, that he had for ſome time, laboured under an indiſpoſition, which had detained him there. At laſt, his troops having ſupplied themſelves with proviſions for four days, began their march at the fourth watch of the night, with their general himſelf at the head of them. He detached a party of Numidians to reconnoitre the enemy, with orders to advance thirty ſtadia before the reſt, to ſcour the country as far as the gates of Tarentum, in order to prevent the enemy from diſcovering his forces, and to make them believe, that an inconſiderable party only had advanced out of the Carthaginian camp for the ſake of plunder. This had the deſired effect; for advice being brought to Livius, then in the height of his entertainment, that a detachment of Numidians were laying waſte the country within ſight of the town, he commanded ſome of his troops to drive them from thence the next morning, without giving himſelf any further trouble, for the preſent, about them. In the mean time Hannibal contrived matters ſo, as to take poſt before the town about midnight, on the ſide of the gate Temenis. Whilſt affairs were in this ſituation, Tragiſcus and Nicon, Philomenes ſerving as a guide to Hannibal in this expedition, found means to ſecure all the avenues leading to the forum; which it was no difficult matter to do, Livius having ſo intoxicated himſelf, that he could think of nothing but taking his repoſe. Hannibal advertiſed his friends in the city of his arrival by a great fire, which he cauſed to be lighted;

ed; and was informed by them, that the plot within doors was ripe for execution, by the ſame ſignal, as had been before concerted betwixt them. Upon this, he ſent Philomenes, with a thouſand Africans, to poſſeſs himſelf of the gate Temenis. Philomenes acquainted the guard poſted there, that he had brought them a wild boar, and therefore deſired a ſpeedy admiſſion. Upon their opening the gate, the Africans entered, and put them all to the ſword; whilſt Hannibal, with the main body of his troops, found a paſſage through another gate, by Nicon's aſſiſtance, into the town. All the Carthaginian and Tarentine forces met, as had been appointed, in the forum; from whence Hannibal ſent a detachment of two thouſand Gauls, divided into three bodies, each commanded by two Tarentine captains, into three different parts of the town, to ſecure every poſt of importance. After this diſpoſition, he iſſued out an order, enjoining all the citizens not to ſtir out of their houſes; at the ſame time aſſuring them of his protection. The Tarentines, finding the Carthaginians entered, were at firſt thrown into the utmoſt conſternation; but when ſome of their own nobility told them, that Hannibal was come to deliver them from a proud and inſulting enemy, and to reſtore them to their former liberty, their fears ſoon ſubſided. Livius, upon the firſt alarm, being ſo drunk, that he was incapable of giving out his orders at ſo critical a conjuncture in a proper manner, withdrew himſelf, with his family, into the port, notwithſtanding the conſpirators had taken care to place a guard before his houſe, where getting on board a Roman veſſel, he made his eſcape to the citadel. In the mean time Hannibal commanded every Tarentine to poſt over his door the word TARENTINI, that the citizens might be diſtinguiſhed from the Romans, and then gave up all the Roman houſes to his ſoldiers to be plundered, with a permiſſion to put to the ſword every Roman, that ſhould fall into their hands. That the Romans might be ſtruck with the greater terror, as well as the more effectually maſſacred, Philomenes had cauſed Roman trumpets to be blown towards the citadel, which ſtood in the mouth of the harbour, as well as in other parts of the town, imagining, that this artifice would draw them thither, where troops were prepared to fall upon them. A conſiderable number of Romans loſt their lives by this device; but many of them retired into the citadel, which Hannibal immediately blocked up. As he had drawn up his forces in order of battle, to support the detachments sent to plunder the Romans, if they met with any resistance, there was little blood shed on the Carthaginian side. When he found the city entirely at his devotion, he ordered the citizens to appear before him unarmed, and made them a speech, filled with assurances of his kind intentions towards them; which was answered with the loudest acclamations. In order to secure the city from the insults of the Roman garrison in the citadel, Hannibal surrounded the former with a line, which, in a manner, cut off all communication betwixt it and the latter. However, he could not effect this without a considerable opposition from the enemy. During the time his men were at work upon it, one very brisk action happened, wherein the Romans were defeated, and lost a great number of men. Hannibal, after this, carried on the siege of the citadel with inconceivable vigour; but the Romans, receiving a strong reinforcement from Metapontum, made a furious sally upon the besiegers, and destroyed the greatest part both of their works and military machines. This made the Carthaginians despair of taking it at present by force; so that they drew off from before it. Hannibal, upon this disappointment, assembling the Tarentines, told them, they would never become masters of the citadel, unless they could cut off all supplies from the Romans by sea. This they were sensible of; but as the Romans kept their ships blocked up in the port, they thought it would be impossible to exclude them from the dominion of the sea. But Hannibal, by dint of genius, surmounted this difficulty; for observing, that ships of a moderate size might be drawn on shore, and conveyed through the middle of the city into the sea on another side, he made use of this expedient to annoy the enemy. The Tarentines therefore, shutting up the citadel on all sides, both by sea and land, soon reduced the Roman garrison to great extremities. Hannibal then, leaving some troops in the city, to support the Tarentines against any attack or surprize of the enemy, returned to the camp he had marked out upon the Galesus immediately after he was admitted into the town. Here he continued in a state of inaction, till the commencement of the next campaign[w].

ACCORDING to Appian, the name of the person, who introduced the Carthaginians into Tarentum, was Cononeus; and

and that of the Roman commandant Junius. Cononeus, ſays the ſame author, being extremely fond of hunting, prevailed upon the guard poſted at one of the gates to let him out and in whenever he pleaſed in the night, under the pretence, that he was obliged to purſue his favourite diverſion in the night-time, for fear of the enemy's parties. By this artifice, he found means frequently to confer with Hannibal; and at laſt enabled a body of Carthaginians, dreſſed like hunters, but with coats of mail and ſwords under their hunting habits, to take poſt in the town; who, being ſoon joined by a greater number of forces, that lay concealed in a neighbouring wood, eaſily made themſelves maſters of the place. Five thouſand Romans, together with a body of Tarentines in the Roman intereſt, retired into the citadel. Theſe troops, being reinforced by half of the garriſon of Metapontum, repulſed the beſiegers in all their attacks, burnt their works and military machines, and deſtroyed many of their men in the frequent ſucceſsful ſallies they made. This ſo diſcouraged Hannibal, that he retired into Apulia, leaving Hanno, with a body of forces, to keep the place blocked up. But the Romans, being maſters of the ſea, received copious ſupplies of all things neceſſary, and ſtreightened both the town and the Carthaginian camp in ſuch a manner, that Hannibal, upon his return, which happened ſoon after, found them almoſt reduced to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions. He therefore put them into a method of conveying their ſhips out of the port into the ſea on the ſouthern ſide of the city. After this, the Tarentines and Carthaginians intercepted the Roman convoys by ſea, and greatly diſtreſſed the garriſon. At laſt receiving intelligence, that the troops in the citadel expected a large ſupply of corn from the Thurians, they poſted a ſquadron of galleys at a proper place in ambuſcade, which, without much difficulty, ſeized upon the Thurian veſſels, and made all the crews priſoners. The people of Thurium therefore ſent deputies to Hannibal to redeem the captives, who, being by the Tarentines introduced to that general, found a moſt kind reception, and had their priſoners releaſed without ranſom. This made ſuch an impreſſion upon the minds of the deputies, that ſoon after they put Hannibal into the poſſeſſion of their city, tho' againſt the conſent of the inhabitants, the garriſon, upon the approach of the Carthaginians, retiring privately to Brunduſium. As the reduction of the city of Tarentum was an event of the utmoſt importance to Hannibal and what, what, in all probability, not a little contributed to the protracting of this destructive war, we thought ourselves obliged to give our readers, in this place, a circumstantial account of it, though, prolix as this may seem to be, it is but an abridgement of that to be found in Polybius, Livy, and Appian [x].

Hanno defeated by the Romans.

WHILST Hannibal lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, the consuls, towards the beginning of the following year, threatened Capua with a siege. This greatly alarmed the Capuans, who were under dreadful apprehensions of a famine, as the Romans had prevented them from cultivating their lands the preceding year. They therefore entreated Hannibal to send them a supply of provisions, before the Romans had cut off the communication betwixt their city and the places, where the Carthaginians, and their allies, had erected magazines. Whereupon Hanno, in pursuance of an order received from Hannibal, moving out of the country of the Brutii, encamped upon an eminence about three miles from Beneventum; and, having amassed a vast quantity of corn, appointed a day for the Capuans to send a proper number of waggons thither to carry it off. The consuls being informed of this, Fulvius marched with all expedition to Beneventum, and from thence to Hanno's camp, which he immediately attacked, and, by the bravery of Vibius, a centurion of the Pelignian troops, Valerius Flaccus, tribune of the third legion, and T. Pedanius, the first centurion of it, carried, after an obstinate resistance. Of the Carthaginians, above six thousand were slain, and seven thousand taken prisoners. A great number of Campanian peasants, together with their waggons, and the corn Hanno had collected for the use of the Capuans, as well as an immense quantity of other plunder, fell into the hands of the Romans. Hanno himself was not in the action, but at some small distance from the camp, when it happened; but, being informed of it by one Cominius Ceritus, he retired, with great precipitation, into Brutium, attended only by a few of his horse. This blow so terrified the Capuans, that the principal of them seemed afraid the enemy would as easily possess themselves of Capua, as they had before done of Arpi. However, in order to animate them to a vigorous defence, and protect their territory from the incursions of the Roman parties, Hannibal sent the garrison a reinforcement of two thousand thouſand men. In the mean time the Carthaginian garriſon at Tarentum, in conjunction with the inhabitants, continued the ſiege of the citadel there, Hannibal, with his army, purſuing all the meaſures, that he thought neceſſary to facilitate the reduction of that place [y].

The Carthaginians admitted into Thurium.

THE body of troops left to defend Metapontum being ſo weakened by the large detachment ſent to the citadel of Tarentum, that the Romans there were not in a condition to make head againſt the citizens, who were well affected to the Carthaginians, Hannibal found means to make himſelf maſter of that city. Appian tells us, that the Metapontini put all the Romans to the ſword; and that Heraclea, a town ſituated between Metapontum and Tarentum, followed the example of thoſe two cities. The Thurians likewiſe, being nearly related to the people of the two laſt-mentioned cities, as deſcended from the Achaians, and highly reſenting the cruel treatment of the Tarentine hoſtages, meditated a revolt from the Romans. They therefore ſent a deputation to Hanno and Mago, who then commanded a Carthaginian army in Brutium, inviting them to come and take poſſeſſion of Thurium. Atinius, the commandant, had but a ſmall garriſon, his chief dependence being upon the townſmen, whom he had armed and diſciplined, that they might be the better enabled to ſupport him, in caſe of a viſit from the enemy. Hanno firſt preſented himſelf before the town with a body of infantry, whilſt Mago, with the cavalry, lay in ambuſcade by favour of ſome eminences, which concealed him from the enemy's parties, that were ſent to reconnoitre the Carthaginians. Atinius therefore imagining, that he ſhould be attacked only by a body of foot, and being ignorant of the conſpiracy the Thurians had entered into, did not in the leaſt doubt but that he ſhould eaſily repulſe the enemy. Hanno, as matters had been before concerted, retired upon the approach of the Romans, drawing both them and the Thurians inſenſibly to the foot of the eminences poſſeſſed by the Carthaginian horſe; who immediately ruſhing down upon them with a great ſhout, the Thurians, according to agreement, took to their heels, and were received by the conſpirators into the city. The Romans in the mean time, notwithſtanding they were charged in front, in flank, and in rear, behaved with great bravery; but being at last likewise put to flight, upon their arrival at the town, they found themselves denied admission, the conspirators on the walls crying out, "That the Carthaginians, being mixed with the Romans, "would certainly enter, unless the gates were immediately "shut". They were all therefore cut to pieces, except Atinius, with a few of his principal officers, whom the Thurians saved from the general carnage, out of the great personal regard they had for that commandant, on account of his mild and gentle government. After they had sent these on board a galley, prepared for that purpose, to the next port belonging to the Romans, the conspirators delivered Thurium into the hands of the Carthaginians. In the mean time the consuls moved towards Capua, in order to form the siege of that important place [z].

The proconsul Sempronius betrayed and killed.

WHILST the Romans were thus preparing to attack Hannibal in the most sensible part, they sustained an almost irreparable loss by the death of Sempronius Gracchus. That excellent commander, having made the necessary dispositions for marching out of Lucania into the neighbourhood of Capua, with a body of Volones, to prevent the enemy from throwing any succours into the place, was, by the treachery of Flavius Lucanus, drawn into an ambuscade, and cut off, with all the small party that attended him. Livy tells us, that authors do not entirely agree in their accounts of that general's death, some affirming, that he was massacred by two troops of Numidians, as he repeated a sacrifice, which had been attended by a very bad omen, at some distance from the camp, before he left Lucania; others, that a Carthaginian detachment put him, and three lictors, with some servants attending them, to the sword, near the river Calor, in the territory of Beneventum, as they were going to bathe themselves; and lastly, others, that he fell in the manner first related. The Roman writers differ likewise as much in the accounts they give us of his interment; some intimating, that Hannibal celebrated his funeral obsequies with great pomp and magnificence, the Spaniards distinguishing themselves above any other nation in the Carthaginian army on that occasion; and others, that he sent the body to the Roman camp, to be interred there. Be that as it will, Hannibal reaped considerable conſiderable advantage from this accident, ſince it, for ſome time, retarded the attack of Capua [a].

HOWEVER, the conſuls at laſt approached that city, with an intention to inveſt it; of which the Capuans being informed, they ordered a detachment of foot out of the town, to make a ſally upon the enemy. As the Romans plundered all the country, through which they moved, that detachment, ſupported by a body of Carthaginian cavalry, under the command of Mago, fell in with a numerous party of them, ravaging the adjacent territory without any order or diſcipline. Theſe troops Mago routed at the firſt onſet, laid fifteen hundred of them dead upon the ſpot, took many priſoners, recovered a vaſt quantity of booty, and diſperſed the reſt. This action ſo intimidated the conſuls, that, for the preſent, they thought proper to ſtand upon the defenſive, and ſo encouraged the Carthaginians and Capuans, that they frequently inſulted the enemy. Hannibal, upon advice of what had happened, immediately marched to Capua, and attacked the Romans. Soon after the beginning of the engagement, the queſtor Cornelius appeared with the body of troops formerly commanded by Sempronius, to the terror of both parties, each looking upon them as enemies. Under this apprehenſion, both armies drew off from the field of battle to their reſpective camps. The conſuls, after the action, in which the Romans ſuffered moſt, divided their forces into two bodies, in order to oblige Hannibal to leave the territory of Capua. Fulvius, with one of them, retreated into the diſtrict of Cumæ, whilſt Claudius took his march into Lucania. Hannibal purſued the latter; but was not able to come up with him. However, he met with a Roman corps of ſixteen thouſand men, under the conduct of M. Centenius Penula, who had ſignalized himſelf on many occaſions as a centurion. This officer, being introduced to the ſenate by P. Cornelius Sulla the prætor, had the aſſurance to tell the conſcript fathers, that, if they would truſt him with only a body of five thouſand men, he would turn the tables upon the Carthaginians, and give a good account of Hannibal. Inſtead of five thouſand, they aſſigned him eight thouſand, which, by the acceſſion of voluntiers in his march to Lucania, and many of the natives on his arrival there, he encreaſed to double the number. Being a man of wonderful reſolution, he engaged the Carthaginians upon Hannibal's first offering him battle; but, not being able to cope with that general, after a fight of two hours, he was entirely defeated. As Hannibal, by guarding all the passes and avenues in the neighbourhood of his camp, had taken care to cut off their retreat, all the Romans, except a thousand men, together with their general, were slain. Notwithstanding which, Claudius having taken a large compass, in order to get clear of Hannibal, arrived once more before Capua, and, in conjunction with his collegue, blocked up that city [b].

As likewise the prætor Fulvius.

HANNIBAL, ever intent upon taking advantage of the foibles of the Roman generals, receiving intelligence from his emissaries in Apulia, that Cn. Fulvius the prætor, being elated with some late instances of success, despised the enemy, and permitted a total relaxation of discipline to take place amongst his troops, advanced to Herdonia, where the Romans lay encamped. Upon his arrival there, he distributed three thousand light-armed troops in a woody spot of ground, which concealed them from the enemy, and detached Mago, with two thousand horse, to block up all the passes and defiles on that part, where, he foresaw, the enemy would endeavour to make off, in case they were pushed. The prætor, being a man of a fiery temper, was easily drawn by Hannibal into the ambuscade; where being attacked in front, in rear, and in flank, and the retreat cut off, the whole Roman corps, consisting of eighteen thousand men, except the prætor, and two thousand, who fled as soon as they saw victory incline to the Carthaginians, were put to the sword. The two last blows coming, as it were, one upon the neck of the other, threw the Roman senate into a great consternation, and obliged them to send M. Mitilius and C. Lectorius to the consuls, with fresh instructions [c].

Hannibal in vain attempts to excite the citizens of Brundusium to a revolt.

NOTWITHSTANDING these misfortunes, the consuls, pursuant to an order received from the senate, made the necessary dispositions for forming the siege of Capua. Hannibal, after the defeat of the enemy at Herdonia, returned to Tarentum, where he attempted, both by force and persuasion, to bring the Roman garrison in the citadel to a capitulation; but all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he turned off to Brundusium, to excite the citizens there to a revolt;

revolt; but being diſappointed in this view, he entertained ſome thoughts of moving towards Capua, at the earneſt deſire of the citizens, who now ſent a deputation to him. At this time the tranſactions in the iſland of Sicily were very conſiderable, and the Carthaginians exerted themſelves there, notwithſtanding the numerous armies they employed in Italy and Spain. However, as the particulars of theſe tranſactions do not fall under our province, we muſt refer our readers for them to the hiſtory of Syracuſe, to which they properly belong[d].

Otacilius ravages the coaſts of Africa.

ABOUT the time of the reduction of Syracuſe, Otacilius ſailed with eighty quinqueremes from Lilybæum to Utica; where entering the port in the night, he took a great number of veſſels laden with corn. After which, he landed a body of forces, that ravaged all the adjacent territory; and then returned on board with a very conſiderable booty. The Carthaginians giving him no obſtruction in this excurſion, either by ſea or land, he arrived ſafe at Lilybæum three days after he left the harbour of Utica, with an hundred and thirty tranſports, that conveyed the corn, and other ſpoils he had acquired, into that harbour. By ſuch a ſeaſonable ſupply, he was enabled to relieve the people of Syracuſe, who, as well as the Roman garriſon there, were, at that time, threatened with a famine[e].

The tranſactions in Spain.

THE Carthaginians had this year three armies in Spain; one commanded by Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, another by Mago, and the third by Aſdrubal the brother of Hannibal. The two former generals encamped cloſe together, about five days march from the Romans; and the latter poſted himſelf at Anitorgis, a city much nearer the enemy. This obliged the Romans to divide likewiſe their forces. Cneius, with one third of the Roman troops, and a body of thirty thouſand Celtiberian auxiliaries, advanced into the neighbourhood of Anitorgis, to obſerve the motions of Aſdrubal the ſon of Hamilcar. The two armies encamped on oppoſite banks of the ſame river, with an intention ſoon to come to an engagement. Aſdrubal, having a perfect knowledge of the Spaniſh perfidy, and being beſides well ſkilled in the Celtiberian tongue, eaſily found means to bribe the Celtiberian troops to a deſertion; which obliged Cneius to paſs the Iberus, and to ſecure himſelf, by keeping that river betwix him and Aſdrubal's army. In the mean time Mago, and the other Aſdrubal, by the aſſiſtance of Maſiniſſa, and Indibilis regulus of the Lacetani, gave the Romans a complete overthrow, and killed Publius. The ſame generals and princes, with their united forces, afterwards going in queſt of Cneius, met with him on the top of an eminence, where, after a bloody action, they defeated him, put him to the ſword, with a great number of his legionaries, and forced the reſt to fly to Publius's camp, which was guarded by a ſmall body, under the command of one of his lieutenants called T. Fonteius. However, the Carthaginians, towards the cloſe of the campaign, were unexpectedly overthrown by a young Roman knight named C. Martius, who had collected the remains of the Roman army, as we have elſewhere related. According to Claudius, who tranſlated the Annales Aciliani out of the Greek into Latin, two Carthaginian camps were forced in twenty-four hours time by Martius, thirty-ſeven thouſand Carthaginians killed, eghteen hundred made priſones, beſides many ſpoils taken, amongſt which was a ſilver ſhield, weighing an hundred and thirty pounds, with the effigies of Aſdrubal, the ſon of Hamilcar, upon it. Valerius Antias relates, that only Mago's camp was taken, when ſeven thouſand of the enemy were put to the ſword; and that, in a pitched battle, Martius defeated Aſdrubal, killing ten thouſand of his men, and making four thouſand three hundred and thirty priſoners. Piſo affirms, that the Romans drew the Carthaginians into an ambuſcade, and by that means cut off five thouſand of them. In ſhort, from this ſpecimen, we may form a true idea of the authors Livy followed; which is the reaſon of our inſerting theſe laſt particulars here. Their relations, in the point before us, are plainly refuted both by the preceding and ſubſequent operations of the Carthaginian and Roman armies in Spain, as may be collected even from Livy himſelf; nay, that hiſtorian, partial as he is, allows ſome of theſe to have greatly exceeded the truth in their accounts of the numbers of the ſlain in the battles they have deſcribed; which is a tacit acknowledgment of his own partiality, and conſequently a confirmation of what, in relation to the affairs of Spain during ths period, we have ſo frequently obſerved [f].

In the mean time the conſuls, and the prætor Claudius, having drawn a line round Capua, puſhed on the ſiege of that important place with the utmoſt vigour. The Capuans at firſt made frequent ſallies, eſpecially upon the workmen employed upon the ſaid line, which was flanked with parapets and towers placed at proper diſtances. The Capuans, in this diſtreſs, ſent meſſengers to Hannibal, complaining, "That they were deſerted by him, and "upon the point of ſurrendering to the Romans; at the "ſame time conjuring the Carthaginian, by their fidelity "to him, to ſend them ſpeedy ſuccours." This however could not induce Hannibal to abandon the blockade of the citadel of Tarentum; but being at laſt informed by a Numidian horſeman, who had paſſed through the Roman camp undiſcovered in the night, that Capua was reduced to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions, with ſome regret he moved from his camp upon the Galeſus near Tarentum, to the relief of his beloved city. Though for ſome time, after the arrival of the Numidian, he remained in a ſtate of ſuſpenſe, not knowing whether the reduction of the citadel of Tarentum, or the relief of Capua, would turn out moſt to his advantage, yet, out of the ſingular affection he bore the Capuans, he at laſt came to a reſolution to ſuccour them. It is probable likewiſe, that he took this ſtep, in order to preſerve his reputation amongſt his allies; which, he imagined, could not be more effectually done, than by a vigorous ſupport of thoſe, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed themſelves in his favour. Leaving therefore his baggage in Brutium, he advanced with a ſtrong body of light-armed troops, together with thirty-three elephants, towards Capua, taking poſt in a valley behind mount Tifata. Here he did not continue long inactive; for he firſt took a fort called Galatia by ſtorm, and then, without loſs of time, attacked the Roman camp, the Capuans at the ſame inſtant, as had been before concerted betwixt them and Hannibal, making a vigorous ſally with their whole garriſon; but, after a warm diſpute, both the Carthaginians and Capuans were repulſed, with conſiderable loſs. Livy tells us, that in the heat of the action, the Spaniards and Numidians, together with the elephants, broke into the enemy's camp; that thoſe huge animals, by overturning the Roman tents, and frighting the beaſts of burden there, ſcattered terror where ever they moved; and that Hannibal, taking advantage of this confuſion, ordered ſome of his men, who could ſpeak Latin, to cry out, "That, ſince the Roman camp was taken, every ſoldier "was at liberty to ſhift for himſelf as well as he could, "and to fly to the neighbouring mountains." However, the elephants being ſoon driven out of the camp by fire brought thither for that purpoſe, and Hannibal's artifice defeated, the Romans recovered themſelves, and obliged the enemy to retire. After this action, Hannibal, not being able either to draw the enemy to a battle, or force a paſſage through their camp into the town, laid aſide all thoughts for the preſent of relieving Capua [g].

Hannibal advances to Rome.

HOWEVER, that general, ever active in forming of ſchemes for the annoyance of his enemies, at laſt hit upon an expedient, which, he doubted not, would infallibly anſwer his purpoſe. He propoſed to march with ſuch expedition to Rome, as to preſent himſelf at the walls of that metropolis, before the Romans could have any notice or ſuſpicion of his deſign. In order to facilitate the execution of his project, Hannibal ordered his troops to ſupply themſelves with proviſions for ten days, and to get ready as many tranſports as would waft them over the Vulturnus in one night. But notwithſtanding the privacy with which this whole affair was tranſacted, Fulvius, by means of his ſpies, received intelligence of Hannibal's intended motion, and diſpatched a courier to Rome, to give the ſenate early notice of his approach. As the Carthaginian did not march directly to Rome, but took a large compaſs, and ſtaid to ravage the countries, through which he moved, the Romans had time to make proper diſpoſitions for the defence of their capital. However, many, even of the ſenators themſelves, were ſtruck with incredible terror at the appearance of the Carthaginian forces. Hannibal, having marched through the territores of Fruſinum, Ferentinum, Anagnia, Labicum, Algidum, Tuſculum, and Gabii, encamped on a commodious ſpot of ground within eight miles of Rome; his Numidian parties, that preceded the main body of the army, putting to the ſword, or taking priſoners, all the Romans they met with in their rout. After a ſhort ſtay here, he moved to the banks of the Anio, about three miles from the enemy's capital; from whence, eſcorted by a choice detachment of two thouſand horſe, he advanced advanced to the very gates of Rome, in order to reconnoitre the enemy, and take a view of the situation of the city. But not meeting with the desired success, either in this excursion, or the attempts he afterwards made, Hannibal retired six miles from Rome, where he pitched his tents upon the Tutia. From hence he went to the grove of the goddess Feronia, where stood a temple sacred to her, enriched with the valuable oblations and presents of the Capenates, a people inhabiting that particular district; which he plundered. Livy affirms, that after Hannibal's departure, great heaps of brass were found in this grove, which his soldiers had left there, in the room of the treasure they had carried from thence, out of a religious motive. According to Strabo, a sacrifice was offered annually to the goddess Feronia, in the grove where she was worshipped, at the foot of the mountain Soracte, where her votaries walked unhurt over burning coals. On several Roman denarii, preserved in the cabinets of the curious, she is represented with a crown on her head. Hannibal, finding himself disappointed in his views, is said to have cried out, "That at one "time his own will, and at another fortune, would not per-"mit him to take Rome." Livy seems to intimate, that the routes Hannibal took in his passage to Rome and retreat from it, could not be ascertained, some authors confounding them, though one of these, he believes, in his time, was certainly known. We shall not further expatiate upon this remarkable expedition, since all the particulars of moment relating to it, omitted by us here, will be found in a proper place [h].

HANNIBAL, instead of marching to the relief of Capua, the siege of which his late enterprize could not divert the enemy from, moved with such expedition to Rhegium, that he had like to have surprised that city. This little pleased the Capuans, who prevailed upon Bostar and Hanno, the commanders of the Carthaginian forces in Capua, to press Hannibal, in the strongest and most moving terms, to attempt raising the siege of that city. Their letters however had no effect; for Hannibal either being not able or willing to relieve the place, it was obliged to surrender to the Romans, Seppius Læsius being at that time the mediaſtuticus, or chief magiſtrate, there. Vibius Virius, who had been the chief author of the late revolt, put an end to his life by poiſon, as did twenty-ſeven other ſenators. In what a ſhocking and inhuman manner Fulvius treated the Capuan ſenators, both before, and even after, the conſcript fathers at Rome had granted them mercy, may be ſeen in a former part of this work. Nothing can give us a more lively idea of the cruelties and enormities a thirſt after power may make a ſtate capable of, than what even the partial Livy himſelf has tranſmitted down to poſterity on this occaſion, except the late villainous and unchriſtian behaviour of a moſt chriſtian prince, as famous for his obſervation of ſolemn treaties, as either the Romans or Carthaginians were. The ſucceſs of this ſiege gave the Romans a viſible ſuperiority over the Carthaginians, and diſpoſed the Italian ſtates in general to declare for their former maſters [i].

State of affairs in Spain.

SOME time after the reduction of Capua, Aſdrubal, the ſon of Hamilcar, being encamped at a place called Lapides Atri, in the country of the Auſetani, between Illiturgi and Mentiſſa, was informed, that Claudius Nero, who had been employed before Capua, was arrived in Spain with a ſtrong reinforcement; and that the command of the army deſtined to act againſt the Carthaginians in Spain was given to him, in the room of L. Martius and T. Fonteius. Aſdrubal ſoon after, by a falſe point of conduct, ſuffered himſelf to be ſhut up on an iſthmus in ſuch a manner, that he lay at the mercy of the enemy. However, he found means to extricate himſelf out of the difficulties, in which that error had involved him, though by none of the moſt honourable methods. This event ſo changed the face of affairs in Spain, that no perſon of diſtinction, except P. Cornelius Scipio, the ſon of Publius, who had lately loſt his life in Spain, offered himſelf a candidate for the proconſulate there. He was therefore choſen proconſul for Spain, and ſent, with an additional body of troops, to carry on the war in that country. Soon after his arrival there, he received deputations from moſt of the Spaniſh nations, who diſcovered a greater inclination than ever to come to a cloſe union with the Romans. When Scipio, amidſt the applauſe and acclamations of all ranks and degrees of men at Rome, took upon himſelf the command of

of the army in Spain, he was ſcarce twenty-four years of age [k].

NOTHING of moment, except what has been already related, happened further this year in Spain. At the end of it, Aſdrubal, the ſon of Giſco, extended his winter-quarters as far as Gades, and the ocean. Mago took up his above the Saltus Caſtulonenſis, in the maritime parts; and Aſdrubal, the ſon of Hamilcar, cantoned his body of troops in the neighbourhood of Saguntum. About this time the Carthaginians ſent a ſquadron to Tarentum, to cut off all ſupplies from the Roman garriſon in the citadel there; but they incommoded their allies the Tarentines more than the enemy, ſince it was found impoſſible to convey, either by ſea or land, a quantity of proviſions, ſufficient to ſupport both the people of Tarentum, and the forces on board the Carthaginian galleys. Though the latter therefore for ſome time blocked up the citadel by ſea, they could not carry their point, the Romans there being amply provided with all things neceſſary, and having a large train of military engines, wherewith to annoy the enemy. Hannibal, now finding the Carthaginian affairs going ſwiftly to decay in Italy, as well as Sicily and Spain, could not forbear curſing Hanno, and his faction, for the detention of thoſe ſuccours, which had ſo long been promiſed him. This, which was effected by their artifice, did not only prevent the conqueſt of Italy, but proved the total ruin of the African republic, the hitherto formidable rival of Rome, as will more clearly appear in the future courſe of this hiſtory [l].

Hannibal's affairs go to decay in Italy, Sicily, and Spain.

THE next campaign the Romans made themſelves maſters of Salapia, by the aſſiſtance of one Blaſius, a Salapian, who had always been a ſecret well-wiſher to the Romans. As the particulars of this action have been already related at large, we ſhall not dwell upon them here; but only obſerve, that Hannibal loſt a body of his beſt horſe in it, which proved much more fatal to him, than the loſs of Salapia, ſince his cavalry could never after this blow, if Livy may be credited, make head againſt that of the Romans, to which it had always been before ſuperior. About this time a Tarentine ſquadron, commanded by Nicon, defeated a Roman fleet ſent to ſupply the citadel with proviſions, under the conduct of D. Quintius, who was killed in the action.

The Romans take Salapia; but are defeated at ſea by the Tarentines.

action. But, to make amends for this disaster, a Roman detachment, consisting of two thousand men, fell upon four thousand Tarentine foragers, and, through the conduct and bravery of their leader C. Persius, entirely defeated them, putting the greatest part of them to the sword [m].

The Romans draw four thousand robbers from Agathyrna to ravage Bruttium.

ABOUT this time, the Romans being resolved to chastise the Brutians for their attachment to the Carthaginians, Lævinus, the Roman general in Sicily, transported a body of four thousand men, consisting chiefly of robbers, from Agathyrna to Rhegium, in order to enable the garrison of this last city to lay waste the whole country of Bruttium. As most of the men, of which this corps was formed, had been guilty of the most enormous crimes, and committed great depredations in Sicily for a considerable period of time, the Romans could not have pitched upon any troops more proper to execute such a design. Lævinus likewise served another wise end by sending this band of villains to Rhegium; for by this means he preserved the tranquillity and repose of the island of Sicily, which must have been greatly disturbed by the continuance of such a gang of banditti at Agathyrna [n].

Scipio takes New Carthage.

SCIPIO, having taken care to get his naval forces in readiness to put to sea early in the spring, and appointed Tarraco the place of rendezvous for the forces of his Spanish allies, upon their assembling there, ordered the main body of the army to defile from thence to the Iberus, himself following at the head of five thousand Spaniards. Here he harangued the soldiery, insisting largely upon all those topics, that, he thought, would be the most apt to inspire them with resentment and resolution. After this, leaving M. Syllanus, with three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, to prevent all disorders in those parts of Spain, he passed the Iberus, with an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse. As almost all the riches of Spain were deposited in New Carthage, a city situated like Old Carthage, upon a peninsula, betwixt a noble port and a lake, which last served as a fence to the western and northern parts of the wall, he formed a design upon it. To the attack of this place he was likewise further excited by the commodiousness of its harbour, which was

was capacious enough to receive any fleet, and ſo near the coaſt of Africa, that the Romans, when in poſſeſſion of it, might eaſily make a deſcent on the Carthaginian territories there. Upon his arrival here, Scipio made a ſpeech to his troops, importing, "That as all the wealth of the enemy "amaſſed in Spain, all their engines of battery and military "machines, all the hoſtages of the Spaniards to the Carthaginians, which alone ſecured the fidelity of the former "to the latter, together with the principal, if not only, "granary the Carthaginians had in Spain, were lodged in "that city, by the reduction of it they ſhould in a manner "terminate the war, at leaſt in that part of the world, "with their proud rival." Mago, who, according to ſome authors commanded in the town, or, as Valerius Antias will have it, Arme, upon Scipio's approach, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a vigorous defence. He poſted two thouſand of the citizens in that part of the town which fronted the Roman camp, five hundred Carthaginians in the citadel, and five hundred more upon an eminence in the eaſtern part of the city. He likewiſe ordered another body to be ready to move, where-ever the efforts of the enemy ſhould render their aſſiſtance neceſſary, at a moment's warning. The Romans did not only repulſe the enemy in a ſally they made upon them, but likewiſe purſued them with ſuch ardour, that, had not Scipio cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, they had entered pell-mell with the Carthaginians into the town. This ſo intimidated the troops in garriſon, that they abandoned many of their poſts, and in a manner, deſerted the ramparts; which when Scipio obſerved, advancing to an eminence called Mercurius Teutates, he immediately ordered a vigorous attack to be made on thoſe parts of the wall, which were moſt expoſed, his fleet at the ſame time forwarding the operations of the land-forces, by aſſaulting the town on the ſea ſide. After a bloody and obſtinate diſpute, the Romans carried the place ſword in hand, Scipio greatly animating his men, by flying from place to place to give his orders, as occaſion required; and ſome fiſhermen of Tarraco enabling one of his detachments to enter the town on the ſide of the ſtagnum or moraſs, which ſeemed almoſt inacceſſible. The commandant retired into the citadel; but was ſo vigorouſly preſſed by the Romans, that he ſoon found himſelf obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. Till the ſurrender of the citadel, the ſlaughter was general; but afterwards quarter was given, the soldiers being chiefly intent upon plunder. The Romans made ten thousand freemen, besides a prodigious number of women, children and slaves, prisoners, together with three hundred, or, according to others, seven hundred twenty-five Spanish hostages, whom the Roman general immediately dismissed. They found in the place an hundred and twenty of the greater catapults; two hundred eighty-one of the lesser sort; twenty-three of the larger balistæ, fifty-two of the smaller; an inconceivable number of darts, and other missive weapons; besides many of the machines called scorpions, together with seventy-four military ensigns. An immense quantity of gold and silver, both in money and plate, fell into Scipio's hands. But as the authors Livy followed, particularly Silenus and Valerius Antias, greatly differed in this point, as well as with regard to the strength of the Carthaginian garrison, the number of captives, the quantity of shipping seized in the port, and the provisions, naval stores, &c. found on board, we shall beg leave to refer our readers, for their further satisfaction on those heads, to that writer himself, and to the circumstantial account we have already given of this glorious action in a former part of our history [o].

The Carthaginians seem to despise the Romans, notwithstanding the progress of their arms.

THE Carthaginians, for some time, endeavoured to suppress the news of the blow they had received in Spain by the reduction of New Carthage, being apprehensive, that as soon as the Spaniards received intelligence of that unexpected event, they would, to a man, declare in favour of the Romans. But not being able long to conceal so remarkable a disgrace, they were obliged at last to own it, though they put as good a face upon the matter as they well could, in the present melancholy situation of affairs, in order to palliate their own shameful behaviour at the late attack. They gave out, "That Scipio had stolen the "town by Surprise; that the conquest was of little impor-"tance, notwithstanding the young commander affected to "cry it up as equivalent to a signal victory; and that, "upon the approach of three Carthaginian generals, at the "head

Notwithſtanding which ſuggeſtions, they were perfectly ſenſible of the great loſs they had ſuſtained, and of the fatal influence the reduction of ſo important a fortreſs muſt neceſſarily have upon their affairs. The polite as well as generous treatment the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, regulus of the Ilergetes, all the daughters of Indibilis, thoſe of the principal Spaniſh nobility, a young lady of the moſt attractive charms bethrothed to Allucius, prince of the Celtiberians, and Allucius himſelf, met with from Scipio, will more naturally fall under our obſervation, when we come to the hiſtory of Spain; for which reaſon we ſhall content ourſelves with having barely mentioned it in this place [p].

Hannibal defeats the proconſul Cn. Fulvius at Herdonea.

MARCELLUS, after the taking of Salapia, advancing into Samnium, made himſelf maſter of Maronea and Melæ, two cities of that country, by aſſault. Three thouſand Carthaginian ſoldiers, left there by Hannibal, were all either killed or taken priſoners. Two hundred and forty thouſand buſhels of wheat, together with an hundred and ten thouſand of barley, and ſome plunder, that the troops partook of, were found in thoſe fortreſſes; but this could by no means be deemed a ſufficient compenſation for the great defeat Hannibal gave the proconſul Cn. Fulvius at Herdonea about the ſame time. The Roman general, being appriſed, that the citizens of Herdonea ſhewed a diſpoſition to abandon the Carthaginian intereſt, moved that way, to encourage them to declare themſelves. Hannibal, by his ſpies, receiving intelligence of this motion, as well as the reaſon of it, advanced likewiſe into the neighbourhood of that city, with ſuch celerity, that Fulvius had no notice of his approach. However, upon Hannibal's offering battle to the Romans, an engagement enſued, wherein the legionaries behaved with great bravery, till the Carthaginian found means to ſurround them with his horſe. Then they were ſoon thrown into confuſion, and driven out of the field, with the loſs of thirteen thouſand men, the reſt flying to Marcellus in Samnium by different routs. After this victory, Hannibal burnt the city of Herdonea, put to death as many of the nobility, who had had kept a secret correspondence with Fulvius, as he could discover, and transplanted the body of the citizens to Metapontum and Thurii. Upon the first news of Fulvius's overthrow, Marcellus moved out of Samnium into Lucania, to give a check to the progress of the Carthaginian arms, and came up with Hannibal near the town of Numistro. Both sides immediately shewed a disposition to fight, and drew up their armies in order of battle without delay. Hannibal posted his right wing on an eminence, and Marcellus his left close by the town. The action was very sharp, but not decisive, the night obliging both sides to retire. Hannibal, not judging it expedient to renew the attack the next morning, decamped in the night, bending his march for Venusia, where, in a few days, the Roman army arrived. Some slight skirmishes happened here betwixt the advanced guards of both parties; but nothing of moment was undertaken by either of the generals, they being wholly employed in watching one another's motions. A conspiracy, formed against the Roman troops in Capua, being detected, the conspirators received condign punishment. Syphax, about this time, sent an embassy to Rome, notifying to the senate certain advantages he had lately gained over the Carthaginians, with a declaration, that no power was considered by him in a more hostile light, than the state of Carthage, nor in a more friendly one, than that of Rome. Towards the close of this campaign, Hamilcar, with a Carthaginian squadron, consisting of forty galleys, hovered about the coasts of Sardinia, and, not meeting with any Roman fleet to oppose him, ravaged all the country about Olbia and Caralis. The Sicilian banditti above-mentioned, about this time, did not only destroy with fire and sword a good part of Brutium, but likewise laid siege to the city of Caulonia [q].

Various engagements betwixt Hannibal and Marcellus.

HANNIBAL, having taken up his winter-quarters near Canusium, used all possible means to excite the people of that city to a revolt from the Romans; which reaching the ears of Marcellus, he advanced to Canusium, encamped over-against Hannibal, and soon found means to draw him to a battle. The contending armies, being separated by the night, at first parted upon equal terms; but the next day, the encounter being renewed, Hannibal worsted the Romans. This extremely chagrined Marcellus, who hitherto had never received received any diſgrace from the Carthaginians; but now, beſides the field of battle, loſt near three thouſand men, amongſt whom were four centurions, and two military tribunes, together with ſix ſtandards, that were taken by the enemy. Being therefore filled with indignation and reſentment, he reſolved to venture another engagement with Hannibal, who, on his part, ſeemed determined not to decline the challenge. Marcellus poſted the left wing, and thoſe cohorts, that, in the laſt action, had loſt their colours, in front; the twentieth legion he placed to the right; and appointed Cornelius Lentulus and C. Claudius Nero to command both wings, whilſt the main body was committed to his conduct. Hannibal poſted the Spaniards in front, and diſpoſed his other forces in the uſual manner. The fight was obſtinate and bloody, the Carthaginian elephants overthrowing many of the Roman ſtandards, breaking the enemy's ranks, and treading under foot ſuch a number of them, that their army muſt have been abſolutely ruined; had not Decimus Flavius, a military tribune, advanced boldly againſt them, at the head of a party of dartmen, who wounding moſt of thoſe huge animals by a ſhower of their pila diſcharged upon them, they turned upon their own men with ſuch fury, that they were thrown into diſorder; which enabled the Romans to drive Hannibal to his camp, after they had laid eight thouſand Carthaginians dead upon the ſpot. Marcellus however loſt above three thouſand men in the action, and had almoſt all the reſt wounded; inſomuch that he found himſelf not capable of purſuing Hannibal, when his ſpies informed him, that he was retreating into Brutium. During theſe tranſactions, the Hirpini, Lucani, and Volſcentes, ſubmitted to the conſul Fulvius, delivering all the troops Hannibal had left in their cities for garriſons, into his hands. Pactius and Vitius likewiſe, two of the principal noblemen amongſt the Brutii, endeavoured to procure for their countrymen the ſame terms, that had been granted to their neighbours. Q. Fabius, the other conſul, about the ſame time, took by ſtorm Manduria, a city of the Salentines, making four thouſand men therein priſoners of war. After this inſtance of ſucceſs, Fabius ſat down before Tarentum. As the Carthaginians had then no fleet in thoſe ſeas, having ſent all their galleys to the iſland Corcyra, in order to aſſiſt king Philip, then at war with the Ætolians, he found no difficulty in making his approaches by ſea as well as by land. Whilſt theſe things happened, Hannibal advanced with a ſtrong body of troops to Caulonia; which obliged the Sicilian forces above-mentioned to retire to an eminence at some distance from that town [r].

Fabius takes Tarentum.

FABIUS had no occasion to push on long the siege of Tarentum. An accident, that could not be foreseen, threw that place into his hands. It happened, that the commandant of the Brutian garrison, which Hannibal left for the defence of that place, fell desperately in love with a girl, whose brother was a soldier in the Roman army. This person being informed by his sister, in a letter, of the great interest she had with the commandant, he immediately communicated the matter to Fabius, who ordered him to go into the city as a deserter, and to try whether he could not, by his sister's influence, prevail upon her gallant to introduce the Romans into the town. This was happily effected, without any great effusion of blood, since the Tarentines found themselves not able to make head against the Romans, after the Brutians had deserted them. Nicon and Democrates, two of the Tarentine leaders, died gloriously, on the bed of honour, fighting for the liberties of their country; and Philomenes, by whose agency Tarentum had been betrayed to Hannibal, was supposed to have thrown himself headlong from off his horse into a well, after the end of the action. Carthalo, who commanded the body of native Carthaginians in the place, was put to the sword, together with a good number of his men, as well as the greatest part of the Tarentines, and many even of the Brutians themselves, who, one would have thought, had merited better treatment. All authors agree, that the plunder taken here was immense, and even equal to what Marcellus found in Syracuse. The number of slaves made prisoners amounted to thirty thousand. Fabius took care to dismantle Tarentum, and to demolish the wall, that separated the town from the citadel. About this time Hannibal, having, for a considerable term, surrounded the body of Sicilian banditti posted on the eminence near Caulonia above-mentioned, forced them to surrender at discretion [s].

Asdrubal defeated by Scipio in Spain.

THE Carthaginians had this year three armies in Spain, commanded by three of their best generals, viz. Asdrubal the son of Hamilcar, Asdrubal the son of Gisco, and Mago. Edeco, or Edesco, a general of great fame amongst the Spaniards, abandoning the Carthaginian interest about the beginning of the summer, came over to Scipio. His wife and children children had been, for ſome time, in the Roman camp; but a regard to their ſafety did not ſo much induce him to act the part he had done, according to Livy, as that ſincere affection for the Romans, with which Scipio had inſpired all the Spaniards, by his great humanity, politeneſs, and condeſcenſion. Indibilis, Mandonius, and moſt of the other Spaniſh reguli, charmed with the ſame amiable qualities, joined Scipio with all their forces. By this acceſſion of ſtrength, that general found himſelf enabled to hazard an engagement with Aſdrubal the ſon of Hamilcar, who lay encamped near the city of Bætula, or, as Polybius calls it, Bæcula. Scipio was impatient of delay, as fearing the junction of Aſdrubal and his collegues. The Carthaginian diſcovered the ſame eagerneſs for a battle on his part, as finding the Roman army to be daily reinforced by the acceſſion of Spaniſh troops, and his own diminiſhed in proportion, by the continual deſertion of thoſe troops. Scipio, upon his approach towards the Carthaginian camp, detached ſome parties of his velites to reconnoitre the enemy, who, having fallen in with ſome of their advanced guards, defeated them, purſued them to their camp, and then returned, without any loſs, to their own army. Animated by this event, Scipio, the next day, attacked the Carthaginians, though Aſdrubal had taken care to poſt himſelf upon an eminence in the midſt of a plain, ſurrounded ſo by a river, as to form a peninſula, the preceding night, in a moſt advantageous manner. The Carthaginians, for ſome time, defended themſelves with great bravery; but were at laſt totally routed, and forced to fly, according to Livy, with the loſs of eight thouſand men killed upon the ſpot, beſides ten thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, taken priſoners; though the ſame moſt conſiſtent hiſtorian had juſt before informed us, that their retreat was cut off in ſuch a manner, that it was impoſſible for any of them to eſcape. This blow, next to the bravery of the Roman troops, may be attributed to the violence of the Carthaginian elephants, which, being galled by the enemy's pila, recoiled upon the forces with which they were intermixed, and ſtruck them with as much terror, as did the Romans. Scipio gave the Carthaginian camp up to his ſoldiers to be plundered, and releaſed all the Spaniſh priſoners found there without ranſom; but ordered the Africans to be ſold for ſlaves. Aſdrubal, rallying the remains of his ſhattered army, purſued his march towards the Pyrenees, having ſent his elephants that way before the beginning of the engagement. The Spaniſh princes, who had entered into an alliance with Scipio, received conſiderable preſents, for their gallant behaviour in the late battle; Indibilis in particular being ordered by the Roman general to pick three hundred horſes out of thoſe taken from the enemy, for his own uſe. Notwithſtanding the glorious victory Scipio had gained, he thought proper to retire from Bætula, and the Saltus Caſtulonenſis; which gave the other two Carthaginian commanders an opportunity of joining Aſdrubal. At a conſultation held for that purpoſe, each of theſe generals had his particular province aſſigned him. Aſdrubal, the ſon of Hamilcar, was to march into Italy, to aſſiſt Hannibal, with all the Spaniſh forces he could draw together; Aſdrubal, the ſon of Giſco, was to take upon himſelf the command of the corps lately committed to Mago's conduct, and to retire into Luſitania; but induſtriouſly to avoid an engagement; and Mago was ſent to the Balearic iſlands, with a large ſum of money, to make new levies there. Maſſiniſſa had likewiſe a choice detachment of three thouſand horſe, being the flower of the cavalry, aſſigned him, in order to ſupport the Carthaginian allies in Hiſpania Citerior, as well as to deſtroy the enemy's country there with fire and ſword. As Scipio, by his generous and affable deportment, ſeemed to be in a fair way of winning the hearts of all the Spaniards, it was judged neceſſary to make theſe diſpoſitions, that the Spaniſh ſoldiery, in the Carthaginian ſervice, might be drawn immediately either into Gaul, or the remoteſt part of Spain, where the Romans had not, as yet, got any footing. This, it was hoped, would put an effectual ſtop to that general deſertion, which then prevailed amongſt thoſe troops [t].

ALL perſons of penetration and attention, upon their peruſal of above the account, will be naturally inclined to enquire, how it was poſſible for Aſdrubal to have ſent all the elephants away, with the train that attended them, towards the Pyrenees, if many of them remained in his camp, and occaſioned a greater carnage amongſt his troops there, upon the Romans forcing it; how theſe troops ſhould have been hemmed in, and ſo ſurrounded on all ſides, by a victorious enemy, that their retreat was entirely cut off, and yet that many of them, nay, the greateſt part of them, ſhould have made their eſcape; how Aſdrubal's army ſhould have been

been entirely ruined, and yet that Scipio, immediately after the action, ſhould have been obliged to retire to Tarraco, which enabled the other two Carthaginian generals to join Aſdrubal, and concert with him the operations of the remaining part of the campaign, which the Romans, above all things, ought to have prevented; laſtly, what were the happy conſequences of this defeat, which Scipio is ſaid to have given the Carthaginians. In ſhort, from the above-recited particulars, it appears that, to uſe Sir Walter Raleigh's witty expreſſion, the Romans beat Aſdrubal out of Spain into Italy, there to join Hannibal with the moſt numerous Carthaginian army, that ever appeared in that country, (for ſo Livy repreſents it) had not a diſaſter prevented that junction. If Polybius countenanced ſuch relations as theſe in any manner, (and even that moſt incomparable hiſtorian is not abſolutely void of weakneſs and partiality) he is ſo far to be cenſured. But to proceed:

THE next year, being the eleventh of the ſecond Punic war, the Carthaginians threatened to ravage the coaſts of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia, with a fleet of above two hundred ſail; of which Scipio being appriſed, he detached fifty galleys to cruiſe off the ports of Sardinia, and protect that iſland from all inſults of the enemy. The conſul T. Quinctius Criſpinus ſent for a large train of battering engines from Sicily, intending ſoon to form the ſiege of Locri, his fleet having already blocked that city up on the ſea-ſide. But he laid aſide that deſign on Hannibal's approach to Lacinium, and on receiving advice, that his collegue Marcellus had drawn his forces from Venuſia, in order to join him. Hannibal, being appriſed, that both the conſuls were encamped within three miles of one another, betwixt Bantia and Venuſia, moved that way, pitching his tents at a ſmall diſtance from them. Notwithſtanding the ſummer was far advanced, the conſuls wrote to L. Cincius, ordering him to come with a fleet from Sicily to Locri, a body of Romans from Tarentum being commanded to inveſt that city by land at the ſame time. This being diſcovered to Hannibal by ſome Thurians, he placed an ambuſcade for that corps; into which having drawn them, he put two thouſand of them to the ſword, took twelve hundred priſoners, and diſperſed the reſt. He afterwards decoyed the two conſuls into another ambuſcade of Numidian horſe, together with M. Marcellus ſon to one of them, and A. Manlius, both both of them legionary tribunes, attended only by an eſcorte of two hundred and twenty horſe, of which forty were Fregellani, and the reſt Etruſcans. The brave Marcellus, one of them, who had acquired ſuch renown by the ſeveral advantages he got over Hannibal, loſt his life, through the cowardice of the Etruſcans, who fled at the firſt onſet. But Criſpinus, his colleague, with the two tribunes abovementioned, L. Arennius, M. Aulius, two prefects of the Roman allies, and others, by their own bravery, and that of the Fregellani, made their eſcape in the manner we have already related [n].

Hannibal obliges the Romans to raiſe the ſiege of Locri.

MAGO, the Carthaginian commandant at Locri, found himſelf ſo preſſed by Cincius, that he was upon the point of ſurrendering; but receiving advice of the blow Hannibal had given the Romans, by the ſlaughter of Marcellus, he reſolved to defend the place to the laſt drop of blood. Soon after, an expreſs arrived from Hannibal, with an account, that the Numidian cavalry had already begun their march for Locri; and that he himſelf, with the groſs of the army, would follow them with all poſſible expedition. Upon the firſt appearance of the Numidians, Mago made a ſally with his whole force upon the beſiegers, and, after an obſtinate diſpute, the Numidians coming up in the nick of time, forced them to abandon their works, and leave all their battering engines, and other military machines, behind them; ſo that Hannibal, upon his arrival at Locri, found no enemy to oppoſe him there. About this time, Valerius, the Roman admiral, after having ravaged the coaſt of Africa, attacked a Carthaginian ſquadron of eighty-three galleys off of Capua. The Carthaginians, not being able to withſtand the efforts of the Romans, were ſoon obliged to ſheer off, with the loſs of eighteen ſhips; which Valerius carried off in triumph. From thence ſteering for Sicily, he arrived in a ſhort time, with an immenſe booty at Lilybæum [w].

The Carthaginians are guilty of a breach of faith with regard to to Philip king of Macedon.

THOUGH the Carthaginians had lately ſent a fleet to aſſiſt Philip againſt the Romans and Ætolians, which, in all probability, was at this time either cruiſing off of the iſland Corcyra, or riding at anchor in the port there, yet we do not find, that this fleet did any important ſervice to that prince. It neither protected his coaſts from the inſults of

of the Roman and Ætolian privateers, nor enabled him to tranſport any forces to Italy, or any other country, that it might have been his intereſt to have invaded. The Carthaginians therefore by no means obſerved the treaty of alliance they had entered into with that prince; which doubtleſs incenſed him to ſuch a degree, that he, for the future, broke off all correſpondence with them. Be that as it will, it is certain he not only made a peace with the Romans exclusive of them, which was an apparent infraction of the late treaty, provided they had paid any regard to it, but likewiſe left them to cope with the Romans alone, both before and after his accommodation with that people; which was alſo contrary to the late treaty, upon the aforeſaid ſuppoſition. But as the diſcuſſion of this point belongs more properly to the hiſtory of Macedon, we ſhall at preſent paſs by every thing farther relating to it, and proceed to the Carthaginian affairs in Italy [x].

Asdrubal beſieges Placentia.

ASDRUBAL, as we have lately obſerved, being obliged to abandon his camp near Bætula, had afterwards a conference with the other two Carthaginian generals, wherein the operations of the campaign were ſettled. In purſuance of the plan then formed, Aſdrubal advanced towards the Pyrenees, at the head of the forces aſſigned him, with all poſſible expedition. The Pyrenees, as far as we can collect from hiſtory, he croſſed, without any great difficulty, though, if Livy may be credited, Scipio had detached a body of troops to diſpute the paſſage of that ridge of mountains with him. As the ſilver-mines (Q) near Bætula had ſupplied

(Q) Polybius tells us, that, near New Carthage, there was a ſilver mine ſo rich, that the Carthaginians extracted out of it every day twenty-five thouſand drachms of ſilver. Aletes, the diſcoverer of this mine, was, according to the ſame author, deified by the Spaniards after his death, for the ſervice he thereby did his country. Ariſtotle and Poſidonius intimate, that Spain, in the moſt early ages, abounded with ſilver; inſomuch that the Phœnicians exported vaſt quantities of that metal from thence, which they purchaſed for oil, and other trifles; nay, the firſt author aſſures us, that the Phœnicians, by this means, had not only immenſe quantities of plate, but that even the very anchors of their ſhips were made of ſilver. But of this more, when we come to the hiſtory of Spain (23).

(23) Polyb. l. x. c. 10. Poſidon. apud Diodor. Sic. l. v. Ariſtot. in mirab. auſcult.

ſupplied him with a very conſiderable quantity of treaſure, upon his arrival in Gaul, he not only prevailed upon the Gauls to grant him a paſſage through their territories, but likewiſe to furniſh him with a proper number of recruits. The Ligurians received him in the ſame manner, as would alſo the Etruſcans, could he have advanced to their frontiers. Aſdrubal therefore, meeting with as little oppoſition, and as many favourable circumſtances, to facilitate and expedite his march, as he could hope for, arrived at Placentia ſooner than either the Romans, or even his brother Hannibal himſelf, expected. But ſitting down before this place, contrary to the rules of ſound policy, and continuing the ſiege of it, he gave the Romans an opportunity of aſſembling all their forces to attack him, and at the ſame time, by his too great ſecurity, as well as the enterprize he had undertaken, prevented Hannibal from joining him, as he had propoſed to do, upon the firſt news of his having paſſed the Alps. This indolence of Hannibal proceeded from a notion, that Placentia would not be ſoon reduced, and that therefore, though they ſhould unite their forces, they could not ſpeedily enter upon any military operation. Thus Aſdrubal not only loſt all the advantages he might have reaped from the friendſhip of the Arverni, and other Gallic nations, who had ſo greatly expedited his paſſage to Italy, by this ſingle ſtep, but likewiſe totally ruined the Carthaginian affairs in that country, as will ſoon moſt evidently appear [y].

Hannibal receives ſeveral blows.

As ſoon as Hannibal moved out of his winter-quarters, he ordered a body of troops to march into the country of the Salentines, with an intention to ravage it, before the conſul Claudius could take the field; but this was prevented by the conduct and bravery of C. Hoſtilius Tubulus, who attacked the Carthaginians with a body of light-armed troops, and entirely defeated them, killing four thouſand of their men upon the ſpot. After this diſaſter, Hannibal retired into Brutium, to prevent his being hemmed in by the enemy, who began now to advance againſt him from ſeveral parts. In the mean time Tubulus, with his forces, joined the conſular army under Claudius at Venuſia. Hannibal, having drawn all his garriſons out of Brutium, and by this means reinforced his army, marched to Grumentum tum in Lucania, in order to recover ſome towns, that, through fear, had revolted to the Romans. As, immediately after the late junction, Claudius had ſent a detachment, under the command of Tubulus, to reinforce the proconſul Fulvius at Capua, and, with the remaining corps, conſiſting of forty thouſand foot, and two thouſand five hundred horſe, had himſelf gone in queſt of Hannibal, he arrived at Grumentum ſoon after the Carthaginian, and encamped within five hundred paces of him. Claudius, by the ſtratagem formerly mentioned, and the bravery of C. Aurunculeius, tribune of the third legion, gave Hannibal another defeat here, cutting off eight thouſand of his men, and taking ſeven hundred priſoners. Four elephants were likewiſe killed, and two taken, in the action. Nine military enſigns, and ſome plunder, alſo fell into the hands of the Romans, who, according to Livy, loſt only two hundred men on this occaſion. Hannibal, ſoon after this blow, decamped in the night, and, by leaving a few Numidian horſe in his intrenchments to amuſe the enemy, made good his retreat to Venuſia; but here the conſul came up again with him. At this place, in another rencounter, the Carthaginians loſt two thouſand men; upon which Hannibal retired, with great precipitation, to Metapontum, where he was joined by Hanno, and from thence made the beſt of his way to Canuſium [z].

DURING theſe tranſactions, Aſdrubal, being obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Placentia, began his march for Umbria. Of this the conſul Claudius being informed by a letter, ſent from that general to his brother Hannibal, which was intercepted near Tarentum, he put himſelf at the head of a detachment of ſeven thouſand men, the very flower of his troops, and poſted with incredible celerity to join his collegue Livius. Though no general was allowed to leave his own province, to go into that of another, by the Roman laws; yet in a conjuncture of ſo delicate and important a nature as this, when the ſafety, and even the very being, of Rome lay at ſtake, he thought himſelf at liberty to diſpenſe with the eſtabliſhed rules of war, for the welfare of his country. He had no ſooner received the letter abovementioned from L. Virginius, a legionary tribune, who had eſcorted the Carthaginian couriers with a Samnite detachment tachment to him, and read it, than he ſent it to the ſenate at the ſame time diſpatching his orders to the Larinates Marrucini, Frentani, Prætutiani, &c. through whoſe territories he was to paſs, to provide a ſufficient quantity of proviſions and carriages for his troops, that he might purſue his march without the leaſt interruption. As nothing could ſave Rome, after the junction of the two Carthaginian armies, in order to prevent this, he judged it proper to ſtrike ſuch a bold and unexpected blow, as would terrify the enemy; which, he imagined, might be done, could he and his collegue vigorouſly charge Aſdrubal with their united forces. This reflection determined him to make the movement mentioned here, after having left the command of the troops in the camp to Q. Catius, one of his lieutenants [a].

And joins him.

CLAUDIUS gave not the leaſt hint of his deſign to any of his officers, till he was got at ſuch a diſtance from Hannibal, that the communication of it to the troops could not be of any ill conſequence to him. He then only in general told them, "That he was leading them to certain "victory; that his collegue wanted a reinforcement; that "in war all depended upon reputation; that the bare "rumour of their arrival would diſconcert all the meaſures "of the Carthaginians; and that the whole honour of this "battle would fall to them." He marched with ſuch expedition, that in ſix days he arrived at Sena, where Livius lay encamped within half a mile of the Carthaginians. Soon after his arrival, Aſdrubal, taking a view of the Roman army, diſcovered ſeveral ſhields of an antient make, that he had never ſeen before, many thin, lean horſes, which had been greatly fatigued, and that the Roman army was apparently more numerous than the day before. By theſe, and ſeveral other circumſtances, that able general ſuſpected Claudius to have joined his collegue with a body of troops. This threw him into a ſort of melancholy, as imagining, that Hannibal had been overthrown, and conſequently that he came too late to ſupport him [b].

The Romans defeat Aſdrubal upon the banks of the Metaurus.

BEFORE the arrival of Claudius, the prætor L. Portius Licinius was encamped, with ſome forces, at a ſmall diſtance from the conſul Livius. Immediately after that important event, a council of war was held, in which the three commanders

manders preſided. Livius gave his opinion, that an action, for ſome days, ſhould be deferred, that Claudius's troops might have time to refreſh themſelves, after ſo tedious and fatiguing a march. Claudius himſelf entertained different ſentiments, imagining, that nothing could prove more fatal to the republic, than the leaſt delay to give the enemy battle at this critical juncture. His advice was complied with, and the ſignal of battle accordingly given. However, Aſdrubal, under the apprehenſions above-mentioned, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and his army began to march in great diſorder. Night overtaking him, and his guides deſerting him, he was uncertain what way to go. He marched at random along the banks of the Metaurus, now the Metaro, and was preparing to croſs it, when the united forces of the enemy came up with him. In this extremity, he ſaw it would be impoſſible for him to avoid coming to an engagement, and therefore did all things, which could be expected from the preſence of mind and courage of a conſummate warrior. He ſeized an advantageous poſt, and drew up his forces on a narrow ſpot, which gave him an opportunity of poſting his left wing, compoſed of Gauls, and the weakeſt part of his army, in ſuch a manner, that it neither could be attacked in front, nor charged in flank; and of giving his main battle, and right wing, conſiſting of Spaniards, all veteran troops, a greater depth than front. After this haſty diſpoſition of his forces, he poſted himſelf in the centre, and firſt moved to attack the enemy's left wing, commanded by the conſul Livius, well knowing that all was at ſtake, and that he muſt either conquer or die. The battle laſted a long time, and was obſtinately diſputed by both parties. Aſdrubal eſpecially ſignalized himſelf in this engagement, and quite completed the glory he had acquired by a ſeries of ſhining actions. He led on his ſoldiers, who were trembling, and quite deſpirited, againſt an enemy ſuperior to them both in numbers and reſolution. He animated them by his words, ſupported them by his example, and, with intreaties and menaces intermixed, endeavoured to bring back thoſe who fled; till at laſt, ſeeing that victory declared for the Romans, and being unable to ſurvive the loſs of ſo many thouſand men, who had quitted their country to follow his fortune, he ruſhed at once into the midſt of a Roman cohort, cohort, and there died in a manner worthy the son of Hamilcar, and brother of Hannibal [c].

This victory almost entirely owing to the conduct and bravery of Claudius.

THIS victory, which Livy makes equal to that of Cannæ, was almost entirely owing to the bravery and activity of Claudius. That general flew like lightning from one part of the army to another, insomuch that he seemed to be in all places at once. Observing that the enemy's right wing, composed of Spaniards and Ligurians, the flower of Asdrubal's troops, charged the left of the Romans with such resolution, that fortune seemed to be on the point of declaring for the Carthaginians there, and that the enemy's elephants, after having thrown the Roman vanguard into confusion, and overturned the standards there, occupied the void space betwixt the two armies in such a manner, that it was difficult to discover to what party they belonged, their guides now not being capable of governing them, he cried out to his men in an angry tone, "To what purpose then have we made so long a march with such expedition?" and immediately made an effort to possess himself of an eminence, that covered the Gauls, in order to penetrate to the enemy on that side; but, finding this impossible, he drew out a detachment of some cohorts from the right wing, with which wheeling about, in order to sustain Livius, he charged the Spaniards and Ligurians in front, and in flank, and in rear, almost at the same time. This changed the face of affairs, especially as such an attack was unexpected, and made with the utmost fury. The Spaniards and Ligurians therefore, not being able to sustain so violent a shock, were soon put to the rout, and almost all cut to pieces; after which the Gauls were, for the most part, massacred without opposition. The leaders themselves destroyed most of the elephants, to prevent the destruction they would have occasioned amongst their own troops, upon whom they turned all their rage, after they were wounded by the enemy. According to Livy, fifty-six thousand of Asdrubal's men fell in this bloody action, and near six thousand were taken prisoners; though Polybius makes the whole whole loſs of the Carthaginians not to have exceeded ten thouſand men. Be that as it will, the Romans ſeemed to have been weary of killing, ſince when a perſon told Livius after the battle, that it would be an eaſy matter to cut off a body of Caſalpine Gauls and Ligurians who had either not been in the fight, or eſcaped out of it, then flying in great confuſion, with a ſmall detachment of horſe, he anſwered, "It is fit that ſome ſhould ſurvive, to carry the "enemy the news of their defeat, and our bravery." Livy affirms, that the Romans carried off an immenſe quantity of gold and ſilver, as well as plunder of other kinds; but Polybius is ſilent on that head. This action proved deciſive, ſince we may juſtly eſteem it to have determined the fate of Italy, as the battle of Zama a few years afterwards did that of Africa [d].

HANNIBAL received no intelligence of this blow, till Claudius adverti ſed him of it, by throwing his brother Aſdrubal's head into his trenches, immediately after he arrived at the Roman camp near Canuſium. This inhumanity was the more inexcuſeable, as Hannibal had given the Romans recent inſtances of a generous and noble diſpoſition, by treating with the utmoſt decency, not to ſay tenderneſs and reſpect, the bodies of Gracchus and Marcellus. That treatment, in our opinion, demonſtrates the great humanity of Hannibal, if not of the Carthaginians in general, on ſuch occaſions; as the ſavage barbarity of Claudius does that of the Romans. As Claudius ſent two captives in chains, which, one ſhould have imagined, would have been mortifying enough, to inform Hannibal of his brother's fatal overthrow, nothing can equal, vindicate, or even palliate, the ferity of that barbarian. All the glory he had acquired by his late conduct in the battle of Metaurus, which certainly ought not to be denied him, ſerved only to render him more hateful and deteſtable, ſince nothing can be more monſtrous, than ſuch a contraſt of qualities in the ſame perſon. That the fact, here alledged againſt him, was real, is allowed by the moſt prejudiced Roman hiſtorians themſelves, who ſeem to relate it with pleaſure, and thereby reflect an eternal diſhonour both upon themſelves and their republic, as intimating, that they were all pleaſed with it, and conſequently of the ſame diſpoſition with Claudius. The juſtneſs of this reflection flection is confirmed by the high encomium Valerius Maximus passes upon the noble and humane behaviour of Hannibal hinted at, which ought to be looked upon as a severe reprehension of the conduct of Claudius. In short, we think, a more lively instance of the Roman disposition at this juncture, with regard to humanity and greatness of soul, than that just hinted at, does not occur in history. It is pity but we had the Carthaginian annals for this particular period; they would doubtless have set the Romans in their true and proper light [e].

Hannibal greatly affected at the news of his brother's defeat and death.

THE melancholy news imparted to him by Claudius, filled Hannibal with horror and sadness. He perceived, by this cruel stroke, the fortune of Carthage: "It is done," said he, according to Horace, in that beautiful ode, where this defeat is described, "I will no longer send triumphant messages to "Carthage! In losing Asdrubal, I have lost at once all my "hope, all my good fortune"! After this fatal event, Hannibal retired to the extremity of Brutium, where, assembling all his forces, he remained for a considerable time, in a state of inaction, the Romans not daring to disturb him, so formidable did they deem him alone, though every thing about him went to wreck, and the Carthaginian affairs seemed not far from the verge of destruction. Livy tells us, it was a difficult thing to determine, whether his conduct was more wonderful in prosperity or adversity. Notwithstanding which, Brutium being at best but a small province, and many of its inhabitants being either forced into the service, or forming themselves into parties of banditti, so that a great part of it remained uncultivated, he found it a difficult matter to subsist there, especially as no manner of supplies were sent him from Carthage. The people there were as solicitous of preserving their possessions in Spain, and as little concerned at the situation of affairs in Italy, as if Hannibal had met with an uninterrupted course of success, and not the least disaster had befallen them since his first arrival in that country [f].

The Carthaginians worsted in Spain.

AFTER Asdrubal's departure for Italy, Hanno was sent to succeed him in Spain. The body of troops this general brought from Africa, in conjunction with that Mago com-commanded in Celtiberia, formed a conſiderable army. Theſe forces encamped in Celtiberia, and at ſome diſtance from them, in the ſame province, nine thouſand Celtiberians had poſted themſelves. Scipio ſent a detachment of ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, under the command of M. Syllanus the proprætor, to attack the enemy, if an opportunity offered. The proprætor, receiving ample intelligence of the ſituation and diſpoſition of both camps from ſome Celtiberian deſerters, who conducted him to that of their countrymen, was thereby enabled to gain a ſignal advantage over the enemy. He ſurpriſed the Celtiberians, being, for the moſt part, new-raiſed men, putting many of them to the ſword, and obliging the reſt to diſperſe in the adjacent woods, from whence they retired to their reſpective habitations. Hanno and Mago, towards the end of the action, advancing to their relief, were likewiſe defeated, and Hanno taken priſoner. Mago, with the cavalry, and a good part of the veteran infantry, made his eſcape, and, ten days afterwards, joined Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco. Theſe two commanders, with their united forces, continued, for ſome time, in the neighbourhood of Gades [g].

The Carthaginian affairs go to decay in Spain.

ACCORDING to ſome authors, Scipio, being appriſed of Aſdrubal's march for Italy, had before ſent a conſiderable reinforcement to the conſul Livius, to enable him to make head againſt the Carthaginian forces under Aſdrubal and Hannibal, provided neither of the conſular armies could hinder their junction. But the greateſt part of the Roman hiſtorians have omitted this circumſtance; which ſeems to invalidate the authority of thoſe writers in this particular. Be that as it will, Scipio had no ſooner received intelligence of the enemy's defeat in Italy, than he put himſelf in motion, and began to meditate the entire conqueſt of Spain. His brother, L. Scipio, being detached with a body of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, to take the city of Oringis, on the confines of Lower Bætica, executed his orders with great bravery, making the Carthaginian garriſon, and three hundred of the inhabitants, who ſhut the gates againſt him, priſoners of war, with the loſs only of ninety men. Livy ſays, that the Roman detachment killed two two thousand of the enemy in the attack; and that Lucius, in order to ingratiate himself with the Spaniards, left the citizens in possession of the town, and all their effects. The territory of Oringis was extremely fruitful, and abounded with silver-mines. In the city itself Asdrubal had long had a good number of troops, who had not a little harassed the Romans and their allies, by their frequent incursions into the mediterranean parts of the country. The Carthaginians therefore sustained a considerable loss by the reduction of that place. Scipio is said to have complimented his brother highly upon this conquest, telling him, that it was equal to the taking of New Carthage. That general, finding the season far advanced, and that he could make no impression upon the province in which Gades was seated, since Asdrubal had placed numerous garrisons in all the fortresses there, suspended the military operations till the following spring. However, M. Valerius Lævinus the proconsul, who commanded in Sicily, committed great ravages on the coasts of Africa, where he made a descent about this time. Having destroyed with fire and sword all the country about Carthage and Utica, he returned to Lilybæum, defeating, in his passage, a Carthaginian squadron of seventy galleys. Of these he took seventeen, sunk four, and dispersed the rest. Thus were the Romans victorious every-where this campaign, the Carthaginians not being able to cope with them either by sea or land [h].

Lucania submits to the Romans.

THE next year, Hannibal sent a detachment of Numidians to observe the motions of the Roman army, under the command of the consuls Q. Cæcilius and L. Veturius, in the territory of Cosentia. That detachment, falling in with one of the enemy's parties, which had been plundering the country, after a short dispute, routed it, and carried off the booty to Hannibal's camp. But this small advantage did not make amends for the loss of Lucania, which submitted to the Romans. Nothing further worth relating happened this campaign betwixt the forces of the two contending republics in Italy [i].

The Carthaginian generals and Masinissa overthrown in Spain by Scipio.

THE Carthaginian generals, that commanded this year in Spain, were Mago the son of Hamilcar, and Asdrubal the son of Gisco. These two commanders, in the spring, moved moved from Gades, where, it is probable, they had fixed their winter-quarters, with an army of fifty, or, as others will have it, ſeventy, thouſand foot, and four thouſand five hundred horſe. Advancing with all expedition towards the Romans, whom they were determined to engage, they at laſt took poſt in the plains of Silpia, at no great diſtance from them. Scipio, being extremely alarmed at the approach of ſo formidable a power, diſpatched in all haſte Syllanus to Colcas, a neighbouring prince, who had promiſed Scipio a body of auxiliary troops, to inform him of the enemy's motions. In the mean time he drew his forces out of Tarraco, and, being joined by ſome of his allies, advanced to Caſtulo, where he was ſoon met by Syllanus, with a reinforcement of three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, from Colcas. From thence he marched to Bætula, or Bætula, with an army forty-five thouſand ſtrong. Mago and Maſiniſſa, at the head of the Carthaginian cavalry, fell upon the Romans as they were encamping, and had put them into diſorder, had not Scipio placed ſome troops of his horſe in an ambuſcade behind an eminence, near the ſpot upon which he intended to encamp. Theſe, ſallying out upon the Carthaginians, obliged them at firſt to retire with precipitation; but, being afterwards duly ſupported, ſo puſhed them, that they betook themſelves to a downright flight. The light-armed troops on both ſides, for ſome time after this, ſkirmiſhed with one another; but without any conſiderable loſs. Both Aſdrubal and Scipio, for ſeveral days together, drew their forces out of their lines, ranged in order of battle, though Aſdrubal appeared firſt in the morning, and retired the laſt in the evening. At length Scipio, reſolving to give the Carthaginians battle, ordered his men to refreſh themſelves before day-break; and then ſent his horſe and light-armed troops to brave the enemy. Aſdrubal poſted the Spaniards in the wings, the elephants in front, and the Carthaginians, intermixed with the other Africans, in the centre. After having made this diſpoſition, he advanced towards the enemy, his cavalry in the mean time keeping their horſe in play. Scipio took care to protract the fight till towards noon, imagining that the Carthaginians muſt wax faint by that time, as being entirely void of ſuſtenance, and conſequently that he ſhould break them without much difficulty. Accordingly then ordering his wings to advance, he attacked Aſdrubal's Spaniſh auxiliaries in front with the legionaries, and in flank at the ſame time with the velites, ſuſtained by ſeveral cohorts, which were commanded to wheel about for that purpoſe. The Spaniards, after ſome reſiſtance, were routed, the Carthaginian and African forces not being able to ſupport them, ſince the Spaniards, that formed Scipio's main body, kept them in awe by moving towards them. The elephants, as had frequently happened of late, occaſioned greater confuſion in the Carthaginian army, than in that of the enemy. Notwithſtanding therefore Aſdrubal did his utmoſt to animate his men, they were defeated, and purſued by the Romans to their camp, which had then been taken, had not a violent ſtorm cooled the ardour of the victors, and put an end to the action [k].

Maſiniſſa abandons the Carthaginian intereſt.

THE night after the battle, Aſdrubal cauſed his camp to be ſtrengthened by ſome additional works, as expecting the next day another viſit from the enemy. In the mean time Attanes, regulus of the Turdetani, with a conſiderable body of troops, went over to the Romans. Many other reguli followed this example; and two fortreſſes of note ſurrendered to Scipio, who made their garriſons priſoners of war. As the victory lately gained by Scipio had entirely alienated the minds of the Spaniards from the Carthaginians, Aſdrubal thought proper to abandon his camp, and retire with precipitation towards the ocean, though he had juſt before ſo fatigued his wearied and hungry troops, in order to render his camp inacceſſible to the enemy. Scipio, being informed of this, immediately detached his cavalry after the Carthaginian general, who ſo haraſſed him in his retreat, that the legionaries at laſt came up with him, and, after a faint reſiſtance, put all his men, except ſeven thouſand to the ſword. However theſe, with Aſdrubal at their head, gained an advantageous poſt, where, for ſome time, they defended themſelves, till at laſt Aſdrubal finding them to deſert in great numbers, abandoned them and made his eſcape to Gades. In the mean time Syllanus, whom Scipio had left, with a detachment of ten thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, to block up the enemies troops in the poſt above-mentioned, found means to draw Maſiniſſa their commander mander off from the Carthaginian intereſt. This unexpected event proved the total ruin of the Carthaginians in thoſe parts, as will hereafter more fully appear. Mago, after the example of Aſdrubal, flying to Gades, the remainder of the African forces either gradually diſperſed themſelves in the neighbouring provinces, or deſerted to the Romans. Maſiniſſa, after his late conference with Syllanus, by the connivance of that general, paſſed over into Africa, with ſome of the leading men of the Maſſyli, in order to diſpoſe that nation to ſecond his views. However, this was done in ſuch a manner, as not to give any umbrage to the Carthaginians, nor induce that crafty people to entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion of the meaſures he was going to purſue [1].

Scipio brings over Syphax to the Roman intereſt.

MASINISSA, to ſerve more effectually the party he intended ſoon to declare himſelf in favour of, made but a ſhort ſtay in Africa. Having prevailed on his ſubjects to concur with him in the execution of the project he had formed, he haſtened to Gades, to confer with Mago and Aſdrubal about the future operations. Syllanus likewiſe retired with his body of forces to Tarraco, where Scipio had fixed his head quarters. Scipio, ſoon afterwards paſſing into Africa with two quinqueremes, perſuaded Syphax, king of the Maſæſyli, to abandon the Carthaginians, and enter into an alliance with Rome. Aſdrubal was then at Syphax's court, and did his utmoſt to traverſe the negotiation carried on betwixt the two powers; but without effect. The three chief cities of Spain, beſides Gades, in alliance with, or ſubject to, Carthage, were Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa. Illiturgi the Romans took by ſtorm, levelled it with the ground, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword. Caſtulo, in which was a Carthaginian garriſon compoſed of the fugitives, that eſcaped the carnages in the late defeats, was betrayed by one Cerdubellus to Marcius, and Himilco the commandant, with his whole corps, made priſoners of war. Marcius, then paſſing the Bætis, which the Spaniards called Certius, poſſeſſed himſelf of two opulent towns, which ſurrendered at his approach. From thence he advanced to Aſtapa, and, after a warm diſpute, made himſelf maſter of it in the manner already related. In the mean time Mago, having received a reinforcement from Africa, as well as of ſome Spaniſh troops levied by Hanno, made the proper diſpoſitions for carrying on the war with vigour, notwithſtanding the melancholy ſituation of his affairs. A body of Roman forces, encamped upon the Sucro, during theſe tranſactions, mutinied, a report of Scipio's death, that was induſtriouſly propagated, occaſioning that commotion; but the mutineers being, by a ſeaſonable puniſhment of ſome of their ringleaders, brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, Marcius attacked four thouſand of the enemy encamped upon the Bætis, under the command of Hanno, forced their camp and either took or killed the greateſt part of them. The engaging Syphax to confederate with the Romans, was a very conſiderable point gained, though this was not effected without ſome difficulty. Scipio firſt ſent Lælius, with five quinqueremes, to make propoſals to that prince, which he ordered him to back with magnificent preſents. Lælius executed his commiſſion with great dexterity, putting Syphax in mind of the advantages he had reaped from a former alliance with the Romans. Notwithſtanding which, Scipio, as we have juſt obſerved, found himſelf obliged to viſit in perſon that prince's court, where by his uncommon addreſs, if we will believe Livy, he defeated the intrigues of Aſdrubal, and put the laſt hand to the treaty [m].

Scipio ſends Lælius to attempt the conqueſt of Gades.

SOON after the reduction of Aſtapa, ſome deſerters arrived at Gades from Scipio's camp. Theſe fugitives promiſed that general, not only to deliver the city, together with the Carthaginian garriſon and commandant, into his hands, but likewiſe to make him maſter of the enemy's whole fleet riding at anchor in the harbour there. Scipio therefore detached Lælius with a body of light-armed troops, aſſiſted by a naval force of one quinquereme, and ſeven triremes, to put the conſpirators in motion. In the mean time the conſpiracy being diſcovered to Mago, before it was ripe for execution, he took care to ſeize the principals of it, and ſent them on board a quinquereme, in order to tranſport them to Carthage. Aſdrubal the Carthaginian admiral, ordered the captain of this veſſel to precede the reſt of the fleet, he himſelf following at a ſmall diſtance with eight triremes. Upon his approach to Carteia, he deſcried Lælius's ſquadron coming out of that port. The Carthaginian could not, for ſome time, determine whether or no it would be proper for him him to attack the Romans; but this ſtate of ſuſpenſe gave Lælius an opportunity of coming up with him, which obliged him to hazard an engagement; in which being worſted, he made the beſt of his way towards the coaſts of Africa, with only five triremes. However, Lælius miſſed his aim, ſince Mago had taken care to give him a proper reception, if he advanced to Gades; of which being appriſed by the priſoners, he returned to Carteia, from whence he diſpatched an expreſs to Marcius. who was moving with a powerful corps to ſupport him, to inform him of what had happened. Both theſe commanders therefore, judging the ſiege of Gades too difficult an enterprize to be undertaken at preſent, laid aſide that deſign, and, in a ſhort time, rejoined Scipio at New Carthage [n].

Scipio gives the Spaniſh regulı a great overthrow.

THE diſappointment the Romans had met with in their deſign upon Gades, together with the rebellion of the Ilergetes, and revolt of the legions above-mentioned, gave Mago hopes, that he ſhould ſtill be in a condition to make head againſt the enemy. He therefore wrote to Carthage for a ſpeedy reinforcement, aſſuring the ſenate, that, if they would be active and expeditious at this juncture, they might recover what they had loſt in Spain. To excite them to make a vigorous effort, he greatly exaggerated the misfortunes of the Romans, giving a melancholy account of the dangers that threatened them. In the mean time Mandonius and Indibilis, being offended at the Romans, for not ceding to them the countries they had conquered, and encouraged by the report of Scipio's death, pillaged the territories of the Sedetani and Sueſſetani, allies of Rome. Hearing afterwards of Scipio's ſeverity to the ringleaders of the revolting legionaries, who were Romans, they concluded, that Spaniſh revolters muſt be excluded all hopes of pardon. Animated therefore by deſpair, they aſſembled a numerous army of Celtiberians, and advanced againſt Scipio. That general moving at the head of his forces with great celerity towards them, at laſt found them poſted in a plain, ſurrounded on all ſides by mountains, and ſcarce capable of containing ſuch a number of men. Having ſecured the defile leading into this valley, he detached Lælius, with the cavalry, to take a compaſs round the hills, and attack the enemy in rear, whilſt he charged them in front with the legionaries. This diſpoſition being made, Scipio attacked the reguli, and gave them a total overthrow, putting almoſt their whole army to the ſword. What became of them afterwards, our readers will find in a former part of this hiſtory [o].

Scipio holds a conference with Maſiniſſa.

THOUGH Syllanus and Maſiniſſa had ſettled the preliminaries, yet, by ſeveral intervening accidents, the concluſion of a treaty betwixt the Numidian and the Romans, was deferred to this time. The chief obſtacle to the ſigning of it was, that Maſiniſſa could find no opportunity of having an interview with Scipio, which he ardently deſired. Scipio, being informed of this, and that Maſiniſſa was at Gades, took a journey thither with a good eſcorte, purely out of a deſire to have a conference with him. Maſiniſſa, receiving intelligence of this from Marcius, prevailed upon Mago to ſend him, with a detachment from the iſland of Gades, to ravage the neighbouring part of the continent; which enabled him to confer with Scipio. At their firſt interview, Maſiniſſa told the Roman general, "That, from the time "he had ſo generouſly and politely releaſed his nephew, "for which he was greatly obliged to him, he had conceived a ſincere affection for him; that, ever ſince, he had "wiſhed for an opportunity of expreſſing his high regard "for the people of Rome, which now the gods had bleſſed "him with; that no foreigner could be more cloſely attached to them than he was; and that though he could "not give ſufficient proofs of this in Spain, where he was "a ſtranger, yet if the Romans would transfer the war to "Africa, where he had ſome intereſt, he would convince "them of the purity of his intentions, and at the ſame "time anſwer for the ſucceſs of the expedition." Every thing being afterwards ſettled to the mutual ſatisfaction of both parties, Maſiniſſa, in order to blind Aſdrubal, plundered ſome part of the adjacent country, and then returned to Gades [p].

Gades ſurrenders to the Romans.

THE Carthaginians, being diſappointed in the diverſion they expected from the mutiny of the legionaries, and the rebellion of the Spaniards, ordered Mago to abandon Spain, and ſail with all poſſible expedition to Italy. That he might be enabled the more effectually to ſuccour Hannibal, he received a large ſum of money to make levies in Gaul and Liguria.

Liguria. Before he left Gades, he did not only oblige the citizens to bring all their gold and ſilver to him, but plundered all their temples. In his paſſage to Italy, he made an attempt upon New Carthage; but was repulſed with great loſs. From thence he ſailed to the iſland of Pityuſa, where he met with a kind reception, receiving a plentiful ſupply of proviſions, and a good number of recruits. Then he ſteered his courſe to the largeſt of the Balearic iſlands, that had a commodious haven; where endeavouring to put in, he was attacked by the natives in ſo violent a manner with their ſlings, that he found himſelf obliged to ſheer off with conſiderable loſs. However, proceeding to the leſſer one near it, that was extremely fertile, tho' not ſo populous and powerful as the other, he entered the port, landed his men, encamped in a place of great ſtrength, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the whole iſland without oppoſition. As the ſeaſon was far advanced, he wintered here; to which he was the more ſtrongly induced by the good diſpoſition of the natives, who expreſſed all imaginable zeal and affection for the Carthaginians, ſupplying him during his ſtay amongſt them, with a body of two thouſand men. We muſt not omit obſerving, that the people of Gades ſhut their gates upon Mago after his repulſe at New Carthage; for which affront he whipped and crucified their ſuffetes, who were ſent to excuſe that conduct to him; nor that they ſurrendered to the Romans ſoon after he had abandoned them [q].

THE next ſummer, Mago, landing in Liguria with an army of twelve thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, ſurpriſed Genoa. From thence he ſailed to the coaſts of the Ligures Alpini, to try whether he could not raiſe ſome commotions amongſt them. The Ingauni, one of their cantons, were then at war with the Epanterii, a ſort of highlanders, who likewiſe belonged to them. This gave Mago an opportunity of ſeizing upon the town and port of Savo, and ſtationing ten of his long ſhips there. The reſt of his fleet he ſent to Carthage, upon a rumour, that Scipio was going to tranſport a body of troops to Africa, in order to attack that capital. Then he joined the Ingauni, whoſe friendſhip he preferred to that of the other contending party, and, in concert with them, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for invading the common enemy. As his army ſoon grew grew very numerous by the acceſſion of a ſtrong body of Gauls and Ligurians, the Romans were greatly alarmed, and made the motions already mentioned. About this time, Cn. Octavius, who commanded in Sardinia, took eighty Carthaginian tranſports, laden with corn, and other proviſions, for Hannibal, as Cælius will have it, or with booty taken in Etruria, and Epanterian captives, according to Valerius Antias, off of the coaſts of that iſland. As the plague made great havock both in the Carthaginian and Roman armies this year in Brutium, and Hannibal had beſides a famine to ſtruggle with, nothing material happened the campaign we are now upon in thoſe parts. Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian general, during his inaction this ſummer, erected an altar near the temple of Juno Lacinia, (Polybius ſays, a column or pillar near the town of Lacinium) upon which he engraved an account of all his great atchievements in Greek and Punic letters. Our readers will find ſome obſervations upon this monument of antiquity, which, Polybius aſſures us, was extant in his time, in two of our former notes [r].

The Spaniſh reguli receive a ſecond defeat.

THE following year, advice was brought to Carthage, that an army formed of the Auſetani, Ilergetes, and ſeveral other Spaniſh nations, under the command of Indibilis, Mandonius, &c. had been entirely overthrown by the Romans. Indibilis, it ſeems, being encouraged by Scipio's departure out of Spain, had excited the people above-mentioned to a ſecond revolt, imagining, that now an opportunity offered of rendering himſelf, with all the other reguli, independent both of the Romans and Carthaginians. To that end he aſſembled, in a few days, an army of thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, with which he advanced into the country of the Sedetani. Here the Roman generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, gave them a total defeat, putting above thirteen thouſand of them to the ſword, in which number was Indibilis himſelf, and taking eight thouſand priſoners. Mandonius, and the other authors of this revolt, being delivered up to the Romans, received capital puniſhment, after a confiſcation of all their effects; and then a peace was granted to the Spaniards upon

AFFAIRS were ſcarce ſettled in Spain, when Lælius made a deſcent in Africa at Hippo Regius, and pillaged all the neighbouring territory. This ſo alarmed the inhabitants, that they diſpatched meſſengers in all haſte to Carthage, with advice, that Scipio, with the Roman fleet, was arrived on their coaſts, and had landed at Hippo a ſtrong body of forces. As a rumour had, for ſome time, prevailed at Carthage, that Scipio had already paſſed into Sicily, the people and ſenate were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by this melancholy news. The great revolution that had happened in their affairs, the deſtruction of all their veteran troops, the incapacity of their youth for war, the defection of Syphax, Maſiniſſa, and all their other allies, together with the fickleneſs and inconſtancy of the Africans, from whom their auxiliary foces were to be drawn, afforded them a moſt diſmal proſpect, now their metropolis was threatened with a ſiege. However, when they received intelligence, that only Lælius, with an inconſiderable force, had put in at Hippo, in order to make an incurſion upon their territories on that ſide, their fears began to ſubſide. As ſoon therefore as they had recovered themſelves from the panic they were thrown into, they began to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for their defence: they ſent an embaſſy to Syphax, to attempt recovering that prince, as well as to ſeveral other African reguli, who ſhewed an inclination to ſide with the Romans: they remitted a ſum of two hundred talents of ſilver to Philip king of Macedon, in order to engage him to make a diverſion either in Italy or Sicily: they diſpatched orders to their generals in Italy to make all poſſible efforts to keep Scipio at home; and they ſent Mago a reinforcement of ſix thouſand foot, eight hundred horſe, ſeven elephants, and twenty-five long ſhips, together with a large ſum of money to make new levies, that he might advance nearer Rome, and join Hannibal. Lælius, having had a conference with Maſiniſſa, wherein that prince gave freſh aſſurances of his ſincere attachment to the Romans, and expreſſed an ardent deſire to ſee Scipio in Afri-

In the mean time the veſſels, with the body of troops deſtined for Italy to reinforce Mago, ſailed from Carthage, and, after a happy voyage, put into the part of Savo, where they joined the other Carthaginian ſquadron. Mago, upon their arrival, acquainted the chiefs of the Gauls and Ligurians with the reinforcement and welcome diſpatches he had received from Carthage. He took occaſion from hence to aſſure them, "That the chief end of his coming to Italy was to ſecure to "them the enjoyment of their rights and privileges." To this he ſubjoined, "That though the ſtate of Carthage would "exert itſelf to the utmoſt, in order to obtain this deſirable "end, yet the ſucceſs of its endeavours would depend upon "them, as it was in their power to enable him to make a "greater or leſſer figure in the field; that as Sp. Lucretius "and M. Livius would ſoon unite their forces, a ſtrong body "of auxiliaries would be neceſſary to oppoſe ſo formidable an "army." To which the Gauls replied, "That as one "Roman army was hovering about their frontiers, and another in Etruria, at a ſmall diſtance from them, they could "not come to ſo vigorous a reſolution as their inclination "prompted them to, ſince this would expoſe their country "to the ravages of the enemy; but that however, underhand, "they would give him all the aſſiſtance in their power. As "to the Ligurians, they added, they were at liberty to act "as they ſhould think proper, ſince the Roman armies were "too remote from their borders to have any influence upon "their councils; and therefore it was but juſt, that they "ſhould openly take part in the war, and ſupply him with "what number of recruits he wanted." The Ligurians being of the ſame ſentiments, provided he allowed them two months time to raiſe men in, every thing ſucceeded according to his deſire; for the Gauls privately ſent him proviſions, and, by virtue of the Carthaginian money, the new levies went on briſkly in Liguria. But, notwithſtanding theſe happy beginnings, Mago met with the ſame fate in Italy, that Aſdrubal had done before in Spain, as will in a ſhort time appear [u].

Scipio takes

Both Scipio, and the Roman ſoldiery, expreſſed great impatience to attack the enemy in the heart of their dominions. The intelligence Lœlius brought from Maſiniſſa, excited the general to this, as the plunder he carried off with him from Africa did the troops. However, they were prevented from under-undertaking this expedition for the preſent, by a ſucceſsful attempt upon the city of Locri. Some workmen, who had ſerved in the Carthaginian garriſon of one of the citadels there, being taken by a Roman party, and brought to Rhegium, offered to deliver up the place to him, provided they received a proper reward for the danger to which they ſhould expoſe themſelves. This being agreed to, the Romans, by the aſſiſtance of theſe traitors, made themſelves maſters of that citadel, in which they were employed; but the Carthaginian garriſon in the other, commanded by one Hamilcar, defended itſelf with great bravery, till Hannibal advanced from the river Butrotus to its relief. Upon his approach, a warm action enſued, and the Romans would have been totally routed, notwithſtanding Scipio came from Maſiniſſa to their aſſiſtance, had not the people of Locri ſupported them; but this happening, and Hannibal being wounded by a ſcorpion, the Carthaginians thought proper to draw off. Scipio, after the action, finding both the town and the other citadel abandoned by the enemy, placed garriſons in them; and then immediately made the proper diſpoſitions for carrying the war into Africa[w].

During theſe tranſactions in Italy, the Carthaginians were under continual apprehenſions of Scipio's making a deſcent in Africa. They had poſted parties on every promontory and hill bordering upon the ſea, to give them notice of the firſt appearance of the enemy, and were filled with terror upon the arrival of every expreſs, for fear he ſhould bring news of the enemy's landing. In this diſtreſs, it was the general opinion, that all poſſible attempts ſhould be made to detach Syphax from the Roman intereſt; ſince both the ſenate and people thought, that a proſpect of aſſiſtance from him would be the chief inducement to the Romans to invade their dominions in Africa. In order to accompliſh this, a lucky incident intervened: Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, who was at Syphax's court with Scipio, in order to negotiate an alliance with that prince, had a daughter of exquiſite charms named Sophoniſba. At that time Aſdrubal offered this young lady in marriage to Syphax, thinking this would be a means of uniting him with the Carthaginians. He therefore now, with the ſame view, waited again upon Syphax; and having inflamed him with a deſcription of the beauty he was to have for his conſort, ſent for her thither from Carthage, to haſten the marriage. Amongſt other things, it was ſtipulated on this occaſion, that an offenſive and defenſive league ſhould be concluded betwixt him and the the Carthaginians, in consequence of which he should assist them with all his forces. Asdrubal, not satisfied with this, as being no stranger to the alliance he had formerly entered into with Rome, nor of the variable temper of the African barbarians, thought proper to put him upon a measure, which would prevent Scipio's landing in Africa, and consequently hinder a future union betwixt him and the Romans. Whilst therefore he was in his first amorous transports, the Carthaginian, by means of his daughter's soothing arts and endearments, prevailed upon him to write a letter to Scipio in Sicily to the following effect: "That, as he had married Asdru-

" bal's daughter, his interest was inseparable from that of " the Carthaginians; that, besides this, he had concluded a " solemn treaty with that nation; that he therefore advised " him not to set his foot in Africa, because, in such case, he " could not dispense with being neutral; that, if he offered
" to move with his army to Carthage, he should find himself
" obliged, both out of regard to his own native country,
" and that of his wife, to oppose him with all his forces."
This letter did not however produce the desired effect; for Scipio having, in answer to it, admonished him "to take " care how he violated the laws of hospitality with him, and
" the engagements entered into with the people of Rome," set sail with a formidable force for Africa, and landed at the Fair Promontory without opposition [x].

It is intimated by Appian, that Sophonisba was betrothed to Masinissa, who was educated at Carthage, and a prince of the finest accomplishments. Animated by the passion he nourished for a lady of such attractive charms, according to the same author, he eminently distinguished himself on all occasions in Spain against the Romans; but this poor prince being stripped of his kingdom, and not in a condition, as was apprehended, to give any considerable assistance to the Carthaginians, Sophonisba, for the reason hinted at above, though in defiance of justice, honour, and public faith, was given to Syphax. Livy is silent as to this particular, though that seems to us no sufficient argument against the probability of it; since Masinissa's future long uninterrupted fidelity to the Romans, is a proof, that he was of a noble disposition, and therefore could not abandon his first friends the Carthaginians without some grievous provocation. Possibly the Roman man hiſtorian's great regard for his hero Scipio, whoſe character, he might think, would a little ſuffer by a true relation of this fact, prevailed upon him to omit it. Be that as it will, Maſiniſſa ever afterwards bore an implacable hatred to the Carthaginians, and contributed not a little to the deſtruction of their republic, as will moſt evidently appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory. But to proceed to the war in Africa[y]:

The Carthaginians turn into a great conſternation upon the news of Scipio's landing in Africa.

As the Carthaginians had ſeen no Roman army in Africa for fifty years paſt, the alarm that Scipio's deſcent occaſioned over the whole country, was inexpreſſible. Wherever that general moved, he ſcattered terror. The inhabitants of the open country retired into the towns with their effects; and Carthage in particular was extremely crouded on this melancholy occaſion. The gates there were ſhut in the utmoſt hurry, detachments poſted upon the ramparts to defend them, and parties ordered to patrol every night all over the city, to prevent a ſurprize; in ſhort, the ſame diſpoſitions were made, as would have been proper in caſe of an immediate ſiege. They had no commander of any repute, but Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, who had been defeated by Scipio in Spain, and was as unequal to that general in his military capacity, as his raw, undiſciplined troops were incapable of oppoſing the Roman legionaries. Being appriſed of Scipio's arrival at Utica, with his fleet and land-forces, they detached Hanno, a young Carthaginian nobleman, to obſtruct his landing, with a body of five hundred horſe; who, falling in with a detachment of the Roman cavalry, ſent by Scipio out to plunder, immediately attacked them; but, after a ſhort diſpute, he was cut off, with a conſiderable number of his men, and the reſt diſperſed. After this action, Scipio laid the country waſte to the very gates of Carthage; and poſſeſſed himſelf of an opulent city in the neighbourhood of that place, which he pillaged, and made eight thouſand of its principal citizens priſoners. Theſe firſt inſtances of ſucceſs greatly heightened the confuſion, that had before begun to reign in Carthage, eſpecially when it was known there, that Maſiniſſa had joined Scipio with a body of two hundred, or, as others ſay, two thouſand, Numidian horſe. In this laſt article we have followed Livy; but, according to Appian, Aſdrubal and Syphax greatly careſſed Maſiniſſa at this time, in order to prevent the junction of his forces and the Romans, though, at the ſame time, they they had resolved upon his destruction, as soon as Scipio should be driven out of Africa. This, continues the same author, Masiniſſa was not ignorant of, though, in order to overcome them at their own weapons, he pretended to be entirely reconciled to those two commanders, having been before at variance with them, for the reason above assigned. However, he privately informed Scipio of all their motions and designs. We might here give our readers an account of the family of Masiniſſa, as well as of the principal events that had happened to him before this period, together with a description of the kingdom his father governed; but all this we chuse to reserve for the history of Numidia [z].

Masiniſſa defeats Hanno.

In the room of the horse lately cut to pieces, or taken prisoners, a new and more numerous body of cavalry was raised with all possible expedition, and the command of it given to another Hanno, the son of Hamilcar, who advanced towards Utica, to observe the enemy's motions. But being too weak to undertake any thing against them, or even to prevent the adjacent country from being pillaged, he thought proper to remain inactive, till he was reinforced by some new levies, that his officers were making both in the Carthaginian territories, and those of the neighbouring princes independent of them. At last, finding his troops to amount to four thousand men, he took post in a town called Salera, fifteen miles from the Roman camp. Out of this place, Masiniſſa, who was sent to Salera, with a detachment of horse, by Scipio, for that purpose, found means to draw him; and then, in conjunction with a choice body of Roman cavalry, commanded by Scipio himself, that lay in ambuscade, charged him with such vigour, that he was put to flight, a thousand of his men falling in the action, and two thousand being either killed or taken prisoners in the pursuit. Most authors relate, that Hanno was slain; but Cœlius and Valerius Antias affirm, that he fell into the enemy's hands. After this, Scipio put a garrison into Salera, and pushed on the siege of Utica. In the mean time Asdrubal assembled an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; but durst not approach the enemy, till the arrival of Syphax, who soon joined him with an army of fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. Scipio, being informed of this junction, raised the siege of Utica, Utica, after he had carried it on ineffectually for the space of forty days, and fixed his winter-quarters in such a manner, as to fear no insults of the enemy. This a little revived the drooping spirits of the Carthaginians, who now saw their own forces, in conjunction with those of Syphax their ally, superior to the Romans in the field [a].

State of affairs in Italy.

In Italy this year, Hannibal gained an advantage over the consul Sempronius; but was himself soon after defeated by that general. The loss the Carthaginians sustained on this occasion, was above four thousand of their men killed on the field of battle, about three hundred taken prisoners, besides forty horses, and seven standards, that fell into the victors hands. Hannibal, upon this disaster, retired with his army to Croton. The other consul Cethegus in the mean time kept Etruria in awe, and prevented Mago from approaching his brother Hannibal. As the Etruscans were generally disposed to a revolt, and kept a close correspondence with Mago, Cethegus found it a difficult matter to execute the province assigned him. The Brutians, hearing of the great success of Scipio in Africa, for the most part abandoned the Carthaginian interest. Some of Hannibal's garrisons amongst them they put to the sword, others they expelled; and in many places, where they could not openly declare for the Romans, they found means to inform the senate of their aversion to the Carthaginians. In the mean time Hannibal came to Petilia, and expostulated with the citizens upon their sending ministers to Rome; but pretended to be satisfied with their conduct, when they strenuously denied this charge. However, to cut off all future grounds of suspicion, he put the principal inhabitants under arrest, committing them to the care of a guard of Numidians; and, disarming the citizens, left the defence of the place to the slaves. He treated other cities likewise with equal severity, Thurii in particular, with its district, which he gave up to his soldiers to be plundered, sparing only three thousand of the citizens, and five hundred peasants, whom he knew to be closely attached to the Carthaginians. These he transplanted to Croton, where he fixed his head-quarters, erected his principal magazine, and took care effectually to cover it from all attempts of the Romans [b].

Scipio routs Syphax and Asdrubal.

SCIPIO having fortified his camp, the Carthaginians, notwithstanding their superiority, could find no opportunity of attacking him; so that both sides continued in a state of inaction, till the return of the spring. During the winter, Scipio attempted to draw off Syphax from the Carthaginians, but without effect. However, that prince offered to act in quality of mediator beween the contending powers, provided Scipio would agree to this preliminary, viz. that both parties should recall their armies home; which, he intimated, would serve as a basis for a future treaty, and effectually secure the repose of their respective dominions. This proposal the Roman general, at first, rejected; but afterwards seemed to listen to it, in order to amuse the enemy, till he could find an opportunity of carrying his point. During the negotiation, Scipio was informed, that the Carthaginian camp, which consisted chiefly of wooden barracks, covered with boughs, was but very slightly fortified; and that the Numidian quarters, which were at some distance from the other, were entirely defenceless, the soldiers being only covered with mats, hurdles, dry leaves, and other suchlike combustible materials. To which his spies added, that the troops observed no order or discipline, but lay in a careless manner without their trenches. This intelligence excited him to attempt forcing their camp by some stratagem, since he found himself too weak to come to a pitched battle with them, especially as the spot they were encamped upon was a smooth and open plain, extremly proper for their cavalry, much superior to that of the Romans, to act in. Having maturely weighed these particulars, he sent embassadors to the camp, to renew, as was given out, the conferences, but in reality to make such discoveries, as would favour the execution of his scheme. These embassadors were attended by some of his veteran soldiers, disguised like slaves, who had orders to move about the camp, and observe all the avenues leading to and from it, its form and situation, how far Asdrubal was from Syphax, how all the posts were occupied, and whether it would be easier to surprise it in the day-time, or by night. Having informed himself of all these particulars, he immediately broke off the conferences, letting Syphax know, "That as his officers had, in a council of "war, declared themselves averse to all pacific measures, "and pressed him to push on the war with vigour, he "found himself obliged, in compliance with their desire, "to pursue the military operations." Such a declaration could could not but extremely mortify both Asdrubal and Syphax, who looked upon the treaty to be as good as concluded. However, they soon recovered themselves, and resolved to draw, if possible, the enemy out into the plain, where, they doubted not, they should be able to give a good account of them; or, if they should fail in the execution of this project, their intention was to besiege their camp both by sea and land; which they imagined themselves capable of doing. But Scipio took his measures so well, that he surprised them in the manner already related. Lælius and Masiniſſa burnt Syphax's camp, as Scipio himself did that of Asdrubal. Their army was entirely ruined, only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, with the two commanders, escaping out of so great a multitude. According to Livy, this complete victory was, in a great measure, owing to the wise dispositions of Masiniſſa. The scene exhibited on this melancholy occasion, Polybius tells us, was inconceivably dreadful; which indeed may easily be admitted, if we consider the terrible havock made of the Carthaginian and Numidian troops. Appian relates, that Syphax, having, some time before, shamefully abandoned the Carthaginians, when he had advanced as far as Utica to their assistance, under the pretext of repelling a foreign invasion, returned soon after to succour them, and endeavoured to bring over Masiniſſa, by promising to give him which of his three daughters he pleased, and to fix him on the throne of the Masæsyli. The same author tells us, that Scipio offered sacrifices to the deities Audacia and Pavor, that his troops might behave with bravery, and not be struck with any panic terrors in the night, since they were then to begin the attack. Asdrubal made his escape to Anda, where he rallied the remains of his shattered army, consisting chiefly of mercenaries and Numidians; and having, by his own authority, presented a good number of slaves with their freedom, and joined them to the others, he formed a considerable corps. Syphax retired to an advantageous post, about eight miles from the field of battle, which he possessed himself of. Appian relates, that Asdrubal was condemned to be crucified for his ill success; which is improbable, if what Livy says be true, viz. that, soon after the last disaster, he went to Carthage, in order to prevent the senate and suffetes from coming into any pacific measures. Be that as it will, the suffetes having convened the senate, three motions were made: first, that embassadors should be sent to Scipio, to treat of a peace with that general; ſecondly, that Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy; thirdly, that, in imitation of the Roman reſolution in adverſity, they ſhould depend upon themſelves, and their allies, for the defence of their country, and therefore immediately reinforce their army, and apply to Syphax for further ſuccours. This laſt, being backed by Aſdrubal, and the Barchine faction, was carried; in conſequence of which, the new levies went on briſkly, and miniſters were diſpatched in all haſte to Syphax, who was prevailed upon, by the entreaties and endearments of his beloved Sophoniſba, to join Aſdrubal with a large body of forces. In the mean time Scipio advanced to the walls of Carthage, and offered the citizens battle; which they thought proper to decline. As ſoon as Aſdrubal had left Anda, it ſurrendered to the Romans. Two other towns of note likewiſe in that neighbourhood, which pretended to make reſiſtance, Scipio carried by aſſault, and gave them up to his ſoldiers to be plundered. After this, he ſet down again before Utica, and puſhed on the ſiege of that place with the utmoſt vigiour. In the mean time Aſdrubal and Syphax, being joined by a good number of Celtiberian troops, upon a review of their army, found it to amount to thirty thouſand ſtrong, with which they moved towards Scipio, in order to attack him. That general, having received intelligence of their approach, and left a ſufficient number of troops to defend his lines, roſe from before Utica, and advanced to meet them. The Roman army was diſpoſed in the uſual manner. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal poſted his Carthaginian forces in the right wing, Syphax, with his Numidians, in the left, and the Celtiberians in the centre. The Carthaginians and Numidians were routed at the firſt onſet; but the Celtiberians, being animated by deſpair, fought with ſuch reſolution, that they were almoſt all to a man killed upon the ſpot. As Scipio had treated them with the utmoſt lenity after their late revolt, they were ſenſible the black ingratitude to him, they were now guilty of, deſerved no mercy, if they fell into his hands; and finding it impoſſible to eſcape by flight, they reſoved to die in the field. The obſtinacy with which they, for ſome time, maintained the diſpute, gave many of the Carthaginians and Numidians an opportunity of ſaving themſelves, who muſt otherwiſe have been inevitably cut off. The day after the battle, Scipio detached Lælius and Maſiniſſa, with the horſe and light-armed troops, to purſue Syphax

and Asdrubal; whilst he himself, with the main body, reduced most of the towns in the neighbourbood of Carthage [c].

THE Carthaginians now looked upon their condition as desperate, expecting every moment to be besieged by Scipio with his victorious army. They therefore repaired the wall of the city, filled their magazines, and made all the other necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence. In the mean time the garrison of Tunes abandoned that city at Scipio's approach. Soon after the loss of this place, the Carthaginians sent a squadron of galleys to destroy the Roman fleet in the port of Utica; which they might have easily effected, had they not put into the harbour of Ruscino by the way, and staid a whole night there; which, together with their slow sailing, and the useless precaution of drawing up their fleet in order of battle, as though they had been to engage some formidable enemy, gave the Romans an opportunity of frustrating, in a great measure, their design. The great consternation the Carthaginians were thrown into by their late losses, prevented them from pursuing this enterprize with the expedition necessary to render it successful, since they imagined the Romans to be invincible by sea, as well as by land. However, they carried off six of the enemy's galleys; which, in the present situation of affairs, elated them as much, as formerly an important victory would have done. We are told by Appian, that Hamilcar, the Carthaginian admiral, surprising the Roman fleet at Utica, took one trireme, and six transports; that, immediately after this, Hanno, with a body of forces, attempted to raise the siege of Utica; but was repulsed with considerable loss; that however, Scipio, being tired with the long siege, or rather blockade, of that place, transported all his military machines to Hippo; and that having ineffectually played them upon that city likewise, he burnt them all as useless, ravaged some parts of the neighbouring provinces, and entered into an alliance with others. The same author likewise intimates, that the Carthaginians attempted to corrupt the Iberian troops in the Roman service; but without success, their indirect practices being discovered to Scipio by the aruspices at repeated sacrifices. We might here give our readers all the particulars, besides those already mentioned,

The Carthaginians ſue to Scipio for peace.

IMMEDIATELY after the laſt defeat, the ſenate and ſuffetes of Carthage came to a reſolution to recall Hannibal from Italy, upon whoſe veteran troops, and their fleet, together with the powerful aſſiſtance of Syphax, they were convinced, their preſervation did abſolutely depend. Their fleet therefore having, in the main, failed in the important enterprize above-mentioned, Syphax being taken priſoner, his country conquered, and Hannibal as yet at a great diſtance, they had no other reſource left, than to ſue to Scipio for peace. To this they were farther excited, by the general's encamping again at Tunes, within ſight of their capital. They therefore deputed thirty of their principal ſenators, who were ſelected for that purpoſe out of the centumvirate, to wait upon Scipio. Being introduced into the Roman general's tent, they all threw themſelves proſtrate on the earth, kiſſed his feet, (in conformity, as Livy obſerves, to the practice of their anceſtors the Tyrians) and ſpoke to him in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms. They accuſed Hannibal, and the Barchine faction, as the authors of all their calamities; they confeſſed themſelves to have broken the peace concluded betwixt them and the Romans, and that they deſerved whatever puniſhment that nation ſhould think proper to inflict upon them. They begged however, that their city, which had twice merited deſtruction, by the temerity of its citizens, might remain a monument of the Roman clemency, promiſing at the ſame time an implicit obedience to his commands. Scipio replied, "That though he "had come into Africa, not for peace, but conqueſt, "which he had, in a manner, effected, yet, that all na- "tions might ſee the ſtrict juſtice of the Romans, both in "undertaking and concluding their wars, he would grant "them a peace upon the following terms:" that they ſhould deliver all the Roman priſoners and deſerters to him; that they ſhould recall their armies out of Italy and Gaul; that they ſhould never ſet foot again in Spain; that they ſhould retire out of all the iſlands between Italy and Africa; that they ſhould put the victors in poſſeſſion of all their ſhips, twenty only excepted, which they ſhould be allowed to keep for for their own uſe; laſtly, that they ſhould give to the Romans five hundred thouſand buſhels of wheat, three hundred thouſand of barley, and pay five thouſand talents, or, as others will have it, five thouſand pound weight of ſilver. He gave them three days to conſider of theſe conditions; which they feigned a compliance with, in order to gain time till Hannibal's arrival. A truce being granted the Carthaginians, they immediately ſent deputies to Rome, and at the ſame time diſpatched an expreſs to Hannibal, to haſten his return to Africa. Appian intimates, that, beſides the articles above-mentioned, Scipio inſiſted upon a compliance with the two following: that Maſiniſſa ſhould not only keep poſſeſſion of his own kingdom, but as many of Syphax's territories, as he ſhould be able to conquer; and that the Carthaginians ſhould not extend their dominions beyond the Foſſa Punica. But theſe, and other points, wherein that author differs from Livy and Polybius, ſeem not ſo agreeable to truth, as what has been tranſmitted to poſterity by thoſe two celebrated hiſtorians [e].

Mago overthrown in Inſubria.

DURING theſe tranſactions, Mago advanced into Inſubria, where he met with the Roman forces under the command of M. Cornelius and P. Quintilius Varus. A general action ſoon happened between the two armies, wherein the Carthaginians were defeated. However, Aſdrubal's elephants, by their noiſe, ſmell, terrible appearance, &c. with the Numidian horſe, ſo puſhed the Roman cavalry, and his Carthaginian infantry charged the legionaries with ſuch bravery, that, had his corps de reſerve, which conſiſted of Gauls, done their duty againſt the triarii, the Romans muſt have been overthrown. Mago performed the part of a conſummate general, diſtinguiſhing himſelf greatly throughout the whole action; but being wounded in the thigh, he was obliged to be carried out of the battle, which threw his troops into ſuch confuſion, that a good part of them betook themſelves to flight. Five thouſand Carthaginians fell on the field of battle, and eighteen of their ſtandards were taken. But this victory coſt the Romans dear; for they loſt two thouſand three hundred men, beſides the beſt part of the twelfth legion. Mago, after having made an excellent retreat by favour of the night, returned into the country of the Ingauni, which was one of the maritime parts of Liguria, where he met a courier bringing him orders

ders to return directly to Carthage. The Ligurians, being informed of this, received the Romans with open arms; and Mago, embarking his troops, immediately set sail for Carthage; but his wound growing worse, upon his arrival on the coast of Sardinia, he expired [f].

Hannibal recalled from Italy.

THE Romans being thus every-where victorious, Consentia, Uffugium, Vergæ, Besidiæ, Hetriculum, Syphæum, Argentanum, Dampetia, and other towns of less note in Brutium, opened their gates to the consul Cn. Servilius. This was the situation of affairs, when Hannibal was commanded to return to Africa. Valerius Antias wrote, that, just before his departure, Hannibal was defeated by Servilius not far from Croton, and that, on this occasion, he lost five thousand men. But Livy, partial as he is, looks upon this as little better than a downright fiction. When the messengers from Africa informed Hannibal of the senate's pleasure, he expressed the utmost concern and indignation, groaning, gnashing his teeth, and being scarce able to refrain from tears. "Now, said he, those persons, "who have long endeavoured to drag me out of Italy, "by denying me proper supplies, send me direct and ex-"plicit orders to return home. Hannibal is not vanquished "by the Romans, but by the senate of Carthage. Scipio "has not so much reason to exult and plume himself at "my being forced from Italy, as Hanno, who, for want "of other means of effecting it, has completed the ruin "of my family by the destruction of Carthage." As he had foreseen what would happen, he had prepared a proper number of vessels to transport his forces to Africa; which he did, after having massacred a body of Italian troops, that refused to accompany him, in the temple of Juno Lacinia. Such an instance of cruelty, at that time, was not so much to be wondered at, since Hannibal must have been exasperated almost to madness to see himself thus forced to quit a country he had been so long contending for. Never banished man, according to Livy, shewed so much regret in leaving his native country, as Hannibal did in going out of that of the enemy. He often turned his eyes wishfully to Italy, accusing gods and men for his misfortunes, and calling down a thousand curses, if we will credit the same author, upon himself, for his not having after ter the battle of Cannæ, advanced to the walls of Rome at the head of his army, ſtill reeking with the blood of its citizens. Appian writes that Aſdrubal, the Carthaginian admiral, committed unparrallelled cruelties in all the cities allied with Carthage, before Hannibal's departure, permitting his men to raviſh their virgins and matrons, and behaving in all reſpects to them, as the moſt inhuman enemy does to the inhabitants of all towns carried by aſſault. But as Livy, whoſe authority, in the main, we prefer to that of Appian, is ſilent as to this particular, we own ourſelves inclined to pay no great regard to it [g].

The Carthaginians break the truce Scipio granted them.

THE Carthaginian embaſſadors, about this time, arrived at Rome, where they met with but a very indifferent reception. The conſcript fathers, greatly diſſatisfied with the excuſes made by theſe embaſſadors, in vindication of their republic, and the ridiculous offer of their adhering, in its name, to the treaty of Lutatius, thought proper to refer the deciſion of the whole to Scipio, who, being upon the ſpot, could beſt judge what ſuited the welfare of the ſtate. However, the Romans plainly diſcovered, from the conduct of their miniſters on this occaſion, as well as the recalling of their troops home, that, notwithſtanding their pretended deſire of peace, the Carthaginians would be averſe to an accommodation, as ſoon as they received intelligence of Hannibal's landing in Africa. They were confirmed in the ſentiments they had entertained, by the news, which in a few days, arrived at Rome, viz. that the Carthaginians, in violation of the truce which they themſelves had ſo earneſtly deſired, had ſeized a great number of ſhips on the coaſt of Africa, near the iſland Ægimurus, and even attacked the galley that carried the Roman embaſſadors to Carthage, in the river Bagrada, within ſight of Scipio's camp. Such a procedure could not but exaſperate the two nations one againſt the other more than ever; the Romans, from the ſtrong deſire they muſt have had to revenge ſo black a perfidy; and the Carthaginians, from a perſuaſion, that they were not now to expect a peace. For the particulars of thoſe infamous actions, as well as Scipio's great generoſity and politeneſs to the Carthaginian embaſſadors, notwithſtanding ſuch a flagrant grant violation of the law of nations, we must refer our readers to the Roman history [h].

Hannibal makes proposals of peace to Scipio.

HANNIBAL had no sooner landed in Africa, than he sent out parties to get provisions for the army, and buy horses to remount the cavalry. He entered into a league with the regulus of the Areacidæ, a Numidian tribe not far from Adrumetum. Four thousand of Syphax's horse, then in the service of Masiniſſa, came over in a body to him; but as he did not think it proper to repose any confidence in them, he put them all to the sword, and distributed their horses amongst his troops. Vermina, one of Syphax's sons, and Mesetulus, another Numidian prince, likewise joined him with a very considerable body of horse. Most of the fortresses in Masiniſſa's kingdom either surrendered to him upon the first summons, or were taken by storm. Narce, a city of considerable note there, he made himself master of by a stratagem. Tychæus, a Numidian regulus, and faithful ally of Syphax, whose territories were famous for an excellent breed of horses, reinforcing him also much about the same time with two thousand of his best cavalry, Hannibal advanced to Zama, a town about five days march from Carthage, where he encamped. He thence sent out spies to observe the posture of the Romans. These being brought to Scipio, he was so far from inflicting any punishment upon them, which he might have done by the rules of war, that he commanded them to be led about the Roman camp, in order to take an exact survey of it, and then dismissed them. Hannibal, admiring the noble assurance of his rival, sent a messenger to desire an interview with him; which by means of Masiniſſa he obtained. The two generals therefore, escorted by equal detachments of horse, met at Nadagara, where, by the assistance of two interpreters, they held a private conference. Hannibal, after having flattered Scipio in the most refined and artful manner, and expatiated upon all those topics, that he thought could influence that general to grant his nation a peace upon tolerable terms, told him that the Carthaginians would willingly confine themselves to Africa, since such was the will of the gods, in order to procure a lasting peace, whilst the Romans would be at liberty to extend their conquests to the remotest nations.

tions. He farther added, that, with regard to the ſincerity of his intentions, ſince the Romans had lately, not without reaſon, ſuſpected the Punic faith, he deſired him to be fully convinced of it, and to reſt aſſured, that the ſame conſtant and uniform diſpoſition Hannibal had ſhewn in the proſecution of this bloody war, as long as the gods permitted it, would as eminently appear in the ſtrict obſervation of a future peace; and that the Romans had the leſs reaſon to doubt of this, as the intereſt of the Carthaginians itſelf rendered ſuch a conduct on their part abſolutely neceſſary. Scipio anſwered, That the Romans were not prompted by ambition, or any ſiniſter views, to undertake either the former or preſent war againſt the Carthaginians, but by juſtice, and a proper regard for their allies; that the Carthaginians had, before his arrival in Africa, not only made him the ſame propoſals, but likewiſe agreed to pay the Romans five thouſand talents of ſilver, reſtore all the Roman priſoners without ranſom, and deliver up all their galleys; that the late perfidious actions of the Carthaginians ought to be ſo far from procuring them more favourable terms, that the Romans thought themſelves authorized from thence to impoſe more rigorous conditions upon them; which if he would ſubmit to, then a peace would enſue; if not, the deciſion of the diſpute betwixt them muſt be entirely left to the ſword [i].

THIS conference betwixt two of the greateſt generals the world ever produced thus ending without ſucceſs, they both retired to their reſpective camps, where they informed their troops, that not only the fate of Rome and Carthage, but that of the whole world, was to be determined by them the next day. Accordingly in the morning, both commanders drew up their armies in order of battle; and, after endeavouring to animate their men to make their utmoſt efforts, by all the motives to bravery that could be offered, they advanced towards each other with great reſolution in the plains of Zama. Scipio poſted the haſtati, divided into ſmall battalions, with proper ſpaces between them, in front; after them, the principes divided in the ſame manner; and the rear was brought up by the triarii. The Italian horſe, under the conduct of Lælius, he placed in the left wing; and the Numidian, commanded by Maſiniſſa, in the right.

By

By this disposition, which differed some thing from that which the Romans usually made, a proper precaution was taken against the violence of the enemy's elephants, which would otherwise have undoubtedly borne down the principes. He ordered his light-armed troops, who were to begin the fight, to retire into the void spaces between the battalions, if they found themselves overcharged by the enemy, or pushed by their elephants, the most expeditious part of them continuing their retreat, till they came behind the army, thereby giving an opportunity to their wounded, or more slow companions, of saving themselves in the interval between the hastati and principes, or that between the principes and triarii. Hannibal, on the other side, posted his elephants, eighty in number, in front; behind them he placed his vanguard, consisting of Ligurian, Gallic, Balearic, and Mauritanian mercenaries; then followed the main battle, composed of four thousand Africans and native Carthaginians, sustained by a body of four thousand Macedonian veterans, sent him by king Philip; and, at a furlong's distance from them, moved those brave troops, that had served under him in Italy, forming his rear, in whom he reposed his chief confidence. The Carthaginian cavalry were opposed to Lælius; and the Numidian, under Tychæus, Mesetulus, &c. to Masiniſſa [k].

The battle of Zama.

SOME time before the beginning of the action, the Numidian horse on both sides skirmished with inconsiderable loss. After which, pursuant to Hannibal's orders, the elephants advanced against the enemy; but those distributed in the left wing, being frightened by the sound of the trumpets, and the other martial music, fell foul upon their own Numidian horse, and put them into disorder. Masiniſſa immediately took advantage of this confusion, and, without giving them time to recover themselves, charged them with such fury, that he drove them out of the field. The elephants, that attacked the Roman light-armed troops, being likewise repulsed, and many of them wounded, recoiled in like manner upon the Carthaginian horse posted in the right wing, and made such an impression upon them, that they met with the same rough treatment from Lælius, that the Numidians had before done from Masiniſſa. In the mean time the infantry on both sides engaged with unparallelled bravery. Hannibal's mercenaries at first repulsed pulſed the legionaries; but theſe laſt, being duly ſupported by the principes, not only recovered themſelves, but routed the mercenaries, and puſhed them on the Carthaginians; which occaſioned the defeat of both bodies, and, in a great meaſure, determined victory to declare for the Romans. The corps de reſerve, formed of Hannibal's veterans, that had ſerved under him in Italy, behaved with inexpreſſible intrepidity and reſolution; but Lælius and Maſiniſſa, returning from the defeat of the enemy's horſe, bore down all before them, and obliged this phalanx, which before ſeemed impenetrable, to give way. They were therefore put to the rout, and the ground ſtrewed with their dead bodies, moſt of them being killed either in the battle or the purſuit. Appian relates, that, during the heat of the action, Hannibal firſt engaged Scipio, and afterwards Maſiniſſa, in ſingle combat, wherein he had the advantage. According to the ſame author, the Carthaginians had twenty-five thouſand men ſlain, and eight thouſand taken priſoners. Livy and Polybius affirm, that twenty thouſand of Hannibal's men were killed, and as many taken priſoners; as likewiſe, that an hundred and thirty ſtandards fell into the enemy's hands. Some ſay, the Romans loſt only two thouſand men; others, that two thouſand five hundred Romans, and a greater number of Maſiniſſa's ſoldiers, fell in this engagment. Be that as it will, Scipio got a complete victory, and made himſelf maſter of Hannibal's camp, where he found ten talents of gold, two thouſand five hundred of ſilver, and an immenſe quantity of other booty. All the remarkable particulars of this action, omitted here, our readers will find in a former part of this work [1].

Hannibal's excelent conduct at that battle.

HANNIBAL, having eſcaped to Thon, was ſoon joined by ſome Brutian and Spaniſh fugitives, who had been too ſwift for their purſuers; but not caring to truſt himſelf in their hands, he fled privately to Adrumetum. The ſurpriſing military genius of that moſt renowned general never more eminently diſplayed itſelf than at the battle of Zama, as we learn from Polybius, who greatly celebrates his conduct on that occaſion. Scipio himſelf likewiſe, according to Livy, paſſed an high encomium upon him, on account of his uncommon capacity in taking advantages, the excellent arrangement arrangement of his forces, and the manner in which he gave his orders during the engagement; but being vaſtly inferior to the enemy in horſe, and the ſtate of Carthage obliging him, at no ſmall diſadvantage, to hazard a battle with the Romans, he met with the fate above-mentioned. Some conſolation however it muſt have been to him to hear, that Scipio not only approved of his conduct, but openly declared, that he outſhined himſelf in this glorious, though unfortunate, action [m].

A peace concluded between the Romans and Carthaginians.

THE ſenate of Carthage, hearing of Hannibal's arrival at Adrumetum, diſpatched meſſengers to him, with orders to return to Carthage. He obeyed theſe orders, and adviſed his countrymen to conclude a peace with the Romans upon the terms they ſhould think proper to preſcribe them. To this they were the more ſtrongly excited by the news they received of a defeat given Vermina, the ſon of Syphax, their ally. This blow was very conſiderable, fifteen thouſand of that prince's men being laid dead on the field of battle, twelve hundred made priſoners, and fifteen hundred Numidian horſes, together with ſeventy-two military enſigns, taken. After this overthrow, the Carthaginians ſent ten of their principal citizens, as embaſſadors, to implore Scipio's clemency, who told them, with a haughty air, That they might meet with him at Tunes. However, thirty Carthaginian ſenators, ſelected out of the centumvirate, waiting upon Scipio, and ſuing for peace in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms, that general thought proper to dictate to them the following conditions: 1. The Carthaginians ſhall be governed by their own laws, and remain in poſſeſſion of all their African dominions. 2. The Carthaginians ſhall deliver up to the Romans all their deſerters, fugitive ſlaves, priſoners of war, and all the Italians, whom Hannibal forced to follow him. 3. This ſhall be done within thirty days after the treaty is ſigned. 4. They ſhall alſo deliver up all their ſhips of war, except ten triremes, and all their tame elephants, and ſhall train up no more of thoſe animals for the ſervice. 5. The ſenate and people of Carthage ſhall not engage in any war, without the conſent of the Romans. 6. They ſhall ſupply the Roman troops with corn, and pay their auxiliaries, till the return of the embaſſadors they ſhall ſend to Rome. 7. They ſhall pay the Romans, in the ſpace of fifty years, ten thouſand Euboic

boic talents, at equal payments. 8. They ſhall deliver up to Scipio an hundred ſuch hoſtages as he ſhall chuſe, the youngeſt of whom ſhall not be under fourteen, and oldeſt above thirty years of age. 9. Neither the peace nor truce ſhall take place, till the Carthaginians have reſtored to the Romans the ſhips and effects taken from them during the laſt truce. 10. The Roman armies ſhall leave Africa within fifty days after the concluſion of the treaty. 11. The Carthaginians ſhall reſtore to Maſiniſſa all they have uſurped from him and his anceſtors, and even enter into an alliance with him. 12. They ſhall never for the future make any levies in Gaul or Liguria. 13. They ſhall aſſiſt the Romans both by ſea and land, whenever they are called upon ſo to do. Theſe terms, which Scipio thought proper to grant the Carthaginians, in caſe the ſenate and people of Rome would ratify them, appeared ſo intolerable to the populace of Carthage, that they threatened to plunder and burn the houſes of the nobility. But Hannibal, having aſſembled a body of ſix thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, at Marthama, prevented an inſurrection, and by his influence, completed the accomodation. However, Giſco, an enemy to the Barchine faction, made a ſpeech to the ſenators, in order to diſſuade them from accepting ſuch a ſhameful peace. Hannibal, being highly incenſed at his preſumption, dragged him from his ſeat: which giving great offence, in order to vindicate, or, at leaſt, to palliate, ſo precipitate an action, Hannibal made an apology for it to the following effect: "As I left your city at nine years of "age, and did not return till after thirty-ſix years abſence, "I had full leiſure to learn the military art, and flatter "myſelf, that I have made good improvement in it; but, "with regard to your conſtitution, it is no wonder that I "am a ſtranger to it, and therefore I muſt deſire you to "inſtruct me in every branch of it." He then inſiſted upon the neceſſity of concluding a peace; adding, "that they "ought to return the gods thanks for having diſpoſed the "Romans to grant them ſuch favourable conditions." He likewiſe repreſented to the ſenators the importance of uniting in their ſuffrages; intimating, that it might be of fatal conſequence to the ſtate, if, by their diviſions, they ſhould throw more weight into the popular ſcale, which already did but too much preponderate. That whole venerable aſſembly therefore, in order to prevent the people from taking

ſuch an affair under their cognizance, came over to his opinion, and the terms propoſed by Scipio were accepted. Ample ſatisfaction having been made the Romans for the outrages offered their miniſters, and the infraction of the late truce, the Carthaginians diſpatched an embaſſy, at the head of which was Aſdrubal, ſurnamed Hædus, or The Kid, to Rome. As he was an irreconcileable enemy to Hannibal and his family, he endeavoured to excuſe the people of Carthage, by imputing the late rupture to the ambition of the Barchine faction, and extolled his own conduct, as well as that of Hanno, towards the Romans. He likewiſe expatiated upon the generoſity, magnanimity, wiſdom, and humanity of the Romans; whilſt his companions endeavoured to move the ſenate to compaſſion, by exhibiting to their view the calamitous ſtate of Carthage in the moſt lively colours. By theſe methods of perſuaſion, they not only prevailed upon the conſcript fathers to grant them their requeſt, but likewiſe to ſend two hundred of their priſoners then at Rome to Scipio, with orders that they ſhould be reſtored, without any pecuniary conſideration, as ſoon as he ſhould receive from the Carthaginians their ratification of the treaty. The late truce for three months, which the Carthaginians obtained of Scipio, upon the return of their embaſſadors, was changed into a perpetual peace, upon the terms that general had preſcribed. They then, in purſuance of the treaty, delivered up to Scipio above five hundred ſhips, all which he burnt in ſight of Carthage, to the inexpreſſible mortification of the inhabitants of that unfortunate city. They likewiſe delivered up into the hands of the Romans all their elephants, all the ſlaves, deſerters, and priſoners of war. The number of theſe laſt amounted to above four thouſand men. Scipio treated both the Latin and Roman deſerters with extreme ſeverity, ordering all the heads of the former to be ſtruck off, and the latter to be crucified. The public funds at Carthage being exhauſted by ſo long and expenſive a war, the ſenate found it vaſtly difficult to raiſe a ſum ſufficient for the payment of the firſt tax impoſed by the treaty. This threw them into a melancholy ſilence, and many could not even refrain from tears. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, laughing on this occaſion, was reproved by Aſdrubal Hœdus, for inſulting his country in this the time of its affliction, which, he inſinuated, was owing to his conduct. Hannibal, in reply, according to the ſame author, ſpoke to that auguſt aſſembly to the following effect: "Were my heart as viſible as my

"coun-

" countenance, you would perceive, that this laughter,
" which has given ſuch offence, flows not from an exceſs of
" joy, but from a mind almoſt diſtracted with the public " calamities; nor is even this laughter ſo unſeaſonable as " your abſurd and indecent tears. Then you ought to have
" wept, when your arms were taken from you, your ſhips
" burnt, and you were prohibited from engaging in any " foreign wars. This was the mortal blow, that laid us
" proſtrate. Do not imagine, that the Romans, out of any " particular averſion to you, have formed a ſcheme for your
" deſtruction. No great city can long enjoy any repoſe.
" If it has no foreign, it will ſoon meet with a domeſtic
" enemy; as the moſt robuſt conſtitutions, when free from " all external morbific cauſes, are borne down by their own
" ſtrength. You are only ſenſible of the public calamities,
" as far as you have a perſonal concern in them; and the
" loſs of your money only gives you the moſt pungent ſor-" row. When therefore Carthage was made the ſpoil of the " victor, when it was left diſarmed and defenceleſs amidſt ſo
" many powerful African nations, who had at that time " taken the field, not a groan, not a ſigh was heard. But " now, when a capitation-tax is demanded, you lament and " bewail, as if all were loſt. Alas! I greatly fear, that the " ſubject of this day's anxiety and concern will ſoon prove
" the leaſt of your misfortunes." Thus ended the ſecond Punic war, one of the moſt remarkable mentioned in hiſtory, both on account of the viciſſitudes of fortune diſcernible in it, and the immenſe quantity of blood and treaſure it occaſioned the conſumption of. Zonaras, from ſome authors not now extant, tells us, it laſted only ſixteen years; but Livy and Polybius, whoſe authority is more to be depended upon, make it to have included eighteen campaigns, and intimate it to have been terminated eighteen years after Hannibal came to a rupture with the Romans [n].

THE year after the concluſion of the laſt treaty, Hamilcar, a Carthaginian captain, left in thoſe parts either by Aſdrubal or Mago, excited the Inſubres, Cœnomani, and the Boii, together with the Sallyi, Ilvates, and other cantons of Liguria, to make an irruption into the territories of the allies of Rome. Of this the ſenate immediately informed the ſtate of of Carthage, threatening at the ſame time to renew the war, if that infringer of the late treaty was not delivered up to them. What anſwer the Carthaginians returned to this menace, we no-where find; but the death of Hamilcar, who was ſoon after killed in a battle he fought with Fulvius Purpureo the prætor, put an end to all farther diſpute betwixt the Carthaginians and the Romans on this head. The peace betwixt Carthage and Rome was ſcarce ſigned, when Maſiniſſa, at the inſtigation of the Romans, unjuſtly made himſelf maſter of part of the Carthaginian dominions in Africa, under pretence, that thoſe territories formerly belonged to his family. The Carthaginians, through the villainous mediation of the Romans, to which, by an article of the late treaty, they were obliged to have recourſe, found themſelves under a neceſſity of ceding thoſe countries to that ambitious prince, and entering into an alliance with him. The good underſtanding afterwards betwixt thoſe two powers continued many years; but at laſt Maſiniſſa, through the intrigues and dark cabals of the Romans, as there is great reaſon to believe, violated the treaties ſubſiſting betwixt him and the Carthaginians, and not a little contributed to the ſubverſion of the African republic, as will ſoon moſt evidently appear [o].

The Carthaginians ſend fifty Euboic talents to Rome, in purſuance of the late treaty.

THE following year, in the conſulate of Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus, the Carthaginians ſent fifty Euboic talents of ſilver to Rome, in purſuance of the late treaty; but the ſilver not being good, the quæſtors refuſed it; and, upon examination, it being found wanting one fourth part, the Carthaginian miniſters were obliged to borrow a ſum of money at Rome, to make up the deficiency. At their requeſt, an hundred of their hoſtages were releaſed, and hopes given them, that the other hundred ſhould ſoon be returned, provided they inviolably adhered to their late engagements. In the mean time, the remaining hoſtages deſiring leave to be removed from Norba, which they repreſented as a place very inconvenient for them to reſide in, the ſenate immediately ſent them to Signia and Ferentinum. From hence they were removed to Setia, where their domeſtics occaſioned a commotion, which had like to have proved of ill conſequence to the Romans; but how this accident affected the ſtate of Carthage, is no-where ſaid. According to Appian, the trade of the Carthaginians began, even at this time, to to flouriſh, notwithſtanding all their ſhipping had ſo lately been, in a manner, deſtroyed. A glaring inſtance this of the ſurpriſing genius of that people for commerce, even in their moſt depreſſed and miſerable condition [p]!

Hannibal reforms ſome abuſes at Carthage, and afterwards flies to Antiochus king of Syria.

NOT long after the tranſactions juſt hinted at, Livy tells us, that one Hamilcar, a Carthaginian general, commanded an army of Gauls, that was defeated by Cethegus; and that this general himſelf was taken priſoner in the action; but whether any, or how many, Carthaginian troops aſſiſted the Gauls on this occaſion, or what influence that event had upon the Carthaginian affairs, hiſtory informs us not. In the mean time Hannibal kept up his credit at Carthage. Notwithſtanding he had failed in the execution of his grand and favourite ſcheme, the republic gave him the command of an army deſtined to act againſt ſome neighbouring African powers; and from Cornelius Nepos it ſeems probable, that he made ſome campaigns after the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war. This gave ſuch umbrage to the Romans, that, notwithſtanding the Carthaginians made them a preſent of a golden crown, and thanked them in a moſt polite manner for the peace they had granted them, they refuſed to releaſe the Carthaginian priſoners ſtill detained in Italy. The ſenate indeed, at the requeſt of the embaſſadors, who came with the compliment to Rome, gave leave to the Carthaginian hoſtages ſtill with them to reſide in what city of Italy they pleaſed; and aſſured the embaſſadors, that this inſtance of their republic's friendſhip was very acceptable to them. But with regard to the priſoners, the conſcript fathers frankly told them, that they could not diſmiſs them, as long as Hannibal, their moſt avowed and inveterate enemy, was at the head of an army in Africa. Upon this remonſtrance, the Carthaginians recalled Hannibal home, and conferred upon him the office of prætor; which ſeems to have been an employment of great conſideration and authority. In this poſt Hannibal behaved ſo as to gain univerſal applauſe. He regulated the finances in ſuch a manner, that, notwithſtanding the deplorable ſtate to which Carthage was reduced, conſiderable ſums were laid up yearly for the public ſervice, after the payment of the tax to the Romans impoſed by the laſt treaty, and all other deductions made. As ſuch a laudable conduct muſt have been founded upon a reformation of many

abuſes, it undoubtedly drew upon him the hatred of many perſons concerned in thoſe abuſes; but neither this, nor the animoſity of the old Hannonian faction, which was far from being extinguiſhed, prevented him from purſuing the meaſures he thought neceſſary for the ſervice of the republic with zeal and reſolution. But he was not ſatisfied with putting the management of the finances upon a good footing. He was equally impatient of rectifying the irregularities, which had crept into the adminiſtration of juſtice. As the judges exerciſed the moſt cruel rapine with impunity, diſpoſing, in an arbitrary manner, of the lives, properties, and reputations of the citizens, without the leaſt controul, ſince they held their offices for life, and mutually ſupported one another, Hannibal reſolved to redreſs ſo crying an evil. He therefore, by his integrity, courage, and popularity acquired thereby, effected the paſſing of a law, whereby it was enacted, that the judges ſhould be choſen annually; with a clauſe, that none ſhould continue in office beyond their year. This ſtep greatly irritated the nobles and grandees, but extremely pleaſed the populace, of Carthage. His reputation and authority amongſt the latter were raiſed to a higher pitch by the method he made uſe of to complete the regulation of the finances above-mentioned. The public revenues had been embezzled by thoſe, who had the management of them, and ſome of the leading men in the city. This obliged the ſenate and ſuffetes to think of levying the annual tribute due to the Romans upon the people; which ſcheme Hannibal prevented from being put in execution, by detecting the frauds of the officers concerned in every branch of the public revenues, as well as the colluſions of thoſe poſſeſſed of the other lucrative poſts. It is no wonder therefore, that perſons of this complexion ſhould exert their utmoſt malice to ruin a man, however laudably diſpoſed to the public, who, they had the aſſurance to pretend, deprived them of their lawful property; for in that light they conſidered their long continued peculation. In order to gratify their reſentment, they excited the Romans to purſue Hannibal to deſtruction. Accordingly C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culleo were ſent to Carthage, as was pretended, to accommodate all differences betwixt the Carthaginians and Maſiniſſa, but, in reality, to ruin Hannibal, who, they aſſerted, carried on a ſecret intelligence with king Antiochus, in order to concert with him the proper meaſures for proſecuting the war againſt the Romans. Hannibal, upon their arrival, notwithſtanding ſtanding their ſpecious pretexts, knew the ſubject of their commiſſion, and thought it prudent to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the times. Having therefore made all the proper diſpoſitions for his departure, in order to blind his country-men, in the duſk of the evening, he went out of the city in a foreign dreſs, attended only by two companions, ignorant of his deſign. That he might travel with the greater expedition, he had before ordered relays at proper places, by the aſſiſtance of which paſſing the Vocanian diſtrict, he arrived at a caſtle, or palace, of his own between Acholla and Thapſus. From hence he was wafted over in a veſſel, that waited for him, to the iſland Cercina. Here he had recourſe to a ſtratagem, to conceal his retreat from Carthage; which had the deſired effect. The populace of Carthage, the morning after his departure, were in a great ferment upon his abandoning the city. Some thought he was fled, others that he had been aſſaſſinated by the Roman faction. However, at laſt time diſcovered the truth, the ſenate receiving certain intelligence, that he had been ſeen in the iſland Cercina. No ſooner did this news come to hand, than the Roman embaſſadors inſiſted upon the Carthaginians making a public declaration of their diſlike of the project he was gone upon. In order to impoſe upon the maſters of ſhips at that time in the iſland Cercina, he gave out, that the republic of Carthage had ſent him their embaſſador to Tyre. Livy tells us, that he was not ſo much affected with the proſpect of his own unhappy fate, as with that of the calamities, which threatened his country. From Cercina he ſteered his courſe for Tyre, where, upon his arrival, he was treated with all the marks of diſtinction due to his exalted merit. After ſtaying ſome days here, he ſet out for Antioch, and had a conference with Antiochus's ſon at Daphne, where he was celebrating ſome ſolemn diverſions. From hence he poſted to Epheſus, where he met with a moſt kind reception from that prince himſelf, whom he determined to enter upon a war with Rome, after he had been, for ſome time, in a fluctuating condition on that head. Tully informs us, that, during his reſidence here, a philoſopher, named Phormio, eſteemed the beſt orator in Aſia, expatiated in an harangue on the duties of a general, and the rules of the military art, before him; which charming the audience, Hannibal was aſked his opinion of it. To which the Carthaginian frankly replied, "That, in his time, he had ſeen many "old dotards, but none that came up to Phormio." Stobæus informs us, that this Phormio was a Stoic philoſopher; and that when he undertook to prove, that a wise man only was fit to be a general, Hannibal laughed, as being convinced, that a skill in martial affairs was to be acquired, not by theory, but by practice. The Carthaginians, being apprehensive, that, by Hannibal's intrigues, they might be embroiled with the Romans, thought proper to send them advice, that he was withdrawn to the court of Antiochus. This news not a little alarmed them; and the king might have turned so lucky an accident greatly to his advantage, had he known how to make a proper use of it [q].

Hannibal endeavours to embroil his countrymen with the Romans, but in vain.

HANNIBAL's constant opinion was, that Italy should be made the seat of the war. To enforce this, he observed to Antiochus, that Italy would supply a foreign invader both with a sufficient quantity of provisions, and a proper number of recruits; and that if the Romans were permitted to transport their Italian forces into any foreign country, no prince or state in the world could make head against them. He offered to sail to Carthage, and did not doubt but he should persuade his countrymen to take up arms against the common enemy, provided the king would trust him with the command of a fleet of an hundred ships, and a body of seventeen thousand land-forces on board. With these troops he proposed to make a descent in some part of Italy; whilst the king himself should assemble a numerous army, and put himself in a condition to advance to his relief, whenever it should be thought convenient. Had this salutary advice been followed, Antiochus would not have been obliged soon after to submit to such conditions of peace as the Romans thought fit to impose upon him. But, notwithstanding that prince's wrong conduct, at first he approved very much of Hannibal's proposal; which induced that general to dispatch one Ariston, a Tyrian, to Carthage, in order to engage the senate there more strongly in his interest. To secure the fidelity of this person, Hannibal made him some valuable presents, after he had furnished him with proper instructions, and promised him great rewards in Antiochus's name, in case he happily executed his commission. Ariston was no sooner arrived at Carthage, than the people began to suspect the errand he came upon. As he associated only with the members of the Barchine faction, the suspicions, that had been been entertained, were turned into a violent preſumption of his guilt; ſo that he was ſeized, and called upon to clear himſelf; but not having the good fortune to do this to the ſatisfaction of the dominant party, great debates aroſe in the ſenate concerning him. Some members of that auguſt aſſembly were for treating him as a ſpy; but others thought this might be a bad precedent, as nothing could be proved directly againſt him; inſinuating further, that as ſuch an action could be conſidered in no other light than as a violation of the laws of hoſpitality, the Tyrians would not fail making repriſals upon the Carthaginians reſiding at Tyre, and other trading cities in their dominions. However, the determination of this affair was deferred till the next day; which gave the crafty Tyrian an opportunity of making his eſcape in the night, after he had fixed, in ſeveral public places, papers, which fully declared the occaſion of his coming to Carthage. The ſenate, to ſhew how religiouſly they intended to obſerve the laſt treaty, immediately ſent advice of this to the Romans [r].

Hannibal confers with Villius and Scipio.

THE Romans, ſoon after the arrival of the expreſs with this news, nominated P. Sulpicius and P. Villius their embaſſadors to Antiochus, ordering them to take Pergamus in their way, that they might confer with Eumenes, who reſided there, a violent enemy of Antiochus. Sulpicius was detained at Pergamus by an indiſpoſition; but Villius, in purſuance of his orders, came to Epheſus, where he found Hannibal. He had many conferences with him, paid him ſeveral viſits, and ſpeciouſly affected to ſhew him a particular eſteem on all occaſions; but his chief aim, by all this inſidious behaviour, was to render him ſuſpected, and leſſen his credit with the king; in which he ſucceeded but too well, as afterwards manifeſtly appeared. This we learn both from Livy and Polybius; the latter of which hiſtorians repreſents this application of Villius to Hannibal as a premeditated deſign, in order to deſtroy his intereſt with king Antiochus; and the former owns, that the affair took the ſame turn as Villius might have had in view by the execution of ſuch a deſign. However, the firſt author, for a very obvious reaſon, tells us, that the only end of Villius's converſation with Hannibal was to ſound that general, and to remove any fears or apprehenſions he might be under from the Romans. Claudius, and the Libri Græci Aciliani, according to Livy, affirmed, that that Scipio was joined with Sulpicius and Villius in this embaſſy, and even tranſmitted to poſterity ſome of the particulars that paſſed in converſation betwixt the Roman miniſters and Hannibal. According to theſe authors, Scipio deſired Hannibal to tell him, who, in his opinion, was the moſt celebrated general in hiſtory. To which the Carthaginian replied, Alexander king of Macedon, becauſe, with an inconſiderable body of troops, he had defeated moſt numerous armies, and extended his conqueſts into countries ſo widely diſtant, that it ſeemed impoſſible for any man even to traverſe them. Being then aſked, who was the next to him, he anſwered, Pyrrhus, who firſt underſtood the art of encamping to advantage; neither did ever any commander, continued he, make a more judicious choice of poſts, or better underſtood how to draw up his forces, or was more happy in conciliating the affections and favour of mankind to him, as evidently appeared from the diſpoſition of the Italian troops, who were more deſirous of being under his government, than that of the Romans, though they had ſo long been ſubject to them. Scipio then demanding of him, whom he looked upon as the third captain, he made no ſcruple of mentioning himſelf. Here Scipio not being able to refrain from laughing, But what would you have ſaid, added he, had you vanquiſhed me? I would, replied Hannibal, have ranked myſelf above Alexander, Pyrrhus, and all the generals the world ever produced. Scipio was not inſenſible to this artful and delicate flattery; which, by giving him no rival, ſeemed to inſinuate, that no captain was worthy of being put in compariſon with him. This anſwer of Hannibal is much more probable and ingenious, than that mentioned by Plutarch, who makes that general to have given the firſt place to Pyrrhus, the ſecond to Scipio, and to himſelf the third; which is low, jejune, and quite deſtitute of that elegance and vivacity, which Livy's relation, in conformity to Hannibal's character, is ſeaſoned with [r].

Hannibal removes ſome ſuſpicions Antiochus had entertained of him.

ANTIOCHUS, having entertained a ſuſpicion of Hannibal, ever ſince his late conferences with Villius, would not, for ſome time, admit him into his councils. This ſlight, at firſt, Hannibal took no notice of; but afterwards, judging it expedient to enquire into the cauſe of ſuch a ſudden change in the king's conduct towards him, that he might have an opportunity portunity of clearing himſelf, if any ill offices had been done him, he entreated that prince to diſcover to him the reaſon of his late coldneſs; which having learnt, he addreſſed himſelf to Antiochus in the following terms: "My father Hamilcar, "Antiochus, obliged me, in my tender infancy, at the altar, "to take an oath always to bear an implacable averſion to "the Romans. Animated by this hatred, I have waged war "with them ſix-and-thirty years; prompted thereto by it, I "have abandoned my native country in times of peace, and "taken ſanctuary in your dominions; fired by it, ſhould "you fruſtrate my expectations, I will fly to every part of "the globe, and endeavour to rouſe up all nations againſt "the Romans. If any of your favourites therefore would "incenſe you againſt me, let him accuſe me of ſome other "crime. I hate mortally the Romans, and am equally hated "by them. For the truth of this I appeal to the manes of "my father Hamilcar, and all the deities, who were witneſſes "of my oath. So long therefore as you are diſpoſed to come "to a rupture with the Romans, you may rank Hannibal "amongſt your beſt friends. But, if any conſiderations "ſhould incline you to peace, I deſire to be entirely excluded "your councils." This ſpeech, uttered with ſuch force and energy, and expreſſive of ſo much ſincerity, removed all the prejudices the king had imbibed; ſo that Hannibal was not only reſtored to favour, but preparations made to execute the ſcheme he had formed [s].

Antiochus deſerts Hannibal.

THOUGH the king had come to a reſolution to give Hannibal the command of part of his fleet, yet, by the intrigues of his miniſters, the equipment of it was not only at firſt retarded, but even the expediency of putting the Carthaginian in that poſt debated in council. Thoas the Ætolian ſuggeſted, "That it was improper to weaken the king's fleet at that "juncture, by undertaking, with part of it, an expedition "to Africa; that, in caſe his majeſty's intereſt had rendered "neceſſary ſuch an expedition, no one would have been "more improper than Hannibal to have conducted it; that "it was imprudent to repoſe ſo much confidence in an exile, "a Carthaginian, whoſe fortune or genius might put every "day into his head a thouſand different projects; that the "fame Hannibal had already acquired, and which he conſidered

" ſidered as his peculiar inheritance, was too great for
" one, who acted under the king; that the king alone
" ought to be looked upon as the general and conductor of " the war; that, if Hannibal ſhould loſe either a fleet, or " an army, the loſs would be as great, as if a commander " of leſs note had occaſioned it; that if ſucceſs attended his " arms, not Antiochus, but Hannibal, would have the " glory of all the victories aſcribed to him; that ſuppoſing
" he ſhould conquer the Romans in this war, what hopes
" could be entertained of Hannibal's living peaceably as a
" ſubject under him, when he was ſcarce ſatisfied with the " ſupreme power at Carthage? that his behaviour from " his youth, having always in his mind graſped at univer-
" ſal empire, had not been ſuch as could induce them to " believe, that he would tamely ſubmit to any ſuperior
" in his old age; that however, if he could not overcome
" his fondneſs for Hannibal, he might make uſe of him as " a counſellor and companion, but not as a general, &c."
Theſe malicious ſuggeſtions, the pure effect of envy, made ſuch an impreſſion upon Antiochus's low and groveling mind, in which a ſordid jealouſy had extinguiſhed all noble and generous ſentiments, that he dropt the above-mentioned laudable deſign, an immediate execution of which only could, at that juncture, have effectually embarraſſed the Romans. In the mean time the Carthaginians offered to ſupply the Romans with a thouſand buſhels of wheat, and five hundred thouſand of barley, as a free gift; to equip a fleet at their own expence for their ſervice; and to remit to Rome the whole remaining part of the ſum impoſed upon them by the late treaty immediately, though it would not have been due for many years to come by one of the articles of that treaty. The Romans gave their embaſſadors a kind reception, and told them, " That they ſhould only re" quire from their principals the ſhips, that their late en" gagements obliged them to furniſh; that they would pay
" ready money for whatever ſupplies of corn they ſhould
" ſend them; and that the ſum, due to them from Car" thage, ſhould be paid at equal payments, in the manner
" ſtipulated at the concluſion of the laſt peace." From this incident, we may form ſome ſort of an idea of the incredible induſtry of the Carthaginians, as well as of their ſurpriſing genius for trade; ſince from hence it appears, that, notwithſtanding they had been entirely exhauſted by a long, bloody, and moſt expenſive war, notwithſtanding they had been ſtripped of the beſt part of their dominions by the Romans and Maſiniſſa, notwithſtanding they had been depriv-ed, in a manner, of all their ſhips, and almoſt rendered incapable, to outward appearance, of applying themſelves to any ſingle branch of commerce, they yet found means, in ten or twelve years time, to become wealthy and powerful; which could only have been the effect of a flouriſhing and extenſive trade. At what an exalted pitch of power therefore muſt they have arrived, had Hannibal either been duly ſupported in Italy, or contended with a nation of not ſuch an inflexible reſolution for the dominion of the world [t]!

Hannibal's advice to him.

SOME time after this, Antiochus found his affairs in ſuch a perplexed ſituation, that he was at a loſs what meaſures to purſue. In this emergency, his miniſters were obliged to have recourſe to Hannibal, who, in abilities, infinitely outſhone all other perſons at his court, notwithſtanding the late affront put upon him. That renowned general, forgetting the ill uſage he had met with, appeared as much diſpoſed to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed prince with his advice, as he would have been capable, had his plan of operations been executed, of ſupporting him before by his conduct, and perſonal bravery. In proof of which, he addreſſed himſelf to Antiochus in the following terms: "Had I been admit-" ted into your councils ever ſince our arrival in Greece [u], " I ſhould have declared my ſentiments, when an alliance " with the Achœans, Bœotians, and people of Eubœa, was " brought upon the carpet, in the ſame manner as I ſhall " this day, when we are to conſider the expediency of a " treaty with the Theſſalians. You are, above all things, " to invite Philip king of Macedon to enter into an alliance " with you. As to the Eubœans, Bœotians, and Theſſa-" lians, they are not to be regarded, ſince they court your " friendſhip through fear. Upon the firſt appearance of a " Roman army, they will change ſides, and will be well " received, as pretending to have been over-ruled by a ſu-" perior power, and acted againſt their inclinations through " compulſion. Beſides, the aſſiſtance thoſe people can af-" ford you, if well affected, is inconſiderable; whereas " Philip has lately ſhewn himſelf a match for the Romans. " You will likewiſe have the Ætolians, a ſtate, that, in " the late war betwixt Philip and the Romans, caused the " scale to preponderate in favour of the latter, to act for " you. I can therefore, provided you succeed in your ne" gotiation, insure you success. But, if Philip cannot be " prevailed upon to join his arms with ours, we may how" ever prevent him from assisting the enemy. Your son

" Seleucus is now at Lysimachia; let him advance, with " the troops under his command, through Thrace to the " confines of Macedonia, and lay them waste; which will
" oblige the Macedonian monarch to employ all his forces " in the defence and protection of his own dominions.
" You have now my opinion with regard to Philip. And " as to the war in general, had my advice been listened to,
" the Romans would, before this time, have heard of " greater exploits than the reduction so Chalcis, and the cas" tle of Euripus; even that Etruria, Liguria, and all Ci-
" salpine Gaul, were in a flame, and Hannibal, a name
" terrible to them, once more in Italy. However, your " affairs may still be retrieved; assemble all your land and " sea forces, station part of your fleet at Corcyra, in order " to prevent the Romans from approaching your frontiers;
" order the other part to hover about the coast of Italy fac" ing Afaica and Sardinia; and do you, at the head of your
" army, march into the territory of Byllis. By these dis" positions, you will provide for the security of Greece,
" and not only make the enemy believe, that you have an
" intention to pass over thither, but likewise be able actu" ally to land all your troops there, should the situation of " affairs require it. However deficient I may be in other " points, the vicissitudes of fortune I have met with a" mongst the Romans, enable me to point out to you the " most effectual way of distressing them. In the execution " of the plan I have submitted to your consideration, you " may depend upon my assisting you with the utmost zeal
" and activity. As to the rest, may the gods give you
" success in this, and all your other undertakings!" The speech was received with general applause; but none of his salutaryadmonitions listened to.

Hannibal defeated in a sea engagement.

AFTER Antiochus was forced to abandon Europe, by the victorious arms of the Romans, he retired to Ephesus. Here he, for some time, took up his residence, without any apprehensions of danger, his flatterers persuading him, that the enemy never durst pursue him into Asia. Hannibal, being now in great esteem at that prince's court, thought it

but

but juſt to undeceive him in a point of ſuch importance. He therefore told him, "That he did not ſo much doubt of "an invaſion of his Aſiatic dominions, as wonder, that the "Romans were not already there; that it was eaſier to "tranſport an army from Greece into Aſia, than from Ita-"ly into Greece; that the Romans were as powerful by "ſea as by land; that a Roman ſquadron was ſeen, ſome "time before, hovering about the promontory Malea; "that he had received intelligence of the departure of a "freſh reinforcement of ſhips, and a new general, from "Italy." From whence he inferred, "That Antiochus "muſt reſolve either to abdicate his throne, or oppoſe vi-"gorouſly a people, who graſped at the empire of the "world." As this diſcourſe of Hannibal, who was both the moſt able and faithful counſellor at the Syrian monarch's court, nor a little affected the prince to whom it was direct-ed, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for his defence; but all his efforts proved unſucceſsful. Even his fleet, under the conduct of the great Hannibal himſelf, was defeated by that of the Rhodians, commanded by Eudamus, off of Sida, on the coaſt of Pamphylia, and miſerably ſhattered. However, the Rhodians ſuffered extremely in the action, ſuſtaining almoſt as great a loſs of men and ſhips as Hannibal. The bad ſucceſs of this engagement was entirely owing to the ill conduct of Apollonius, one of Antiochus's admirals, who fled, with the ſquadron he commanded, almoſt in the beginning of the fight. Notwithſtanding which Hannibal made an excellent retreat, the enemy not being in a condi-tion to purſue him. However, the Rhodians detaching Chariclitus with twenty beaked ſhips to Patara, and Magiſte, a ſmall iſland, with a commodious port, in the ſea of Ly-cia, prevented the junction of Hannibal's ſhattered galleys with another Syrian ſquadron; which was a great morti-fication to the Carthaginian. In ſhort, after a ſeries of miſ-fortunes, Antiochus found himſelf obliged to ſend Zeuſis, the governor of Lydia, and his ſon Antipater, with a carte blanche, to the Roman camp, in order to procure a peace upon any terms. The article chiefly inſiſted upon was, that Hannibal ſhould be delivered up to the Romans; with which Antiochus, being unable to defend himſelf, was forced to comply. However, Hannibal, foreſeeing what would happen, had taken care to retire in time to the iſland of Crete. It appears from Scipio Naſica's ſpeech in Livy, that Hannibal was a general in the Syrian army at the battle of Magnesia; from whence, as well as from other circumstances, we have reason to believe, that he was present in all the principal actions, that happened between the Romans and Antiochus [u].

Hannibal is obliged to fly to Cete, and afterwards to Prusias king of Bithynia.

HANNIBAL, upon his arrival in Crete, took sanctuary amongst the Gortynii; but having brought great treasure with him, and considering the avarice of the Cretans, he judged it would be proper to have recourse to some stratagem, in order to secure himself, especially as he had reason to apprehend, that the Cretans were advertised of the riches he brought with him. He therefore filled several vessels with molten lead, just covering them over with gold and silver; which he deposited in the temple of Diana, in the presence of the Gortynii, with whom, he said, he trusted all his treasure. Justin tells us, that he left this there as a security for his good behaviour, and lived for some time very quietly in those parts. He however took care to conceal his riches in hollow statues of brass, which according to some, he always carried along with him, or, as others will have it, exposed to view in a place of public resort, as things of little value. At last he retired to the court of Prusias king of Bithynia, with whom he found means to unite several neighbouring princes and states, and so formed a powerful confederacy against Eumenes king of Pergamus, a professed friend of the Romans. A rupture soon commenced betwixt them, which was followed by a great effusion of blood on both sides. During this war, Hannibal employed a stratagem of an extraordinary kind, in a sea-fight, to destroy Eumenes, which, he thought would be of the utmost consequence to him. He put into earthen vessels a vast number of the most venomous serpents, which he ordered to be collected for that purpose, commanding the greatest part of his captains to attack Eumenes's ship, and throw these vessels on board him, whilst the rest stood on the defensive. The admiral-galley Hannibal discovered, by sending out a boat, with a letter to Eumenes; which enabled the officers above-mentioned to attack it with great fury. Eumenes would have been either killed or taken, had he not sheered off, and been too swift for his pursuers. However, the other ships of Pergamus sustained the fight with great vigour, till the earthen vessels were thrown into them. At first they only laughed at this, and

and were much ſurpriſed to find ſuch weapons employed againſt them; but being ſurrounded with the ſerpents, which flew out of theſe veſſels when they were broken, they found themſeves ſeized with ſo much horror, that they retired in confuſion to their camp on the ſhore. Nepos tells us, that Hannibal promiſed a great reward to the perſon, that ſhould kill Eumenes; that when the officer, whom he ſent to him, came on board the admiral-galley, it was imagined he brought propoſals of peace; that Eumenes, inſtead of this, receiving a letter full of ridicule, could not conceive what was the end of ſuch a commiſſion; and that, irritated thereby, he immediately began the engagement. The ſame author likewiſe intimates, that Hannibal gave that prince ſeveral overthrows by land, and reduced him to great ſtreights, more by force of genius, or dint of conduct, than ſuperiority of ſtrength [w].

And poiſons himſelf in order to avoid falling into the hands of the Romans.

THE Romans, receiving intelligence of the important ſervices Hannibal had done Pruſias, and of the influence he had at that prince's court, ſent T. Quintius Flaminius thither as their embaſſador. Flaminius, at his firſt audience, complained of the protection Pruſias gave Hannibal, repreſenting that famous general "as the moſt "inveterate and implacable enemy the Romans ever had; "as one who had ruined both his own country and Antiochus, by drawing them into a deſtructive war with "Rome." Pruſias in order to ingratiate himſelf with the Romans, immediately ſent a party of ſoldiers to ſurround Hannibal's palace, that he might find it impoſſible to make his eſcape. The Carthaginians, having before diſcovered, that no confidence was to be repoſed in Pruſias, had contrived ſeven ſecret outlets in his palace, to evade the machinations of his enemies, even if they could carry their point at the Bithynian court; which he was actually meditating, when the above-mentioned detachment arrived. Perceiving no poſſibility of eſcaping, he had recourſe to the poiſon, which he had long kept for this melancholy occaſion; which taking in his hand, "Let us, ſaid he, deliver the Romans from the diſquie-"tude, with which they have been long tortured, ſince "they have not patience to wait for an old man's death. "Flaminius will not acquire any reputation or glory by "a victory

"a victory gained over a betrayed and defenceleſs per-"ſon. This ſingle day will be a laſting teſtimony of the "degeneracy of the Romans. Their anceſtors gave Pyrrhus
"intelligence of a deſign to poiſon him, that he might guard
"againſt the impending danger, even when he was at the "head of a powerful army in Italy; but they have deputed
"a perſon of conſular dignity to excite Pruſias impiouſly to "murder one, who has taken refuge in his dominions, in "violation of the laws of hoſpitality." Then he denounced dreadful imprecations againſt Pruſias, and his kingdom, and invoked the gods preſiding over the ſacred rights of hoſpitality; after which, drinking off the poiſon he had prepared, he expired, at ſeventy years of age. Cornelius Nepos intimates, that Hannibal deſtroyed himſelf by a ſubtle (R) poiſon, which he carried about with him in a ring for that purpoſe. Plutarch relates, that according to ſome writers, he ordered a ſervant to ſtrangle him with a cloak wrapped about his neck; and others will have it, that in imitation of Midas and Themiſtocles, he drank bulls blood. Be that as it will, his death reflected an eternal ignominy and diſgrace upon the Romans, whoſe inſatiable thirſt after empire had extinguiſhed all generous ſentiments, and every ſpark of virtue in their minds [x].

(R) Zonaras relates, that Hannibal was under no apprehenſion of a ſudden violent death, though he took ſuch precautions to ſecure himſelf. This was occaſioned by an anſwer the oracle gave him, when conſulted on a certain emergency, viz. that he ſhould die in Libya. However, adds that author, the prediction was fulfilled; ſince the ſpot of ground, on which he took the fatal drought, was called Libya. Aurelius Victor tells us, that Hannibal died in a village of Bithynia called Libyſſa, ſituated near the ſea, where he was buried in a wooden coffin, with this inſcription upon his tomb, Here lies Hannibal; and that this was ſtill remaining in his time (24).

ned faction. Polybius ſeems to make him a pattern for all ſucceeding commanders; and Livy, notwithſtanding his partiality, owns himſelf aſtoniſhed at his wonderful conduct, after the defeat of his brother Aſdrubal. No other general could have found means, after ſo terrible a blow, of maintaining himſelf in one of the pooreſt ſpots of Italy, for ſeveral years, without any reinforcement of troops, or ſupplies of proviſions, from Carthage. The perfect harmony kept up in his army, compoſed of ſuch a variety of nations, viz. Greeks, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, &c. differing in laws, manners, language, genius, and amoſt every other particular, even after fortune had declared againſt him, and when they were in want both of money and proviſions, was a full demonſtration of his conſummate abilities. The inviolable attachment of his new allies to him, when he was reduced to the neceſſity of making them ſuſtain almoſt the whole burden of the war, by quartering his army upon them, and levying contributions in their reſpective countries, clearly evinces the ſame thing. Polybius obſerves that he over-reached moſt of the generals that oppoſed him; but was himſelf never outwitted by any of them; and ſeems to inſinuate that it would have been much more fatal to the Carthaginians to have loſt him, than any of the armies he ever commanded: and indeed it ſufficiently appears, from the preceding part of this hiſtory, that he was the life and ſoul not only of the army, but likewiſe of the Carthaginian ſtate. In fine, by his own ſurprizing capacity, he carried on a war againſt the moſt martial people in the world many years, in a remote country, in ſpite of the violent oppoſition made by a powerful domeſtic faction, which refuſed him ſupplies of every kind, and thwarted him on all occaſions. With regard to his political character, we ſhall only obſerve, that the ſecret intelligence he held with Philip king of Macedon, the wiſe counſels he gave Antiochus, the double regulation he introduced at Carthage, the potent confederacy he formed in favour of king Pruſias, beſides many other inſtances, that will occur to our readers, evidently prove him to have made as great a figure in the cabinet, as the field. What we have already obſerved of his facetious diſpoſition, and love for the muſes, is confirmed by Gellius and others. His religious and moral conduct Livy paints in the blackeſt colours; but the teſtimony, as to this point, Polybius has given of him, the humanity with which he treated the bodies of Marcellus and Sempronius

Gracchus, the high reverence he expreſſed for the gods on all occaſions, his ſingular continence, and uncommon wiſdom, his contempt of riches, the extraordinary temperance he was famous for, even in the midſt of the greateſt affluence, when he was at the head of the ſtate of Carthage; theſe ſhining qualities, we ſay, and others, atteſted by the beſt authors, will not permit us to give any attention to the unfair repreſentation of that prejudiced hiſtorian. Polybius however intimates that he was accuſed at Carthage of avarice, and of cruelty at Rome; and that people were much divided in their ſentiments concerning him. This cannot appear ſtrange to any one, who conſiders, that, as he had many implacable enemies in both cities, he muſt, of courſe, have been drawn by ſome of them in the moſt diſadvantageous light. But though, adds Polybius, we ſhould allow ſome of the defects he has been charged with true, yet it would be but fair to conclude, that they ought rather to be attributed to the difficulties with which he was obliged to ſtruggle during the courſe of ſo long and burdenſome a war, than to his own natural diſpoſition. Beſides, he might be forced frequently to fall in with the inclinations of his officers, when they were oppoſite to his own, in order to excite them to a chearful diſcharge of their duty. Theſe, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, he could not always keep within proper bounds, conſidering the natural bent of his countrymen, any more than the ſoldiers, who fought under them. Be that as it will, Polybius looked upon Hannibal to have been a general of ſo noble and ſublime a genius, that, in his opinion, had he at firſt attacked other powers, and reſerved the Romans for the laſt nation to have contended with, he muſt have entirely overthrown their republic, and conſequently rendered Carthage miſtreſs of the world[y].

Diſputes between the Carthaginians and Maſiniſſa.

It has been already obſerved, that, by one of the articles of the late treaty, the Carthaginians were to reſtore to Maſiniſſa all the territories and cities he poſſeſſed before the beginning of the war. To theſe Scipio annexed part of Syphax's dominions, dominions, in order to reward the zeal and affection that prince had diſcovered for the Romans on all occaſions, ever ſince the commencement of his friendſhip with them. After Hannibal's flight to Antiochus, and his emiſſary Ariſton's eſcape, related above, the Romans began to look upon the Carthaginians with a ſuſpicious eye, though, to prevent all diſtruſt, the latter of theſe ſtates had ordered two ſhips to purſue Hannibal, confiſcated his effects, razed his houſe, and, by a public decree, declared him an exile. It was agreed likewiſe to notify to the Romans Ariſton's commiſſion, as well as eſcape, in order to ſhew their diſapprobation of Hannibal's deſign, by the deputies they diſpatched to Rome, to complain of Maſiniſſa's unjuſt pretenſions. That prince, being appriſed, that Carthage was miſerably rent by factions, and upon but very indifferent terms with the Romans, on account of the two events above-mentioned, ſeized upon part of a maritime territory, which was extremely rich and fruitful, ſituated near the Leſſer Syrtis, called Emporia. Both ſides ſent embaſſadors to Rome on this occaſion, to ſupport the title of their reſpective maſters to the diſtrict in diſpute. The Carthaginians alledged, "That this was within "the limits of their African dominions, as ſettled by Scipio; "and that this had been acknowledged by Maſiniſſa himſelf, "who, when he had purſued one Aphires, a Numidian "prince, making an excurſion out of his own territories, "as far as the borders of Cyrenaica, would not paſs through "Emporia, without aſking leave of the Carthaginians, look-"ing upon it then as a territory indiſputably belonging to "them." To which the Numidian miniſters replied, "That what they ſo confidently advanced about Scipio's "ſettling the limits, was falſe; that the Carthaginians, in "ſtrictneſs and equity, ought only to have the ſpot of "ground, on which Byrſa ſtood, every other part of their "African dominions being taken from the natives by fraud "and violence; that, as to the diſtrict in queſtion, they "could not prove themſelves to have been in poſſeſſion of it "ſince the infancy of their republic, nay, that it had been "any conſiderable time under their juriſdiction; that the "Carthaginians and Numidians had been maſters of it by "turns, juſt as ſucceſs attended their reſpective arms; and "that they hoped the ſenate would permit things to remain in "their preſent ſituation." Hereupon the conſcript fathers thought proper to ſend Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus, to examine the controverſy upon the ſpot. However, they returned without coming to any reſolution, leaving the buſineſs in the ſame uncertain ſtate in which they found it. Whether the commiſſioners acted in this manner of their own head, or by order of the ſenate, is not ſo certain, as that the intereſt of the Romans rendered a perfect harmony betwixt the contending parties then improper; for otherwiſe Scipio, who had deſerved ſo well of both of them, could, by his own ſingle authority, have put an end to the diſpute [z].

The Romans accommodate the differences between them.

MASINISSA, not ſatisfied with the poſſeſſion of the diſtrict he had ſo unjuſtly uſurped, over-ran a province, that his father Gala had taken from the Carthaginians, and Syphax from him, from whom it had returned to its former maſters, through the charms and endearments of Sophoniſba. The Carthaginian deputies pleaded the cauſe of their principals, and Maſiniſſa his, before the Roman commiſſioners, with exceeding heat. The Carthaginians urged, that "this "territory was theirs, both by right of inheritance, and "deed of gift." On the other hand, Maſiniſſa inſiſted, "that it was formerly part of his father's kingdom; that, in "conſequence of this title he had taken poſſeſſion of it; "and that his pretenſions were ſo indubitable, that he only "feared, leſt the modeſty of the Romans, which might "render them timorous of indulging a friend and ally in his "juſt claims upon their common enemy, ſhould prove pre-"judicial to him." The commiſſioners, in conformity to the diſpoſition of their republic, referred this diſpute, which happened ten years after the former, to the deciſion of the ſenate, and conſequently left it undetermined. However, in the conſulate of L. Æmilius Paulus, and Cn. Bœbius Tamphilus, the Romans effected an accommodation betwixt Maſiniſſa and the Carthaginians, confirming the former in the poſſeſſion of his unjuſt acquiſitions, and reſtoring to the latter an hundred hoſtages they had, till that time, detained [a].

Maſiniſſa endeavours to embroil the Carthaginians with the Romans.

MASINISSA, graſping at farther conqueſts, endeavoured ſoon after to embroil the Carthaginians with the Romans. In order to this, he concerted meaſures with the Roman embaſſadors in Africa, to prejudice the conſcript fathers againſt them. The latter did not ſcruple to affirm, that, to their certain knowledge, Perſeus king of Macedon, with whom the Romans then were upon the verge of a war, had privately ſent ſent embaſſadors to Carthage, to negotiate an alliance with that ſtate; and that the ſenate was aſſembled by night in the temple of Æſculapius, to confer with them: whilſt the former, in as ſtrong a manner, aſſerted, that the Carthaginians had diſpatched miniſters to Perſeus, to conclude a treaty with him. Livy ſeems to intimate, that the Carthaginians would not own this; but that the Romans, always attentive to the inſinuations of their enemies, believed it to be true. The future conduct of that people towards Carthage renders Livy's authority, in this point, indiſputable [b].

And makes an irruption into the province of Tyſca.

NOT long after this, Maſiniſſa made an irruption into the province of Tyſca, where he ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of above ſeventy, or, as Appian will have it, fifty towns and caſtles. This obliged the Carthaginians to apply, with great importunity, to the Roman ſenate for redreſs, their hands being ſo tied up by an article of the laſt treaty, that they could not repel force by force, in caſe of an invaſion, without the conſent of the Romans. The Carthaginian miniſters at Rome repreſented the miſerable condition of their republic in the moſt moving terms. They declared, "That Maſiniſſa was "entirely void of honour; that, without the interpoſition "of that auguſt aſſembly, to whom they then addreſſed "themſelves, no limits could be preſcribed to his cruelty, "inſolence, avarice and ambition. They therefore begged "the conſcript fathers either themſelves to determine the "point in debate betwixt their principals and Maſiniſſa, or "to ſuffer the former to diſlodge the latter from his con-"queſts by force of arms; or laſtly, if they were reſolved "to ſupport the Numidian in all his unjuſt pretenſions, to "ſpecify, once for all, what territories the Carthaginians "were to cede to him, that they might know what hereafter "they had to depend upon." To this they ſubjoined, "That, "if the Carthaginians had incurred the diſpleaſure of the Ro-"mans in any point inadvertently ſince the concluſion of "the laſt peace, they begged they would puniſh them for "the offence themſelves, and not leave them expoſed to the "inſults and vexations of Maſiniſſa, ſince they preferred an "utter extinction to the barbarities and depredations they "were forced to ſuffer from ſo mercileſs a tyrant." Then throwing themſelves proſtrate on the earth, they burſt out into tears; which making a deep impreſſion upon the ſenate in their favour, Guluſſa, Maſiniſſa's ſon, being then preſent, and called upon to vindicate his father's conduct, replied in terms to the following effect: "That he had received no in-"ſtructions from his father how to act in the preſent emer-"gency, ſince it could not be foreſeen, that any thing would "be laid to his charge; that the Carthaginians had had ſeve-"ral clandeſtine meetings by night in the temple of Æſcu-"lapius, the object of whoſe conſultations was kept ſecret "from him, after which deputies were diſpatched to Rome; "that the ſole deſign of his father's ſending him to Rome "was, to entreat the ſenate not to pay any regard to the in-"ſinuations of the common enemy againſt him, ſince the "implacable hatred they bore him was occaſioned by the in-"violable fidelity, with which he had been ſo long attached "to the Romans." The ſenate, after hearing both ſides, anſwered, "That it would be proper for Guluſſa to ſet out "immediately for Numidia, in order to acquaint his father "with the complaints of the Carthaginians againſt him; "that he ought to ſend deputies to Rome, to remove all "difficulties that obſtructed an accommodation between him "and them; that they would continue to ſerve him as they "had hitherto done, but not to the prejudice of the Cartha-"ginians; that it was but juſt the antient limits ſhould be "preſerved; that the Carthaginians ought to be maintained "in the poſſeſſion of thoſe territories, which the late treaty "had allotted them." The deputies of both powers were then diſmiſſed with the uſual preſents. The Romans were prompted to act after this perfidious manner, partly by that implacable hatred they bore the Carthaginians, and partly by the hopes of receiving ſuccours from Maſiniſſa in the Macedonian war, which they were juſt going to enter upon. The Numidian anſwered their expectations; for he did not only ſupply them with corn, but likewiſe ſent a body of troops, conſiſting of a thouſand horſe, and as many foot, with twenty two elephants, under the command of his ſon Miſagenes, to their aſſiſtance. However, this proceeded rather from a motive of policy than gratitude; for he conſidered, that if the Romans were victorious in this war, his affairs could but remain in the ſame ſituation; whereas, ſhould they be overcome, he doubted not reducing Carthage, and making himſelf maſter of Africa [c].

The villainous behaviour of the Romans to the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginians, notwithſtanding the lamentable ſlavery under which they groaned, diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome, who who acquainted the ſenate, "That their ſtate would immediately tranſport a million buſhels of wheat, and five hundred thouſand of barley, into whatever part of the world the Romans pleaſed; that they were ſenſible ſuch a ſupply was not proportioned to thoſe happy effects of the Roman generoſity and goodneſs, which their principals had ſo long experienced, neither did it correſpond with their inclinations; but that they hoped it would be conſidered, by way of atonement for this defect, that, during the proſperity of both republics, in former times, they had given frequent inſtances of their being true and faithful allies." Maſiniſſa's embaſſadors not only offered the ſame quantity of corn, but likewiſe offered to reinforce the Roman army with another body of twelve hundred horſe, attended by twelve more elephants, and to obey all the ſenate's commands with the utmoſt alacrity. But neither could the Carthaginians, by ſuch an abject and mean-ſpirited behaviour, a ſufficient indication of that low and groveling mind, which ſeems to have been the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of their nation, prevail upon the Romans to diſcontinue their chicane. They ſpun out matters to a tedious length, not permitting the miniſters they employed to adjuſt all diſputes betwixt Maſiniſſa and the Carthaginians, to arrive at a deciſion. By this conduct they enabled the former to exhauſt the latter, and conſequently paved the way to the immediate deſtruction of a ſtate, which to them, of all others, ſtill appeared the moſt formidable [d].

Cato bears an implacable hatred to the Carthaginians.

WHATEVER villainous deſigns the Romans might have formed, they affected to ſhew a great regard to the principles of juſtice and honour. They therefore ſent Cato, a man famous for committing enormities under the ſpecious pretext of public ſpirit, to accommodate all differences betwixt Maſiniſſa and the Carthaginians. The latter very well knew their fate, had they ſubmitted to ſuch a mediation, and therefore appealed to the treaty, which had been concluded by Scipio, as the only rule, by which their conduct, and that of their adverſary, ought to be examined. This unreaſonable appeal ſo incenſed the righteous Cato, that he pronounced them a devoted people. As the intention of that upright perſon was not ſo much to forward the obſervation or concluſion of treaties, as to widen breaches, diſcover the ſtrength and condition of Carthage, which was then very flouriſhing, notwithſtanding ſtanding the many blows it had received, and gratify the Roman ambition by all poſſible means, it is not ſo ſtrange, that he ſhould, even in the moſt abſurd, though moſt virulent manner, preſs the ſenate, after his return home, to deſtroy that city. It is much more wonderful, that a Frenchman ſhould cenſure his conduct, when it ſo exactly quadrates with that of a certain court, which he cannot poſſibly be a ſtranger to, for above a century paſt. However, as we have more than a bare jealouſy of the growing power, as well as ambitious deſigns, of that court, we may, without offence, give it as our opinion, that, in order to ſecure the liberties of Europe, as well as to introduce public faith, juſtice and honour once more into the world, it is neceſſary, that the ſtate repreſented by that court ſhould be humbled, if not deſtroyed[e].

Maſiniſſa defeats the Carthaginians.

SOME years before this time, Carthage was miſerably rent by three potent factions. That devoted to the Romans was headed by one Hanno, a deſcendent, as may be ſuppoſed, of the perſon, who ruined his country, by not ſupporting Hannibal; that in the intereſt of Maſiniſſa, by Hannibal, ſurnamed Paſſer; and that formed of the populace by Hamilcar, ſurnamed Sannis, and Carthalo. But, of late, two powerful parties had ſtruggled for the dominion of the city, one of which, called the popular faction, prevailed over the other, compoſed of the grandees, and their adherents, and expelled forty of the ſenators. They retired to the court of Maſiniſſa, to excite him to a war with the Carthaginians, who ſent Guluſſa and Micipſa, two of his ſons, to Carthage, to ſolicit their return. However, the gates were ſhut upon them at their approach, leſt the people, moved by the tears of thoſe related to the exiles, ſhould grant their requeſt; nay, Hamilcar, ſurnamed Sannis, one of the Carthaginian generals, cloſely purſued Guluſſa, and cut off ſome of his retinue. This occaſioning a freſh rupture, Maſiniſſa beſieged Oroſcopa, in violation of the laſt treaty. Aſdrubal, another Carthaginian general, advanced to the relief of Oroſcopa, with an army of twenty-five thouſand foot, and four hundred horſe, and was immediately joined by a body of ſix thouſand men, under the conduct of Aſaſis and Suba, two Numidian captains, who deſerted from Maſiniſſa. Animated by this acceſſion of ſtrength, Aſdrubal approached the Numidian, midian, and ſkirmiſhed ſucceſsfully with ſome of the advanced guards. Maſiniſſa, obſerving the eagerneſs of the Carthaginian, retired before him, as though he was afraid of his ſuperior force, and inſenſibly drew him into a large and deſolate plain, ſurrounded with precipices, and void of all kinds of ſuſtenance. Aſdrubal, finding himſelf thus decoyed, poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral eminences, and prepared for an engagement; which immediately enſuing, and ending in favour of Maſiniſſa, the Carthaginians ſued for peace. In order to terminate their conteſts with that prince, the Carthaginians offered to yield up the territory of Emporia, to pay down two hundred talents of ſilver, and remit eight hundred more at a ſtipulated time to him. But Maſiniſſa inſiſting upon the return of the exiles, they did not come to any deciſion. It is obſervable, that the Roman deputies, who arrived in the Numidian camp ſoon after the engagement, had orders to inſiſt upon a peace, in caſe the Carthaginians defeated Maſiniſſa; but to aſſure that prince of the continuance of their friendſhip, and puſh him on to the war, in caſe he was victorious. This they did, in order to complete the ruin of the Carthaginians. How, through the vindictive diſpoſition of Guluſſa, and the breaking out of the plague amongſt them, the Carthaginian forces were almoſt utterly deſtroyed, our readers will find in a former part of this work, to which we muſt alſo beg leave to refer them for the particulars of the action juſt hinted at [f].

Cato prevails upon the Roman ſenate to declare war againſt Carthage.

EVER ſince Carthage rejected the mediation of the Romans, Cato had made his utmoſt efforts to prevail upon the conſcript fathers to deſtroy that city. But Scipio Naſica, having a ſuperior influence in the ſenate, had hitherto, notwithſtanding the grievous provocation he met with from the Carthaginians, already related, prevented a rupture. However, the people of Carthage knowing the Romans to be their inveterate enemies, and reflecting upon the iniquitous treatment they had met with from them ever ſince the commencement of their diſputes with Maſiniſſa, were under great apprehenſions of a viſit from them. To prevent this, as much as in them lay, by a decree of the ſenate, they impeached Aſdrubal general of the army, and Carthalo commander of the auxiliary forces, together with their accomplices, as guilty of high treaſon, for being the authors of the war waged againſt the

the king of Numidia. They sent a deputation to Rome, to discover what sentiments were entertained there of their late conduct, and to know what satisfaction the Romans required. These ministers meeting with a cold reception, other deputies were dispatched, who returned with the same success. This made the unhappy citizens of Carthage believe, that their destruction was resolved upon; which threw them into the utmost despair. And indeed they had too just grounds for such a melancholy apprehension, the Roman senate now discovering an inclination to fall in with Cato's measures. It is said, that, in order to excite the conscript fathers to a vigorous resolution against the Carthaginians, that incendiary, after one of his most virulent speeches, threw out of the lappet of his robe, in the midst of the senate, some African figs, whose size and beauty observing the senators to admire; "Know," said he, "that it is but three days since these "figs were gathered; such is the distance between the ene-"my and us." About the same time the city of Utica, being the second in Africa, and famous for its immense riches, as well as its equally capacious and commodious port, submitted to the Romans. As the possession of so important a fortress, which, by reason of its vicinity to Carthage, might serve as a place of arms in the attack of that city, enabled the Romans to put the design they had been so long meditating in execution, immediately after this event, they declared war against the Carthaginians, without the least hesitation. In consequence of which declaration, the consuls M. Manilius Nepos and L. Marcius Censorinus were dispatched with an army and a fleet, to begin hostilities with the utmost expedition. The land-forces, destined to act against the Carthaginians, consisted of eighty thousand foot, and four thousand chosen horse; and the fleet of fifty quinqueremes, besides a vast number of transports. The consuls had secret orders from the senate, not to conclude the operations but by the destruction of Carthage, without which, the republic pretended, she could not but look upon all her possessions as insecure and precarious. Pursuant to the plan they had formed, they landed the troops first at Lilybæum in Sicily, from whence, after receiving a proper refreshment, it was proposed to transport them to Utica [g].

The Romans demand three hundred hoſtages of the Carthaginians.

THE anſwer brought by the laſt embaſſadors to Carthage had not a little alarmed the inhabitants of that city; but they were not yet acquainted with the reſolutions taken at Rome. They therefore ſent freſh embaſſadors thither, whom they inveſted with full power to act as they ſhould think fit for the good of the republic, and even to ſubmit themſelves, without reſerve, to the pleaſure of the Romans; but the moſt ſenſible perſons amongſt them did not expect any great ſucceſs from this condeſcenſion, ſince the early ſubmiſſion of the Uticans had rendered it infinitely leſs meritorious than it would have been before. However, the Romans ſeemed to be, in ſome meaſure, ſatisfied with it, ſince they promiſed them their liberty, the enjoyment of their laws, and in ſhort, every thing that was dear and valuable to them. This threw them into a tranſport of joy, and they wanted words to extol the moderation of the Romans. But the conſcript fathers immediately daſhed all their hopes, by declaring the next inſtant, Roman-like, that this favour was granted them upon condition, that they would ſend three hundred young Carthaginians of the firſt diſtinction to the prætor Fabius at Lilybæum, within the ſpace of thirty days, and comply with all the orders of the conſuls. Giſco, ſurnamed Strytanus, Hamilcar, Miſdes, Gillicas, and Mago, for ſo were the embaſſadors called, durſt not make the leaſt remonſtrance againſt the ſeverity of theſe conditions, but immediately ſet out for Carthage, to impart them to the ſenate there. That auguſt aſſembly was filled with inexpreſſible concern, upon hearing the article relating to the hoſtages, which were conſidered as the flower, and the only hopes, of the nobleſt families in Carthage. They found themſelves likewiſe extremely perplexed at the ſilence of the Romans with reſpect to the cities, of which no notice was taken in the conceſſions they ſeemed willing to make, and at the vague expreſſion of ſubmitting to all the orders of the conſuls. However, being abſolutely incapable of coping with ſo formidable an enemy, and, at that juncture, in want of almoſt every thing, Mago Bretius, in a brave and eloquent ſpeech, exhorted them, for the preſent, to obey. No ſcene can be conceived more moving, than that exhibited by Carthage, when the hoſtages were delivered up; nothing was to be ſeen but tears, all parts, at the ſame time, echoing with groans and lamentations; but, above all, the unhappy mothers afforded a moſt mournful ſpectacle, bathing themſelves in tears, tearing their diſhevelled led hair, beating their breaſts, and yelling in ſuch a manner, as might have moved the moſt ſavage hearts to compaſſion. When the fatal moment of ſeparation was come, they accompanied their children to the ſhip, bid them a long, laſt farewel, perſuaded, that they ſhould never ſee them more, embraced them with the utmoſt tenderneſs, claſped them ſtrongly in their arms, could not be prevailed upon to part with them, till they were forced away by the ſailors; nay, many of them ſwam a long time after the ſhip, fixing their eyes immoveably upon it. As the embaſſadors delivered them to the conſuls, and they to Fabius at Lilybæum, before the thirty days were expired, they were not entirely without hopes of ſoftening their hard-hearted enemy; but the conſuls only told them, that, upon their arrival at Utica, they ſhould learn the farther orders of the republic [h].

And oblige them to deliver up all their arms.

THOSE miniſters no ſooner received intelligence of the Roman fleet's appearing off of Utica, than they repaired thither, in order to know the fate of their city. The conſuls, however, did not judge it expedient to communicate all the commands of their republic at once, leſt they ſhould appear ſo harſh and ſevere, that the Carthaginians would have refuſed a compliance with them. They firſt therefore demanded a ſufficient ſupply of corn for the ſubſiſtance of their troops. Secondly, that they ſhould deliver up into their hands all the triremes they were then maſters of. Thirdly, that they ſhould put them in poſſeſſion of all their military machines. And, fourthly, that they ſhould immediately convey all their arms into the Roman camp. As care was taken, that there ſhould be a certain interval of time betwixt each of theſe demands, the Carthaginians found themſelves enſnared, and could not reject any one of them, though they ſubmitted to the laſt, which Cenſorinus inſiſted upon, notwithſtanding the powerful reaſons urged againſt it, with the utmoſt reluctance and concern [i].

The Romans command the Carthaginians to abandon their city.

THE gaining of theſe points paved the way to the deſtruction of Carthage, though it reflected an eternal diſhonour upon the Roman name. Cenſorinus, now imagining the Carthaginians not capable of ſuſtaining a ſiege, commanded them to abandon their city, or, as Zonaras will have it, to demoliſh liſh it, permitting them to build another eighty ſtadia from the ſea, but without walls or fortifications. Both the embaſſadors, before whom this fulminating decree was pronounced, and the people of Carthage, when they were appriſed of it, by their geſtures and complaints, demonſtrated the greateſt emotions of grief on this tragical occaſion; but the Romans remained inflexible, not ſhewing the leaſt regard to the tears and entreaties of a people, reduced to the extremes of deſpair. The embaſſadors, at one time, ſupplicated the gods with the greateſt fervor, as well as endeavoured, by all poſſible means, to excite the compaſſion of the Romans; and at another, they appealed to the avenging deities, whoſe ſevere eyes are ever open to fraud and villainy. The ſenators and people, upon receiving the report of the embaſſadors, for ſome time, entirely abandoned themſelves to deſpair; which was heightened by the frantic diſpoſition of the women, whoſe children had been ſent to Rome. In ſhort, Carthage was nothing now but a ſcene of horror, madneſs, and confuſion. The citizens curſed their anceſtors for not dying glorioufly in the defence of their country, rather than concluding ſuch ignominious treaties of peace with their implacable enemies, which had been the cauſe of the deplorable condition, to which their poſterity was then reduced. They likewiſe condemned themſelves in the ſtrongeſt terms, for having ſo tamely, as well as ſtupidly, delivered up their arms, and even blaſphemouſly taxed the gods themſelves with being the authors of all their misfortunes. However, nothing could make any impreſſion upon the Romans in their favour. But as, in a former part of our hiſtory, we have expatiated largely upon this head, we ſhall only beg leave to obſerve farther here, that, when the firſt tranſports of grief were over, and their paſſions began to ſubſide, they unanimouſly reſolved to die upon the ſpot, rather than comply with the barbarous orders of the Romans; and, in conſequence of this reſolution, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for the defence of their capital city [k].

A certain polite [l] author takes ſome pains to ſhew, that the Romans did not act agreeably to the maxims of juſtice and honour in the point before us; and conſequently ſeems to inſinuate, inſinuate, that ſome proof, beſides the notoriety of the facts, is requiſite to evince the iniquity of their conduct on the preſent occaſion. This perhaps may be looked upon as an argument of ſome good nature, and delicacy of ſentiments; but can never be deemed one of that boldneſs, and inflexible attachment to truth, eſſential to a good hiſtorian. A writer of this kind will paint every ſpecies of vice, particularly thoſe of a moſt public and enormous nature, in their moſt proper, that is, in the moſt odious colours. He will eſteem a perſon, who endeavours to palliate, or even touches but lightly upon any flagrant villainy, be the actors of it who they will, as one who either inwardly approves of it, or is afraid of expoſing it; and conſequently as one ſo far diſqualified for tranſmitting to poſterity the tranſactions of former ages. It is not ſufficient, in our opinion, in order to expreſs our deteſtation of that execrable perfidiouſneſs and barbarity the Romans were guilty of, to ſay, "I can never believe, "that ſo ſenſible, rational and juſt a man as Polybius, could "have approved of the proceedings of the Romans on the "preſent occaſion.---We do not find here any of the characteriſtics, which diſtinguiſhed the Romans antiently, that "greatneſs of ſoul, that rectitude, that utter abhorrence of "mean artifices, frauds, and impoſtures, which, as is "ſomewhere ſaid, formed no part of the Roman genius.--- "Why did not the Romans attack the Carthaginians by "force? Why ſhould they declare expreſly in a treaty, "that they allowed them the full enjoyment of their liberties and laws, and underſtand, at the ſame time, certain "private conditions, which proved the entire ruin of both? "Why ſhould they conceal, under the ſcandalous omiſſion "of the word "city" in this treaty, the black deſign of deſtroying Carthage, as though, beneath the cover of ſuch "an equivocation, they could juſtly ruin it? In fine, why "did the Romans not make their laſt declaration, till after "they had extorted from the Carthaginians, at different "times, their hoſtages and arms, that is, till they had abſolutely rendered them incapable of diſobeying their unjuſt "commands? ---- It is very dangerous to be poſſeſſed of ſo "much power, as may enable one to commit injuſtice with "impunity, and with a proſpect of being a gainer by it. "The experience of all ages ſhews, that ſtates ſeldom ſcruple to commit injuſtice, when they think it will turn to "their advantage." Our readers will here obſerve, that, with regard to the Roman nation in general, theſe reflections

ſcarce carry with them more of ſatire than panegyric; and that as to the very perſons guilty of one of the greateſt violations of public faith, attended with the moſt aggravating circumſtances, that perhaps ever happened, he only ſeems to intimate, that they did not come up to the virtues of their anceſtors; nay, he puts them upon a level with thoſe at the head of other ſtates. Such a palliation of one of the moſt atrocious public crimes to be met with in hiſtory, would be inexcuſable in an author of any other nation than that to which he belongs; but as for his countrymen, if we ſuppoſe them to pay any deference to the conduct of their ſuperiors for above a century paſt, it is as natural for them to talk in this ſtrain now, as it was for the Romans to act the part they did at the time Carthage was deſtroyed.

The perfidious conduct of the Romans expoſed.

In whatever light we view the villainous conduct of the Romans, at this juncture, it muſt appear as the reſult of a complication of all the bad qualities, that can be inherent in any ſtate. Perjury, cruelty, injuſtice, pride, meanneſs of ſpirit, and even cowardice itſelf, in the higheſt degree, are ſome of the principal of them. Neither can we conceive how it ſhould enter into the head of the author juſt cited, as well as of many others, that even the anceſtors of that profligate ſet of men we are now ſpeaking of, were ſo eminent for their rectitude, greatneſs of ſoul, and public ſpirit, at leaſt any of them but thoſe, who flouriſhed in the earlieſt times of the republic. Can any ſtate, that is continually graſping at univerſal empire, and aims at nothing but enſlaving all its neighbours, deſerve ſuch a ſhining character? And that the Roman republic had this ſolely in view, even almoſt from its very infancy, is evident from the moſt partial of its own hiſtorians. That public ſpirit, if any criminal paſſion deſerves ſuch a noble appellation, which ſerves only to cement the members of a community together, in order to enable them the more effectually to plunder and maſſacre all the reſt of their ſpecies, is, at moſt, no better than that principle, which unites a gang of robbers and aſſaſſins; and whether the Romans in general were not, from very remote times, actuated by ſuch a public ſpirit as this, will eaſily be determined by thoſe who have been but moderately converſant with their writers. The beſt therefore, in our opinion, that can be ſaid of the Romans of the age we are now upon, is, that they were worſe than any preceding generation of one of the moſt hypocritical, tyrannical, ambitious, and conſequently worſt nations, we read of in hiſtory. We muſt leave it to the consideration of our readers, whether their conduct has not been since equalled by that of a neighbouring nation, which has, for the best part of a century, been taught to distinguish between the letter and spirit of treaties, and which, with its liberty, seems to have lost the very notion of all public virtues.

The operations of the Romans against Carthage.

But to resume the thread of our history: the Carthaginians, having pacified Asdrubal, one of their generals, who, for some contumelious treatment, had advanced, at the head of twenty thousand men, almost to the gates of Carthage, in order to besiege it, reduced most of the open country to their obedience. Asdrubal, with his forces, posted himself advantageously before the town, supplying the inhabitants daily with vast quantities of provisions. At last the Roman army invested it, not doubting but it would fall an easy prey to them. Manilius attacked it by land, as Marcius did by sea; and both of them pushed on the siege with all the vigour they were capable of. But Asdrubal greatly retarded their approaches, by cutting off their parties sent to collect materials for framing the military machines; which he did, by drawing them insensibly into ambuscades prepared for that purpose. Manilius therefore could make no considerable impression on the city by land; and as Marcius, with the fleet, lay near the stagnum or great morass, the exhalations proceeding from thence, together with the heat of the season, infected the air, and carried off great numbers of his men. The garrison likewise repulsed the Romans in all the attacks they made, with the loss of abundance of men, and, by their vigorous sallies in the night, destroyed most of their works and battering engines. Asdrubal also, by his detachments, prevented their excursions, and intercepted their foragers; so that their cavalry was reduced to the utmost distress. As for Massiniſſa, a misunderstanding betwixt him and the Romans hindered the junction of their forces; so that the consuls reaped no advantage from the troops of that ally. They therefore judged it expedient, at present, to draw off from before the town. Marcius, with the fleet, endeavoured to ravage the coasts of Africa; but not being able to execute his design, he attacked the island Ægimurus, which surrendered to him. In the mean time Manilius moved towards the sea-coasts, to favour, as should seem, the operations of Marcius; but finding him not in a capacity to undertake any thing, he returned to his former camp before the walls of Carthage, having been harassed in his march by Himilco, surnamed ſurnamed Fabeas, or, according to Appian, Phameas, general of the Carthaginian horſe. However, the ſiege went on very ſlowly, Aſdrubal cloſely attending him, and deſtroying great numbers of his men on one ſide, whilſt the beſieged made an equal havock of them on the other, by their continual ſallies. The Romans were only in poſſeſſion of Saxus, Leptis, Cholla, and Utica; ſo that they were not a little ſtreightened for want of proviſions. We are told by Appian, that Cenſorinus played one vaſt ram againſt the walls with ſix thouſand foot, and another with a prodigious number of rowers, whoſe officers attended, doing their duty as if in an engagement; but, though a great breach was made, he could not ſtorm the place, the Carthaginians, after having repulſed him, repairing it in the night. In what manner the Carthaginians afterwards burnt the Roman fleet, and Scipio Æmilianus ſaved the Roman army, when it was upon the very brink of deſtruction, may be learnt from Appian, as well as a former part of this hiſtory [m].

In the mean time Maſiniſſa, drawing near his end, diſpatched a courier to Æmilianus, to appriſe him of it, and to deſire him to divide the dominions he was poſſeſſed of betwixt his three ſons, Micipſa, Gulufla, and Maſtanabal, as well as to aſſiſt them with his advice. This Scipio executed in the moſt prudent and equitable manner, as we ſhall ſee in the Numidian hiſtory. Whilſt this was tranſacting, Manilius reduced the ſtrong city of Tezaga, and gave the enemy a great defeat there, putting twelve thouſand of them to the ſword, and taking ſix thouſand priſoners. Some other places of ſtrength he likewiſe made himſelf maſter of before the concluſion of the campaign [n].

Phameas deſerts the Carthaginians.

The Carthaginians, about this time, ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs by the deſertion of Phameas, one of their beſt commanders, who went over to the Romans, after he had had an interview with Æmilianus, at the head of a body of two thouſand two hundred horſe. As he was an officer of great capacity, he did not a little contribute to the deſtruction of Carthage. For the particulars of this tranſaction, we muſt refer our readers to Appian [o].

The Carthaginians obtain ſome advantages over the Romans.

THE next campaign, the conſul Calpurnius Piſo, and his lieutenant Mancinus, conducted the war in Africa. The Carthaginians were ſo ſtrong this year, that they obtained ſeveral advantages over the Romans, and towards the cloſe of it, obliged them to raiſe the ſiege of Hippo Zaritus, which they had carried on the whole ſummer, after having burnt all their military machines. As for the ſiege of Carthage, that, for the preſent, ſeemed to be at a ſtand. The beſieged applied to Andriſcus, who pretended to be the ſon of Perſeus king of Macedon, for aſſiſtance, or at leaſt for a diverſion in their favour, by purſuing the war he was then engaged in againſt the Romans with vigour. In order the more ſtrongly to excite him to this, they promiſed him powerful ſupplies both of money and ſhips. However, they received no aſſiſtance from that quarter, the reaſon of which, as well as all the moſt important events of this campaign, our readers will find related in another place [o].

Bithyas, with a body of Numidian horſe comes over to the Carthaginians.

THE Carthaginian army, having been reinforced the preceding year with a body of eight hundred Numidian horſe, whoſe leader Bithyas had prevailed upon them to deſert Guluſſa, and the acceſſion of ſome other troops from Carthage, began to move very early out of its winter-quarters. As it had been obſerved, that neither Micipſa nor Maſtanabal, Maſiniſſa's other ſons, had ſent any ſupplies to the enemy, either of money or arms, notwithſtanding they had, for a long time paſt, promiſed them ſuch ſupplies, the Carthaginians reſumed their former courage, ſcoured the open country, and put all their places of ſtrength in the beſt poſture of defence. The advantages they had gained at Nepheris and Hippo, and the enemy's inability to puſh on the ſiege of Carthage, though the city was, in a manner, diſmantled, and the inhabitants diſarmed, inſpired them with a reſolution to defend themſelves to the laſt drop of blood. They ſent embaſſadors to Micipſa, Maſtanabal, and the independent Mauritanian princes, in order to form a powerful alliance againſt the Romans, inſinuating to thoſe princes, that, ſhould the African republic be once ſubverted by that haughty people, they muſt ſoon expect to meet with the ſame fate. Aſdrubal the Carthaginian general without the town, about about this time, deſiring the command of the troops within the city, poſſeſſed by another Aſdrubal, Guluſſa's nephew, accuſed him falſly of a deſign to betray the republic into that prince's hands. The innocent perſon was ſo thunder-ſtruck with the accuſation, which came entirely unlooked for, that he had nothing to offer in his own defence; ſo that he was inſtantly diſpatched upon the ſpot, without any further proceſs [P].

Soon after Piſo, with a body of troops, reduced ſome of the inland towns, leaving Mancinus, with the other part of the army, to continue the ſiege of Carthage. Mancinus, obſerving one part of the wall, which, by reaſon of its rocky ſituation, ſeemed inacceſſible, not guarded, found means to ſcale it, and take poſt in the town, with three thouſand five hundred men. But the Carthaginians not only prevented any ill conſeqences from this lodgment, but likewiſe cut off his retreat, and ſo ſurrounded him, that he muſt either have been deſtroyed, or ſtarved to a ſurrender, had not Æmilianus in the critical moment relieved him. This ſo diſheartened the Carthaginians, that they abandoned ſeveral poſts; which encouraged Æmilianus to make an attack upon Megara, a part of the city, which our readers will find already deſcribed. This was begun at midnight, by a ſelect body of troops, who had provided themſelves with axes, levers, and ſcaling-ladders, being led by the general himſelf. They advanced ſeveral ſtadia without the leaſt noiſe; but at laſt gave a ſudden and general ſhout, which ſtruck the enemy, who did not expect a viſit at ſo unſeaſonable an hour, with terror. However, recovering themſelves, they oppoſed the aſſailants with ſuch bravery, that Æmilianus found it impoſſible to mount the ramparts; but at laſt perceiving a tower very near the walls, and of an equal height with them, but without the city, abandoned by its guards, he detached thither a party of choice troops, who, by the help of pontons, made a lodgment on the walls, from whence deſcending into Megara, they immediately broke down the gates. Upon which Æmilianus entering with four thouſand of the flower of his troops, the enemy found themſelves obliged to retreat to Byrſa, in as great a conſternation as if the whole city had been taken, being followed even by the forces, that were encamped without the town. Asdrubal, finding the next morning what had happened, was extremely chagrined; and, either to gratify his resentment, or to reduce the besieged to a state of desperation, that they might behave with a greater degree of resolution in the defence of the place, massacred all the Roman prisoners he had taken, in the manner we have already related [q].

And fortifies his camp.

WHILST Asdrubal was thus venting his fury upon the Roman captives, and even murdering many Carthaginian senators, who had been so brave as to oppose his tyranny, Æmilianus was busy in drawing lines of circumvallation and contravallation cross the isthmus, which joined the peninsula, whereon Carthage stood, to the continent of Africa. That part of these lines, which fronted the city of Carthage, was strengthened by a wall twenty-five stadia long, and twelve foot high, flanked at proper distances with towers and redoubts; and on the middle tower was erected a very high wooden fort, from whence could be seen whatever was doing in the city. The enemy, who were within a darts cast of it, made their utmost efforts to put a stop to the work; but as the whole army was employed upon it day and night without intermission, it was finished in twenty-four days. The Carthaginians were doubly incommoded by this work; first, as it secured the Roman forces against their sallies; and secondly, as Æmilianus thereby cut off all provisions from them; which distressed them exceedingly. Bithyas indeed, who had been sent out to collect corn before Æmilianus made himself master of Megara, arrived soon after the consul had perfected his lines; but he durst not venture to attack them. However, he found means to convey by sea some small quantities to Asdrubal, who distributed what he received amongst his troops, without any regard to the inhabitants. That general seems to have been induced to this by the opposition he met with from the senators, who, being highly incensed at his enormous cruelty to the Roman prisoners, as it precluded them from all hopes of mercy, and, instead of encouraging, disheartened the troops, cried out, "That such an unjustifiable proceeding was highly unseasonable at a juncture, when they were ready to sink

"sink under the pressure of the publick calamities." A famine therefore ensued, which not a little contributed to the destruction of the city [r].

The Carthaginians again worsted.

THE besieged found themselves already reduced to great straights; but the progress Æmilianus had lately made in an attempt to stop up the mouth of the old harbour by a mole, that of the new one being already shut up by the Roman fleet, afforded them a much more melancholy prospect, than any thing that had yet happened to them. Being extremely alarmed, they resolved to take such measures, as might, if possible, defeat the enemy's design. Setting therefore all hands to work, with an industry scarce to be parallelled, they dug a new bason, and opened a communication with the sea; which enabled them to make head against the enemy once more upon that element; for, with the same diligence, they fitted out a fleet of fifty quinqueremes, with a vast number of other vessels, built chiefly of the old materials found in their magazines. This amazing work was completed so suddenly, and with such an impenetrable secrecy, that Æmilianus entertained not the least suspicion of it, till he saw their squadron appear at sea. Then his surprise was so great, thinking it impossible, that so weak an enemy should, as it were, in an instant become so formidable, that, Appian believes, the Carthaginians might have totally ruined the Roman fleet, had they immediately attacked it. This seems to have been no unreasonable supposition, because, as no such blow was expected, and every man otherwise employed, the Carthaginians would have found the Roman vessels destitute of rowers, soldiers and officers. However, two days after, both parties came to an action, and being greatly animated, the one by the hopes of preserving every thing dear and valuable to them, the other of finishing a conquest, which had cost them such an immense quantity of blood and treasure, they exerted themselves in an extraordinary manner. During the heat of the action, the Carthaginian brigantines, gliding along under the large Roman ships, broke to pieces many of their sterns, rudders, and oars; and, if at any time they found themselves pushed, they retreated with surprizing swiftness, and returned immediately to the charge.

The diſpute continued with equal ſucceſs till the evening, when the Carthaginians thought proper to retire, not under any apprehenſion of the enemy's ſuperiority, but in order to renew the engagement with greater advantage early the next morning. Their lighter veſſels, being extremely ſwift and numerous, ſoon occupied the harbour, and, by their multitude, ſhut up the mouth of it; ſo that thoſe of a larger ſize were excluded from thence, and obliged to take ſhelter under a very ſpacious terrace, which had been thrown up againſt the walls to unload goods, and on the ſide whereof a ſmall rampart had been raiſed during this war, to prevent the enemy from poſſeſſing themſelves of it. Here the fight began again early the following day with more vigour than ever, and continued till late at night; but at laſt, by the conduct and bravery of five galleys of Sida, the Carthaginians were obliged to retire, and ſail for ſhelter to the city. The next morning Æmilianus attacked the terrace; but was repulſed with prodigious ſlaughter by the beſieged, who burnt all his military machines. However, he afterwards carried it by aſſault, and having fortified it, ordered a wall to be built cloſe to thoſe of the city, and of equal height with them. When this was finiſhed, he commanded four thouſand men to mount it, and diſcharge ſhowers of darts and javelins upon the enemy, in order both to inſult and annoy them. As the troops on each ſide were upon a level, there was ſcarce a dart thrown but what did execution. The laſt action concluded the military operations of this campaign.[s]

Lælius gives Diogenes, one of the Carthaginian generals, a great overthrow.

In order the more effectually to cut off ſupplies of every kind from the beſieged, Æmilianus formed a deſign to reduce the places of ſtrength the Carthaginians had ſtill in their hands, particularly Nepheris, where they had a numerous body of forces ſtrongly encamped, commanded by Diogenes, one of Aſdrubal's intimate friends, who, by means of the new baſon above-mentioned, ſent continual convoys of proviſions to Carthage. The reduction of the other places he effected by detachments commanded by perſons that he could confide in; but that of the latter was accompliſhed by a body of troops under the conduct of Lælius, ſupported by Guluſſa's Numidian horſe. By the activity of theſe laſt, and the violence of the Numidian elephants, the whole whole Carthaginian army, conſiſting of eighty-four thouſand men, was either cut to pieces, or taken priſoners, except four thouſand, who diſperſed themſelves in the neighbouring villages. This happened before Æmilianus reſumed the operations againſt the city of Carthage, and induced the Africans, who were kept in awe by Diogenes, to abandon the Carthaginians [t].

Æmilianus taſtes Byrſa, and deſtroys Carthage.

Soon after Æmilianus formed two attacks, one againſt Byrſa, and the other againſt the Cothon. Having poſſeſſed himſelf of the wall, which ſurrounded the port or Cothon, he threw himſelf into the great ſquare of the city, that was near it; but the night not permitting him to penetrate farther, he ordered his ſoldiers to remain there till morning under arms. At break of day he received a reinforcement of four thouſand men from the camp, who, notwithſtanding all the efforts of their officers to the contrary, plundered the temple of Apollo, which was immenſely rich, and divided the booty amongſt themſelves, before they could be prevailed upon to advance againſt the enemy. Æmilianus, by the occupation of this ſquare, and poſſeſſion of the wall, being maſter of every part of the city, but Byrſa or the citadel, attempted to force his way to this laſt with inexpreſſible bravery. The Carthaginians having been greatly weakened by a famine, inſomuch that they had been obliged to feed, for ſome time, upon human fleſh, and had ſcarce ſtrength to handle their arms, he, in ſix days effected this. However, in the conteſt he loſt a vaſt number of men, and gained his point with the utmoſt difficulty. Moſt of thoſe who had fled into Byrſa, were ſo intimidated at the approach of the Roman army, that they ſurrendered upon the proconſul's granting them their lives. Aſdrubal, the commandant, ſoon after abandoned the reſt of them, and put himſelf into the hands of the Romans. His wife could not ſurvive ſuch an inſtance of perfidiouſneſs, cowardice, and inhumanity; and therefore, with nine hundred Roman deſerters, to whom Æmilianus had denied mercy, committed herſelf, as well as her children, to the flames, that deſtroyed both the citadel, and the famous temple of Æſculapius upon it. Appian tells us, that, before ſhe acted this tragedy, ſhe appeared in ſplendid attire, with her children, upon the walls, and addreſſed herſelf to Scipio in terms to the following effect: "May the gods, Roman, "be

" be propitious to you, who act according to the rules of " war; but may you, and the genius of Carthage, take " vengeance of that miſcreant Aſdrubal, the betrayer of his " wife, children, country, and religion!" Then turning to Aſdrubal, who ſtood by Æmilianus, " Abandoned vil- " lain, ſaid ſhe, and moſt cowardly of mortals! both I, " and theſe my children, ſhall be ſoon buried in theſe " flames; but as for you, great general of Carthage, what a " ſplendid triumph will you be reſerved to grace! What " tortures may you not expect to ſuffer!" This put a period to the ſtate of Carthage, and conſequently to the diſpute for the empire of the world, which had continued, almoſt without intermiſſion, betwixt two of the moſt famous republics to be met with in hiſtory, for the ſpace of an hundred and eighty years. What inſtructions the conſcript fathers at Rome ſent the proconſul, in relation to the total demolition of Carthage, and how, in conſequence of theſe inſtructions, that unfortunate city was entirely razed, the cities confederated with it diſmantled, as well as thoſe that had declared for the Romans rewarded, and the whole country appertaining to it turned into a province, together with many other particulars relative to the cataſtrophe we are now upon, our readers will find recited at large in the Roman hiſtory [u].

He carries off an immenſe quantity of plunder to Rome.

THUS fell Carthage, in the conſulate of C. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius, about a hundred and forty-ſix years before the commencement of the chriſtian æra; a city, whoſe deſtruction ought to be attributed more to the intrigues of an abandoned faction, compoſed of the moſt profligate part of its citizens, than to the power of its villainous rival, however formidable it might at that time appear. The treaſure Æmilianus carried off, even after the city had been delivered up to the ſoldiers to be plundered, according to the Roman military law, was ſo immenſe, that it exceeded all belief, Pliny making it amount to four (S) millions four hundred and ſeven thouſands weight of ſilver.

(S) This was not the only treaſure Æmilianus met with now in Carthage. According to Salluſt, he preſerved from the flames ſeveral valuable libraries, which he preſented to the ſons of Micipſa. The works of all the moſt noted Phœnician and Punic authors ſilver. The iniquity of the Roman conduct at the commencement, as well as through the whole courſe, of this war, is acknowledged by Velleius, and other hiſtorians, who cannot be ſuſpected of the leaſt partiality in favour of the Carthaginians, In fine, Rome, though, in a manner, miſtreſs of the world, could not imagine herſelf in a ſtate of ſecurity, as long as even the name of Carthage remained; ſo true is it, that a rivetted antipathy, fomented by long and bloody wars, continues even after all cauſe for fear is removed, thors were undoubtedly included in theſe collections, ſome of the principal of which, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were the following:

1. Dius, a celerated Phœnician hiſtorian, a fragment of whoſe work, relating to the friendly intercourſe betwixt Solomon and Hiram king of Tyre, has been preſerved to us by Joſephus, in the eighth book of his antiquities, and the firſt of his treatiſe againſt Apion.

2. Eumachus, a Carthaginian writer, cited by Phlegon, who, amongſt other things, related, that, whilſt the Carthaginians were drawing a line round Africa Propria, they diſcovered two human ſkeletons, depoſited in two coffins, of an enormous ſize. One of theſe, according to Phlegon, was twenty-three cubits long, and the other twenty-four. The age in which this author lived, has not been hitherto diſcovered.

3. Hieronymus Ægyptius, who, according to Freculphus Lexovienſis, a chonological hiſtorian, that lived near nine hundred years ago, wrote a hiſtory of Phœnicia. For a further account of him, we muſt refer to onr readers to Voſſius.

4. Heſtiæus Mileſius, a compiler of Phœnician hiſtory, taken notice of by Joſephus, in the tenth book of his Jewiſh antiquities.

5. Hypſicrates, a native, as ſhould ſeem, of Phœnicia, who compoſed a hiſtory of that country in the Phœnician language. A Greek tranſlation of this author, done by one Chætus, if not the original itſelf, was extant in the time of Tatian. He is likewiſe taken notice of by Euſebius, in the tenth book of his Præparatio evangelica.

6. Iolaus, a compiler of Phœnician hiſtory, whoſe works are all loſt, except a few fragments, which ſeem entirely fabulous. From what Bochart, Geſner, and Voſſius, have related of him, the loſs of his performance is not greatly to be regretted.

7. Mochus or Moſchus, a Phœnician, who wrote the hiſtory of his own country in his mother-tongue. Chætus above-mentioned tranſlated this piece into Greek. Joſephus, Tatian, and Athenæus, ſupply us with the ſhort account we have of him.

8. Moſchus

removed, and does not ceaſe, till the object that occaſions it is no more. The Romans ordered it never to be inhabited again, denouncing dreadful imprecations againſt thoſe, who, contrary to this prohibition, ſhould attempt to rebuild any part of it, eſpecially Byrſa and Megara. However, all perſons who deſired it, were admitted to ſee Carthage, nothing affording Æmilianus a higher ſatisfaction, than to have people view the ruins of a city, which had contended with Rome for ſuperiority ſuch a ſeries of years. The Carthaginian priſoners, ſent to Rome, were diſtributed in the various provinces of Italy, as already related. In confirmation of what we have advanced above concerning the duration of Carthage, we muſt here beg leave to obſerve, that Syncellus aſſerts this city to have ſtood ſeven hundred

8. Moſchus Sidonius, a native of Sidon, who, according to Strabo, ſeems to have been the founder of the atomical philoſophy.

9. Procles, a Carthaginian hiſtorian, ſome of whoſe fragments have been preſerved to us by Pauſanias.

10. Sanchoniatho, a Phœnician hiſtorian, who, according to the moſt received opinion, lived a little before the ſiege of Troy. He extracted his hiſtory, which was written in the Phœnician language, partly from the records of cities, and partly from the ſacred writings depoſited in temples. Philo of Byblus, who according to Suidas, lived in the reign of Hadrian, tranſlated this hiſtory into Greek, ſome extracts of which we find in the firſt book of Euſebius's Præparatio evangelica. Suidas informs us, that he wrote one treatiſe of the religious inſtitutions of the Phœnicians; another of Hermes's phyſiology; and a third of the Egyptian theology. Porphyry makes him to have been of Berytus; but he was of Tyre, if we will give credit to Athenæus.

11. Theodotus, a writer of Phœnician hiſtory, whoſe performance Chætus tranſlated into Greek. Our readers wi l find every thing relating to him, that antiquity has ſupplied us with, in Bochart and Voſſius (25).

hundred and forty-eight years, which almoſt entirely correſponds with ſir Iſaac Newton, Salmaſius, Petavius, &c. and therefore may be conſidered as an additional argument in favour of what thoſe great men have offered on that head [w].

ABOUT twenty-four years after this ſtately metropolis had been laid in aſhes by Æmilianus, purſuant to the orders of the ſenate, C. Gracchus, tribune of the people, in order to ingratiate himſelf with them, undertook to rebuild it, and, to that end, conducted thither a colony of ſix thouſand Roman citizens. The workmen, according to Plutarch, were terrified by many unlucky omens, at the time they were tracing the limits, and laying the foundation of the new city; which the ſenate being informed of, would have ſuſpended the attempt: but the tribune, little affected with ſuch preſages, continued carrying on the work, and finiſhed it in a few days. From hence it ſeems probable, that only a ſlight kind of huts were erected, eſpecially ſince we are told by Velleius, that Marius, after his flight into Africa, lived in a poor, mean condition amidſt the ruins of Carthage, conſoling himſelf by the ſight of ſo aſtoniſhing a ſpectacle, and himſelf at the ſame time ſerving, in ſome meaſure, as a conſolation to that ill-fated city. But whether Gracchus executed his deſign, as Plutarch intimates, or the work was entirely diſcontinued, in compliance with the ſenate's orders, as Appian ſuggeſts, it is certain this was the firſt Roman colony, that ever was ſent out of Italy [x].

Carthage afterwards rebuilt by the Romans themſelves.

APPIAN relates, that Julius Cæſar, having landed his forces in Africa, to put an end to the war with Pompey's adherents there, ſaw, in a dream, an army compoſed of a prodigious number of ſoldiers, who, with tears in their eyes, called him; and that, ſtruck with the viſion, he wrote down in his pocket-book the deſign he formed, on this occaſion, of rebuilding Carthage and Corinth; but that being murdered ſoon after in the curia at Rome by the conſpirators, he was not able to execute it. However, ſays the ſame author, Auguſtus Cæſar, his adopted ſon, finding this memoir amongſt amongſt his papers, built a city at ſome ſmall diſtance from the ſpot on which antient Carthage ſtood, which he called by the ſame name, in order to avoid the ill effects of thoſe imprecations, which had been vented at the time of its deſtruction. Thither he ſent a colony of three thouſand men, who were ſoon joined by conſiderable numbers from the neighbouring towns. But this notion, however it may have been received by Appian, is not conſiſtent with what we find advanced by Strabo, who intimates, that both Carthage and Corinth were rebuilt at the ſame time by Julius Cæſar. It is certain this laſt author, who flouriſhed in the reign of Tiberius, affirms Carthage in his time to have been equal, if not ſuperior, to the largeſt city in Africa; which can ſcarce be admitted, if we ſuppoſe it to have been built by Auguſtus, after the concluſion of all his wars; and, till that time, it is not natural to ſuppoſe him to have built it. Be that as it will, Plutarch follows Strabo, and therefore, in oppoſition to Appian, gives a ſanction to his authority. Pliny mentions it as a very conſiderable colony in his days, though the town then was not of ſo large an extent, as that deſtroyed by Æmilianus. Solinus gives us to underſtand, that the town built by Gracchus was called Junonia, and, for ſome time, of little note, agreeable to what we have hinted above. However, he informs us, that, in the conſulate of M. Antoninus and P. Dolabella, it made ſuch a figure, that it was eſteemed the ſecond city in the Roman dominions; which, in our opinion, adds ſome weight to the laſt obſervation of Strabo. It was looked upon as the capital of Africa for ſeveral centuries after the commencement of the chriſtian æra. Maxentius laid it in aſhes about the ſixth or ſeventh year of Conſtantine's reign. Genſeric, king of the Vandals, took it A. C. 439. but, about a century afterwards, it was re-annexed to the Roman empire by that renowned commander Beliſarius. At laſt the Saracens, under Mohammed's ſucceſſors, towards the cloſe of the ſeventh century, ſo completely deſtroyed it, that no other traces or footſteps of it are now to be diſcovered, than thoſe we have already taken notice of in the firſt ſection of the Carthaginian hiſtory [y].

BOOK IV.

CHAP. I.

The history of the Numidians, to the conquest of their country by the Romans.

SECT. I.

Description of Numidia.

THE limits of the region, called Numidia, have been differently defined by the antient geographers. Pliny gives that name to the tract lying between the rivers Tusca and Ampsaga; which includes the Numidia Nova of Ptolemy, together with the district of the Cirtesii. Mela affirms it to have extended from the river Molochath or Mulucha, to the borders of Africa Propria, which he seems to have fixed at a small distance from the city of Cirta. But its boundaries are certainly the best ascertained by Strabo, who, in conformity with what has been advanced by Polybius, Livy, and Dio, makes it to have comprehended the kingdoms of the Massyli and Masœsyli, the last of which was bounded on the west by the Mulucha, as the first was on the east by the Tusca. Dionysius Afer, Silius Italicus, and Appian, as well asthe former historians, add no small weight to Strabo; for which reason, our readers will permit us to give a geographical description of Numidia upon the plan he has laid down [a].

The limits of Numidia.

NUMIDIA then was limited on the north by the Mediterranean; on the south by Gætulia, or part of Libya Interior; on the west by the Mulucha, which separated it from Mauritania; and on the east by the Tusca, a boundary it had in common with Africa Propria. If we suppose Malva, Malvana, Mulucha, Molochath, and the present Mullooïah of the Algerines to be the same river, and the modern Zaine to correspond with the antient Tusca, as the learned and ingenious nious Dr. Shaw ſeems to have rendered probable, this tract was above five hundred miles in length, Twunt, the weſtern Algerine frontier, about fifty miles to the eaſt of the former river, being in 0° 16′ W. long. from London, and Tabarka, the antient Tabraca, upon the latter, in 9° 16′ to the eaſt of that city. The breadth cannot be ſo eaſily aſcertained; but, ſuppoſing it to have been nearly the ſame with that of the preſent kingdom of Algiers, as there is good reaſon to apprehend it was, in the narroweſt part it muſt have been about forty miles, that being the diſtance near Tlemſan from the deſert or Saraha to the ſea-coaſt, and above a hundred in the broadeſt, Jijel being in N. lat. 36° 55′, and Lowtaiah, ſituated amongſt the mountains of Atlas, in 34° 50′. In the Carthaginian times, Numidia contained two conſiderable nations, the moſt powerful of which, according to Strabo, was called the Maſſyli, and the other the Maſœſyli or Maſſœſyli. The country inhabited by the Maſſœſyli is, by ſome authors, eſteemed a part of Mauritania; but Polybius, Livy, and Strabo, whoſe authority will bear down that of all other writers in the point before us, are of another opinion. However, that it was conſidered as appertaining to Mauritania in after-ages by the Romans, we learn from Dio, who not only intimates this, but likewiſe aſſerts, that it had the name of Mauritania Cæſarienſis given it by the emperor Claudius[b].

Numidia had different bounds assigned to it at different times.

The extent of Numidia.

NUMIDIA, including Numidia Propria, or the country of the Maſſyli, and Mauritania Cæſarienſis, or that of the Maſæſyli, extended from 34° 50′ to 37° N. lat. and from 1° 15′ W. to 9° 16′ E. of London. Ptolemy is as inaccurate and erroneous in his geography of this country, as we have before ſhewn him to be in that of Africa Propria; for he places The Great Promontory in 35°, and the Ampſaga in 31° 45′ N. lat. and ſo in proportion of the interjacent places, whereby that part of the coaſt is laid down nearly in an E. S. E. directi on; whereas, according to the lateſt obſervations, to the Promontorium Apollinis it is N. E. and from thence to the Ampſaga, inclining to the N. In ſhort, according to the ſame obſervations, Ptolemy differs ſo widely from the truth in the whole, that thoſe places, which he has fixed in a ſouthern inclination, ſhould have had a northern one; and The Great Promontory, which he has placed placed 3° 15′ to the northward of the Ampſaga, is really 1° 37′ S. of it. Several places likewiſe of this country he has put five degrees farther ſouth, than, in fact, they are found to be. The region formerly poſſeſſed by the Maſſyli, from the moſt accurate obſervations of the moderns, in conjunction with the hints given us by the antients, ſeems to have extended itſelf from 34° 50′ to 37° N. lat. and from 6° 30′ to 9° 60′ E. long. from London. From hence the ſituation and extent of the Maſæſylian kingdom may likewiſe be eaſily determined [c].

The country of the Maſſyli.

THE country of the Maſſyli, Numidia Propria, or, as ſome authors call it, Terra Metagonitis, was ſeparated from the proper territory of Carthage by its eaſtern boundary the river Tuſca, and from the kingdom of the Maſæſyli, or Mauritania Cæſarienſis, if we will believe Pliny, by the Ampſaga. It ſeems to correſpond with that part of the province of Conſtantina lying between the Zaine and the Wed el Kibeer, which is above an hundred and thirty miles long, and more than an hundred broad. The ſea-coaſt of this province is, for the moſt part, mountainous and rocky, anſwering appoſitely enough to the appellation given it by Abulfeda, viz. El Adwah, the high or lofty. It is far from being equal in extent to the territories that formed the kingdom of the Maſæſyli, though this nation is repreſented as leſs potent than the Maſſyli by Strabo. We ſhall only mention ſuch of the principal places ſeated in it, as have been taken the greateſt notice of by the antients, the bounds we have preſcribed ourſelves obliging us, at preſent, to paſs over all the reſt [d].

Cirta.

THE capital city of this province, or rather kingdom, was Cirta, a place of very conſiderable note amongſt the antients. It ſtood about forty-eight miles from the ſea, and at a ſmall diſtance from the Ampſaga. According to Strabo, it was a fortreſs of great ſtrength, and abundantly ſupplied with all neceſſaries, as well as much improved, through the great care of Micipſa, who invited a good number of Greeks to come and reſide in it. Mela and Pliny intimate, that it was likewiſe known by the name of Sittianorum Colonia in their time, and in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate, when under the dominion of Syphax. The latter name it received from the colony colony ſettled there by P. Sittius, who, having been of ſingular ſervice to Cæſar in the African war, received a great extent of territory in thoſe parts, which formerly belonged to Manaſſes, one of Juba's confederates, from that prince, as we learn from Appian and Dio; for which reaſon we find it called Cirta Julia by Ptolemy, who names the territory adjacent to it, the diſtrict of the Cirteſii, which he ſeparates from Numidia, making it to include the cities of Vaga, Miræum, Lares, Ætara, and Azama. That Cirta was one of the largeſt, as well as ſtrongeſt, cities of Numidia, is evident both from the extent of its ruins, which are ſtill to be ſeen, and the commodiouſneſs of its ſituation; for the greateſt part of it was built upon a kind of peninſular promontory, inacceſſible on all ſides, except towards the ſouth-weſt. This promontory was above a mile in circumference, inclining a little to the ſouthward, but terminating in a precipice of a northern direction, and above an hundred fathom in perpendicular. Here a beautiful landſkip aroſe from a moſt agreeable variety of vales, mountains, and rivers, which extended themſelves to a great diſtance. To the eaſtward the proſpect was bounded by an adjacent range of rocks, much higher than the city; but, towards the ſouth-eaſt, the country was more open, entertaining the citizens of Cirta with a diſtant view of the high mountain, called at preſent Ziganeah, as well as thoſe large and fertile eminences, whoſe modern name is Seedy Rougeiſe. The peninſular promontory above-mentioned, in the direction we are now upon, was ſeparated from the neighbouring plains by a deep, narrow valley, perpendicular on both ſides, where a rivulet, that ſeems to have been a branch of the Ampſaga, the modern Rummel of the Algerines, conveyed its ſtream, and over which there was formerly a bridge of moſt excellent workmanſhip. The iſthmus, near which ſtood the principal gate of the city, is about half a ſtadium broad, being entirely covered at preſent with a ſeries of broken walls, ciſterns, and other ruins, continued down to the river, and carried on from thence over a ſmall plain parallel to the valley above deſcribed. The moſt eminent fragments of antiquity ſtill remaining are, 1. A particular ſet of ciſterns near the centre of the city, being about twenty in number, and forming an area of fifty yards ſquare. 2. The aqueduct, whoſe remains, though in a much more ruinous condition than the ciſterns, ſufficiently demonſtrate the wealth, public ſpirit, and magnificence of the Numidian princes, who held their reſidence here. 3. Part of a large and noble edifice, four of whoſe baſes, ſeven foot in diameter, ſtill in their places, ſeem to have formed part of the portico. This ſtands upon the brink of a precipice to the northward, and is the place where the Turkiſh garriſon of Conſtantina is always poſted. That name was given Cirta in the reign of Conſtantine the Great, who repaired and adorned it, according to Aurelius Victor. Cirta was the metropolis of Maſiniſſa's dominions, that prince himſelf, his father Gala, and ſeveral other kings of the ſame family, reſiding there, as we learn from Polybius, Livy, and others. Strabo informs us, that Micipſa took care to render it ſo large, populous, and flouriſhing, that, in his time, it could ſend into the field an army of twenty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe. From its name it appears to be a city of a very high antiquity, and founded by the Phœnicians, even before Dido's arrival in Africa; for Cirta or Certa ſeems to have ſignified city in the Phœnician language when Hercules built Carteia, about the time that he firſt came into thoſe parts, as we learn from Heſychius, who tells us, that one of his names was Melicerta, i. e. king of Certa, Cirta, or the city. We have likewiſe already obſerved, that the Canaanites or Phœnicians, when expelled their native country by Joſhua, fled into Numidia; and that ſeveral proper names of places here were Phœnician; nay, we have, from ſome good authors, rendered it probable, that the Phœnicians ſettled in Numidia and Mauritania long before the Iſraelites diſpoſſeſſed them of the land of Canaan. It may not be improper to add, that the antient Cirta was much larger than the modern Conſtantina, which is about 6° 36′ eaſt of London, and in north latitude 36° 20′ [e].

VAGA, a large city, according to Ptolemy, a few miles eaſt of Cirta. Plutarch calls it Baga, and Salluſt Vacca; which is the name likewiſe given it by Silius, Pliny, and St. Auſtin. The Romans placed a ſtrong garriſon here under the command of Turpilius, as we learn from Salluſt and Plutarch [f]. Vaga.

Lares.

LARES, a town ſouth-eaſt of Cirta, taken notice of by Ptolemy, which ſome think different from that in the itinerary called Laribus Colonia, or, according to Schottus, Laribum Colonia. This place is mentioned by Salluſt, and other antient authors [g].

Azama

AZAMA, a town which Ptolemy makes to be fifteen days journey diſtant from Carthage, lying ſouth-eaſt of Cirta. Some authors imagine this to be the ſame with Zama, a large and magnificent city, and famous for the ſignal defeat Hannibal reeeived near it. But this is rendered improbable by Livy and Polybius, who fix Zama on a ſpot at leaſt two thirds nearer Carthage. Mirœum and Ætara, the other two places in the diſtrict of the Cirteſii, taken notice of by Ptolemy, are ſo obſcure, that it is ſufficient juſt to have mentioned them [h].

Collops Magnus.

ABOUT eighteen miles from the Ampſaga, at the weſtern bottom of the Sinus Numidicus, or, as it is now called, the gulf of Stora, ſtood the Cullu, or Collops Magnus, of Pliny and Ptolemy. There is nothing remaining at preſent of this antient city, but a few miſerable houſes, and a ſmall fort. The modern name is Cull, which, as well as the antient, might be derived from a ſmall port before it, Culla in Arabic and Phœnician ſignifying a port. At the eaſtern extremity of the ſame gulf was the Ruſicada of Ptolemy, the Sgigata or Stora of the moderns. A few ciſterns, converted at preſent into magazines for corn, are the only tokens of antiquity diſcernible in it. The antient geographers have fixed it fifty or ſixty Roman miles from Cullu; whereas in reality it was not above thirty. The adjacent rivulet ſeems to be the Tapſas of Vibius Sequeſter [i].

Tacatua.

NOT many miles to the north-eaſt ſtood the Tacatua of Pliny, Ptolemy, and the itinerary, the Tuckuſh of the Algerines, at preſent a pleaſant village, with a fruitful country round about it. At ſome diſtance from it, in an eaſtern direction, was the Sulluco or Collops Parvus of Ptolemy, the modern ſmall port of Tagodeite [k].

AT the weſtern extremity of the gulf of Hippo, upon the river Armua, was the city of Hippo Regius, a place we have had occaſion to mention frequently in the Roman and Carthaginian hiſtory. Upon the ſpot of ground formerly occupied by that city, a great heap of ruins is ſtill to be ſeen. According to Leo Africanus, the city of Bona, or, as the Moors call it, Blaid el Aneb, Town of Jujebs, from the plenty of them gathered in the neighbourhood, about a mile farther to the north, was built out of theſe ruins. This ſeems to be confirmed by the name Bona, which is undoubtedly a corruption of Hippo or Hippona. It is probable, that Bona has the ſame ſituation that Ptolemy's Aphrodiſium had, ſince he places it fifteen miles to the north of Hippo. The ruins of Hippo take up a ſpace about half a league in circumference, conſiſting, as uſual, of large broken walls and ciſterns. This city was called Hippo Regius, becauſe it was, for ſome time, the ſeat of the Numidian kings, as Silius Italicus informs us. And indeed its commodious ſituation both for hunting and commerce, the ſalubrity of the air its inhabitants breathed, the delightful proſpect they enjoyed, which took in the ſea, a ſpacious harbour, a variety of mountains covered with trees, and plains diverſified with rivers, fountains, and fertile ſpots of ground, in a moſt beautiful manner, all at once, demonſtrate this city to be as worthy of ſuch an honour, as any other in the Numidian dominions. We have before ſhewn the word Hippo to be of Phœnician extraction, which is a proof, that the antient inhabitants were of the ſame origin. We ſhall reſerve the deſcription of Bona for the hiſtory of Algiers, to which it will more properly belong [1]. Hippo Regius.

THABRACA or Tabraca was a maritime city of Numidia Propria, ſeated on the weſtern bank of the Tuſca. Mela, Juvenal, Pliny, Ptolemy, and St. Auſtin, all make mention of it. Pliny inſinuates, that it was a Roman colony in the latter ages. The ruins of it are ſtill remaining, and out of them has ſprung the modern Tabarca, where there are ſeveral broken walls and ciſterns, with a ſmall fort and garriſon of Tuniſeens. Bochart ſays, that Thabraca was a Phœnician word, and equi- Tabraca.

Naragara. NARAGARA or Nadagara, a very antient town, ſituated at a conſiderable diſtance ſouth-weſt of Tabraca, on the confines of Africa Propria. Here, towards the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, Scipio is ſaid to have encamped for the benefit of the water, Hannibal at the ſame time taking poſt upon an eminence four miles diſtant from him. Polybius ſeems to have called this place Margaron. It is ſuppoſed, that ſome fragments of an aqueduct, and other traces of this antient city, are ſtill to be ſeen [n].

Sicca. SOMEWHERE in this tract we are to look for Sicca, Sicca Venerea, or, as ſome will have it, Venerea. But, as we have taken notice of this place elſewhere, as well as the lewd cuſtom prevailing in it, and as its ſituation cannot, with any preciſion, be aſcertained, we ſhall drop all further particulars relating to it [o].

Thirmida. THIRMIDA, a town of this province, where Hiempſal, according to Salluſt, loſt his life; but whether it ſtood on the borders of the Maſſyli, or remote from them, for want of ſufficient light from hiſtory, we ſhall not take upon us to determine [p].

Suthul. SUTHUL, a city where that prince's treaſure was depoſited, as we are informed by the ſame hiſtorian. It ſhould ſeem probable from ſome hints he gives, that it could not be very remote from Thirmida [q]

Madaura. MADAURA, a city, as may be inferred from St. Auſtin, in the neighbourhood of Sicca Venerea, Tagaſte, and Hippo Regius. It was famous for the birth of Apuleius the Platonic philoſopher; which is all we can ſay of it [r]. As

As for Sava, Gemellæ, Calama, Lambeſa, Theveſte, Tadutti, Sigus, Tipaſa, Simiſthu, Lamaſba, and an infinite number of other obſcure places, mentioned chiefly, if not ſolely, by Ptolemy, the Itinerary, Peutinger's table, the Notitia, Æthicus, Oroſius, and others, who lived below that period of time, to which we muſt here confine ourſelves, as they cannot improve our idea of any ſingle fact or circumſtance relative to the hiſtory we are now upon, our readers will not only excuſe a deſcription, but even a bare enumeration of them. It will be ſufficient, in order to compleat our geographical deſcription of this province, to give a ſuccinct account of the moſt remarkable mountains, promontories, rivers, fountains, iſlands, and ſome of the principal curioſities of it, to which we ſhall beg leave to premiſe a word or two concerning the mediterranean part of it [s]. Sava, &c.

WE have already obſerved, that the ſea-coaſt of this province was, for the moſt part, mountainous and rocky. To which we ſhall add, that the inner or mediterranean part was diverſified with a beautiful interchange of hills and plains, which grew leſs capable of culture, in proportion as it approached the Sahara. In many places, for ſeveral leagues together, nothing was to be ſeen but a ſolitary deſert, void both of all animals, and every thing proper for their ſupport; in others fruitful diſtricts, abounding with gardens producing great plenty of the moſt delicious pomgranates, apples, &c. afforded a moſt delightful proſpect to travellers. But the natural hiſtory, both of Numidia Propria, and Mauritania Cæſarienſis, our readers may expect in a proper place [t]. The ſeacoaſt of this province mountainous.

THE firſt ridge of mountains we ſhall take notice of, is that upon the borders of Gætulia, which terminated the country between the parallels of Sitifi and Cirta, called by the antients Buzara. 2. That called Thambes, extending itſelf as far as Tabraca. 3. The Mampſarus of Ptolemy, upon the frontiers of Gætulia, which ſeparated that country, or the Sahara, from the Mauritania Sitifenſis. 4. The Mons Audus of Ptolemy, or the Mons Auraſius of the middle age, known at preſent amongſt the Turks by the name Jibbel Aureſs or Evreſs. All of which will hereafter be minutely deſcribed [u]. The mountains of it.

THE firſt promontory that falls under our obſervation is the Tritum of Strabo, and the Metagonium of Mela, about ſix leagues to the eaſtward of the Ampſaga, called at preſent the Sebba Rous, or Seven Capes, by the Algerines. 2. The Hippi Promontorium of Ptolemy, the Mabra of the ſea-charts, about twenty leagues eaſt of the former. It goes now among the Algerines by the name Ras el Hamrah, i. e. The Red Cape, and has the ruins of two ſmall buildings upon it. 3. Scarce a league diſtant from the Hippi Promontorium, to the northward, is the Stoborrum Promontorium of Ptolemy. This was in the gulf of Hippo, and about a league from the city of that name [w].

The rivers. OF the rivers which water Numidia Propria, the moſt remarkable are the following: 1. The Ampſaga, which ſeparated this region from that of the Maſæſyli or Mauritania Cæſarienſis. That river fell into the ſea about ſix leagues to the weſt of Cullu, and is at preſent named the Wed el Kibeer, or Great River; which very well tallies with the ſignification of the word Ampſaga, Aphſah importing in Arabic broad, large, ample, &c. At preſent it appears to be made up of the following branches: The Wed el Dſahab, River of Gold, whoſe ſource is at Kaſbaite, a heap of ruins ſixty miles to the ſouth-weſt; the rivulet of Jimmeelah, in the ſame direction nearly with the Wed el Dſahab, but at a little more than forty miles diſtance; the Wed el Hammam, twenty miles to the weſt of Conſtantina; the Wed el Sigan, fifteen miles to the ſouth-weſt from Phyſgeah; and the ſprings of Hydrah, about half that diſtance to the ſouth-eaſt. The modern geographers have generally conducted the chanel of their Ampſaga towards the gulf of Cull; whereas the Wed el Kibeer, which truly anſwers to the Ampſaga of the antients, has no ſuch direction, but falls into the ſea ſix leagues to the weſtward. Cellarius ſeems to fix its ſource in that ridge of mountains, by Ptolemy called Buzara, upon the borders of the Sabara; which runs counter to the lateſt and moſt accurate obſervations. 2. The Armua of Pliny, the modern Sei-bouſe, which emptied itſelf into the weſtern extremity of the gulf of Hippo. This frequently lodges great quantities of roots and trunks of trees on the neighbouring ſhore, and, by reaſon reaſon of the low ſituation of the adjacent country, occaſions frequent inundations. 3. The Rubricatus of Ptolemy, or Ma-fragg of the Algerines, has its fountains on ſome hills, that lie at a little diſtance to the ſouth of Hippo, its mouth being about four leagues eaſterly from that of the Armua. Bochart thinks, that the word Rubricatus is a Latin one, equivalent to the Punic or Phœnician Siſara, i. e. Red or Purple; and that both the river and the lake ſo called deduced their name from that dye, the preparation of which the Africans and Carthaginians were ſo famous for; which notion ſeems to be confirmed by Pliny and Dioſcorides, but particularly by Herodotus, who informs us, that the Zygantes, the antient inhabitants of this country, beſmeared themſelves with a liquid ſubſtance of that colour. We are told, that the mouth of this river is at preſent generally ſtopped up with a high bank of ſand, raiſed by the north and north-eaſt winds; ſo that it is ſeldom open, but after long and heavy rains. 4. The Tuſca, called now the Zaine, the boundary of this province on the ſide of Africa Propria. It is ſaid, that, in the language of the neighbouring Kabyles, or remains of the old Africans, the word Zaine denotes an oak-tree, and conſequently approaches pretty near in ſignification to Thabraca, the Phœnician name of the frontier town upon this river above-mentioned. The Zaine has its ſource in the adjacent mountains; which is contrary to what Leo has advanced [x].

ALL the moſt noted fountains of this tract are reducible to two heads: 1. Thoſe to which the principal rivers owe their origin, that have been juſt touched upon. And, 2. That in the neighbourhood of Zama, whoſe waters, if drunk copiouſly, rendered the voice loud and ſonorous, according to Pliny and Vitruvius. This extraordinary quality, if Bochart may be credited, gave name both to the fountain and the town; for זמר Zamar, cecinit, ſonorus fuit, and in Pihel זמר Zimmer, canere fecit, ſonorum eſſe fecit, &c. plainly allude to it. The eliſion of the R was very common in the oriental words adopted into other languages; as in Vacca from בקר Bacar, Μᾶσσα from מוסר Muſar, Mappa from מפר Mapar, &c. The Town of Zamar Fountains.

was ſituated near the ſource of the Ampſaga; and if we ſuppoſe it to have occupied the ſame ſpot of ground that Marmol's Zamor or Zamora does, Bochart's etymon will appear extremely probable. Zama was the city in which king Juba reſided, and was levelled with the ground by the Romans, according to Stabo [y].

THE only iſlands, as far as we can recollect, that were ever ſuppoſed to have been adjacent to this region, were, 1. The Inſulæ Naxicæ or Pithecuſæ of Scylax, oppoſite to Collops Magnus, which we apprehend rather to have belonged to Europe than Africa. 2. The iſland of Tabraca near the mouth of the Zaine, or Tuſca, now in the poſſeſſion of the Genoeſe, who pay an annual rent for it to the regency of Algiers [z].

Curioſities of this province.

THE principal curioſities of Numidia Propria are, 1. The large marſhy plain between Blaid el Aneb and Hippo, with the river Booemah, which hath a bridge of Roman workmanſhip upon it. 2. The Roman inſcriptions found diſperſed all over this province. 3. The rich lead mines in the mountains of Beni Boo-Taleb. 4. The lukewarm ſprings, bubbling within a learge ſquare baſon of Roman workmanſhip, which ſeem to be the Aquæ Calidæ or Aquæ Tibilitanæ of the antients, lying about ten leagues to the ſouth-weſt of Hippo Regius, and ſixteen to the eaſt of Cirta or Conſtantina. To which we might add ſeveral others, did we not reſerve them for the natural hiſtory of the kingdom of Algiers [a].

The limits and extent of the Regio Maſæſylorum.

THE limits and extent of the Regio Maſæſylorum of Strabo, or the Mauritania Cæſarienſis of Dio, being that tract lying between the Mulucha and Ampſaga, is already aſcertained, by the determination of thoſe of Numidia in general, and Numidia Propria, or the country of the Maſſyli, in particular. The length indeed of the former province much exceeded that of the latter; but its breadth was not conſiderable, being at a mean only about twenty leagues, except in that part, which bordered upon the confines of the Maſſyli. It lay betwixt 34° 30′ and 37° N. lat. and extended from 1° 15′ W. to 6° 30′ E. long. from London, including that part of the country of the weſtern Moors bounded on the weſt by the Mullooïa, and on the eaſt IGILGILI, a town of this tract, about ſeven leagues to the weſtward of the Ampſaga, where, according to Pliny, Auguſtus planted a Roman colony. Ptolemy places this town half a degree to the ſouthward of Saldæ, in a ſituation contrary to that of the modern Jijel, which lies twelve miles more to the northward, though Dr. Shaw takes this place to be the Igilgili of the antients. It is ſcarce to be doubted but this town was much older than the time of Auguſtus, becauſe the name Igilgili, which Pliny intimates it to have had in the Auguſtan age, was apparently not of Roman extraction [a]. Igilgili.

SALDÆ, another place where Auguſtus planted a Roman colony. Ptolemy makes it to be two degrees diſtant from Igilgili, and the itinerary ninety-three miles; which is falſe, if, with the traveller above-mentioned, we admit the modern Boujeiah to be the antient Saldæ. As there is no manner of affinity betwixt the names Boujeiah and Saldæ, and the city, which goes by the former name, is but thirteen leagues from Jijel, the ſuppoſed Igilgili of the antients, perhaps our ſagacious readers will be inclined to believe them two different towns; which ſentiment we own ourſelves diſpoſed to entertain [b]. Saldæ, RUSAZUS, another Auguſtan colony weſt of Saldæ, taken notice of by Pliny, Ptolemy, and the itinerary. Ruſazus.

(A) It is probable, that Miltine a town mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, muſt have been near the confines of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, or in that province, but the particular ſpot it occupied, we cannot take upon us to determine. It ſeems probable, from what we find hinted of it by Diodorus, to have been a place of conſiderable force, and ſituated in a populous country. As for the cities of Tocas, Phellina, Maſchala, Acris, &c. they ſeem to have had their ſituation near the borders of Africa Propria. For a confirmation of this, we muſt refer our readers to a former note, (1).

(1) Univerſ. hiſt. vol. xvi. p. 191. (Z)

We remember not this place to be famous in history for any remarkable transaction that happened in or near it [c].

Rusucurium. RUSUCURIUM, a city in the neighbourhood of the former, that was highly distinguished by the emperor Claudius, who conferred great honours upon it, as we are informed by Pliny [d].

Rusconium. RUSCONIUM, another Roman colony, that owed its origin to Augustus, seated near the mouth of the Serbes or Serbetis. Ptolemy calls it Rustonium; but we apprehend, that he ought to be corrected by Pliny. In the itinerary we find it named Rusguniæ Colonia. It has been imagined, that a small castle on cape Temendfuse or Metafus, fifteen miles east of Algiers, in situation answers pretty nearly to it; because Icosium, which is supposed to have corresponded with the present Algiers, and Rusconium, had the same distance, and were placed in the same direction, according to the itinerary. If this be admitted, Rusconium had a Cothon, some traces of which are still remaining; and the modern Dellys occupies the very spot of ground Rusucurium stood upon. The three towns last-mentioned, from their names, seem to have been originally Libyan or Phœnician [e].

Icosium. ICOSIUM, whose situation has just been determined, may seem to have taken up the space on which Algiers was afterwards built, both from the consideration already offered, and from some Roman inscriptions found in this last city, taken notice of by Gramaye [f].

Tipasa. TIPASA, a Roman colony, mentioned by Ptolemy and the itinerary; but the town was probably of higher antiquity than the conquest of Numidia by the Romans. It was forty-seven miles from Icosium, in a north-east direction; which is an additional argument in favour of Algier's being the antient Icosium, and likewise evinces, that the present Tefessad is the Tipasa of the old geography [g].

Jol. THE next city of consequence on the sea-coast, to the westward, was Jol, the seat of the younger Juba, who, out of the great veneration he had for Augustus, gave it the

the name of Cæſarea, according to Eutropius, Pliny, and Strabo. That it had a port, and an iſland lying in the mouth of it, we are aſſured by Strabo; which gives us good grounds to ſuppoſe, that the modern Sherſhell anſwers to the Jol or Julia Cæſarea of the antients. The large circuit, and ſumptuous remains of an old city at Sherſhell, together with its ſituation, and many other concurring circumſtances, ſerve likewiſe to render extremely probable ſuch a ſuppoſition. For a full and ample deſcription of the port or Cothon, and all other particulars of note relating to Sherſhell, ſome of which were doubtleſs applicable to the Numidian Jol, we muſt beg leave to refer our curious readers to the obſervations of the ingenious traveller ſo frequently cited. We ſhall only add, that a colony was ſettled here by the emperor Claudius; and that Bochart affirms the word Jol, in the oriental languages, to ſignify high or lofty; which agrees with the ſituation of the place, and conſequently proves, that it was either founded by the Orientals, or by ſome of their deſcendents [g].

Canucius.

THE Canucius of Ptolemy, Gunugi of Pliny, and Gunugus of the itinerary, anſwering to the Breſk of the Algerines, ſtood about nine miles to the weſtward from Jol. Though this place was formerly famous, on account of a Roman colony planted in it by Auguſtus, it is now uninhabited, the violences committed by the neighbouring Kabyles not permitting people of any nation to make a ſettlement in it [h].

Cartenna.

CARTENNA, a very conſiderable city, ſituated, as ſhould ſeem, near the mouth of the river Cartennus, where Auguſtus ſettled the ſoldiers of the ſecond legion. Ptolemy indeed places it ſome leagues more weſterly; but the poſition he aſſigns many of his towns, is ſo extremely erroneous, that he deſerves no credit, when any ſhadow of an argument can be offered againſt him. Now, Cartenna, in the Phœnician language, ſignified the city of Tenna; and we find a promontory ſome leagues to the eaſtward, at this day called the cape of Tennes, and a town named Tnis or Tennis not far diſtant from it. It was not unuſual amongſt the moſt antient founders of cities to build them upon the banks of rivers, and to give thoſe rivers the names of the new-new-built towns. Of this the city and river of Camicus in Sicily, to omit many others that might be produced, is a sufficient proof. That Tenna, Tennes, or Tanas, was a local proper name in Numidia, is not only evident from the cape abovementioned, but from the Tanas, which was a river of this country, though its course cannot, for want of sufficient light from history, be ascertained. Whether Tenna or Tennis was the proper name of the founder, or derived from the nature of the soil, as the learned traveller we are so much obliged to seems to insinuate, we shall not take upon us to determine. However, we hope that ingenious gentleman will not take it amiss, if we dissent from him, when he derives Tanis, the name of a most antient and illustrious city of Egypt, from תין tin, clay, and makes this city to have been the same with Pelusium; for Tanis, in Hebrew letters, is Tzaan, or Zoan, and the word itself Egyptian, whose signification is intirely unknown. As for the city, it was, according to the itinerary of Antoninus, at least forty-four Roman miles from Pelusium, and consequently must have been different from it. We have deduced the word Cartenna from the Phœnician language, because it appears from Procopius and Eusebius, not to mention other writers, that the Phœnicians sent colonies into this country in the most early times [i].

Arsenaria. On the western banks of the Cartennus, the antients place Arsenaria, a town where, if Pliny may be credited, a Latin colony was planted under some of the first Roman emperors. As the last-mentioned author makes it to be three Roman miles from the sea, it is probable the modern Arzew answers to it [k].

Quiza. The next maritime town of note, in a western direction, is the Quiza Xenitana, Quiza Colonia, or Quiza Municipium, of Ptolemy, Mela, Pliny, and the itinerary. Dr. Shaw will have Geeza to be the antient Quiza; which, as the situation assigned this last was immediately after the Portus Magnus, is not improbable [l].

Siga, Siga, an antient city of great repute, situated at the mouth of an harbour, and upon a river of the same name. According

According to Pliny, Syphax's palace was here, which, together with the city itſelf, was demoliſhed in the time of Strabo. However, it was afterwards rebuilt, and a colony ſettled there, as we are informed by Ptolemy. Dr. Shaw believes, that the Tafna anſwers to the river, and Tackumbreet to the town, of Siga. It appears from Scylax, that both the city and river were known in his time, the former of which he calls Sigum. It was the laſt maritime place of eminence of this region, being at no great diſtance from the Malva, which our learned traveller has, with a good appearance of truth, endeavoured to prove the ſame river with the Molochath and Mulucha [m].

THE firſt mediterranean cities worthy our notice, to the weſt of the Ampſaga, were Sitifi and Satifi, ſixteen miles from one another. For a further account of which, our readers may have recourſe to Ammianus Marcellinus, Ptolemy, and other antient writers. By their names, they ſeem to have been founded by the Phœnicians [n]. Sitifi and Satafi.

AUZIA or Auzea, a city of great antiquity, if, with Menander Epheſius, we ſuppoſe it to be the African city of that name founded by Ithobaal king of Tyre. Tacitus tells us, that it was built in a ſmall plain, ſurrounded on all ſides with barren foreſts of a vaſt extent. The ruins of this city are called by the neighbouring Arabs Sour Guſlan, the walls of the antelopes, a great part whereof, flanked at proper diſtances with little ſquare towers, is ſtill remaining [o]. Auzia.

TUBUSUPTUS or Tubuſuttus, a town mentioned by Ptolemy and Ammianus Marcellinus, which Lipſius takes to be the Thubuſcus beſieged by Tacfarinas, according to Tacitus. From what Marcellinus has hinted, it ſeems to have been ſituated near the Mons Ferratus [p]. Tubuſuptus.

As Nababurum, Vitaca, Uſſara, Vazagad, Auſum, Robonda, Zaratha, Chizala, Lamida, Vaſana, Phloryia, and many other towns, together with every thing relating to them, are long ſince buried in oblivion, we ſhall paſs them over in ſilence, and proceed to the principal promontories, Nababurum.

mountains, rivers, &c. of this province, which it will be neceſſary for our readers to have a general idea of, in order to underſtand thoſe accounts of the tranſactions happening in it, that have been tranſmitted down to us by the antient hiſtorians [q].

The promontories of this province.

THE firſt promontories, that preſent themſelves to our view, are the Audus and Vabar of Ptolemy. The Aſhounemonker of the Algerines ſeems to anſwer to Vabar, having ſome traces of old ruins ſtill remaining upon it. 2. The Promontorium Apollinis of Pliny and Polemy, the Nackos of the Moors, and cape Tennes of the modern geographers. It deduces its name Nackos, i. e. The bell, from the figure of the grotto in the lower part of it, and is in almoſt 2° E. long. from London. 3. The Promontorium Magnum of Ptolemy was a large and conſpicuous cape near 1° E. of the Malva or Mulucha. This is at preſent called by ſailors Cape Hone, and by the inhabitants Ras Hunneine and Mellack. It lies about four leagues to the north-eaſt of Twunt, and is a continuation of the mountains of Trara [r].

The mountains.

AMONGST the mountains of note in the Numidia Maſæſylorum may be ranked that high knot of eminences, which at preſent diſtinguiſh themſelves to the ſouthward of the plains of Sudratah, being probably the beginning of that chain of mountains, called by the antients mount Atlas. 2. The Zalacus of Ptolemy, which ſeems to have had the ſame poſition as the preſent mount Wannaſhreeſe. 3. Mount Malethubalus, upon the frontiers of Gætulia. This is in the Sahara, and, if we remember right, has not had its modern name brought into Europe. 4. The Durdus of Ptolemy, lying between the mountains of El Callah and Trara. 5. The Mons Phruræſus, immediately ſucceeding Malethubalus. 6. The Montes Chalcorychii, near the country of the antient Herpiditani, between mount Durdus and the Malva or Mulucha [s].

The rivers.

THE moſt remarkable rivers taken notice of by the antients were, 1. The Audus, placed by Ptolomy at the bottom of the Sinus Numidicus, no traces of which are now to be ſeen. 2. The Siſaris, called at preſent by the Moors and Algerines the Manſoureah, whoſe water was probably probably of a red colour in antient times; for that the name imports, as has been already obſerved. 3. The Niſſava, known at this day by the name of the river of Boujeiah, becauſe it empties itſelf into the ſea a little to the eaſtward of that city. It conſiſts of a number of rivulets, falling into it from different directions, and has its ſource at Jibbel Deera, ſeventy miles up into the country to the W. S. W. 4. The Serbetis, now the Yſſer, a large river, whoſe mouth is about eight leagues from Temendfuſe, and lieth ſomething nearer Ruſgunia than Rufuccuræ. We are told, that its ſources are from the mountainous diſtrict to the S. S. W. that the weſtermoſt branch of it is called Shurffa, after the name of the neighbouring Arabs; and the other Wed el Zeitoune, i. e. The river of olives, from the vaſt quantity of that fruit produced in the adjacent territory. 5. The Savus, a river falling into the ſea near Pliny's Icoſion, which our learned traveller takes to have had the ſame ſituation as the Algiers of the moderns. If this be admitted, the Hameeſe bids faireſt for the antient Savus, eſpecially as Leo calls this very river Sefsaia, a word nearly approaching to Savus. 6. The Chinalaph of Ptolemy is the moſt noted river of the Algerines, who call it Shelliff. It ariſeth in the Sahara, at the diſtance of eighty miles to the ſouth-eaſt. The fountains which form its ſource, from their number and contiguity, are known amongſt the Arabs by the name Sebbiene Aine, or Sebaoun Aioun, The ſeventy fountains. A minute deſcription of this river our readers will find in a proper place. 7. The Cartennus, to which, it is ſuppoſed, the ſtream formed by the Sikke and the Habrah anſwers. Marmol calls a river in this ſituation Cirat; which may give ſome countenance to the aforeſaid ſuppoſition. 8. The Flumen Salſum, at preſent called the Wed el Mailah, is a ſtream ſomething leſs than the Cherwell, as it paſſeth by Oxford. 9. Aſſara, a river mentioned by Ptolemy, which may poſſibly be the ſame with the Iſſer of Abulfeda. The Iſſer is one of the four branches that form the Tafna, which our readers may find deſcribed in that curious piece we have ſo often referred them to [t].

The iſlands appertaining to it.

THE only iſlands that deſerve our attention are, 1. The Acra of Scylax, an iſland that forms the modern port of Harſhgoone, under which veſſels of the greateſt burden may lie in the utmoſt ſafety. 2. The Tres Inſulæ of Antoninus, ſituated ſituated about ten miles from the Mulucha, to the north-weſt of that river [u].

Its curioſities.

THE chief curioſities worthy of notice are: 1. The ruins of a Roman city, called at preſent Caſſir, among the Beni Grohberry, to the northward of Jibbel Afroone; upon the mountains adjacent to which the Algerines frequently dig up large pipes of lead, ſuppoſed to have been formerly employed in conveying the excellent water thoſe parts produced to Saldæ. 2. The rivulet of ſalt-water, which glides through the valley Dammer Cappy, i. e. The iron gate. 3. The large ſalt-pits, five miles to the ſouthward of Arzew. 4. One of the fountains of the Habrah at Niſrag, where the water burſts out with a ſurpriſing noiſe and rapidity; as alſo the hot bath, and ſeveral antient ciſterns upon a branch of the Habrah, when it arrives within eight leagues of the ſea. 5. Wanaſhreeſe, a high rugged mountain, generally covered with ſnow, and remarkable for its mines of lead-ore, many fleaks and ſparks of which being brought down by the river Wed-el-Fuddah, and left upon the banks of it expoſed to the ſun, gave occaſion to the name Wanaſhreeſe. 6. The Jibbel Miniſs, an entire mountain of ſalt. 7. The Aquæ Calidæ Colonia of the antients, the Hammam or Bath of Mereega of the moderns. All of which, with many others that we cannot touch upon here, will be accurately deſcribed in that branch of the modern hiſtory, to which they properly belong [w].

SECT. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, cuſtoms, arts, &c. of the Numidians.

The antiquities of the Numidians.

ALL the authors, famous for their reſearches into antiquity, agree, that the tract extending from the iſthmus of Suez to the lake Tritonis, was chiefly peopled by the deſcendents of Miſraim; and that the poſterity of his brother Put, or Phut, ſpread themſelves over all the region betwixt that lake and the Atlantic ocean. It is certain Herodotus gives great countenance to this notion; for he tells us, that the Libyan Nomades, whoſe territories, to the weſt, were bounded bounded by the Triton, agreed in their cuſtoms and manners with the Egyptians; but that the Africans, from that river to the Atlantic ocean, differed almoſt in all points from them. Ptolemy mentions a city called Iuren near Adrumetum; and Pliny a river of Mauritania Tingitana, known by the name of Fut or Phut; which ſeems to confirm the above-mentioned ſuppoſition. The diſtrict adjacent to this river we find mentioned by ſome authors under the appellation of Regio Phutenſis; which plainly alludes to the name Phut. That word ſignifies ſcattered or diſperſed; which very well agrees with what we find related of the Numidians by Mela and Strabo; ſo that we may, without any ſcruple, admit the Aborigines of this country to have been the deſcendents of Phut. Aldrete, Gaſper Varreiro, and others, think, that ſome remains of Phut are ſtill diſcernible in the modern Fez; which notion, after a peruſal of thoſe writers, our readers will perhaps think proper to eſpouſe. However, it appears from Euſebius, Procopius, St. Auſtin, and others, that the Aborigines were not the only antient inhabitants of Numidia, ſince the Phœnicians, in almoſt the earlieſt ages, ſent colonies thither. But tho' both theſe nations deſcended from Ham, they yet differed in many particulars, as we ſhall have frequent occaſion to obſerve [a].

POLYBIUS, as has been already obſerved, informs us, that the Carthaginians once poſſeſſed all that part of Africa, extending from the confines of Cyrenaica to the pillars of Hercules; but this, we apprehend, is to be underſtood of the ſea-coaſt of that vaſt tract: for it ſufficiently appears from Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Livy, and other antient hiſtorians, that the interior Numidia, at leaſt a conſiderable part of it, was independent on the Carthaginians. It is true, the Numidians always aſſiſted the Carthaginians in their wars; but moſt of thoſe forces were upon the footing of mercenaries, or of auxiliary troops, ſent in purſuance of ſolemn ſolemn engagements entered into by the princes to whom they belonged. This might be proved by a great number of paſſages drawn from the authors juſt mentioned, were it in any manner neceſſary. The Carthaginian form of government therefore undoubtedly prevailed in every part of Numidia ſubject to the ſtate of Carthage, though, in others, abſolute monarchy took place. No one can doubt of this, who conſiders, that not only the kingdom of Antæus, including this country, as well as Mauritania Tingitana, and conſequently that of his conqueror Hercules, was deſpotic, but likewiſe that Iarbas, Gala (B), Syphax, Maſiniſſa, and other later princes, ruled here with an unlimited ſway. The old eaſtern governments alſo, from whence that of Numidia was derived, put the point here inſiſted upon beyond diſpute. As to the interior of this government, or the particular political maxims, that formed the baſis of it, we are entirely in the dark, the moſt authentic antient hiſtorians not ſupplying us with the leaſt hint relative thereto [b].

Laws. WHETHER or no any of the independent princes of Numidia were legiſlators, or, if ſo, what particular laws they enacted for the good of their ſubjects, hiſtory informs us not. The Carthaginian laws had, without doubt, their proper force amongſt all the Numidians under the dominion of Carthage. Could Iſidore be relied upon, ſome laws of the Medes and Perſians might poſſibly have been obſerved in ſeveral diſtricts of this country, ſince he ſeems to intimate, that thoſe nations, in antient times, planted a colony

(B) We are informed by Appian, that there were many reguli, or heads of tribes, in the county of the Maſæſyli, not much unlike the emirs of the preſent Arabs, who enjoyed a ſort of ſovereignty over their reſpective tribes, but yet acknowledged Syphax for their chief. It can ſcarce be doubted, but that Syphax's government, with reſpect to theſe princes, was deſpotic, otherwiſe he could not have brought ſuch numerous armies into the field. What has here been obſerved of Syphax, was undoubtedly true of the other kings of the Maſæſyli, as well as thoſe of the Maſſyli (2).

ny in Numidia, at leaſt, that there was an intercourſe betwixt them and the Numidians. Salluſt likewiſe more than inſinuates the ſame thing, ſince he affirms, that the Perſians ſailed hither before the Phœnicians, when, intermixing with the Gætulians, they, in conjunction with that people, formed the Numidian nation. To which that author ſubjoins, that neither being able to find any materials here for building of houſes, nor to carry on any commerce with the Spaniards, by reaſon of their different languages, and the great ſea betwixt them, the Perſians built them huts, tents, or cottages, of the bottoms of their ſhips inverted, which they removed from place to place; and that, from this circumſtance, they called themſelves Numidæ, a word which, in the Perſic tongue, alluded thereto. But this relation being inconſiſtent with itſelf, and the notion couched therein entirely repugnant to the whole ſtream both of ſacred and profane antiquity, our readers will not ſcruple to reject it [c].

Religion. As the firſt Numidians, in common with all other Indigenæ of that vaſt tract between the borders of Egypt and the Atlantic ocean, were called Libyans, we may infer from Herodotus, that the principal gods they ſacrificed to were the Sun and Moon. This is a convincing proof of their high antiquity, as clearly evincing, that the migration of the firſt colony, which peopled this country, preceded the introduction of image-worſhip into the pagan world. It is likewiſe an argument, that this colony did not conſiſt of Perſians, ſince the Sun only was their principal deity. Some of theſe Numidians alſo might probably worſhip Triton, Minerva, and Neptune (C), eſpecially thoſe near the confines of Africa Propria, as the ſame author ſeems to ſuggeſt. That part of this nation ſubject to Carthage, it is reaſonable to preſume, paid divine honours to the Phœnician and Greek deities, that were the objects of the Carthaginian worſhip, of which we have already given ſo full and ample an account. It appears from Herodotus, that Hephæſtus, or Vulcan, was an Egyptian deity worſhipped at Memphis; but whether or no the Numidians held him in any veneration, or indeed had any knowledge of him, we muſt leave others to decide [d].

(C) Father Delrio thinks, that the Nephthuim of Moſes was either the great anceſtor, or nation, of the Numidians. If ſo, it is very poſſible, that Neptune, one of the great gods of Africa, might have deduced his name from thence. This notion ſeems to be countenanced by St. Jerom, who reads it Neptuim; which is almoſt entirely the ſame word with Neptunus, after the rejection of the Latin termination US. Aldrete, a perſon of moſt profound erudition, comes into this opinion (3).

Language. FROM what has been juſt offered, our readers will allow it probable, that Miſraim and Phut, with their deſcendents, moved together into Africa; and that their poſterity inhabited contiguous regions; nay, if any credit may be given to Herodotus, and other authors of the beſt repute, they agreed, for many ages, in moſt particulars. Herodotus ſeems to intimate, that in his time, or at leaſt not long before it, the people, inhabiting that tract afterwards called Numidia, went by the general name of Libyans; and that the Numidians were then poſſeſſed of the country ſituate between the frontiers of Egypt and the river Triton, ſince he tells us, that the nation occupying that region were called Libyan Nomades, in contradiſtinction to the Libyans, who extended themſelves from thence to the weſtwards, as far as the Atlantic ocean. This obſervation we remember not to have been made by any other author. However, it ſeems to be of conſiderable conſequence; for it bids fair to prove, that the kingdoms of the Maſſyli and Maſœſyli, though of a very early date, were not called Numidia, till after, or at leaſt a little before, the time of Herodotus; and that this name was occaſioned by an irruption of a great body of the Libyan Nomades into the countries to the weſtward of the Triton about the period abovementioned. In confirmation of this notion, it may be obſerved, that no mention is made of the Numidians by any of the Greek or Roman hiſtorians, till about the time of Herodotus; which is a preſumptive argument, that they made no conſiderable figure, and conſequently did not poſſeſs territories of ſo large an extent then as afterwards. Though

Though therefore it can ſcarce be doubted, but that Numidia Propria and Mauritania Cæſarienſis were at firſt peopled by Phut's deſcendents, it is probable, that neither of thoſe provinces were called Numidia till the age of Herodotus, or at leaſt not long before that age, when the Libyan Nomades, or Numidians, paſſed into them. However, in conformity to what has been aſſerted above, we muſt remind our readers, that the Phœnicians, in the moſt early ages, and after them the Carthaginians, planted colonies here. Pliny, Solinus, and Strabo, by intimating, that the Numidians of their time agreed in ſome points with the Libyan Nomades of Herodotus, add ſome weight to the hypotheſis we have juſt offered to the conſideration to the learned. From all which particulars we may conclude, that the languages ſpoken in Numidia were, 1. That of the Libyan Nomades, which, from many authors, appears to have been nearly related to the old Egyptian. 2. The Carthaginian. 3. The Phœnician. And 4. That of Phut's immediate deſcendents, who at firſt came there, which, in ſome points, might have differed from all the reſt. That the tongue prevailing, in part of Numidia at leaſt, was different from the Phœnician and Carthaginian, is evident from Salluſt, and others. However barbarous the Numidians might have been, ſome of them uſed letters, not very unlike thoſe that made up the Punic alphabet, as appears from the legends of ſeveral antient Numidian coins [e] (D).

With regard to the cuſtoms of the Numidians, our readers will neither expect nor deſire us to be prolix on that head: neither the limits we have prescribed ourselves, nor the materials left us by the antients, will permit this. In order therefore to form a general idea of these customs, it will be sufficient to observe, that the principal of them were the following:

(D) This likewiſe appears from the letter Bomilcar wrote to Nabdalſa or Nadabalſa, a Numidian nobleman of the firſt rank; which being delivered into the hands of Jugurtha, occaſioned the death of Bomilcar, and many others, as we learn from Salluſt. What we have here advanced, is likewiſe countenanced by Livy, and other authors (4).

The Numidians were divided into tribes, &c

1. THE Numidians were divided into tribes, nomes, cantons, or hordes, in the same manner as the Arabes Scenitæ, and not very unlike the present Tartars; excepting that the latter form their villages, or encampments, of carts, like their ancestors the antient Scythians; whereas the circular dou-wars of the Numidians were composed of their mapalia, with which the hhymas, or tents, of the modern Bedoweens nearly correspond. Mela, Strabo, Virgil, Pliny, and others, put this point beyond dispute. The mapalia, or Numidian tents, were secured from the heat and inclemency of the weather by a covering only of such hair-cloth as our coal-sacks are made of. They were all of the same form, oblong, resembling the inverted bottom of a ship, in conformity to the description Sallust has given us of them. A whole tribe or horde encamped together, and, having consumed all the produce of one fruitful spot, removed from thence to another, as is the custom of their posterity the Bedoweens at this day. As this part of Africa consisted of dry and barren sandy deserts, interspersed with fruitful spots, (for which reason Strabo compares it to a leopard's skin) such a way of life was absolutely necessary for those who did not live in cities. Hence it appears, in conjunction with what we have observed of their language, that nome, agreeable to what we find advanced by Diodorus Siculus, St. Cyril, Epiphanius, Eusebius, and others, must have been either an Egyptian or Syriac word, signifying part, portion, division, &c. and not of Greek extraction, as some absurdly pretend; to which add יד ida or yeda, place, limits, country, &c. and the name Numidia is formed in a much more rational and apposite manner, than it is possible for it to be upon the principles of those persons, who suppose it deduced from a language entirely unknown to the Numidians [f].

2. THOSE Numidians who lived in fixed habitations, for the moſt part dwelt in ſmall cottages, raiſed either with hurdles, daubed over with mud, or built out of ſome ſuch ſlight materials, in the ſame manner as the gurbies of the Kabyles are erected at this day. The roofs were undoubtedly covered with ſtraw or turf, ſupported by reeds or branches of trees, as thoſe of the gurbies are. The Numidians, at leaſt thoſe of Phœnician extraction, called theſe habitations magaria, an explication of which word has been already given. The very learned and accurate Dr. Shaw informs us, that the towns or villages formed of theſe huts, are at preſent built upon eminences, and called by the Kabyles, who inhabit them, Daſhkras [g]. Some of them lived in ſmall huts or cottages, called magaria.

3. The Numidians rode without ſadles, and many of them without bridles, whence Virgil calls them Numidæ infræni. As their principal ſtrength conſiſted in their cavalry, and they were inured to the management of horſes from their infancy, they found this no difficult thing. The cuſtom we are now upon ſuggeſts to us the meaning of the word Metagonium (E), the proper name of a promontory, as likewiſe of the country of the Maſſyli, as has been obſerved above. It is undoubtedly equivalent to מתג יניח meteg ionihh, or meteg ioniahh, one that lays aſide, or that hath laid aſide, his bridle. This is a much more natural etymology, than any that can be drawn from the Greek tongue [h]. They rode without bridles.

4. ACCORDING to Strabo, they had many wives, concubines, and conſequently many children, as the Orientals had, tho', in other reſpects, they were very temperate and abſtemious. Their manner of fighting and encamping They had many wives, concubines, &c.

(E) It appears from Martial and Lucan, that the cuſtom of riding without bridles prevailed more amongſt the Maſſyli than the Maſæſyli. Now the country of the Maſſyli was the Terra Metagonitis, as has been already obſerved; which not a little ſupports the etymon we would give of Metagonium (5).

camping we have already taken notice of; and therefore to touch upon that head here, would be entirely superfluous [i].

The king's brother succeeded to the crown in Numidia.

5. THE king's next brother, not his eldeſt ſon, ſucceeded him in Numidia, particularly in the country of the Maſſyli. This we learn from Livy, who, in proof of what he aſſerts, tells us, that Gala, the father of Maſiniſſa, was ſucceeded by his next brother Deſalces [k].

The diet of the Numidians.

6. THEIR diet conſiſted chiefly of herbs, grain, pulſe, water, &c. and they abſtained almoſt entirely from wine; fleſh was ſometimes, though not ſo frequently, uſed. To this, as well as the moderate degrees of heat and cold of their climate in ſummer and winter, Appian ſeems to attribute their long lives, and the large ſhare of health they enjoy. In conformity to nature and experience, that author aſſures us, that the ſummers in Numidia were not near ſo hot as in India and Ethiopia [l].

They uſe only a whip or rod on horſeback.

7. THE Numidians, particularly the Maſſyli, did not only ride without ſaddles and bridles, but likewiſe all ſorts of accoutrements, as we learn from what Appian relates of Maſiniſſa, as well as from many other authors. This they did, in order to ruſh upon their enemies, or prey, with the greater force and fierceneſs. However, they made uſe of a rod or whip, with which they eaſily managed their horſes, though in the midſt of the hotteſt engagements [m].

Are clad in looſe garments.

8. MANY of the poorer ſort of people in Numidia went almoſt naked; but the Numidians of any faſhion wore their garments looſe, not making uſe of a ſaſh or girdle. In this particular they agreed with the Carthaginians, and moſt of the other Africans. Hence that of Virgil [n]:

Hic Nomadum genus, & diſcinctos Mulciber Afros, &c.

11. DESERTION was no crime amongſt the Numidians, who, after the firſt defeat, were at liberty to return home, or continue in the army, as they pleaſed q. Diſertion no crime amongſt them

12. IN fine, there muſt have been a great variety of cuſtoms in Numidia, as it was inhabited by many different nations, that were oppoſite to one another in many particulars, one of which Diodorus calls the Aſphadelodians, who were probably of a different caſt from the reſt, ſince he informs us, that they were black as the Ethiopians. According to Hellanicus, this poor people, being a tribe or canton of the Libyan Nomades, had nothing but a cup, a pitcher, and a dagger or knife, which they conſtantly carried about with them, their ſmall mapalia being made of aſphodelus, great quantities of which they took care in the ſummer-time to be provided with, in order to have always then an agreeable ſhady retreat. This circumſtance undoubtedly gave occaſion to the name Diodorus calls them by, and is the chief thing, that we find remarked of them by the antient hiſtorians r.

THE Numidians, that inhabited the open country, being a barbarous, rude, and illiterate people, it would be ridiculous to expect any traces of arts or ſciences amongſt them. The Carthaginians and Phœnicians indeed who were very civilized, polite, and ingenious nations, formed, as there is reaſon to believe, no ſmall part of the inhabitants of the moſt conſiderable cities and towns; but we have already treated amply of the arts and ſciences they were famous for. However, the proper Numidians ſeem to have been eminent for their ſkill in managing horſes (F), and knowledge in ſome branches of Arts, &c.

Some knowledge likewiſe of the Egyptian theology, polity, and philoſophical notions, we cannot well ſuppoſe them to have been deſtitute of, ſince their anceſtors had, for a ſeries of generations, an intercourſe with the poſterity of Miſraim; but as to the extent of any knowledge of this kind amongſt them, we are entirely in the dark. The preſent Kabyles and Bedoweens, according to Dr. Shaw, ſpend their time chiefly in making hykes, or woollen blankets, and burnooſes, as they call cloaks or upper garments, in an employment not unlike to which poſſibly ſome of the antient ruſtic Numidians might have been engaged, eſpecially ſince he imagines the Kabyles to be the remains of the old Africans. As for the chronology of the Numidians, if they had any, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that it muſt have agreed in the main with that of the nations they were derived from, and contiguous to, viz. the Carthaginians, Phœnicians, and moſt early Egyptians. In one point however they differed from moſt, if not all, other nations; for they computed their time by nights, and not by days, if any credit may be given to a fragment of Nic. Damaſcenus [s].

ugly gait, a ſtiff neck, and threw their head forward, the Numidian horſeman made but a ridiculous figure before the time of action; but always behaved well during the heat of the engagement. Livy ſeems to intimate, that, in Hannibal's time, ſome of the Numidian cavalry uſed bridles, and were heavy armed troops, wearing coats of mail, ſwords, ſhields, and lancets; which is countenanced by Polybius, Salluſt, and others (6).

SECT.

SECT. III.

The hiſtory of the Numidians, from the earlieſt accounts of time, to the conqueſt of their country by the Romans.

When the Phœnicians came firſt into Numidia.

NUMIDIA, being pretty remote from Egypt, as well as that part of Libya contiguous to it, ſeems to have been but thinly peopled before the firſt arrival of the Phœnicians there. When this happened, we cannot preciſely determine; but, according to Euſebius, who is followed by Bochart, and other authors of good repute, it muſt have been above three hundred years before the foundation of Carthage. For Ariſtotle relates, that the Phœnician hiſtorians made Utica to be two hundred eighty-ſeven years older than Carthage; and Euſebius affirms Hercules, ſurnamed Diodas or Deſanaus, i. e. the Phœnician Hercules, to have been extremely famous all over Africa this very year, and to have conquered Antæus in the fartheſt part of Mauritania near Zilis and Tingis, about fifty years before. Sir Iſaac Newton however, not without reaſon, fixes this event nearer the time of the Trojan war. Salluſt, Florus, and Oroſius likewiſe, inform us, that this Hercules, whom Salluſt calls Libys, built Capſa. From whence we may infer, that either the kingdom of Antæus included Numidia, and even Africa Propria, or elſe that Hercules over-ran theſe countries after he had conquered Mauritania; the former of which notions appears to us the moſt probable. We muſt defer touching upon the war betwixt Hercules and Antæus, till we come to the hiſtory of the Mauritanians, though the conſequences of that war extended to the nation we are now upon [a].

No accounts of the Numidian affairs for ſeveral of the earlieſt centuries now remaining.

THE tranſactions of Numidia, during many of the earlieſt centuries, have, for a long ſeries of ages, been buried in oblivion. It is probable however, that as the Phœnicians were maſters of a good part of it, they were recorded, and not unknown in the Carthaginian times. King Iarbas probably reigned here, as well as in Africa Propria, if not in Mauritania, and other parts of Libya, when Dido began to build Byrſa;

[a] Ariſtot. de mirabil. Euſeb. in chron. Flor. l. iii. c. 1. Salluſt. in Jugurth. Oroſ. l. v. c. 15. Vide Bochart. in præfat. ad Chan.

Byrsa; but we have elsewhere taken notice of all the principal particulars relating to that prince, handed down to us by the antients. It appears from Justin, that, about the age of Herodotus, the people of this country were called both Africans or Libyans, and Numidians; which seems to imply, that the latter name was not then of very long standing, and consequently to countenance what we have advanced above concerning the incorporation of the Libyan Nomades with these (G) Africans or Libyans. Justin likewise intimates, that, about this time, the Carthaginians vanquished both the Moors or Mauritanians, and Numidians, who had leagued together against them; the consequence of which was, that the former were excused paying the tribute, which had been exacted from them ever since Dido's arrival in Africa by the latter. As for the part the Numidians acted in all the wars betwixt the Dionysii, Agathocles, &c. and the Carthaginians, we have already been so copious on that head, that our readers will not expect us to expatiate upon it here [b].

The Carthaginians treat the Micatanian Numidians with great severity.

After the conclusion of the first Punic war, the African troops carried on a bloody war three years against their masters the Carthaginians. The most active of all others, in this rebellion, according to Diodorus Siculus, were the Micatanian Numidians. This so incensed the Carthaginians, that, after Hamilcar had either killed or taken prisoners all the mercenaries, he sent a large detachment to ravage the country of those Numidians. The commandant of that detachment executed his orders with the utmost rigour and severity; for he plundered all that district in a terrible manner, and crucified all the prisoners, without distinction, that fell into his hands. This filled the rest with such indignation and resentment, that both they and their posterity ever afterwards, bore an implacable hatred to the Carthaginians. The conduct of the Numidians in the Carthaginian service, during the

(G) The Numidians. particularly the Masæsyli, lived upon herbs, roots, flesh, milk, cheese, &c. in conformity to what Herodotus relates of the Libyan Nomades, as we learn from Appian and Strabo. This adds no small weight to the hypothesis we have ventured here to submit to the consideration of the learned (7).

the firſt Punic war, was ſuch as merited the higheſt applauſe, as our readers will plainly perceive by conſulting a former part of this hiſtory [c].

Syphax defeated twice by Maſiniſſa.

In the conſulate of the younger Fabius and Sempronius Gracchus, Syphax, king of the Maſæſyli, entered into an alliance with the Romans. This induced Gala, king of the Maſſyli, to conclude a treaty with the Carthaginians, in conſequence of which his ſon Maſiniſſa marched at the head of a powerful army to give Syphax battle. Being reinforced in his march by a body of Carthaginians, as ſoon as he came up with the Maſæſyli, he engaged them. The fight was ſharp and bloody; but at laſt Maſiniſſa carried the day, putting thirty thouſand of the Maſæſyli to the ſword, and driving Syphax into the country of the Mauruſii, or Mauritania. This, for the preſent, gave a check both to the progreſs of Syphax's arms, and the towering projects of the Romans. However, the Maſæſylian monarch found means, ſome time after, to aſſemble another formidable army of Maſæſylians and Mauritanians; which was likewiſe defeated and diſperſed by Maſiniſſa. But the face of affairs in this country ſoon afterward greatly changed [d].

A brief account of Maſiniſſa's affairs before he entered into an alliance with the Romans.

Gala dying whilſt his ſon Maſiniſſa was acting at the head of the Numidian troops ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Carthaginians in Spain, his brother Deſalces, according to the eſtabliſhed order of ſucceſſion in Numidia, took poſſeſſion of the Maſſylian throne. That prince dying ſoon after his acceſſion, Capuſa, his eldeſt ſon, ſucceeded him. But he did not long enjoy his high dignity; for one Mezetulus, a perſon of royal extraction, but an enemy to the family of Gala, found means to excite a great part of his ſubjects to a revolt; which enabled him to form a conſiderable corps, and to bring Capuſa to a general action; which ended in his favour, and Capuſa, with moſt of the nobleſſe, being ſlain, he obtained the Maſſylian crown, as the fruit of his victory. However, he did not think proper to aſſume the title of king, contenting himſelf with that of guardian or protector to Lacumaces, the only ſurviving young prince of the blood, whom he graced with the royal title. To ſupport himſelf in his uſurpation, ~~he~~ married the widow of Deſalces, who was Hanni~~bal's~~ niece, and conſequently of the moſt powerful family family in Carthage. In order to attain the ſame end, he ſent embaſſadors to Syphax, to conclude a treaty of alliance with him. In the mean time Maſiniſſa, receiving advice of his uncle's death, of his couſin's ſlaughter, and of Mezetulus's uſurpation, immediately paſſed over to Africa, and went to the court of Bocchar, king of Mauritania, to ſolicit ſuccours. Bocchar, ſenſible of the great injuſtice offered Maſiniſſa, gave him a body of four thouſand Moors to eſcorte him to his dominions. His ſubjects, having been appriſed of his approach, joined him upon the frontiers with a party of five hundred men. The Moors, in purſuance of their orders, returned home, as ſoon as Maſiniſſa reached the confines of his kingdom; notwithſtanding which, and the ſmall body that declared for him, having accidentally met Lacumaces at Thapſus with an eſcorte going to implore Syphax's aſſiſtance, he drove him into the town, which he carried by aſſault, after a faint reſiſtance. However, Lacumaces, with many of his men, found means to eſcape to Syphax. The fame of this exploit gained Maſiniſſa great credit, inſomuch that the Numidians flocked to him from all parts, and, amongſt the reſt, many of his father Gala's veterans, who preſſed him to make a ſpeedy and vigorous puſh for his hereditary dominions. Lacumaces having joined Mezetulus with a reinforcement of Maſæſylians, which he had prevailed upon Syphax to ſend to the aſſiſtance of his ally, the uſurper advanced at the head of a numerous army to offer Maſiniſſa battle; which that prince, though much inferior in number, did not decline. Hereupon an engagement enſued, and, notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, Maſiniſſa, by his own conduct and bravery, and the valour of his troops, gained a complete victory; the immediate conſequence of which was a quiet and peaceable poſſeſſion of his kingdom. Mezetulus and Lacumaces, with a few that attended them, flying into the territories of Carthage. However, looking upon his preſent ſituation as precarious, he offered to declare Lacumaces the heir apparent to the crown, and treat him in a manner ſuitable to his high rank, provided he would immediately make his ſubmiſſion to him; and, after having pardoned Mezetulus, and reſtored to him every thing that he had forfeited by his treaſonable conduct, to take him into favour, if he would acknowledge him as his ſovereign. Both of them readily complied with the propoſal, and immediately returned home; ſo that the tranquillity and repoſe of Numidia would have been then ſettled upon a ſolid and laſting foundation, foundation, had not this been prevented by Aſdrubal, who was then at Syphax's court. He inſinuated to that prince, who was diſpoſed to live amicably with his neighbours, "That he was greatly miſtaken, if he imagined Maſiniſſa "would be ſatisfied with his hereditary countries; that he "was a prince of much greater capacity and ambition, than "either his father Gala, his uncle Deſalces, or any other of "his family; that he had often diſcovered in Spain marks "of a moſt rare and uncommon merit; and that, in fine, "unleſs this riſing flame was extinguiſhed before it came to "too great a head, both the Maſæſylian and Carthaginian "ſtates would be infallibly conſumed by it." Syphax, alarmed by theſe ſuggeſtions, advanced with a numerous body of forces into a diſtrict, which had long been in diſpute between him and Gala, but then in the poſſeſſion of Maſiniſſa. This brought on a general action between thoſe two princes, wherein the latter was totally defeated, his army diſperſed, and he himſelf obliged to fly to the top of mount Balbus, attended only by a few of his horſe. Such a deciſive battle at the preſent juncture, before Maſiniſſa was fixed in his throne, could not but put Syphax into poſſeſſion of the kingdom of the Maſſyli. Maſiniſſa in the mean time made nocturnal incurſions from his poſt upon mount Balbus, and plundered all the adjacent country, particularly that part of the Carthaginian territory contiguous to Numidia. This diſtrict he not only thoroughly pillaged, but likewiſe laid waſte with fire and ſword, carrying off from thence an immenſe booty, which was bought by ſome merchants, who had put into one of the Carthaginian ports for that purpoſe. In fine, he did the Carthaginians more damage, not only by committing ſuch dreadful devaſtations, but by maſſacring and carrying into captivity vaſt numbers of their ſubjects on this occaſion, than they could have ſuſtained in a pitched battle, or one campaign of an open and legal war. Syphax, at the preſſing and reiterated inſtances of the Carthaginians, ſent Bocchar, one of his moſt active commanders, with a detachment of four thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, to reduce this peſtilent gang of robbers, promiſing him a great reward, if he could bring Maſiniſſa either alive or dead. Bocchar, watching his opportunity, fell upon them unawares, as they were ſtraggling about the country without any order or diſcipline; ſo that he took many priſoners, diſperſed the reſt, and purſued Maſiniſſa himſelf, with a few of his men, to the top of the mountain where he had taken poſt. As he looked looked upon the expedition to be in a manner ended, he did not only ſend many head of cattle, and the other booty that had fallen into his hands, to Syphax, but likewiſe all the forces, except five hundred foot, and two hundred horſe. With this detachment he drove Maſiniſſa from the ſummit of the hill, and purſued him through ſeveral narrow paſſes and defiles, as far as the plains of Clupea, where he ſo ſurrounded him, that all the Maſſylians, except four, were put to the ſword, and Maſiniſſa himſelf, after having received a dangerous wound, eſcaped with the utmoſt difficulty. As this was effected by croſſing a rapid river, in which attempt two of his four attendants were drowned in the ſight of the detachment that purſued him, it was rumoured all over Africa, that Maſiniſſa had been ſwallowed by the ſtream; which gave inexpreſſible pleaſure to Syphax and the Carthaginians. For ſome time he lived undiſcovered in a cave, where he was ſupported by the robberies of the two horſemen, that had made their eſcape with him; but, having cured his wound, he boldly began to advance to his own frontiers, giving out publicly, that he intended once more to take poſſeſſion of his kingdom. In his march he was joined by about forty horſe, and, ſoon after his arrival amongſt the Maſſyli, ſo many people flocked to him from all parts, that out of them he formed an army of ſix thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe; with which he did not only reinſtate himſelf in his dominions, but likewiſe laid waſte the borders of the Maſæſyli. This ſo irritated Syphax, that he immediately aſſembled a body of troops, and encamped very commodiouſly upon a ridge of mountains between Cirta and Hippo. His army he commanded in perſon, and detached his ſon Vermina, with a conſiderable force, to take a compaſs, and attack the enemy in rear. In purſuance of his orders, Vermina ſet out in the beginning of the night, and took poſt in the place appointed him, without being diſcovered by the enemy. In the mean time Syphax decamped, and advanced towards the enemy, in order to give them battle. When he had poſſeſſed himſelf of a riſing ground, that led to their camp, and concluded that his ſon Vermina muſt have formed the ambuſcade behind them, he began the fight. Maſiniſſa being advantageouſly poſted, and his ſoldiers diſtinguiſhing themſelves in an extraordinary manner, the diſpute was long and bloody; but Vermina unexpectedly falling upon their rear, and, by this means, obliging them to divide their forces, which were ſcarce able before to oppoſe the main body

body under Syphax, they were soon thrown into confusion, and forced to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. All the avenues being blocked up, partly by Syphax, and partly by his son, such a dreadful slaughter was made of the unhappy Massyli, that only Masiniſſa himself, with seventy horse, escaped to the Lesser Syrtis. Here he remained, betwixt the confines of the Carthaginians and Garamantes, till the arrival of Lælius, and the Roman fleet, on the coast of Africa. What happened immediately after his junction with the Romans, our readers will find related at large in a part of this work, to which it more properly belongs [e].

We have already observed, that the Carthaginians lost Masiniſſa by depriving him of his dear Sophoniſba. That lady was versed in various branches of literature, excellently well skilled in music, the greatest beauty of that age, or perhaps any other, and of such exquisite charms in every respect, that, according to a grave author, either her bare voice, or a sight of her, was sufficient to captivate the most rigid and severe philosopher. Masiniſſa therefore could never forgive the mortifying affront put upon him by the state of Carthage, when her father Asdrubal, in violation of the laws of honour and public faith, was commanded to give her to Syphax. The Carthaginians however endeavoured to fix that prince in their interest, and, in order to this, prevailed upon Syphax to restore him his dominions. Masiniſſa, to have his full revenge both of Syphax and the Carthaginians, feigned himself entirely satisfied with so generous a cession, and outwardly expressed all imaginable zeal and affection for them, though at the same time he was underhand with the Romans meditating their ruin. Asdrubal had either some private intelligence, or entertained a suspicion, of this; which induced him to lay an ambuscade for Masiniſſa after his arrival in Africa from Spain, which that prince happily escaped. Syphax in the mean time acted much such a part as Masiniſſa; for he assured the Romans of an inviolable attachment to their interest, though he had entered into the strictest engagements with the Carthaginians, at the earnest solicitations of his wife, whose charms he found himself incapable of resisting. The consequences, both of his conduct, and that of his rival Masiniſſa, have been already related related at large. It will be ſufficient therefore in this place to obſerve, that, by the aſſiſtance of Lælius, Maſiniſſa reduced Syphax's kingdom; that, according to Zonaras, he and Scipio ſo far outwitted Hannibal before the memorable battle of Zama, that, by a ſtratagem, they deprived him of ſome advantageous poſts, which, with a ſolar eclipſe happening during the heat of the action, and not a little intimidating the Carthaginian troops, greatly contributed to the victory the Romans obtained; and that, at the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, he was amply rewarded by the Romans for the important ſervices he had done them. As for Syphax, after the loſs of his dominions, he was kept in confinement for ſome time at Alba, from whence being removed in order to grace Scipio's triumph, he died at Tibur in his way to Rome. Zonaras adds, that his corpſe was decently interred; that all the Numidian priſoners were releaſed; and that Vermina, by the aſſiſtance of the Romans, took peaceable poſſeſſion of his father's throne. However, part of the Maſæſylian kingdom was before annexed to Maſiniſſa's dominions, in order to reward that prince for his ſingular fidelity and cloſe attachment to the Romans, as has been already obſerved [f] (H).

As an account of all the principal tranſactions, in which Maſiniſſa was concerned between the ſecond and third Punic wars, has been already extracted from the beſt antient hiſtorians, we cannot here pretend to touch upon any of them, without without being guilty of a repetition. Nothing therefore is further requiſite, in order to complete the hiſtory of this famous prince, than to exhibit to our readers view ſome points of his conduct towards the decline, and at the cloſe, of life; the wiſe diſpoſitions made after his death by Æmilianus, in order to the regulation of his domeſtic affairs; and ſome particulars relating to his character, genius, and habit of body, drawn from the moſt celebrated Greek and Roman authors [g].

(H) This ſeems to be countenanced by the epitomizer of Livy, who gives us ſufficiently to underſtand, that Syphax's family, for a conſiderable term after the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war, reigned in one part of Numidia; for he intimates, that Archobarzanes, Syphax's grandſon, and probably Vermina's ſon, hovered, with a powerful army of Numidians, about the Carthaginian frontiers, a few years before the third Punic war broke out, in order, as ſhould ſeem, either to cover them, or enable the Carthaginians to make an irruption into Maſiniſſa's territories. Cato however pretended, that theſe forces, in conjunction with thoſe of Carthage, had a deſign to invade the Roman dominions, which he urged as a reaſon to induce the conſcript fathers to deſtroy the African republic (8).

Maſiniſſa forces the Carthaginians to conclude a peace with him upon his own terms.

By drawing a line of circumvallation round the Carthaginian army under Aſdrubal, poſted upon an eminence, Maſiniſſa cut off all manner of ſupplies from them; which introduced both the plague and a famine into their camp. As the body of the Numidian troops employed in this blockade was not near ſo numerous as the Carthaginian forces, it is evident, that the line here mentioned muſt have been extremely ſtrong, and conſequently the effect of great labour and art. The Carthaginians, finding themſelves reduced to the laſt extremity, concluded a peace upon the following terms, which Maſiniſſa dictated to them: 1. That they ſhould deliver up all deſerters. 2. That they ſhould recall their exiles, who had taken refuge in his dominions. 3. That they ſhould pay him five thouſand talents of ſilver, within the ſpace of fifty years. 4. That their ſoldiers ſhould paſs under the jugum, each of them carrying off only a ſingle coat. As Maſiniſſa himſelf, though between eighty and ninety years of age, conducted the whole enterprize, he muſt have been extremely well verſed in fortification, and other branches of the military art. His underſtanding likewiſe he muſt have retained to the laſt. This happened a ſhort time before the beginning of the third Punic war [h].

Maſiniſſa diſguſted at the Romans.

Soon after, the conſuls landed an army in Africa, in order to lay ſiege to Carthage, without imparting to Maſiniſſa their deſign. This not a little chagrined him, as it was contrary to the former practice of the Romans, who, in the preceding war, had communicated their intentions to him, and conſulted him on all occaſions. When therefore the conſuls applied to him for a body of his troops to act in concert with their forces, he made anſwer, "That they ſhould "have a reinforcement from him, when they ſtood in need "of it." It could not but be provoking for him to conſider, that, that, after he had extremely weakened the Carthaginians, and even brought them to the brink of ruin, his pretended imperious friends ſhould come to reap the fruits of his victory, without giving him the leaſt intelligence of it [i].

He dies.

HOWEVER, his mind ſoon after returned to its natural bias, which was in favour of the Romans. Finding his end approaching, he ſent to Æmilianus, then a tribune in the Roman army, to deſire a viſit from him. What he propoſed by this viſit, was to inveſt him with full powers to diſpoſe of his kingdom and eſtate, as he ſhould think proper, for the benefit of his children. The high idea he had entertained of that young hero's abilities and integrity, together with his gratitude and affection for the family into which he was adopted, induced him to take this ſtep; but, believing that death would not permit him to have a perſonal conference with Æmilianus upon this ſubject, he informed his wife and children, in his laſt moments, that he had impowered him to diſpoſe, in an abſolute manner, of all his poſſeſſions, and divide his kingdom amongſt his ſons. To which he ſubjoined, "I require, that whatever Æmilianus "may decree, ſhall be executed as punctually, as if I "myſelf had appointed it by my will." Having uttered theſe words, he expired, at above ninety years of age [k].

Some particulars relating to his character.

THIS prince, during his youth, had met with ſtrange reverſes of fortune, as appears from ſeveral preceding parts of this hiſtory. However, ſays Appian, being ſupported by the divine protection, he enjoyed an uninterrupted courſe of proſperity for a long ſeries of years. His kingdom extended from Mauritania to the weſtern confines of Cyrenaica; from whence it appears, that he was one of the moſt powerful princes of Africa. Many of the inhabitants of this vaſt tract he civilized in a wonderful manner, teaching them to cultivate their ſoil, and to reap thoſe natural advantages, which the fertility of ſome parts of their country afforded them. He was of a more robuſt habit of body than any of his cotemporaries, being bleſſed wi h the greateſt health and vigour, which was doubtleſs owing to his extreme temperance, and the toils he inceſſantly ſuſtained. We are informed by Polybius, that ſometimes he ſtood upon the ſame ſpot of ground from morning till evening, without out the leaſt motion, and at others continued as long in a ſitting poſture. He would remain on horſeback for ſeveral days and nights together, without being ſenſible of the leaſt fatigue. Nothing can better evince the ſtrength of his conſtitution, than his youngeſt ſon, named Stembal, Sthemba, or Stembanus, who was but four years old at his deceaſe. Tho' ninety years of age, he performed all the exerciſes uſed by young men, and always rode without a ſaddle. Pliny tells us, that he reigned above ſixty years. He was an able commander, and much facilitated the reduction of Carthage. Plutarch from Polybius obſerves, that the day after a great victory won over the Carthaginians, Maſiniſſa was ſeen ſitting at the door of his tent, eating a piece of brown bread. Suidas relates, that, to the laſt, he could mount his horſe without any aſſiſtance. According to Appian, he left a numerous well-diſciplined army, and an immenſe quantity of wealth (I), behind him [1].

(I) We are farther told, that Maſiniſſa always went bare headed, even though the weather was never ſo ſevere; and that, in his extreme old age, he could ſit on horſeback for four-and-twenty hours together, without being in the leaſt fatigued. Some authors ſay, that he was a pious prince, and ſent back to Melita or Malta a large quantity of ivory, which had been brought him from thence out of Juno's temple, as a preſent by his admiral. It is added, that he cauſed inſcriptions in Numidian letters to be engraven on ſome of the pieces of this ivory, importing, that he willingly returned it, as ſoon as he knew it belonged to the goddeſs. Valerius Maximus ſays, that, not being able to repoſe any confidence in any of his children, officers, &c. he endeavoured to ſecure himſelf from the attempts of his enemies by a guard of dogs. He ſuſtained as many toils, at near ninety years of age, as any man in his dominions. His ſubjects he trained up in the military art, inſtead of permitting them to plunder and ravage the country, as had frequently happened before his time. The inſcriptions above-mentioned are a further proof, that the Numidians had an alphabet of their own (9).

Æmilianus divides his kingdom and effects amongst his three sons. Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal.

MASINISSA, before his death, gave his ring to his eldest son Micipsa; but left the distribution of all his other (K) effects and possessions amongst his children, as has been just observed, entirely to Æmilianus. Of fifty-four sons, that survived him, only three were legitimate, viz. Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal. Æmilianus, arriving at Cirta after he had expired, divided his kingdom, or rather the government of it, amongst these three, though to the others he gave considerable possessions. To Micipsa, who was a prince of a pacific disposition, and the eldest son, he assigned Cirta, the metropolis, for the place of his residence, in exclusion of the others. Gulussa, the next to him, being a prince of a military geunis, had the command of the army, and the transacting of all affairs, relating to peace or war, committed to his care. And Mastanabal, or, according to Livy and Sallust, Manastabal, the youngest, had the administration of justice, an employment suitable to his education, allotted him. They enjoyed in common the immense treasures Masinissa had amassed, and were all of them dignified by Æmilianus with the royal title. After he had made these wise dispositions, that young nobleman departed from Cirta, taking with him a body of Numidian troops, under the conduct of Gulussa, to reinforce the Roman army, that was then acting against the Carthaginians [m].

Mastanabal and Gulussa die soon after their father Masinissa.

MASTANABAL and Gulussa died soon after their father, as appears from the express testimony of Sallust. We find nothing more remarkable of these princes, besides what has been already related, than that the latter continued to assist the Romans in the third Punic war; and that the former was pretty well versed in the Greek language. Micipsa therefore became sole possessor of the kingdom of Numidia. In his reign, and the consulate of M. Plautius Hypsæus

(K) It is said, that Masinissa was served in earthenware, after the Roman fashion; but all the strangers at his table in plate. The second service, or desart, was adorned with golden baskets, in conformity to the Italian custom, so ingeniously worked, that they resembled those made of twigs, rushes, &c. Greek musicians likewise attended his entertainments (10).

(10) Ptol. comment. l. viii. apud Athen. deipnosoph. l. vi.

Hypſœus and M. Fulvius Flaccus, according to Oroſius, a great part of Africa was covered with locuſts, which deſtroyed all the produce of the earth, and even deſtroyed dry wood; but at laſt they were all carried by the wind into the African ſea, out of which being thrown in vaſt heaps upon the ſhore, a plague enſued, which ſwept away an infinite number of animals of all kinds. In Numidia only periſhed eight hundred thouſand men, and in Africa Propria two hundred thouſand: amongſt the reſt, thirty thouſand Roman ſoldiers quartered in and about Utica, for the defence of the laſt province. At Utica in particular the mortality raged to ſuch a degree, that fifteen hundred dead bodies were carried out of one gate in a day. Micipſa had two ſons, Adherbal and Hiempſal, whom he educated in his palace, together with his nephew Jugurtha. That young prince was the ſon of Maſtanabal; but his mother having been only a concubine, Maſiniſſa had taken no great notice of him. However, Micipſa, conſidering him as a prince of the blood, took as much care of him, as he did of his own children [n].

JUGURTHA poſſeſſed ſeveral eminent qualities, which gained him univerſal eſteem. He was very handſome, endued with great ſtrength of body, and adorned with the fineſt intellectual endowments. He did not devote himſelf, as young men commonly do, to a life of luxury and pleaſure. He uſed to exerciſe himſelf, with perſons of his age, in running, riding, hurling the javelin, and other manly exerciſes, ſuited to the martial genius of the Numidians; and, though he ſurpaſſed all his fellowſportſmen, there was not one of them but loved him. The chace was his only delight; but it was that of lions, and other ſavage (L) beaſts. Salluſt, to finiſh his character, tells us, that he excelled in all things, and ſpoke very little of himſelf [o].

(L) Salluſt ſeems to intimate, that many of the natives of Numidia were deſtroyed by theſe wild beaſts; for he ſays, that the Numidians were ſo healthy, and of ſuch robuſt conſtitutions, that almoſt all of them attained to old age, except thoſe who either fell in war, or were devoured by wild beaſts, ſcarce any diſeaſe ever proving fatal to them (11).

(11) Salluſt. in bell. Jugurth.

Micipſa jealous of his nephew Jugurtha.

So conſpicuous an aſſemblage of fine talents and perfections at firſt charmed Micipſa, who thought them an ornament to his kingdom. However, he ſoon began to reflect, that he was conſiderably advanced in years, and his children in their infancy; that mankind naturally thirſted after power; and that nothing was capable of making men run greater lengths than a vicious and unlimited ambition. Theſe reflections ſoon excited his jealouſy, and determined him to expoſe Jugurtha to a variety of dangers, ſome of which, he entertained hopes, might prove fatal to him. In order to this, he gave him the command of a body of forces, which he ſent to aſſiſt the Romans, who were at that time beſieging Numantia in Spain. But Jugurtha, by his admirable conduct, did not only eſcape all theſe dangers, but likewiſe won the eſteem of the whole army, and the friendſhip of Scipio, who ſent a high character of him to his uncle Micipſa. However, that general gave him ſome prudent advice in relation to his future conduct, obſerving, no doubt, in him certain ſparks of ambition, which, if lighted into a flame, he apprehended, might, one day, be productive of the moſt fatal conſequences [p].

Jugurtha's perfidiouſneſs and cruelty.

BEFORE this laſt experiment, Micipſa had endeavoured to find out ſome method of taking him off privately; but his popularity amongſt the Numidians obliged that prince to lay aſide all thoughts of this nature. After his return from Spain, the whole nation almoſt adored him. The heroic bravery he had ſhewn there, his undaunted courage, joined to the utmoſt calmneſs of mind, which enabled him to preſerve a juſt medium between a timorous foreſight and an impetuous raſhneſs, a circumſtance rarely to be met with in perſons of his age, and, above all, the advantageous teſtimonials of his conduct given by Scipio, attracted an univerſal eſteem; nay, Micipſa himſelf charmed with the high idea the Roman general had entertained of his merit, changed his behaviour towards him, reſolving, if poſſible, to win his affection by kindneſs. He therefore adopted him, and declared him joint heir with his two ſons (M) to the crown.

Finding,

(M) Diodorus Siculus relates, that tho' Micipſa had many children, his three favourite ſons were Adherbal, Hiempſal, and Micipſa. The ſame hiſtorian likewiſe adds, that he was the moſt

Finding, ſome few years afterwards, that his end approached, he ſent for all the three to his bed ſide, where, in preſence of the whole court, he deſired Jugurtha to recollect with what extreme tenderneſs he had treated him, and conſeqently to conſider how well he had deſerved at his hands. He then entreated him to protect his children on all occaſions, who, being before related to him by the ties of blood, were now, by their fathers bounty, become his brethren. In order to fix him the more firmly in their intereſts, he likewiſe complimented him upon his bravery, addreſs, and conſummate prudence. He further inſinuated, that neither arms nor treaſures conſtitute the ſtrength of a kingdom, but friends, who are neither won by arms nor gold, but by real ſervices and an inviolable fidelity. "Now where, "continued he, can we find better friends than in brothers? "And how can that man, who becomes an enemy to his "relations, repoſe any confidence in, or depend upon, "ſtrangers?" Then addreſſing himſelf to Adherbal and "Hiempſal, And you, ſaid he, I enjoin always to pay the "higheſt reverence to Jugurtha. Endeavour to imitate, "and, if poſſible, ſurpaſs, his exalted merit, that the world "may not hereafter obſerve Micipſa's adopted ſon to have "reflected greater glory upon his memory than his own "children." Soon after, Micipſa, who, according to Diodorus, was a prince of an amiable character, expired. Though Jugurtha did not believe the king to ſpeak his real ſentiments with regard to him, yet he ſeemed extremely pleaſed with ſo gracious a ſpeech, and made him an anſwer ſuitable to the occaſion. However, that prince at the ſame time was determined within himſelf to put in execution the ſcheme he had formed at the ſiege of Numantia, which was ſuggeſted to him by ſome factious and abandoned Roman officer, with whom he there contracted an acquaintance. The purport of this ſcheme was, that he ſhould extort the crown by force from his two couſins, as ſoon as their father's eyes were cloſed; which, they inſinuated, might eaſily be effected by his own valour, and the venality of the Romans. Accordingly, a ſhort time after the old king's death, he found means to aſſaſſinate Hiempſal in the city of Thirmida, where his treaſures were depoſited, and drive Adherbal out of his dominions. That unhappy prince found himſelf obliged to fly to Rome, where he endeavoured to engage the conſcript fathers to eſpouſe his quarrel; but, notwithſtanding the juſtice of his cauſe, they had not virtue enough effectually to ſupport him. Jugurtha's embaſſadors, by diſtributing vaſt ſums of money amongſt the ſenators, brought them ſo far over, that a majority palliated his inhuman proceedings. When thoſe embaſſadors therefore declared, that Hiempſal had been killed by the Numidians, on account of his exceſſive cruelty; that Adherbal was the aggreſſor in the late troubles; that he was only chagrined, becauſe he could not make that havock amongſt his countrymen he would willingly have done; and entreated the ſenate to form a judgment of Jugurtha's behaviour in Africa from what he had ſhewn at Numantia, rather than from the ſuggeſtions of his enemies, by far the greateſt part of the ſenate diſcovered themſelves prejudiced in his favour. A few however, that were not loſt to honour, nor abandoned to corruption, inſiſted upon bringing him to condign puniſhment; but, as they could not prevail, he had the beſt part of Numidia allotted him, and Adherbal was forced to reſt ſatisfied with the other [q].

He bribes the Roman ſenate, and maſſacres Adherbal.

JUGURTHA, finding now by experience, that every thing was venal at Rome, as his friends at Numantia had before informed him, thought he might purſue his towering projects without any obſtruction from that quarter. He therefore, immediately after the laſt diviſion of Micipſa's dominions threw off the maſk, and attacked his couſin by open force. As Adherbal was a prince of a pacific diſpoſition, and almoſt in all reſpects the reverſe of Jugurtha, he was by no means a match for him. The latter therefore pillaged the former's territories, ſtormed ſeveral of his fortreſſes, and overran a good part of his kingdom without oppoſition. Adherbal, depending upon the friendſhip of the Romans, which his father, in his laſt moments, aſſured him would be a ſtronger ſupport to him tha than all the troops and treasures in the universe, dispatched deputies to Rome, to complain of these hostilities. But, whilst he lost his time in sending thither fruitless deputations, Jugurtha overthrew him in a pitched battle, and soon after shut him up in Cirta. During the siege of this city, a Roman commission arrived there, in order to persuade both parties to an accommodation; but finding Jugurtha untractable, the commissioners returned home, without so much as conferring with Adherbal. A second deputation, composed of senators of the highest distinction, with Æmilius Scaurus, president of the senate, at their head, landed some time after at Utica, and summoned Jugurtha to appear before them. That prince at first seemed to be under dreadful apprehensions, especially as Scaurus reproached him with his enormous crimes, and threatened him with the resentment of the Romans, if he did not immediately raise the siege of Cirta. However, the Numidian, by his address, and the irresistible power of gold, as was afterwards suspected at Rome, so mollified Scaurus, that he left Adherbal at his mercy. In fine, Jugurtha had at last Cirta surrendered to him, upon condition only, that he should spare the life of Adherbal; but the merciless tyrant, in violation of the laws of nature and humanity, as well as the capitulation, when he had got possession of the town, ordered him to be put to a most cruel death. The merchants likewise, and all the Numidians in the place capable of bearing arms, he caused, without distinction, to be put to the sword [r].

He corrupts Bestia and Scaurus.

Every person at Rome, inspired with any sentiments of humanity, was struck with horror at the news of this tragical event. However, all the venal senators still concurred with Jugurtha's ministers in palliating his enormous crimes. Notwithstanding which, the people, excited thereto by Caius Memmius their tribune, who bitterly inveighed against the venality of the senate, resolved not to let so flagrant an instance of villainy go unpunished. This disposition in them induced the conscript fathers likewise to declare their intention to chastise Jugurtha. In order to this, an army was levied to invade Numidia, and the command of it given to the consul Calpurnius Bestia, a person of good abilities, but rendered unfit for the expedition he was to go upon by his insatiable avarice.

Jugurtha,

Jugurtha, being informed of the great preparations making at Rome to attack his dominions, sent his son thither to avert the impending storm. The young prince was plentifully supplied with money, which he had orders to distribute liberally amongst the leading men. But Bestia, proposing to himself great advantages from an invasion of Numidia, defeated all his intrigues, and got a decree passed, ordering him and his attendants to depart Italy in ten days, unless they were come to deliver up the king himself, and all his territories, to the republic by way of dedition; which decree being notified to them, they returned, without so much as having entered the gates of Rome; and Bestia soon after landed with a powerful army in Africa. For some time he carried on the war there very briskly, reduced several strong-holds, and took many Numidians prisoners. But, upon the arrival of Scaurus, whose character has been already given in the Roman history; a peace was granted Jugurtha upon advantageous terms. That prince coming from Vacca, the place of his residence, to the Roman camp, in order to confer with Bestia and Scaurus, and the preliminaries of the treaty being immediately after settled between them in private conferences, every body at Rome was convinced, that the prince of the senate and the consul had sacrificed to their avarice the good of the republick. The indignation therefore of the people in general displayed itself in the strongest manner. Memmius also fired them with his speeches. It was therefore resolved to dispatch the prætor Cassius, a person they could confide in, to Numidia, to prevail upon Jugurtha to come to Rome, that they might learn from the king himself which of their generals and senators had been seduced by the pestilent influence of corruption. Upon his arrival there, he found means to bribe one Bœbius Salca, a man of great authority amongst the plebeians, but of insatiable avarice, by whose assistance he escaped with impunity; nay, by the efficacy of gold, he did not only elude all the endeavours of the people of Rome to bring him to justice, but likewise enabled Bomilcar, one of his attendants, to get Massiva, an illegitimate son of Micipsa, assassinated in the streets of Rome. That young prince was advised by many Romans of probity, well-wishers to the family of Masiniss, to apply for the kingdom of Numidia; wich coming to Jugurtha's ears, he prevented the application by this execrable execrable ſtep. However, he was obliged to leave Italy immediately. He departed Rome with paſſing that ſevere reflection upon the venality of its infamous citizens already mentioned [s].

Obliges the Roman army to paſs under the jugum, and quit Numidia.

JUGURTHA had ſcarce ſet foot in Africa, when he received advice, that the ſenate had diſannulled the ſhameful peace concluded with him by Beſtia and Scaurus. Soon after, the conſul Albinus tranſported a Roman army into Numidia, flattering himſelf with the hopes of reducing Jugurtha to reaſon before the expiration of his conſulatate. In this however he found himſelf deceived; for that crafty prince, by various artifices, ſo amuſed and impoſed upon Albinus, that nothing of moment happened that campaign. This rendered him ſtrongly ſuſpected of having betrayed his country after the example of his predeceſſors. His brother Aulus, who ſucceeded him in the command of the army, was ſtill more unſucceſsful; for, after riſing from before Suthul, where the king's treaſures were depoſited, he marched his forces into a defile, out of which he found it impoſſible to extricate himſelf. He therefore was obliged to ſubmit to the ignominious ceremony of paſſing under the jugum, with all his men, andto quit Numidia entirely in ten days time, in order to deliver his troops from immediate deſtruction. The avaricious diſpoſition of the Roman commander prompted him to beſiege Suthul, the poſſeſſion of which place, he imagined, would make him maſter of all the wealth of Jugurtha, and conſequently paved the way to ſuch a ſcandalous treaty. However, this was declared void as ſoon as known at Rome, as being concluded without the authority of the people. The Roman troops retired into Africa Propria, which they had now reduced into the form of a Roman province, and there took up their winter-quarters [t].

Defeated by Metellus.

IN the mean time Caius Mamilius Limetanus, tribune of the people, excited the plebeians to enquire into the conduct of theſe perſons, by whoſe aſſiſtance Jugurtha had found means to elude all the decrees of the ſenate. This put the body of the people into a great ferment; which occaſioned a proſecution of the guilty ſenators, that was carried on, for ſome time, with the utmoſt heat and violence. Lucius Metellus the conſul, during theſe tranſactions, tranſactions, had Numidia aſſigned him for his province, and conſequently was appointed general of the army deſtined to act againſt Jugurtha. As he perfectly diſregarded wealth, the Numidian found him ſuperior to all his temptations; which was a great mortification to him. To this he joined all the other virtues, which conſtitute the great captain; ſo that Jugurtha found him in all reſpects inacceſſible. That prince therefore was now forced to regulate his conduct, according to the motions of Metellus, with the greateſt caution, and exert his utmoſt bravery, in order to compenſate for that hitherto favourable expedient, which now began to fail him. Marius, Metellus's lieutenant, being likewiſe a perſon of uncommon merit, the Romans reduced Vacca, a large, opulent city, and the moſt celebrated mart in Numidia; defeated Jugurtha in a pitched battle; overthrew Bomilcar, one of his generals, upon the banks of the Muthullus; and, in fine, forced the Numidian monarch to take ſhelter in a place rendered almoſt inacceſſible by the rocks and woods with which it was covered. However, Jugurtha ſignalized himſelf in a ſurpriſing manner, exhibiting all that could be expected from the courage, abilities, and attention of a conſummate general, to whom deſpair adminiſters freſh ſtrength, and ſuggeſts new lights. But his troops could not make head againſt the Romans; they were again worſted by Marius, though they obliged Metellus to raiſe the ſiege of Zama. Jugurtha therefore, finding his country everywhere ravaged, his moſt opulent cities plundered, his fortreſſes reduced, his towns burnt, vaſt numbers of his ſubjects put to the ſword, and taken priſoners, began to think ſeriouſly of coming to an accommodation with the Romans. His favourite Bomilcar, in whom he repoſed the higheſt confidence, but who had been gained over to the enemy by Metellus, obſerving this deſpoſition, found it no difficult matter to perſuade him to deliver up his elephants, money, arms, horſes, and deſerters, in whom the main ſtrength of his army conſiſted, into the hands of the Romans. Some of theſe laſt, in order to avoid the puniſhment due to their crime, retired to Bocchus king of Mauritania, and liſted in his ſervice. But Metellus ordering him to repair to (N) Tiſidium, a city of Numidia,

(N) This city ſeems to have been ſituated either upon the borders of Africa Propria, or in that province, ſince Mettellus diſtributed

Numidia, there to receive farther directions, and he refuſing a compliance with that order, hoſtilities were renewed with greater fury than ever. Fortune now ſeemed to declare in favour of Jugurtha: he retook Vacca, and maſſacred the Roman garriſon, though Turpilius, the commandant, found means to make his eſcape. However, ſoon after a Roman legion ſeized again upon it, and treated the inhabitants with the greateſt ſeverity. About this time one of Maſtanabal's ſons, named Gauda, whom, Micipſa, in his will, had appointed to ſucceed to the crown, in caſe his two legitimate ſons and Jugurtha died without iſſue, wrote to the ſenate in favour of Marius, who was then endeavouring to ſupplant Metellus; the occaſion and effect of which ſolicitation has already been related. That prince, having his underſtanding impaired by a declining ſtate of health, fell a more eaſy prey to the baſe and infamous adulation of Marius, who, after having ſoothed his vanity, aſſured him, that, as he was the next heir to the crown, he might depend upon being fixed upon the Numidian throne, as ſoon as Jugurtha was either killed or taken, which muſt in a ſhort time happen, when he once appeared at the head of the Roman army with an unlimitted commiſſion. Soon after, Bomilcar and Nabdalſa formed a deſign to aſſaſſinate Jugurtha, at the (O) inſtigation of Metellus; but this being detected, Bomilcar, and moſt of his accomplices, ſuffered death, as our readers will find in another part of this work. The plot however had ſuch an effect upon Jugurtha, that he enjoyed afterwards no tranquillity or repoſe. He ſuſpected perſons of all denominations, Numidians as well as foreigners, of ſome black deſign againſt him. Perpetual terrors ſat brooding over his mind; inſomuch that he never got a wink of ſleep, but by ſtealth, and often changing his bed in a low, plebeian manner. Starting buted his troops in winter quarters there, after the concluſion of the campaign (13).

(O) Frontinus relates, that Metellus endeavoured to ſecure Jugurtha's perſon, not to aſſaſſinate him, which, he inſinuates, might have been more eaſily effected. But as this runs counter to Salluſt, who is ſuperior, in point of authority, to Frontinus, this hiſtorical fragment deſerves not much credit (14).

(13) Salluſt. in bell. Jugurth. (14) S. Jul. Frontin. ſtrat. l. i. c. 8. ex. 8.

Starting from his sleep, he would frequently snatch his sword, and break out into the most doleful cries. So strongly was he haunted by a spirit of fear, jealousy, and distraction [u].

Overthrown a second time by him.

JUGURTHA, having destroyed great numbers of his friends, on suspicion of their having been concerned in the late conspiracy, and many more of them deserting to the Romans and Bocchus king of Mauritania, found himself, in a manner, destitute of counsellors, generals, and all persons capable of assisting him in carrying on the war. This threw him into a deep melancholy, which rendered him dissatisfied with every thing, and made him fatigue his troops with a variety of contradictory motions. Sometimes he would advance with great celerity against the enemy, and at others retreat with no small swiftness from them. Then he resumed his former courage; but soon after despaired either of the valour or fidelity of the forces under his command. All his movements therefore proved unsuccessful, and at last he was forced by Metellus to a battle. That part of the Numidian army Jugurtha commanded behaved with some resolution; but the other fled at their first onset. The Romans therefore entirely defeated them, took all their standards, and made a few of them prisoners. Not many of them were slain in the action, since, as Sallust observes, the Numidians trusted more to their heels than their arms for safety in this engagement [w].

Metellus takes Thala.

METELLUS pursued Jugurtha and his fugitives to Thala, a place we have formerly described. His march to this place, being through vast deserts, was extremely tedious and difficult; but being supplied with wooden vessels of all sizes taken from the huts of the Numidians, which were filled with water brought by the natives, who had submitted to him, he invested that city. He had no sooner sat down before it, than a most copious shower of rain, a thing very uncommon in those deserts, proved a great and seasonable refreshment to his forces, who, animated thereby, as though the gods had declared for them, prepared to attack the town with such vigour, that Jugurtha, [u] Idem ibid. Liv. epit. lxv. Plut. in Mar. Vell Paterc. l. ii. c. 11. [w] Sallust. Liv. Paterc. Oros. ubi sup. Eutrop. ubi sup, c. 27.

Jugurtha, with his family, and treaſures depoſited therein, thought proper to abandon it. After a brave defence, it was reduced, the garriſon, conſiſting of Roman deſerters, ſetting fire to the king's palace, and conſuming themſelves, together with every thing valuable to them, in the flames. Jugurtha, being now reduced to great extremities, retired into Gætulia, where he formed a conſiderable corps. From thence he advanced to the confines of Mauritania, and engaged Bocchus, king of that country, whoſe daughter he had married, to enter into an alliance with him; in conſequence of which, having reinforced his Gætulian troops with a powerful body of Mauritanians, he turned the tables upon Metellus, and obliged him to keep cloſe within his intrenchments. Salluſt informs us, that Jugurtha bribed Bocchus's miniſters to influence that prince in his favour; and that having obtained an audience, he inſinuated, that, ſhould Numidia be ſubdued, Mauritania muſt be involved in its ruin, eſpecially as the Romans ſeemed to have vowed the deſtruction of all the thrones in the univerſe. In ſupport of what he advanced, he produced ſeveral inſtances very appoſite to the point in view. However, the ſame author ſeems to intimate, that Bocchus was determined to aſſiſt Jugurtha againſt his enemies by the ſlight the Romans had formerly ſhewn him. That prince, at the firſt breaking out of this war, ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to propoſe an offenſive and defenſive alliance to the republic; which, though of the utmoſt conſequence to it at that juncture, a few of the moſt venal and infamous ſenators, who were abandoned to corruption, prevented from taking effect. This undoubtedly wrought more powerfully upon Bocchus in favour of Jugurtha, than the relation he ſtood in to him; for both the Moors and Numidians adapted the number of their wives to their circumſtances, ſo that ſome had ten, twenty, &c. to their ſhare. There kings therefore were unlimited in this particular, and of courſe all degrees of affinity, reſulting to them from marriage, had little force. It is obſervable, that the poſterity of thoſe antient nations have the ſame cuſtom prevailing amongſt them at this day [x].

SUCH

And endeavours to draw off Bocchus from the interest of Jugurtha.

SUCH was the situation of affairs in Numidia, when Metellus received advice of the promotion of Marius to the consulate. What effect this news had upon that excellent, tho' much injured, commander, has been already observed. But, notwithstanding the injurious treatment he met with on this occasion, he generously endeavoured to draw off Bocchus from Jugurtha, though this would facilitate the reduction of Numidia for his rival. To this end embassadors were dispatched to the Mauritanian court, who intimated to Bocchus, "That it would be highly imprudent "to come to a rupture with the Romans without any "cause at all; that he had now a fine opportunity of con-"cluding a most advantageous treaty with them, which "was much preferable to a war; that, whatever depend-"ence he might place upon his riches, he ought not to "run the hazard of losing his dominions by embroiling "himself with other states, when he could easily avoid "this; that it was much easier to begin a war, than to "end it, which it was in the power of the victor alone to "do; that, in fine, he would by no means consult the "interest of his subjects, if he followed the desperate for-"tunes of Jugurtha." To which Bocchus replied, "That, "for his part, there was nothing he wished for more than "peace; but that he could not help pitying the deplorable "condition of Jugurtha; that if the Romans therefore "would grant that unfortunate prince the same terms they "had offered him, he would bring about an accommoda-"tion." Metellus let the Mauritanian monarch know, that it was not in his power to comply with what he desired. However, he took care to keep up a private negotiation with him till the new consul Marius's arrival. By this conduct he served two wise ends; for, first, he prevented thereby Bocchus from coming to a general action with his troops; which was the very thing Jugurtha desired, as hoping that this, whatever the event might be, would render a reconciliation betwixt him and the Romans impracticable. Secondly, this inaction enabled him to discover something of the genius and disposition of the Moors, a nation, of whom the Romans, till then, had scarce formed any idea, which, he imagined, might be of no small service, either to himself or his successors, in the future prosecution of the war [y].

Marius reduces Capſa.

JUGURTHA, being informed, that Marius, with a numerous army, was landed at Utica, adviſed Bocchus to retire, with part of the troops, to ſome place of difficult acceſs, whilſt he himſelf took poſt upon another inacceſſible ſpot with the remaining corps. By this meaſure, he hoped the Romans would be obliged to divide their forces, and conſequently be more expoſed to his efforts and attacks. He likewiſe imagined, that, ſeeing no formidable body appear, they would believe the enemy in no condition to make head againſt them; which might occaſion a relaxation of diſcipline, the uſual attendant of a too great ſecurity, and conſequently produce ſome good effect. However, he was diſappointed in both theſe views; for Marius, far from ſuffering a relaxation of diſcipline to take place, trained up his troops, which conſiſted chiefly of new levies, in ſo perfect a manner, that they were ſoon equal in goodneſs to any conſular army that ever appeared in the field. He alſo cut off great numbers of the Gætulian marauders, defeated many of Jugurtha's parties, and had like to have taken that prince himſelf priſoner near the city of Cirta. Theſe advantages, though not of any great importance, intimidated Bocchus, who now made overtures for an accommodation; but the Romans, not being ſufficiently ſatisfied of his ſincerity, gave no great attention to them. In the mean time Marius puſhed on his conqueſts, reducing ſeveral places of leſs note, and at laſt reſolved to beſiege Capſa. That this enterprize might be conducted with the greater ſecrecy, he ſuffered not the leaſt hint of his deſign to tranſpire, even amongſt any of his officers. On the contrary, in order to blind them, he detached A. Manlius, one of his lieutenants, with ſome light-armed cohorts to the city of Lares, where he had fixed his principal magazine, and depoſited the military cheſt. Before the lieutenant left the camp, that he might the more effectually amuſe him, he intimated, that himſelf, with the army, ſhould take the ſame rout in a few days; but, inſtead of that, he bent his march towards the Tanais, and, in ſix days time, arrived upon the banks of that river. Here he pitched his tents for a ſhort time, in order to refreſh his troops; which having done, he advanced to Capſa, and made himſelf maſter of it, in the manner we have already related. As the ſituation of this city rendered it extremely commodious to Jugurtha, whoſe plan of operations, ever ſince the commencement of the war, it had exceedingly favoured, he levelled it with the ground, after it had been delivered up to the ſoldiers to be plundered. The citizens likewiſe, being more ſtrongly attached to that prince than any of the other Numidians, on account of the extraordinary privileges he indulged them with, and, of courſe, bearing a more implacable hatred to the Romans, he put to the ſword, or ſold for ſlaves. The true motive of the conſul's conduct on this occaſion ſeems here to be aſſigned, though we are told by Salluſt, in conformity to the Roman genius, that neither avarice nor reſentment prompted him to ſo barbarous an action, but only a deſire to ſtrike a terror in the Numidians [z] (P)

Jugurtha prevails upon Bocchus to aſſiſt him.

THE Numidians, ever after this exploit, dreaded the very name of Marius, who now, in his own opinion, had eclipſed the glory of all his predeceſſor's great atchievements, particularly the reduction of Thala, a city, in ſtrength and ſituation, nearly reſembling Capſa. Following his blow, he gradually preſented himſelf before moſt of the places of ſtrength in the enemy's country, many of which either opened their gates, or were abandoned, at his approach, being terrified with what had happened to the unfortunate citizens of Capſa; others taking by force, he laid in aſhes; and, in ſhort, filled the greateſt part of Numidia with blood, horror, and confuſion. The operations of the campaign were concluded by the reduction of a caſtle, that ſeemed impregnable, [z] Salluſt. Liv. Flor. Plut. Eutrop. Oros ubi ſupra.

(P) Salluſt does not only inform us, that the Numidians lived after much the ſame manner as the Libyan Nomades of Herodotus, but likewiſe that they were called Nomo-Numidæ; which ſeems to confirm what we have hinted above concerning the etymon of the word Numidia. He likewiſe tells us, that theſe Nomo-Numidæ encreaſed ſo exceedingly, that they overſtocked their original country; and therefore a great multitude of them were obliged to make an irruption into the country afterwards from them called Numidia, where they ſettled. This piece of hiſtory the ſame writer affirms ro have been extracted from ſome Punic books belonging to king Hiempſal. From whence it may be inferred, that what has been advanced by Herodotus concerning the irruption of the Libyan Nomades into Numidia, is probably true, ſince it is atteſted by the Punic writers themſelves, though it muſt be owned, that where theſe authors contradict Herodotus, and the generality of the beſt hiſtorians, ſuch a degree of credit is not due to them (15).

(15) Herodot. ubi ſup. l. iv. Salluſt. in bell. Juguth.

impregnable, ſeated on the Mulucha, where Jugurtha kept part of his treaſures (Q). In the mean time Jugurtha, not being able to prevail upon Bocchus, by his repeated ſolicitations, to advance into Numidia, where he found himſelf greatly preſſed, was obliged to have recourſe to his uſual method of bribing the Mauritanian miniſters, in order to put that prince in motion. He alſo promiſed him a third part of his kingdom, provided they could either drive the Romans out of Africa, or get all the Numidian dominions confirmed to him by treaty [a].

So conſiderable a ceſſion could not fail of engaging Bocchus to ſupport Jugurtha with his whole power. The two (R) African monarchs therefore, having joined their forces, ſurpriſed Marius near Cirta, as he was going into winter-quarters. The Roman general was ſo puſhed on this occaſion, that the barbarians thought themſelves certain of victory, and doubted not but they ſhould be able to extinguiſh the Roman name in Numidia; but their incaution and too great ſecurity enabled Marius to give them a total defeat, which was followed four days after by ſo complete an overthrow, that their numerous army, conſiſting of ninety thouſand men, by the acceſſion of a powerful corps of Moors, commanded by Bocchus's ſon Volux, was entirely ruined. Sylla, Marius's lieutenant, moſt eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the laſt action, which laid the foundation of his future greatneſs. Bocchus, now looking upon Jugurtha's condition as deſperate, and not being willing to run the riſk of loſing his dominions, clapped up a peace with Rome. However, the republic gave him to underſtand, that he muſt not expect to be ranked amongſt its friends, till he had

They are both defeated by Marius, upon which Bocchus delivers up Jugurtha to the Romans.

(Q) Notwithſtanding the immenſe treaſures Jugurtha had been in poſſeſſion of, ſo late as ſome years after the death of Gala, father to Maſiniſſa, a great part of the Numidians, all thoſe at leaſt inhabiting the open country, had no gold or ſilver money. However, they were not very ſenſible of this defect, ſince it was ſupplied by their flocks and herds, as we are informed by Livy (16).

(R) Frontinus ſays, that Jugurtha never began a battle with the Romans till towards evening, that, if he ſhould happen to be defeated, he might eſcape by favour of the night (17).

had delivered up into the conſul's hands Jugurtha, that inveterate enemy of the Roman name. The Mauritanian monarch, having entertained a high idea of an alliance with that ſtate, reſolved to ſatisfy it in this particular, and was confirmed in his reſolution by one Dabar, a Numidian prince, the ſon of Maſſugrada, and deſcended, by his mother's ſide, from Maſiniſſa, who, being cloſely attached to the Romans, and extremely agreeable to Bocchus, on account of his noble diſpoſition, had defeated all the intrigues of Aſpar, Jugurtha's miniſter. Upon Sylla's arrival at the Mauritanian court, the affair there ſeemed to be entirely ſettled. However, Bocchus, who was for ever projecting new deſigns, and, like the reſt of his countrymen, in the higheſt degree perfidious, debated within himſelf, whether he ſhould ſacrifice Sylla or Jugurtha, who were both then in his power. He was a long time fluctuating with uncertainty, and combated by a contrariety of ſentiments. The ſudden changes, which diſplayed themſelves in his countenance, his air, and his whole perſon, evidently ſhewed how ſtrongly his mind was agitated; but at laſt he returned to his firſt deſign, to which the bias of his mind ſeemed naturally to lead him. He therefore delivered up Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla, to be conducted to Marius, who, by that ſucceſsful event, happily terminated this dangerous war. The kingdom of Numidia was now reduced to a new form: Bocchus, for his important ſervices, had the country of the Maſæſyli, contiguous to Mauritania, aſſigned him, which, from this time, took the name of New Mauritania. Numidia Propria, or the country of the Maſſyli, was divided into three parts, one of which was given to Hiempſal, another to Mondreſtal, both deſcendents of Maſiniſſa, and the third the Romans annexed to Africa Propria, or the Roman province, adjacent to it. What became of Jugurtha, after he had graced Marius's triumph (S), at which ceremony he was led in chains,

(S) According to Plutarch, Marius's triumph happened on the firſt day of January, which began the year amongſt the Romans, when Jugurtha was expoſed to the view of the people. The populace were extremely pleaſed with that ſight, the Numidian, by his valour and conduct, having rendered himſelf terrible to the Romans; nay, Florus intimates, that he was looked upon by them as a ſecond Hannibal. Plutarch adds, that the day he was led in triumph, he fell diſtracted; that, when he was afterwards

Tranſactions in Numidia after the death of Jugurtha.

JUGURTHA'S two ſons ſurvived him, but ſpent their lives in captivity at Venuſia. However, one of them, named Oxyntas, was, for a ſhort time, releaſed from his confinement by Aponius, who beſieged Acerræ in the war between the Romans and the Italian allies. That general brought this prince to his army, where he treated him as king, in order to draw the Numidian forces off from the Roman ſervice. Accordingly thoſe Numidians no ſooner heard, that the ſon of their old king was fighting for the allies, than they began to deſert by companies; which obliged Julius Cæſar, the conſul, to part with all his Numidian cavalry, and ſend them back into Africa. Some few years after this event, Pompey defeated Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus, and Hiarbas, one of the kings of Numidia, killing ſeventeen thouſand of their men upon the ſpot. Not ſatisfied with this victory, that general purſued the fugitives to their camp, which he ſoon forced, put Domitius to the ſword, and took Hiarbas priſoner. He then reduced that part of Numidia which belonged to Hiarbas, who ſeems to have ſucceeded Mandreſtal above-mentioned, and gave it to Hiempſal, a neighbouring Numidian prince, afterwards thrown into priſon, whilſt ſome tore of his cloaths, and others his golden pendent, with wich they pulled off the tip of his ear, he was greatly diſcompoſed; and that yet, full of horror, when he was caſt naked into the dungeon, he forced a ſmile, crying out, O heavens! how intolerably cold is this bath of yours! In this place He ſtruggled for ſome time with extreme hunger, and ther expired. The barbarous death he was put to, notwithſtanding his own inhuman diſpoſition, will remain an eternal monument of the Roman cruelty and ingratitude. Mithridates therefore juſtly reproached the lords of the world with their infamous barbarity to the grandſon of Maſiniſſa, a prince that contributed as much to the deſtruction of their only rival Carthage as either of the Africani (18).

deſcended from Maſiniſſa, who had always oppoſed the Marian faction. For a particular account of the treacherous reception Hiempſal, or his ſon Mandreſtal, gave young Marius, Cethegus, Lectorius, and others of the ſame party, when proſcribed by Sylla, and forced to ſeek an aſylum at his court, we muſt refer our readers to Plutarch and Appian [c].

Cæſar treats Juba in a very indecent manner.

SUETONIUS informs us, that a diſpute happened at Rome between Hiempſal and one Maſintha, a noble Numidian, whom, it is probable, he had, in ſome reſpect, injured, when Julius Cæſar firſt began to make a figure in the world. This is a plain demonſtration, that Numidia was, at that time, in reality, ſubject to the Romans, ſince the ſubjects there could then apply to the Romans for redreſs, even from their ſovereign. The ſame author adds, that Cæſar warmly eſpouſed the cauſe of Maſintha, and even groſly inſulted Juba, Hiempſal's ſon, when he attempted to vindicate his father's conduct on this occaſion. He pulled him by the beard, than which a more unpardonable affront could not be offered an African, and reproached him with being a tributary dependent prince. In ſhort, he ſcreened Maſintha from the inſults and violence of his enemies; from whence a reaſon may be aſſigned for Juba's adhering ſo cloſely afterwards to the Pompeian faction [d].

Juba defeats Curio, one of Cæſar's lieutenants.

IN conſequence of the indignity Cæſar had offered Juba, and the diſpoſition it had occaſioned, that prince did Cæſar great damage in the civil wars betwixt him and Pompey. By a ſtratagem he drew Curio, one of his lieutenants, to a general action, which it was his intereſt at that time to have avoided. He cauſed it to be given out all over Africa Propria and Numidia, that he was retired into ſome remote country at a great diſtance from the Roman territories. This coming to Curio's ears, who was then beſieging Utica, it hindered him from taking the neceſſary precautions to prevent a ſurprize. Soon after, the Roman general receiving intelligence, that a ſmall body of Numidians was approaching his camp, he put himſelf at the head of his forces, in order to attack them, and, for fear they ſhould eſcape, began his march in in the night, looking upon himſelf as ſure of victory. Some of their advanced guards he ſurpriſed aſleep, and cut them to pieces, which ſtill further animated him. In ſhort, about day-break he came up with the Numidians, whom he attacked with great bravery, though his men were then faſting, and vaſtly fatigued by their forced and precipitate march. In the mean time Juba, who, immediately after the propagation of the rumour above-mentioned, had taken care to march privately, with the main body of the Numidian army, to ſupport the detachment ſent before to decoy Curio, advanced to the relief of his men. The Romans had met with a great reſiſtance before he appeared; ſo that he eaſily broke them, killed Curio, with a good part of his troops, upon the ſpot, purſued the reſt to their camp, which he plundered, and took many of them priſoners. Moſt of the fugitives, who endeavoured to make their eſcape on board the ſhips in the port of Utica, were either ſlain by the purſuers, or drowned. The remainder fell into the hands of Varus, who would have ſaved them; but Juba, who arrogated to himſelf the honour of this victory, ordered them all to be put to the ſword * (T).

(T) Cæſar, who gives us the particulars of this action, intimates, that Sabura, Juba's general, receiving continual reinforcements from his maſter, who kept at a ſmall diſtance from him, at laſt overpowered the Romans, though they behaved with great bravery; that Sabura cut off Curio's retreat, by poſting ſome parties of his horſe upon ſeveral eminences near the field of battle; that, in conſequence of this, almoſt the whole Roman corps, commanded by Curio, was cut to pieces; and that part of the body of troops left with the quæſtor Rufus to guard the camp, made their eſcape to Sicily. In other points, for the moſt part, he agrees with Dio, whom we have here choſen to follow. Appian inſinuates, that this defeat happened near the banks of the Bagrada; that Juba cauſed a rumour to be induſtriouſly propagated, that he was returned home, to repreſs the courſes of ſome neighbouring nations, who frequently made incurſions into his dominions, and had only ſent Sabura, with a ſmall body of troops, to obſerve the enemy. This, adds the ſame author, occaſioned the deſtruction of almoſt two entire Roman legions, with a body of horſe, velites, and ſlaves. Appian alſo relates, that, upon the Cæsar overthrows Scipio, Juba, and Labienus.

THIS victory infused new life and vigour into the Pompeian faction, who thereupon conferred great honours upon Juba, and gave him the title of king of all Numidia. But Cæsar and his adherents declared him an enemy to the state of Rome, adjudging to Bocchus and Bogud, two African princes entirely in their interest, the sovereignty of his dominions. Juba afterwards, uniting his forces with those of Scipio, reduced Cæsar to great extremities, and would, in all probability, have totally ruined him, had he not been relieved by Publius Sittius (U). That the news of Curio's overthrow, Flamma, the Roman admiral, fled, without taking any of the runaways on board; that many of them, with Pollio, a Roman commander, so crouded some merchant ships, in order to make their escape on board them, that they immediately sunk, whilst others were thrown over board for the sake of the money they brought with them; and lastly, that Juba, having placed a great number of the unhappy prisoners, that fell into his hands, upon the walls of Utica, caused them to be pierced with darts. Though Varus did his utmost to prevent this inhuman massacre, he could not prevail. After the end of the action, Curio's head was cut off, and carried as an agreeable present to Juba (19).

(U) Appian gives us the following account of this P. Sittius: Being accused of a certain crime at Rome, he abandoned that city before his tryal came on, and assembled a body of Italians and Spaniards, with which he passed over into Africa. Upon his arrival there, he found the reguli of that country engaged in bloody wars amongst themselves. Sometimes he assisted one of these princes, and sometimes another, victory always declaring for him, whose interest he espoused. This rendered his name terrible to the Moors and Numidians, insomuch that he easily made the scale preponderate in favour of Cæsar, and was rewarded by that general, after the reduction of Africa, with a large extent of territory formerly belonging to one Manasses, a Numidian prince, who had assisted Juba. The other part of this district was given to Bocchus. Sittius settled the troops who had distinguished themselves under his conduct, here; but was afterwards cut off by treachery. This was effected by Arabio, Manasses's son, who after Julius Cæsar's death, sent six thousand Africans to assist S. Pompeius in Spain. These Africans, returning home some time after, disciplined after the Roman manner, enabled Arabio to dispatch Sittius, and likewise to drive Bocchus out of the territory he had usurped from him (20).

That general, having formed a conſiderable corps conſiſting of Roman exiles, and Mauritanian troops ſent him by Bocchus, according to Dio, or, as Cæſar will have it, Bogud, made an irruption into Gætulia and Numidia, whilſt Juba was employed in Africa Propria. As he ravaged theſe countries in a dreadful manner, Juba immediately returned with the beſt part of his army, to preſerve them from utter deſtruction. However, Cæſar, knowing his horſe to be afraid of the enemy's elephants, did not think proper to attack Scipio in the abſence of the Numidian, till his own elephants, and a freſh reinforcement of troops, hourly expected, arrived from Italy; which acceſſion of ſtrength, he imagined, would enable him to give a good account, both of the Roman forces, with which he was to cope, and the barbarians. In the mean time Scipio diſpatched reiterated expreſſes to (W) Juba to haſten to his aſſiſtance, but could not prevail upon him to move out of Numidia, till he had promiſed him the poſſeſſion of all the Roman dominions in Africa, if they could from thence expel Cæſar. This immediately put him in motion; ſo that having ſent a large detachment to make head againſt Sittius, he marched with the reſt of his troops to aſſiſt Scipio. However, Cæſar at laſt overthrew Scipio, Juba, and Labienus near the town of Thapſus, and forced all their camps. As Scipio was the firſt ſurpriſed and defeated, Juba fled into Numidia, without waiting for Cæſar's approach; but the body of Numidians detached againſt Sittius, having been broken and diſperſed by that general, none of his ſubjects there would receive him. Abandoned therefore to deſpair, he ſought death in a ſingle combat with Petreius, and, having killed him, cauſed himſelf to be diſpatched by one of his ſlaves [f] (X). AFTER

(W) Juba, according to Dio, pretended to aſſiſt Pompey, not out of a motive of reſentment, but becauſe he was a defender of the ſenate and people of Rome. But princes frequently, in the place of the real cauſe, ſubſtitute the pretext (21).

(X) Hirtius intimates, that Juba killed Petreius in this combat, and was himſelf afterwards diſpatched by his ſlave. Orſius relates, that Petreius run himſelf through with his ſword; and that Cæsar reduces Numidia to the form of a province.

AFTER this decisive action, and the reduction of Africa Propria, Cæsar made himself master of all Numidia Propria, which he reduced to a Roman province, appointing Crispus Sallustius to govern it in quality of proconsul, with private instructions to pillage and plunder the inhabitants, and, by that means, put it out of their power ever to shake off the Roman yoke. However, Bocchus and Bogud still preserved a sort of sovereignty in the country of the Masæsyli and Mauritania, since the former of those princes, having deserted Cæsar, sent an army into Spain to assist the Pompeians; and the latter, with his forces, determined victory to declare for Cæsar at the ever memorable battle of Munda. Bogud, afterwards siding with Anthony against Octavius, sent a body of forces to assist him in Spain; at which time the Mauritanians revolting from him, Bocchus, with an army composed of Romans in the interest of Octavius, who passed over from Spain into Africa, and his own subjects, possessed himself of Mauritania Tingitana. Bogud fled to Antony, and Octavius, after the conclusion of the war, honoured the inhabitants of Tingi with all the privileges of Roman citizens. He likewise confirmed Bocchus king of Mauritania Cæsariensis, or the country of the Masæsyli, in the possession of Tingitana, which he had conquered, as a reward for his important services. In this he imitated the example of his great predecessor Julius Cæsar, who divided some of the fruitful plains of Numidia among the soldiers of P. Sittius, who had conquered great part of that country, and appointed Sittius himself sovereign of that district. Sittius (Y), as has been intimated above, having taken Cirta, killed Sabura, Juba's general, entirely dispersed his forces, and either cut off, or taken prisoners, most of the Pompeian fugitives, that escaped from the battle of Thapsus, highly deserved to be distinguished in so eminent a manner. After Bocchus's death, that Juba hired a person to kill him; but Appian, Eutropius, and Dio, assure us, that they slew each other (22).

(Y) We learn from Hirtius, that Sittius, or, as he calls him Sitius, greatly distressed Juba before the battle of Thapsus, by possessing himself of a castle situated on a hill, where that prince had a very considerable magazine (23).

death, Mauritania and the Maſæſylian Numidia were, in all reſpects, conſidered as Roman provinces, according to Dio; which ſeems to evince, that the hoſtilities Bocchus committed againſt Carinas, whom Octavius had appointed governor of Spain, mentioned by Appian, were not attended with any bad conſequences, either to himſelf or the Romans, ſince he continued on the throne of the Maſæſylian Numidia and Mauritania as long as he lived. CHAP. II.

The hiſtory of the Mauritanians, to the entire reduction of their country by the Romans.

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Mauritania.

MAURITANIA, or as it is called by Strabo, Maurusia, and the country of the Mauruſii, was bounded on the eaſt by the Malva or Mulucha; on the weſt by the Atlantic ocean; on the ſouth by Gætulia, or Libya Interior; and on the north by the Mediterranean. This kingdom, being reduced to a Roman province in the reign of Claudius, had the name of Mauritania Tingitana given it by that prince, as we are informed by Dio. From Pliny, and ſome inſcriptions in Gruter, it likewiſe appears, that it was called by the Romans at that time, as well as afterwards, ſimply Tingitania, from its principal city Tingi, in order to diſtinguiſh it from Mauritania Cæſarienſis. If we may judge from what has been already obſerved of Numidia and Africa Propria, Deſcription of Mauritania.

the antients were not over-accurate in their descriptions of this country. However, all their faults cannot be discovered, much less corrected, since no modern accounts of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco, answering nearly to the Tingitania of the antients, can be entirely depended upon. All that can be done, is to make use of the best lights that have been hitherto afforded us[a].

Limits and extent of Mauritania.

THOUGH Tingitania, or Mauritania Tingitana, then was considerably broader than Mauritania Cæsariensis, the corresponding parts of Mount Atlas, or the confines of Gætulia, lying more to the southward, yet Pliny and Martianus, according to the latest observations, exceed the truth, when they affirm the greatest breadth of this Mauritania to be four hundred and sixty-seven, or four hundred and seventy-three miles. The length of this region we may make a tolerable estimate of by observing, that the Malva or Mullooïah, its eastern limit, about 1° 15′ W. of London, is something above two hundred and forty miles distant from the Atlantic ocean. Some of the modern geographers make the kingdom of Fez to be two hundred and seventy miles long, and that of Morocco, from cape Non to the Mountains which divide it from Segelmessa, above three hundred and seventy; but this computation, with respect to the antient Tingitania, is undoubtedly more erroneous than that of Pliny, which amounts only to an hundred and seventy miles. The longitude and latitude of the southern limits of Tingitania cannot be ascertained, for want of a proper light from the old geographers; but Septa, the present Ceuta, its most advanced city to the northward, is about 35° 58′ N. latitude, and about 6° W. longitude from London. The Al-Magreb Al-Achsa of Abulfeda includes the Mauritania of Strabo, or the country we are now upon, and part of Mauritania Cæsariensis, as it extends from the Atlantic ocean, which he calls the sea Almohit, to Tlemsan. We must not omit observing, that Ptolemy places the Atlas Major, his southern boundary of this kingdom, at a vast distance from the southern limits assigned it by Pliny, in the deserts of Gætulia or Libya Interior. But it appears, from what has been already advanced, as well as the best relations of modern travellers, that that this ridge of mountains, if real, could not have appertained to Tingitania[b].

MAURITANIA and Mauruſia are names of this region derived from the Mauri, an antient people inhabiting it, frequently mentioned by the old hiſtorians and geographers. Authors are not agreed amongſt themſelves about the origin of this word. Salluſt affirms it to be a corruption of the word Medi; but this is by no means probable. Dr. Hyde deduces it from מַעְבָּרִי Mabri or Mav'ri, "one that lies near the paſſage," as he thinks the ſtreights of Hercules might properly enough be called. Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis and Manilius think the name ought to be derived from the black, dark, ſwarthy colour of the people to which it was applied; but none of theſe etymons ſeem ſo eaſy and natural as that of Bochart, who makes Maurus to be equivalent to מאחור Mahur; or, as an eliſion of gutturals in the oriental languages is extremely common, Maur, i. e. "one from the weſt," or "a weſtern perſon," ſince Mauritania was weſt of Carthage and Phœnice. However, in our opinion, it would ſound better ſtill, ſhould we ſay, "one that comes from the end," or "utmoſt limit, of "Africa," or "the boundary of our voyages," as both the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, for ſeveral ages, might have ſaid of the Tingitanians; for the ſtreights or pillars of Hercules limited the weſtern voyages of thoſe nations for a conſiderable period of time, as is evident from a variety of the beſt authors. It is not improbable, that this country, or at leaſt a good part of it, was firſt called Phut, ſince it appears from Pliny, Ptolemy, and St. Jerom, that a river and territory not far from mount Atlas went by that name. From the Jeruſalem Targum it likewiſe appears, that part of the Mauri may be deemed the offspring of Lud the ſon of Miſraim, ſince his decendents, mentioned Gen. x. are there called מְרִיטָאֵי Mauri or Mauritani. We have already evinced, that this region, as well as the others to the eaſt of it, had many colonies planted in it by the Phœnicians. Procopius tells us, that, in his time, two pillars of white ſtone were to be ſeen there, with the following inſcription in the Phœnician language and character upon them: "We are the Canaanites, that "fled from Joſhua the ſon of Nun, that notorious robber." Ibnu Rachich, or Ibnu Raquiq, an African writer cited by Leo, together with Evagrius and Nicephorus Calliſtus, aſſerts the ſame thing. How, in after-ages, that vaſt tract, extending from the borders of Egypt to the Atlantic ocean, came to be called Barbary, our readers will be informed in another place [c].

Whence ſo called.

The Mauritanians, according to Ptolemy, were divided into ſeveral cantons or tribes. The Metagonitæ were ſeated near the ſtreights of Hercules. The Succoſii, or Cocoſii, according to Bertius, took up the coaſt of the Iberian ſea. Under theſe two petty nations, the Maſices, Verues, and Vervicæ or Vervicæ, ſettled themſelves. The Saliſæ or Salinſæ were ſituated lower, towards the ocean; and ſtill more to the ſouth the Volubiliani. The Maurenſii and Herpiditani poſſeſſed the eaſtern part of this country, which was terminated by the Mulucha. The Angaucani or Iangacaucani, Nectiberes, Zagrenſii, Baniubæ, and Vacuatæ, extended themſelves from the ſouthern foot of Ptolemy's Atlas Minor to his Atlas Major; which is all that he has intimated of them. Pliny mentions the Baniuræ, whom father Hardouïn takes to be Ptolemy's Baniubæ; and Mela the Atlantes, whom he repreſents as poſſeſſed of the weſtern parts of this region. The names of the different clans of Numidians we have poſtponed, till we come to the hiſtory of the Gætulians, ſince the latter nation was ſo intermixed with the former towards the Roman times, that it is difficult to determine to which of them ſome clans belong [d].

TINGIS or Tingi, the metropolis, as ſhould ſeem, of Tingitania, was a city of great antiquity. According to Mela, Solinus, and Pliny, Antæus, cotemporary with Hercules, and conquered by him, laid the firſt foundation of it. Procopius ſeems to intimate, that Tingi was built before the time of Joſhua, ſince he tells us, that the Gergeſites, Jebuſites, and other Canaanitiſh nations or tribes, erected a caſtle in a city, where Tingis, or, as he calls it, Tigiſis ſtood. Dr. Hyde therefore is miſtaken when he affirms Procopius to have aſſerted, that the Gergeſites, Jebuſites, &c. were the founders of Tingis. Pliny inſinuates Antæus to have had a palace at Lixus or Lixos, though he tells us, that the giant was buried at Tingis. This ſeems likewiſe confirmed by Plutarch, who adds, that his ſepulchre was ſtill remaining there in the time of Sertorius, who, paying no regard to the tradition that prevailed amongſt the inhabitants, cauſed it to be opened, and took out of it a corſe ſixty cubits long. Bochart thinks, that the Phœnicians and Carthaginians called it Tingir, Tiggir, Tagger, &c. which, in their language, ſignified an emporium: and it muſt be owned, that the ſituation of Tingis was extremely commodious for carrying on a general trade; which we may, from this circumſtance, reaſonably preſume the Tingitanians did, eſpecially as Pliny ſeems to inſinuate, that to ſome branches of commerce they actually applied themſelves. Bochart's notion therefore receives ſome weight from theſe conſiderations, as alſo from the modern name of this city, Tangier, which we cannot help believing to have been of Phœnician extraction. If we ſuppoſe the antient Tingis to have occupied the ſpot on which Tangier at preſent ſtands, it was very near the ſtreights of Hercules, at the bottom of a gulf of the weſtern ſhore. We are informed by Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, that the Romans drew a colony from this place into the neigbbourhood of Carteia, a town on the other ſide the ſtreights; on which account Pliny abſurdly calls it Julia Traducta, that name being properly applicable to the colony deduced from thence to Spain, to which Strabo gives the appellation of Julia Joza, of the ſame import with the former, Joza, in Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, and Phœnician, being equivalent to the Latin Traducta. We find it likewiſe named by Ptolemy and Marcianus ſimply Tranſducta. Some writers will have Ptolemy to have called Tingis Cæſarea: but this is a controverted point. However, that geographer ſeems to have looked upon Tingis as the moſt noted and uſual proper name of the city we are now upon. Tangier, ſuppoſed to be the antient Tingis, is in 6° 30′ W. longitude from London, and in N. latitude 35° 56′ [d].

Zelis. ZELIS or Zilis, a maritime city in the neighbourhood of Tingis, ſituated near a river of the ſame name. The inhabitants of this city were tranſported to Spain, as we learn from Strabo, and a colony of Romans or Italians tranſplanted thither, as ſhould ſeem, in their room, according to Pliny. The kings of Mauritania, after the planting of that colony, exerciſed no juriſdiction over Zelis, it being under the dominion of the Roman governor of Spain. Some authors imagine, that the modern Arzilla anſwers to Zelis; which if we admit, it ſtood about ſeventy miles from the ſtreights of Hercules. Marmol ſays, that Arzilla was built by the Romans; but this we muſt not give credit to, if it ſhould be thought proper to countenance the aforeſaid ſuppoſition; for if Zelis did not owe its origin to the Indigenæ of this country, it was undoubtedly of Phœnician extraction [e].

Lixus. LIXUS or Lixos ſeems to have been a place of conſiderable repute in the earlieſt ages, ſince, according to Pliny, Antæus had a palace, and therefore probably reſided, here. This circumſtance renders it likely, that Lixus was ſuperior to Tingis itſelf in point of antiquity. But ſome authors ſeem to have confounded theſe two cities, as we ſhall find, by comparing the names given the former by Artemidorus, Eratoſthenes, and Strabo, with Pliny. However, we are inclined to prefer the authority of Eratoſthenes, to that of the others in this point, ſince it is ſupported by Pliny. Lixus therefore and Tingis, in conſequence of this preference, we muſt look upon as two different cities. Pliny relates, that Hercules vanquiſhed Antæus near this place, which he makes to have been in the neighbourhood of the gardens of the Heſperides, and thirty-two miles diſtant from Zelis. The ſame author intimates, that a Roman colony was ſettled here likewiſe by Claudius. As Lixus was called by different writers Linx, Linga, Tinga, Tingi, in all probability it was miſtaken by ſome antient hiſtorians or geographers for Tingis; and therefore Pliny might might be impoſed upon by ſome of the authors he extracted his materials from, when he affirmed Antæus to have had his royal palace at Lixos, ſince it is more natural to ſuppoſe, that he reſided at Tingis. The learned Aldrete aſſerts the word Lixus to be derived from לחישו "lachiſu," or נהרא לחישו "nahara lachiſu, incantation," or the "river of incantation." In ſupport of this ſentiment he obſerves, with the antients, that the town ſtood near the banks of a river of the ſame name; and that ſuch wonderful things had been related of Antæus, as well as his tomb, by various authors, that, to all thoſe who believed them, he muſt appear as a magician. Bochart derives it from לי"ש a lion, becauſe ſuch animals were common in Mauritania. But it may be further obſerved in favour (A) of Aldrete, that the inhabitants of this country were ſuppoſed to have an uncommon ſkill in ſorcery and magic, as appears not only from Virgil and Silius, but likewiſe from what we find related of Sidius Geta by Dio. The river Lixus is mentioned both in the periplus of Hanno, and that of Scylax, as alſo by Ptolemy and Stephanus. Pliny ſeems to turn this river into an æſtuary, which, by its winding courſe, he makes to reſemble a dragon or ſerpent, intimating that it gave riſe to the fable of the dragon guarding the golden apples of the Heſperides. Some learned men will have the preſent Larache to be the antient Lixus; and it muſt be owned, that the ſituation of that place gives great countenance to ſuch a ſuppoſition [f].

At ſome diſtance from Lixus, to the ſouthward, Hanno, in his periplus, ſays he built a city, which he called Thymiaterion. In Scylax the name is Thymiaterias; and in Stephanus, Thimiateria. Bochart believes the Punic name to have been דמאתיריה Dumathiria, i. e. "a city ſituated in a "plain." Hanno himſelf juſtifies this etymology, as the Thymiaterion.

(A) In order to ſtrengthen this conjecture, Aldrete obſerves, that the word Tingin, in Arabic, approaches pretty near the ſignification of Lixus; an obſervation, which, we believe, has eſcaped all other writers (1).

reader will find, by conſulting his periplus; for which reaſon he will not ſcruple giving his aſcent to it. Though this city was ſituated on the ſea-coaſt, ſomewhere to the ſouth of Lixus, the ſpot, on which it ſtood, cannot now be preeiſely determined [g].

Sala. PLINY mentions Sala, a town near a river of the ſame name, not far from the Atlantic ocean, at a conſiderable diſtance from Lixus. All that he obſerves of this town is, that the diſtrict adjacent to it was deſert, infeſted with vaſt herds of elephants, and the excurſions of the Autololes, a tribe of Gætulians. The ſituation, as well as name of, this place, ſufficiently indicates it to be the modern Sallee, a city famous for its corſairs, who ſometimes commit great depredations in the Mediterranean [h].

Rutubis. THE port of Rutubis, where, it is probable, a town ſtood, was two hundred and thirteen miles ſouth of Lixus. At ſome diſtance from this were the Mons Solis, the port of Myſocaras, the promontories of Hercules and Uſadium, and the frontiers of the Autololes. Theſe frontiers terminated Mauritania to the ſouth; and Ptolemy has undoubtedly carried them much farther in that direction, than is conſiſtent with truth. As for Tamuſiga, Suriga, and other obſcure places mentioned by that geographer, extending ſtill farther to the ſouth, it is ſufficient juſt to have taken notice of them. Thus much for the principal maritime towns of Tingitania, bordering on the coaſt of the Atlantic ocean [i].

Exiliſſa. THE firſt maritime town to the eaſtward of Tingis, ſeems to be the Exiliſſa of Ptolemy. Marmol takes the Ceuta of the moderns to correſpond with this place, as it does likewiſe, in all probability, with the Septa and Arx Septenſis of Procopius. That author, together with Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis, and others, inſinuates this name to have been derived from the ſeven hills, called the "Septem Fratres" by Mela, in its neighbourhood. Exiliſſa, Septa, or Ceuta, was a place of great note and eminence in the time of the Goths, as we ſhall ſee, when we come to the hiſtory of that nation [k].

Ruſadir. RUSADIR, a city and haven, taken notice of by Pliny, not far from the country of the Maſæſyli. Ptolemy calls it Ryſſadirum;

dirum; and, from the itinerary, there ſeems to have been a Roman colony ſettled in it. Some authors will have Melila or Melilla, lately in the poſſeſſion of the Spaniards, to be the Ruſadir or Ryſſadirum of the antients. If ſo, it ſtood upon a plain at the bottom of a gulf, and was commanded by a mountain on the weſt ſide [l].

THE firſt inland town, meriting any attention, near the frontiers of the Maſæſyli, was the Aſcurum of Hirtius. According to that author, this place was of ſome conſequence, ſince Bogud, king of Mauritania Tingitana, had a ſtrong garriſon in it, which ſallying out upon a body of the Pompeians, repulſed them with great ſlaughter, driving many of them into the ſea, and the reſt on board their ſhips. No traces of this city, as far as we can recollect, are now remaining [m]. Aſcurum.

MOLOCHATH, or Mulucha, and Galapha, which Ptolemy places in Tingitania, muſt belong to Numidia, if the (B) Molochath, Mulucha, and Malva, be the ſame river, as Dr. Shaw has rendered probable; and therefore we ſhall ſay nothing more of them here [n]. Molochath and Galapha.

(B) This appears from Florus and Frontinus, who affirm the fortreſs of Mulucha to have been in Jugurtha's dominions, and conſequently in Numidia, Salluſt likewiſe confirms this, when he gives us an account of the ſiege and reduction of that place by the Romans in the Jugurthine war. From Cellarius, in conformity to the old geographers, it ſeems probable, that Galapha was ſouth-eaſt of Mulucha; and therefore, that what has been obſerved of the former, holds more ſtrongly with regard to the latter (z).

Volubilis was one of the moſt noted places of this country; and the itinerary makes it a Roman colony. From various authors it appears to be the Fez of the moderns. Gilda is taken notice of likewiſe by Stephanus, as a city of good repute. They were all ſituated in the heart of the country; but the ſpots of ground, occupied by them, cannot, with preciſion, be aſcertained. However, Marmol aſſerts, that Mequinez anſwers to Gilda, which he corruptly calls Silda [p].

Tocoloſida. A little to the ſouth of Volubilis ſtood the Tocoloſida of Ptolemy. According to Marmol, Amergue, a city three leagues from the rivir Eguile, in the province of Habat, anſwers to the antient Tocoloſida; but, as that author is very inaccurate, we cannot, in this particular, entirely depend upon him [q].

Triſidis. THE Triſidis of Ptolemy, according to that geographer, could not be far from the neighbourhood of Tocoloſida. Marmol ſays, that it was built by the Romans, which we can ſcarce believe, upon a riſing ground. The ſame author intimates, that Aben Gezer, in his geography, will have it to have been built by the giants, ſome of whoſe bones, of an enormous ſize, he aſſerts to have been taken out of ſeveral antient tombs in his time.

Gontiana. GONTIANA ſtands ſouth-weſt of Tocoloſida, near the river Sala, and not far from mount Atlas. Marmol informs us, that a ſmall town, by the Moors called Gamaa, upon the road between Fez and Mequinez, is the antient Gontiana; as likewiſe, that this place, though ſtrong by nature, has, for ſome time, been almoſt entirely depopulated and demoliſhed [r].

Banaſa. BANASA, Banaſſa, or Banaſa Valentia, was ſeated in the neighbourhood of the river Subur, at a very conſiderable diſtance, in a northern direction, from Gontiana. Pliny ſeems to intimate, that Banaſa was ſeventy-five miles from Lixus, thirty-five from Volubilis, and as many from the Atlantic ocean. That author, in the ſame place, ſays, that Babba, which Ptolemy calls Babba Julia Campeſtris, was an inland town, forty miles from Lixus; and that Auguſtus planted a Roman colony there. This likewiſe the curious may find confirmed confirmed by the legends on ſome antique coins exhibited by Goltzius [s].

CHALCE or Chalca, a city of Mauritania Tingitana, mentioned by Scylax and Hecatæus; but in what part of that region we are to look for it, cannot now be determined. Ptolemy takes notice of a town called Carcome or Carcoma; which Bochart will have to be the Chalce of Scylax and Hecatæus, ſince thoſe two words are of the ſame import in the Syriac and Greek languages. They ſignify braſs or copper; which ſeems to intimate, that this place was near ſome copper-mine, from whence it deduced its name: and that there was a famous copper-mine in Tingitania, appears from Strabo. Ptolemy makes his Carcoma to be not very remote from Jol, or Julia Cœſarea, but betwixt it and Gades. However, the inaccuracy of that geographer in many points, will not permit us to infer from thence, that this place, which he aſſerts to be a maritime city, is to be ſought for in Mauritania Cæſarienſis. On the contrary, we can ſcarce doubt of its having appertained to Tingitania, from what we find advanced by Strabo. To what has been ſaid we may add, that Polybius cenſures Polyhiſtor, for affirming Chalcea to be the proper name of a Libyan city, ſince, according to him, the copper-mine above-mentioned only was ſo called [t]. Chalce.

CALAMINTHA, a town of Libya, probably of Mauritania, taken notice of by Herodotus and Hecatæus, whoſe ſituation is unknown. However, Bochart has ventured to aſſert, that it ſtood on an eminence or riſing-ground. This notion has been ſuggeſted to him by the word itſelf; for he looks upon Calamintha to be equivalent to the Syriac or Phœnician גלמיתא galmitha, an "eminence," or a "city built upon an eminence." From hence he likewiſe infers, that it muſt have been of a Phœnician original [u]. Calamintha.

WE muſt here beg leave to inform our readers, that Marmol has diſcovered his inaccuracy, not to ſay ignorance, in many particulars; for he has either corrupted ſeveral of Ptolemy's names of cities, or aſſigned names, pretended Marmol's inaccuracy.

pretended to be taken from Ptolemy, to ſeveral places, that are not to be found in his geography, as will appear to every one, who will be at the trouble to compare theſe two authors. His comparative geography is likewiſe frequently not to be relied upon; for which reaſon we have made but few extracts from him. As for Vobrix, Thicath, Ceuta, and many more inconſiderable towns mentioned by the antient geographers, which are ſcarce ever taken notice of in hiſtory, nay, all traces of which are, in a manner, loſt, we have thought proper to paſs them over in ſilence; neither are we apprehenſive, that, for this, it will be deemed neceſſary to make any apology [w].

Rivers of Tingitania.

THE firſt river of Tingitania, if it does not appertain to Numidia, is the Malva, Malvana, Chylemath, Molochath, or Mulucha; for it went by all theſe names. That theſe names denoted the ſame river, will appear from a careful examination of what the old geographers have advanced on this head. Mela, Pliny, and Ptolemy, give the ſame ſituation to the Chylemath and Mulucha, making it the common boundary of Numidia and Tingitania. Strabo alſo affirms his Molochath to ſeparate the country of the Maſæſyli, i. e. Numidia, from Mauritania, i. e. Tingitania; and laſtly, the author of the itinerary, who was cotemporary with Ptolemy, poſitively aſſerts, that the Malva, or Malvana, limited the two Mauritaniæ, i. e. Tingitania, and that part of Numidia joining to it. From whence, as it does not appear from hiſtory, that the limits of thoſe two kingdoms were ever changed, but, on the contrary, is probable that they never were, we may fairly infer, that the abovementioned variety of names points out one and the ſame river, the Mullooïah of the preſent weſtern Moors. 2. The next river, meriting any attention, is the Thaluda, Taluda, or Tamuda of Mela, Pliny, and Ptolemy, which emptied itſelf into the Mediterranean conſiderably nearer the ſtreights than the former. Pliny repreſents this as navigable, and conſequently as a conſiderable river. The different names given it by different geographers, ſeem to countenance what we have juſt offered in relation to the Mulucha (C). 3. The river river Zelis or Zilia, near the city of the ſame name, already mentioned. 4. The Lixus, already taken notice of, when we gave ſome account of the city ſo called. Scylax, in his periplus, mentions a river not far from the Lixus, but betwixt it and the ſtreights, which, Salmaſius thinks, ought to be called Adonis; but as to its courſe, or indeed any particulars at all relating to it, we are entirely in the dark. 5. The Subur, a large and navigable river, fifty miles from the Lixus. It paſſed by the city of Banaſa, as has been lately obſerved. 6. The Sala, which took its courſe, according to Pliny, near the confines of the Sahara. 7. The Duus, Cuſa, Aſama, Phthuth, and other rivers either in, or upon the borders of, Libya Interior (D), recited by Pliny, Ptolemy, &c. are entirely unknown to us, as indeed they were to thoſe geographers themſelves [x] (E).

(C) Ptolemy's Vallona diſcharged itſelf into the ſea not far from the narroweſt part of the ſtreights of Gibraltar, near the place

place where the town Alcazar Saguir, as Marmol calls it, or, according to Moll, Alcazar Quivir, i. e. "the great palace," at preſent ſtands. It appears to us not improbable, that the preſent rivers Sobou, Gueron, Ommirabih, and Sus, anſwer to the Subur, Sala, Duus, and Cuſa, of Ptolemy. Our readers may poſſibly be of the ſame opinion, when they have diligently examined Ptolemy's geographical deſcription of that part of Mauritania contiguous to the Atlantic ocean, and maturely weighed what has been advanced in a former note (3).

(D) To theſe may be added, from Ptolemy, 1. Mount Diur, which might poſſibly have been near the river of the ſame name. 2 Mount Phocra, extending from the Atlas Minor, to Ruſadir, between the promontories Metagonitis and Seſtiarium. The modern name of this mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, is Jibbel el Hadith, i. e. the "mountain of iron," according to Ortelius. 3. The Durdus, already mentioned in the hiſtory of Numidia (4).

(E) That Ptolemy knew little of the geography of this part of Mauritania, is generally acknowledged; but will moſt evidently appear from ſeveral circumſtances, which we ſhall beg leave to throw together here: 1. Darodt, or Darodus, is evidently Promontories.

THE chief capes or promontories of Tingitania were the following: 1. The Metagonitis of Ptolemy, and the Metagonium of Strabo. This promontory, Marmol tells us, in his time was called cape Caſaſa, having a town of the ſame name built upon it. Strabo intimates, that a conſiderable extent of territory, whoſe ſoil was of a dry and ſandy nature, in the neighbourhood of this promontory, went by the ſame name amongſt the Mauritanians. This was different from the Terra Metagonitis of Pliny, and the Metagonium of Mela, dently the ſame name with Dorath, which Ptolemy makes to be the name of a town upon the Diur; as therefore that river, which is the ſouthern limit of the kingdom of Sus, is at this day called Darodt, or Darodus, by the Moors, it muſt be allowed, that Ptolemy's Dorath, not far from the borders of Gætulia, was a river, and probably that which he calls Diur. 2. As this was the ſouthern limit of the country we are now upon, ſuppoſing it to extend as far to the ſouthward as even the preſent kingdom of Sus does, the river Phthuth muſt be to the north of it, and not to the ſouth, as Ptolemy aſſerts; agreeably hereto, Marmol makes Tenſift, the next river to the Darodus, in a northerly ſituation, to be the Phthuth of Ptolemy. 3. As the mouth of the Darodus lies in about twenty-eight degrees north latitude, about four degrees and an half from the tropic of Cancer, it muſt have been in nearly the ſame latitude with Ptolemy's Promontorium Uſadium, and conſequently, much farther to the ſouthward than he extends the Diur. 4. Even the Promontorium Uſadium, the Mons Solis, Portus Myſocaras, Portus Herculis, Tamuſiga, and all the other places he has fixed to the ſouth of the Diur, either are to be placed to the northward of it, or elſe, in antient times, belonged to Libya Interior, and not Tingitania. 5. From Marmol, Gramaye, and ſome of the moſt accurate modern obſervations, it appears, that the towns of Suriga, and Vala, rivers Una, Agna, Sala, &c. to which Ptolemy aſſigns a ſouthern ſituation, in reſpect of the Diur, or Darodus, are really north of it.

Some of our readears may poſſibly imagine, that Ptolemy's Daradas, or Daras, which he places in about fifteen degrees north latitude, was the ſame river as the modern Darodt, or Darodus, which in Mr. Senex's map of Africa is likewiſe called Dras. But admitting this ſuppoſition, Ptolemy will be out in the parallel he aſſigns it about thirteen degrees; which is a greater error than any of the preceding (5).

Mela, near the mouth of the Ampſaga. For their farther ſatisfaction on this head, we muſt refer our curious readers to the learned Lucas Holſtenius, who has favoured the world with a particular account of both the Metagonia, in his notes upon Ortelius. 2. The Seſtiarium promontorium of Ptolemy, or the Ruſſadi of the Itinerary. 3. The promontorium Oleaſtrum, ſo called, according to ſome, from the prodigious number of wild olives growing upon it. 4. The Phæbi promontorium. 5. The cape Cotes, Cottes, or Ampeluſia, not far from Tingis taken notice of by Mela, Ptolemy, and Strabo. The moderns call it cape Spartel. From Mela and Bochart it appears, that Cotes and Ampeluſia were words of the ſame import in the Phœnician and Greek languages; and that they were deduced from the grapes the promontory abounded with. 6. Mons Solis, Promontorium Herculis, and Uſadium, of which Ptolemy has handed down to us nothing but the bare names [y].

Mountains.

AMONGST the principal mountains of Mauritania Tingitana we are to rank, 1. Abyle, Abyla, Abila, Abina, Abinna, or Abenna, for ſuch a variety of names it had, a mountain on the African ſide of the ſtreights of Hercules, called, by the antients, one of Hercules's pillars. Abinna and Abenna ſeem to have been names given it by the Arabs, and the others it received from the Phœnicians. They were all derived from its height, as has been clearly evinced by Aldrete and Bochart. It has been mentioned by Strabo, Mela, Ptolemy, Silius Italicus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Feſtus Avienus, and others. If we are not miſtaken, it is now called by our countrymen, Apes Hill; an appellation which very well agrees with what has been related of it by the antients, or, at leaſt, the country adjacent to it. 2. The Septem Fratres of Mela, and the Heptadelphi of Ptolemy, almoſt contiguous to Abyla. 3. Mount Cotta, not far from the Lixus. 4. That remarkable chain of hills called mount Atlas, which, according to Oroſius, ſeparated the fruitful land from the barren, or, in the ſtyle of the natives, the Tell from the Sahara. The antients likewiſe inform us, that theſe mountains were known by the names Dyris, Adyris, Dyrim, and Adderim, i. e. great, high, lofty or, the Southern limit, as mount Atlas in generally eſteemed to be with reſpect to Tingitania and Numidia. However, Dr. Shaw

Shaw aſſures us, that the part of this long-continued ridge of mountains, which fell under his obſervation, in height could not ſtand in competition either with the Alps or Apennines. He tells us, that if we conceive a number of hills, uſually of the perpendicular height of four, five, or ſix hundred yards, with an eaſy aſcent, and ſeveral groves of fruit and foreſt-trees, riſing up in a ſucceſſion of ranges one behind another; and that if to this proſpect we here-and-there add a rocky precipice of a ſuperior eminence, and difficult acceſs, and place upon the ſide or ſummit of it a mud-walled Daſhkrah, or village of the Kabyles; we ſhall then have a juſt and lively idea of theſe mountains, without paying any regard to the nocturnal flames, melodious ſounds, or the laſcivious revels, of ſuch imaginary beings, as the antients have, in a peculiar manner, attributed to this place [z].

Ports. THE chief ports of this country were, 1. The Ruſadir of Pliny, or Ryſſadirum of Ptolemy already mentioned. The Itinerary makes the town here a Roman colony, and tells us, that the neighbouring promontory was from thence denominated cape Ruſſadi. 2. That at the bottom of the Sinus Emporicus, where there ſeems to have been a town furniſhed with inns, warehouſes, and all manner of accommodations for the Phœnician merchants, who frequented this place from almoſt the earlieſt ages to the time of Auguſtus. Pliny calls the bay the Sinus Saguti, which Bochart would willingly have read Sinus Saguri; ſince that lection would enable him to deduce the word from סחור, ſachur, mercator, the ת being frequently, amongſt the Orientals, pronounced as the ז, of which he produces ſome inſtances, and conſequently to aſſign it the ſame ſignification as Emporicus. 3. Cotes, Cottes, or Cotta, a port or bay mentioned by Scylax, which may poſſibly have been in the neighbourhood of cape Cotta above-mentioned; and if ſo, that author has not given it a right ſituation, ſince he places it between cape Mercury and the ſtreights of Hercules. 4. Ruſibis, or Rutubis, an harbour taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, in the ſouth-weſtern part of Mauritania, between the rivers Cuſa and Diur. 5. Myſocaras, a port ſome miles to the ſouth of Ruſibis, not far from the river Phthuth. This was the laſt ſouthern ſouthern port of Mauritania, mentioned by the antients, being almoſt contiguous to the northern confines of Gætulia [a].

We ſhall now proceed to the principal iſlands on the coaſt of Tingitania, which were known to the old geographers: Iſlands.

1. The Tres Inſulæ of the Itinerary already mentioned, where their is now good ſhelter for ſmall veſſels, were ſituated to the north-weſt of the Mulucha, at the diſtance of ten miles. 2. Gezira, or rather Jezeirah, a ſmall iſland in the river Lixus, about three leagues, according to Marmol and Leo, from the ſea, and thirty from the city of Fez. Pliny tells us, that in his time this iſland abounded with olives; and intimates, that the antients placed the gardens of the Heſperides here. He farther relates, that there was an altar, ſacred to Hercules, ſtill remaining in it when he wrote. Aldrete believes, that this iſland, by the frequent inundations of the river, was, in proceſs of time, laid entirely under water, and at laſt converted into that lake called, by the Spaniards, Laguna grande, or the great lake, a little above the city and harbour of Larache. 3. Ptolemy's Pæna and Erythia (F), two ſmall obſcure iſland in the Atlantic ocean, oppoſite to the tract between his Major and Minor Atlas. 4. The Inſulæ Purpurariæ, which Pliny aſſures us faced the country of the Autololes. The natives of theſe iſlands were famous for dying that colour called the Gætulian purple, which brought great advantage to king Juba, who, according to the ſame author, firſt diſcovered them. Father Harduïn aſſerts, that they are the iſlands called at this day Madera (G) and Porto Santo, being induced thereto by Pliny,

[a] Scylax, Plin. Ptol. Antonin. itinerar. ubi ſup. et. alib. Bochart. ubi ſup. Agrip. comment. apud Plin. l. v. c. 1.

(F) The iſland Erythia is now called Mogador, and has a caſtle in it of conſiderable ſtrength. This is defended by a garriſon of two hundred men, who are poſted there to ſecure the gold mines in the neighbouring country, from which 'tis about five miles diſtant (6).

(G) Madera, or, as the Spaniards call it, Madeira, is an iſland of the Atlantic ocean, betwixt thirty-two and thirty-three deg. north lat. about ſixty miles broad, ſeventy-five long, and an hundred and eighty in circumference. Though it ſeems to

to have been known to the antients, yet it lay concealed for many generations; and was at last discovered by the Portuguese, commanded by Don Juan Zarco, and Don Tristano Vaz, A. D. 1419. Others maintain, that one John Machin, an Englishman, discovered it in the year of our Lord 1344. Be that as it will, the Portuguese took possession of it in the year above-mentioned, and are still almost the only nation inhabiting it. The modern name Madera, or Madeira, was derived from the vast store of wood with which it was stocked; the Portuguese, at their first landing, finding it little better than a thick forest. In order therefore to render the ground capable of cultivation they set fire to this wood, which, according to their writers, occasioned a conflagration of seven years continuance. It is now very fertile, producing, in great abundance, the richest wine, sugar, the most delicious fruits, especially oranges, lemons, and pomegranates, together with corn, honey, and wax. It also abounds with boars and other wild beasts, as likewise with all sorts of fowls, besides numerous groves of cedar-trees. The air of Madera is more temperate than that of the Canaries; and consequently its condition cannot be inferior to that of any of those islands. The towns are Monchico, Santa Croce, and Funzal, its metropolis, so called from the prodigious quantity of fennel at first found growing in its neighbourhood. It is now the see of a bishop, who is suffragan to the archbishop of Lisbon; and the seat of a Portuguese governor. Notwithstanding father Hardouin's opinion, some authors make it the Cerne, or Cerne Atlantica, of the antients. If this be admitted, it was famous for the production of those hawks so well known in Massylia, according to Pliny. As that author places this Cerne in the Atlantic ocean, and from the circumstance just mentioned it appears to have been not remote from Massylia, such a sentiment cannot well be deemed entirely groundless. Whichever of these notions we espouse, Madera seems formerly to have appertained to Mauritania.

Porto Santo lies at a small distance from Madera, and is under the jurisdiction of the same bishop and governor as Madera. It is only eight miles in compass; but the soil is extremely fruitful. 'Tis remarkable, that this island produces the best honey and wax in the world.

Besides the two aforesaid islands, there is another, called by the Spaniards Isla Desierta, i. e. the desolate island, seven miles distant from the eastern coast of Madera. But this being inconsiderable, on account of the sterility of its soil, and its ſmall extent, it is ſufficient juſt to have mentioned it (7).

(H) The Fortunate Iſlands, or, as they are at preſent called, the Canary Iſlands, are ſeven in number. They lie to the ſouthward of Madera, weſt of the ſouthern coaſt of Mauritania, and betwixt twenty-ſeven and thirty degrees north lat. Their names are Palma, Hierro, Gomera, Teneriffe, Gran Canaria, Fuerteventura, and Lanzarote. Palma and Hierro lie moſt to the weſt. Their ſoil is rich; they have good paſture-ground, produce excellent wine, ſugar, &c. and abound in fruit. They have each of them a town of the ſame name. The firſt is ſeven leagues long, ſix broad, and twenty-two in circumference; the latter ten leagues long, ſeven broad, and twenty-ſix round. Hierro has a commodious haven; and Palma a volcano that emits vaſt quantities of ſulphureous matter, as we learn from Juan Nunez de Pena. On the weſtern point of Hierro moſt modern geographers place the firſt meridian. Gomera, ſituated to the ſouth of Palma, is very fruitful, affording plenty of grain, apples, ſugar, and wine, with paſtures for numerous herds of cattle. It takes up twenty-two leagues in compaſs, and has a conſiderable town of the ſame name, beſides a very capacious harbour. Teneriffe, to the eaſt of Hierro, is ſaid to be ſixty miles long. In it there is a famous mountain, called the Pico of Teneriffe, frequently covered with ſnow; which renders it probable, that this iſland was Pliny's Nivaria, and Ptolemy's Ninguaria. The Pico is an aſcent of about fifteen miles, and five in perpendicular height. We are told, that when theſe iſlands were diſcovered by M. Jean de Betancourt, a French gentleman, for Don Juan king of Caſtile, in 1405, the inhabitants of Teneriffe were under ſeveral kings, who lived in caves; and that they kept the bodies of their anceſtors dried like mummies. The towns in it are, St. Chriſtopher de la Laguna, Santa Cruz, Rotava, or Oratava, Rialejo, and Garachico. Canaria, or Gran Canaria, had the ſame name amongſt the antients, as we learn from Pliny; ſo that 'tis probable it was not given by the Spaniards, as ſome writers ſuggeſt; as likewiſe, that ſome knowledge of it has been retained all along from the Roman times, ſince the name aſſigned it by the Romans has been preſerved to the preſent times. It is eleven leagues broad, twelve long, thirty-eight in compaſs, and about of Statius Seboſus, Juba, Pliny, and Strabo. Ptolemy gives theſe iſlands too ſouthern a ſituation, affirming them to lie on the coaſt of Libya Interior, whereas they are in the ſame parallel with the ſouthern part of Mauritania, according to Strabo (I); which ſeems to tally with the beſt modern accounts about thirty from Boſador. Its ſituation is eaſt of Teneriffe, and its capital city Palma, Palmes, or Canaria. In fertility it equals, at leaſt, if it does not exeeed, any of the others. Fuerteventura is eaſt of Gran Canaria, and about twenty-five leagues from the continent of Africa. 'Tis likewiſe fruitful, and has four towns, Tarafala, Lanagala, Pozo Negro, and Fuerteventura. Lanzarote, north of the former, and in all points anſwering to the reſt, has three towns, Cayas or Lanzarote, Puerto de Naos, and Puerto de Cavallos. Though the ſeven are the principal iſlands that go under the name of the Canaries, yet there are ſeveral others in their neighbourhood of leſs note; as the Iſla de los Lobos, ſituated between Fuerteventura and Lanzarote; the Salvaticæ lying farther towards the north-weſt; beſides Rocca, Gratioſa, Santa Clara, and Alagranza, on the north of Lanzarote. They are all ſubject to the king of Spain; and Canaria is the ſee of a biſhop, ſubject to the metropolitan of Sevil. Canaria formerly produced a ſort of dates, and pine-apples, in conſiderable plenty, according to Pliny. In the rivers alſo of theſe iſlands grew the plant papyrus, as in the Nile, if the ſame author may be credited. From the cuſtom of preſerving the bodies of their anceſtors, in the manner above-mentioned, it ſeems probable, that the antient inhabitants of Teneriffe were either a colony of the Ethiopians, or deſcended from the firſt progenitors of that people; ſince, that ſuch a cuſtom prevailed in very early times amongſt them, we learn from Diodorus Siculus (8).

(I) The beſt modern obſervations tally with Strabo, if, with that author and Ptolemy, we extend the ſouthern limits of Mauritania as far to the ſouthward as within three degrees, or leſs, of the tropic of Cancer; but if, with the moderns, we will not allow it to reach beyond the mouth of the Darodus, in nearly twenty-eight degrees north latitude, the Inſulæ Fortunatæ will ſeem to have partly appertained to Gætulia. For our part, we are inclined to believe, that part of the kingdom of Sus and Morocco, particularly the province of Guzula, or Gezula, together with the diſtrict contiguous to the town of Meſſa, belonged to the Gætulians, as will be rendered probable when we come to the hiſtory of that people (9).

counts and obſervations. The antients did not agree in fixing the number of theſe iſlands; Marcellus made them ten; ſeven of which he affirms to have been ſacred to Proſerpina, and the other three to Pluto, Ammon, and Neptune. Pliny and Ptolemy, from Juba, relate, that there were ſix of them; and Seboſus, as well as Plutarch, only two. One of them Pliny and Ptolemy call Ombros, Ombrios, and Pluvialia; the former author, two others Junonia; the latter, Junonia, and "the inacceſſible iſland. The other three Pliny and Ptolemy, according to Iſaac Voſſius, named Capraria, Canaria, and Ninguaria, or Nivaria. Ombrios was uninhabited, and deſtitute of water at all times, but when it rained; from which circumſtance it derived its name. This iſland produced a ſort of canes, ſome of which were black, and others white; out of the former the Mauritanians expreſſed a liquor of a bitter taſte; and out of the latter a pleaſant kind of drink. In one of the Junonia's there was a ſmall temple, built of ſtone. Capraria abounded with monſtrous lizards. Nivaria was always covered with ſnow; and Canaria over-run with dogs of an enormous ſize, two of which were preſented to king Juba. From hence they had their names aſſigned them. They all abounded with apples, and other ſorts of fruit, as well as honey, and all kinds of birds. Their rivers were full of the Siluri, a kind of ſhad-fiſh, &c. In ſhort, the antients ſo highly eſteemed them, on account of their happy climate, ſalubrious air, and fertile ſoil, that they ſtyled them the fortunate iſlands, and fixed here their Elyſian fields [b].

CURIOSITIES, moſt worthy obſervation, were, 1. The vines, grapes, reeds, &c. towards the confines of Libya Interior, of a moſt prodigious and incredible ſize, mentioned by Strabo. 2. The trees growing in the iſland Ombrios, or Pluvialia, and the liquor extracted from them; which ſome learned men have imagined to be the ſugar-canes and moloſſus of the moderns. 3. The river, in the ſouthern parts of Tingitania, which overflowed all the adjacent country, Curioſities.

try, and fertilized it in the ſame manner as the Nile did Egypt; for that there was ſuch a river in this diſtrict, appears from the beſt modern obſervations compared with Strabo. 4. The ſeveral remarkable ruins of Roman antiquities ſtill remaining. 5. The narrow deſcent of many fathom deep, a few miles from Tangier, which leads into a ſort of cave, from whence are paſſages into ſubterraneous apartments, deſigned undoubtedly by the antients as repoſitories for their dead, there being found in them many urns and ſtatues with Punic inſcriptions upon them. We ſhall reſerve all other curious particulars for the hiſtory of the Sharifs in Fez and Morocco [c].

SECT. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, cuſtoms, arts, &c. of the Mauritanians.

The antiquity of the Mauritanians.

THAT the deſcendents of Phut firſt peopled Mauritania, as well as the tract between the Triton and the Mulucha, has been already obſerved from various authors. That the Phœnicians likewiſe planted colonies here in very early ages, appears from the teſtimonies already produced. To which we may add, that from Hirtius, Appian, and Dio, as explained by Aldrete, it may be inferred, that the Arabs are to be ranked amongſt ſome of the moſt antient inhabitants of this country. Their authority is ſupported by that of the African hiſtorians, or rather a tradition of the Africans, as we learn from Leo and Marmol. The Mauritanians bordering on the confines of Gætulia, particularly thoſe in the neighbourhood of the Pharuſii, who were probably intermixed with them, might have been the progeny of the Perſians, whom ſeveral authors of repute affirm to have ſettled here in very remote times. As the Egyptians, in the reign of Ammon, conquered the Atlantides, a nation ſeated on mount Atlas, we may look upon them likewiſe as progenitors of the antient Mauritanians. Should it be admitted, that any number of Perſians ever fixed their habitations in ſo remote a region, 'tis likely, that they either attended Hercules in his Libyan expedition, as ſeveral writers aſſert, or formed part of the body of Arabs above-mentioned; for that they came by ſea, in the manner related related by Salluſt, is utterly improbable. Be that as it will, that the Pharuſii deduced their origin from the Perſians, ſeems to be inſinuated by the near reſemblance of the word Pharuſii to a name given the Perſians in ſcripture, viz. פָּרָס Paras (K), Pharas, or Pharus; for it may be pronounced all theſe ways. This ſeems not a little to ſupport the authority of Mela, Pliny, and others. As the Perſian and Indian dominions were contiguous, it is no wonder we ſhould find the antient Mauri, conſidered as the attendants of Hercules, called Indians by Strabo. According to Leo, ſome of the Moors, and other Africans in his time, believed themſelves to be deſcended from certain tribes of Sabœans, a people of Arabia Felix, who were chaſed out of their native country either by the Aſſyrians or Ethiopians. Others, if we may credit the ſame author, gave out, that their anceſtors were driven out of Aſia by a powerful enemy, and purſued into Greece; from whence they made their eſcape into Barbary, leaving their purſuers in poſſeſſion of the country they laſt abandoned: but this, he adds, was to be underſtood only of the white nations inhabiting ſome parts of weſtern Barbary and Numidia. Marmol relates from the African hiſtorians, that five tribes of Sabœans, under the conduct of Melec Iſiriqui king of Arabia Felix, firſt ſpread themſelves over ſome of the eaſtern parts of Barbary; and that Tut, the grandſon of Cham, ſettled firſt in Tingitania, giving name to the Tuteii, a people of that region. The African Tut, we apprehend, muſt either be Phut, one of Ham's younger ſons, or Lud his grandſon. Nothing abſurd is implied in the laſt ſuppoſition; for it appears, from the Jeruſalem Targum, in conjunction with the ſacred hiſtorian, that Lud, the ſon of Miſraim, may be conſidered as one of the firſt planters of Mauritania [d].

(K) It may not be improper, in order to ſtrengthen what is here obſerved, to take notice, that פַּרְסִי Pharſi, a Perſian, approaches very near the word Pharuſii; eſpecially if we give it a plural of Chaldee, or Syriac termination. From the parts of Scripture Govern-ment.

It is generally imagined, that abſolute monarchy prevailed in Mauritania from the earlieſt ages, as well as in Egypt and Numidia. Bocchar, Bocchus, and Bogud, from what we find related of them by the Roman hiſtorians, ſeem to have governed here with an uncontroulable ſway; which is a ſufficient intimation, that their predeceſſors likewiſe were deſpotic. However, we muſt obſerve from Appian, that ſeveral tribes of Moors, whom he calls αὐτόνομοι, were governed by their own laws, or, at leaſt, under the direction of their own chiefs and leaders, in oppoſition to that form of government, which was eſtabliſhed in the greateſt part of the country we are now upon. The independent Arabs, mentioned by Dr. Shaw, who are ſeated in the kingdoms of Algiers and Tunis, and ſometimes hover about the frontiers of the empire of Morocco, may probably be the poſterity of theſe free-born Moors. Be that as it will, moſt of the provinces of Mauritania, if not the whole region, were ſubject to one prince in the reign of the elder Dionyſius. This we learn from Juſtin, who ſays, that Hanno, a Carthaginian nobleman, in order to attain the ſovereignty of Carthage, to which he then aſpired, had recourſe to the king of the Mauri for aſſiſtance. Appian inſinuates, that not only in Numidia, whilſt regal government flouriſhed there, but likewiſe in other neighbouring parts of Africa, and therefore probably Mauritania, ſeveral reguli, or heads of the Kabyles, as they now are called, were engaged in bloody wars one with another; which evidently implies, that they muſt have exerciſed a ſovereign power. Notwithſtanding which, the great figure the Mauri or Mauruſii made in Africa, that name extending even to the borders of Africa Propria, before the Romans grew formidable there, as appears from Juſtin, is a ſufficient indication, that moſt of them were united under one common head. The names Mauritania Propria or Tingitania received from thoſe of its kings, viz. Bogudiana, &c. clearly demoſtrate the vaſt extent of power they enjoyed. The form of government in uſe, from the remoteſt antiquity, amongſt thoſe nations that firſt ſent colonies hither, evinces the ſame thing; as does that of

the

ture in which the word is uſed, it appears pretty plain, that it was a Perſian proper name; and from others, that the Hebrews called Perſia Elam, and the Perſians Elamites (10).

(10) Nehem. c. xii. v. 22.

the antient Numidians, who agreed with their neighbours the Mauruſii in almoſt all points whatſoever [e].

THAT ſome of the Mauritanians had laws, or at leaſt certain political maxims and inſtitutions, which ſerved as rules for the conduct of their chiefs, may be naturally inferred from Appian; but none of theſe have been conveyed down to us. Nay, the Mauritanian monarchs themſelves, however abſolute, might have had ſome immutable laws, to ſteer their political courſe by, as we find the Medes and Perſians had. Appian's αὐτόνομοι, juſt mentioned, ſeemed to ſuggeſt ſuch a thing, or, at leaſt, that laws were not entirely unknown in Mauritania [f]. Laws.

NEPTUNE ſeems to have been one of the principal objects of adoration in this country, which is a ſufficient proof, that the Naphthuhim, or Nephthuhim, of Moſes, extended themſelves into it; though the firſt ſeat of that people might probably, as Bochart and Arius Montanus imagine, have been in Marmorica and Cyrene. This deity and his wife Neptys might receive their names from hence, Neptune, Neptys, and Naphthuhim, ſignifying the king, queen, and people, of the ſea coaſts. 'Tis certain, that the Egyptians called the exterior parts of the earth, promontories, and whatever bordered upon the ſea, and was waſhed by it, Neptys. The ſun and moon likewiſe, in common with the other Libyan nations, they paid religious honours to. That they offered human ſacrifices to their gods, in imitation perhaps of the Phœnicians and Carthaginian or ſome other antient nations, from whom their anceſtors came, is aſſerted by Seneca. From what Nonnus and others have advanced, it ſeems probable, that Bacchus was worſhiped by the Mauritanians, eſpecially as the Indians and Arabs adored him in a moſt particular manner. In ſhort, we are to form a notion of the Mauritanian religion from that of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Perſians, and Carthaginians, already deſcribed, as well as from that of the old Arabs, which we hope ſoon to give our readers a ſuccinct account of. What peculiarities, in this particular, the Maurita- Religion.

Language. THE Mauritanian language undoubtedly differed from the Numidian in ſuch a manner only as one dialect of the ſame tongue does from another; ſo that there is no room for us to be prolix on this head. As for the Mauritanian character, that ſeems to have been the ſame with the Numidian, thoſe letters on the coins formerly mentioned bearing an equal relation to the inhabitants of Numidia and Tingitania. What has been juſt obſerved of the religion of the people we are now upon, viz. that it bore a near reſemblance and affinity to thoſe of the nations from whom the Mauritanians deduced their origin, will hold equally ſtrong with regard to their language. The tongue of the preſent Kabyles Dr. Shaw has given us a ſpecimen of, and poſſibly ſome traces of that of the antient Moors are ſtill remaining in it; but of this we are far from being certain. However, ſeveral words of the African vocabulary, which that learned and ingenious gentleman has obliged the world with, are deducible from the oriental languages, whatever he may inſinuate to the contrary (L). (L) The very learned and ingenious Dr. Shaw poſitively aſſerts, that there is no affinity at all betwixt what may be ſuppoſed to be the primitive words in the Showiah, as the preſent African Kabyles call their language, and the words which convey the ſame meaning in the Hebrew and Arabic tongues. From whence he ſeems to infer, that this language bore no relation at all to any of thoſe that are now called the Oriental languages; and that 'tis difficult, if not impoſſible, even to form any conjectures about it. But that that there is a poſſibility at leaſt, if not a good degree of probability, of deducing it from the Eaſtern tongues, will beſt appear from the following Showiahan words:

1. Akel,

beſca, at preſent ſpoken in Fez and Morocco, as well as over all other parts of Barbary, was not ſo much derived from the Saracens, who over-ran this vaſt tract, as the antient inhabitants of Numidia and Tingitania. The Punic tongue, not very remote from the Arabic, prevailed through that part of Africa, extending from the Triton to the Atlantic ocean, even to the time of St. Auſtin [h].

Customs. 1. THE Mauritanians, as well as the other Africans, from what Hyginus inſinuates, ſeem to have fought only with clubs, till one Belus, the ſon of Neptune, as that author calls him, taught them the uſe of the ſword. Sir Iſaac Newton makes this Belus to have been the ſame perſon with Seſoſtris king of Egypt, who over-ran a great part of the then known world. 2. All perſons of diſtinction in Mauritania went richly attired, wearing much gold and ſilver in their cloaths. They took great pains in cleanſing their teeth, and curled their hair in a curious and elegant manner. They combed their beards, which were very long, and always had their nails pared extremely cloſe. When they walked out in any numbers, they never touched one another, for fear of diſconcerting the curls into which their hair had been formed. 3. The Mauritanian infantry, in time of action, uſed ſhields made of elephants skins, being clad in thoſe of lions, leopards, and bears, which they kept on both night and day. 4. The cavalry of this nation was armed with broad ſhort lances, and carried targets or bucklers, made likewiſe of the skins of wild beaſts.

They

1. Akel, "to ſee," may naturally be deduced from חבל "hhacal," red, coloured, &c. or עקל "Achal, he understood, perceived, &c. 2. Athrair, a mountain," from אתר "Athar, a place, and הר har, a hill. 3. Allen, the eye," from the Arabic article "al, the," and עין "ein, or en, eye. 4. Aman, "water," from מין "main," or "man, waters," and ה ha, "the, i. e. המק Hamain, or Haman, the waters. 5. Elkaa, "the earth," from the Arabic article "al, the," and קוא kaa, "barren ſoil. 6. Aſſa, to-day," from עשא "aſa, or aſſa, "the time from noon to the next day-break." As all the other Showiahan words we have examined are equally deducible from the Oriental languages, we doubt not but Dr. Shaw's whole Showiahan vocabulary may be deemed of Oriental extraction (11).

(11) Vid. Schind. lex. pent. & Gol. lex. Arabic.

They uſed no ſaddles, nor any accoutrements. Their horſes were ſmall and ſwift, had wooden collars about their necks, and were ſo much under the command of their riders, that they would follow them like dogs. The habit of theſe horſemen was not much different from that of the foot above-mentioned, they conſtantly wearing a large tunic of the ſkins of wild beaſts. The Phutæi, of whom the Mauritanians were a branch, were eminent for their ſhields, and the excellent uſe they made of them, as we learn from Homer, Xenophon, Herodotus, and Scripture. Nay, Herodotus ſeems to intimate, that the ſhield and helmet came from them to the Greeks. 5. Notwithſtanding the fertility of their ſoil, the poorer ſort of the Mauritanians never took care to manure the ground, being ſtrangers to the art of husbandry, but roved about the country in a wild ſavage manner, like the antient Scythians or Arabes Scenitæ. They had tents, or mapalia, ſo extremely ſmall, that they could ſcarce breathe in them. Their food was corn, herbage, &c. which they frequently did eat green, without any manner of preparation; being deſtitute of wine, oil, and all the elegancies, as well as many neceſſaries, of life. Their habit was the ſame both in ſummer and winter, conſiſting chiefly of an old tattered, though thick, garment, and over it a coarſe rough tunic; which anſwered probably to that of their neighbours the Numidians, already deſcribed. Moſt of them lay every night upon the bare ground, though ſome of them ſtrewed their garments thereon, not unlike the preſent African Kabyles and Arabs, who, according to Dr. Shaw, uſe their hykes for a bed and covering in the night. 6. If the moſt approved reading of a paſſage in Horace may be admitted, the Mauritanians ſhot poiſoned arrows, which clearly intimates, that they had ſome ſkill in the art of preparing poiſons, and were excellent dartmen. This laſt obſervation is countenanced by Herodian and Ælian, who entirely come into it, affirming them to have been in ſuch continual danger of being devoured by wild beaſts, that they durſt not ſtir out of their tents or mapalia without their darts. Such perpetual exerciſe muſt render them exceedingly ſkilful in hurling that weapon. 7. The Mauritanians ſacrificed human victims to their deities, as the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, &c. did. This is not only probable from the authorities produced in the Carthaginian hiſtory, but from the expreſs teſtimony of Seneca and Euſebius. 8. As the other cuſtoms of the nation we are now upon coincide with thoſe of the Numidians already related, for their farther ſatisfaction in this particular, we muſt beg leave to refer our readers to the Numidian hiſtory [i].

Arts. WITH regard to the arts and ſciences of the Mauritanians, we have not much to ſay. The country-people were extremely rude and barbarous, as appears from what has been juſt laid down. Thoſe inhabiting cities muſt undoubtedly have had, at leaſt, ſome ſmattering of the literature of the ſeveral nations they deduced their origin from. That the Mauritanians had ſome knowledge in naval affairs, ſeems probable, not only from the intercourſe they had with the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, as well as the ſituation of their country, but likewiſe from Orpheus, or Onomacritus, who aſſerts them to have made a ſettlement at the entrance into Colchis, to which place they came by ſea. Magic, ſorcery, divination, &c. from what has been obſerved in the laſt ſection, they appear to have applied themſelves to in very early times. Cicero and Pliny ſay, that Atlas was the inventor of aſtrology, and the doctrine of the ſphere, i. e. he firſt introduced them into Mauritania. This, according to Diodorus Siculus, gave riſe to the fable of Atlas's bearing the heavens upon his ſhoulders. The ſame author relates, that Atlas inſtructed Hercules in the doctrine of the ſphere and aſtrology, or rather aſtronomy, who afterwards brought thoſe ſciences into Greece. Some ſay that Neptune, and others that Atlas, firſt fitted out a fleet, and invented tall ſhips with ſails. Be that as it will, 'tis generally acknowledged, that both Neptune, and Atlas his ſon, reigned in this country; for which reaſon it cannot be denied probable, that aſtronomy, aſtrology, geography, geometry, navigation, &c. were known to ſome of the Mauritanians in early ages. Let this be admitted, and it will almoſt neceſſarily follow, that a competent knowledge in hiſtory, chronology, &c. could not have been wanting amongſt them. That ſome of them were not deficient in point of genius, is evident from the great and illuſtrious figure the younger Juba made in the learned world, an account of which will be given towards the cloſe of the Mauritanian hiſtory [k].

Power.

NOTWITHSTANDING Mela repreſents Tingitania as a poor deſpicable country, ſcarce deſerving any notice, yet Strabo aſſures us, that it was a rich and opulent kingdom. The antients in general, by fixing the gardens and golden fruit of the Heſperides here, ſeem to concur with him in that opinion. Salluſt, in particular, diſcovers himſelf to have entertained the ſame ſentiment, when he tells us how formidable Jugurtha's army was rendered by its junction with the Mauritanian forces; and Dio, when he intimates, that Bogud, king of Mauritania, cauſed victory to declare in favour of Cæſar, at the battle of Munda. We cannot well conceive it to have been otherwiſe, if we conſider its extraordinary fertility, the genius of its inhabitants for trade, the gold it abounded with, the bravery of its troops, and other inſtances of its power mentioned by writers of the beſt authority. The Carthaginians had generally ſome bodies of Mauritanians in their ſervice, which is a proof, that they were highly eſteemed by that famous republic. The name of Mauri, or Mauruſii, ſeems to have extended itſelf from the Atlantic ocean to the borders of Africa Propria, or, at leaſt, to the Ampſaga, as may be inferred from ſeveral authors: nay, it ſurvived thoſe of the Maſſyli and Maſſæſyli, which muſt have been occaſioned by the ſuperior eminence of the Mauritanian nation, and conſequently is an aditional argument in favour of what has been juſt advanced [1].

SECT. III.

The hiſtory of the Mauritanians, to the entire reduction of their country by the Romans.

Accounts of the earlieſt tranſactions in Mauritania little to be depended on.

THE accounts tranſmitted down to us by the antients of the moſt early tranſactions in Mauritania are ſo inveloped with fable, that 'tis impoſſible for us from thence to form any tolerable idea of them; though theſe accounts are ſo prolix, that they would fill a conſiderable volume. It will therefore be ſufficient, for the information of our readers, ers, to give a conciſe relation of the principal of them, ſtripped as much as poſſible of fable, and as conſiſtent with itſelf as the jarring traditions of the old poets, philoſophers, and hiſtorians, will permit it to be [m].

THE two earlieſt princes of this country, except Neptune, mentioned by antiquity, were Atlas and Antæus. From ſeveral circumſtances, with which we are ſupplied by various authors, it appears extremely probable, that theſe were the ſame perſon. They were both of them the ſons of Neptune, who reigned over Mauritania, Numidia, and a great part of Libya; as may be naturally inferred from his having ſuch particular marks of diſtinction conferred upon him by the inhabitants of thoſe regions. They both ruled with an abſolute ſway over a great part of Africa, particularly Tingitania. Hercules defeated and ſlew Antæus in the ſame war wherein he took the Libyan world from Atlas. Both Atlas and Antæus invaded Egypt, and contended with Hercules in the wars of the gods, and were both overcome by him. Antæus, as well as Atlas, ſeems to have been famed for his knowledge in the celeſtial ſciences. From whence, as well as from other conſiderations that might be offered, we may fairly conclude them to have been the ſame king of Mauritania [n] (M).

(M) The oblique caſes of the word Atlas, viz. Atlantis, Atlante, &c. are apparently compounded of the names Atlas, or Atal, i. e. tall, lofty, &c. and Ante, or Antæus. This is a preſumptive proof, that they both belonged to the ſame perſon, and conſequently, that Atlas and Antæus were the ſame king of Mauritania. The old nominative caſe in the Greek language, of all ſuch words, bore a near relation to the oblique caſes, though altered in proceſs of time. The word Atal anſwers

Sir Iſaac Newton's opinion, in relation to the age wherein they lived, probable.

ANTÆUS, in his wars with Hercules, who ſeems to have commanded an army of Egyptians and Ethiopians, behaved with great bravery and reſolution. Receiving ſeveral large reinforcements of Libyan troops, he cut off vaſt numbers of Hercules's men. But that celebrated commander, having at laſt intercepted a ſtrong body of Mauritanian or Libyan forces, ſent to the relief of Antæus, gave him a total overthrow, wherein both he, and the beſt part of his forces, were put to the ſword. This deciſive action put Hercules in poſſeſſion of Libya and Mauritania, and conſequently of all the riches in thoſe kingdoms. Hence came the fable, that Hercules, finding Antæus, a giant of an enormous ſize, with whom he was engaged in ſingle combat, to receive freſh ſtrength as often as he touched his mother earth, when thrown upon her, at laſt lifted him up in the air, and ſqueezed him to death; as likewiſe, that he took Atlas's globe upon his own ſhoulders, overcame the dragon that guarded the orchards of the Heſperides, and made himſelf maſter of all the golden fruit there. Bochart thinks, that the fable alluded chiefly to naval engagements, wherein Hercules, for the moſt part, was victorious, though Antæus, from time to time, received ſuccours by ſea; till at laſt Hercules, coming up with one of his ſquadrons having a ſtrong reinforcement on board, made himſelf maſter of it; which rendered Antæus, for the future, incapable of making head againſt him. The ſame author likewiſe inſinuates, that the notion of Antæus's gigantic ſtature, prevailing for ſo many centuries amongſt the Tingitanians, pointed out the ſize of the veſſels of which his fleets or ſquadrons did conſiſt; and that the golden apples, ſo frequently mentioned by the old mythologiſts, were the treaſures that fell into Hercules's hands upon Antæus's defeat, the Greeks giving the original word מאל, riches, the ſignification affixed to their own term μῆλα, apples. Biſhop Cumberland ſeems, with Sanchoniatho, and the Atlantian theology in Diodorus, to allow Atlas to have been the ſon of Ouranos, i. e. according to him, Noah; and likewiſe to take for granted, with Euſebius, that Antæus was his ſon. But ſhould this be admitted, we muſt allow Hercules, and conſequently Antæus, to have been ſwers very well to the ſtature of Antæus, according to Pliny and Plutarch (12).

been cotemporary with Miſraim; that the remoteſt weſtern parts of Africa, even thoſe bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, were then fully inhabited; and that they had, even for ſome time, then formed a powerful kingdom; i. e. the north-weſtern part of Libya made a conſiderable figure before Egypt and Phœnicia, from whence its firſt colonies were drawn, could in reality make any figure at all; nay, that thoſe countries, particularly Egypt, could ſend colonies into, and attempt the conqueſt of almoſt the remoteſt regions, immediately after the firſt planters had ſettled there; abſurdities ſo glaring, that even none in Cteſias can exceed them! Beſides, if Euſebius eſpouſed this opinion, as he ſeems to have done, by his citation from Diodorus, provided we fall in with biſhop Cumberland's explanation of Sanchoniatho, he is inconſiſtent with himſelf: for he aſſerts Hercules to have vanquiſhed Antæus about three hundred and ninety-three years before the deſtruction of Troy, as we find by conſulting his Chronicon. Now, allowing that event to have preceded the chriſtian æra twelve hundred years, which is higher than it has even been fixed by the followers of Cteſias and Eratoſthenes, both Hercules and Antæus muſt have lived between ſeven and eight hundred years after the deluge; which, though much too early, in our opinion, muſt bring them down ſeveral hundred years lower than the age of Miſraim. The Greek mythic writers, particularly Apollodorus, will have Atlas to be the ſon of Iapetus, and grandſon of Noah, according to biſhop Cumberland; but this hypotheſis likewiſe, from what has been juſt advanced, muſt be acknowledged void of the leaſt ſhadow of probability. In fine, after the moſt diligent and impartial examination of all the different hypotheſes of hiſtorians and chronologers, relating to Atlas and Antæus, we find none ſo little clogged with difficulties as that of the incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton. That illuſtrious author ſuppoſes Ammon, the father of Seſac, to have been the firſt king of Libya, or that vaſt tract extending from the borders of Egypt to the Atlantic ocean; that the conqueſt of this country was effected by Seſac in his father's life-time; that the Libyans, headed by Neptune, afterwards rebelled againſt Seſac, ſlew him, and then invaded Egypt under the command of Atlas or Antæus, the ſon of Neptune, Seſac's brother and admiral; that Hercules, the general of Thebais and Ethiopia for the gods or great men of Egypt, after the death of Seſac, reduced a ſecond time the whole continent of Libya, having overthrown and ſlain Antæus near a town in Thebais, from that event called Antæa or Antæopolis; and laſtly, that the first reduction of Libya, by Sesac, happened a little above a thousand years before the birth of Christ, as the last, by Hercules, did a few years under that period. Now, though we do not pretend to adopt every particular circumstance of Sir Isaac Newton's hypothesis, yet we cannot forbear observing, that it appears undeniably plain from Scripture, that neither the western extremity of Libya, nor even the other parts of that region, could possibly have been so well peopled before the time of David or Solomon, as to have sent a numerous army to invade Egypt; since Egypt and Phœnicia, from whence the greatest part of the ancestors of the Lybians came, and which were much nearer the place from whence the first dispersion of mankind was made, could not themselves have been greatly over-stocked with inhabitants any considerable time before the reign of Saul. And that such an invasion happened in the reign of Neptune, or at least of his son Antæus, has been fully evinced by that most excellent chronologer°.

A farther argument in support of Sir Isaac Newton.

To what has been already offered on this head we may add, that the Lybians are not taken notice of by scripture, as a nation of any strength or power, till the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam king of Judah, who was then invaded by Sesac. A body of Libyan troops attended that prince in this expedition; and therefore Libya must be considered as then newly become subject to him. About thirty years afterwards they made likewise something of a figure; since in the fifteenth year of Asa, Zerah the Ethiopian advanced to Mareshah with an army of a million of men, of which the Libyans formed a considerable part. As this was but a short time after the death of Sesac, and as Zerah must then have been master of Egypt, since otherwise he would not have marched his Libyan forces through that country to attack Asa's dominions, it seems to us extremely probable from hence, in conjunction with what has been just observed, that Libya was annexed to the Egyptian monarchy by Sesac, and not before; as likewise, that Sesostris, and Sesonchosis, must have been the same Egyptian prince with Sesac, since those names denoted that conqueror who first reduced Libya, and formed the great Egyptian monarchy, according cording to prophane authors. No mention is made of the Egyptians on this occasion, since soon after the death of Sesac, i. e. a little before the Trojan war, the Ethiopians, for a short time, were masters of Egypt, as appears from Pliny and Herodotus. If therefore all that vast tract, known by the name of Libya, was so inconsiderable, that it deserved little or no attention, till the days of Rehoboam and Asa, how obscure must the country, called by the Phœnicians Mauritania, a small part of it, have been in every age preceding Sesac? We may therefore infer from hence, that Antæus, or Atlas, could not have lived much earlier than the age Sir Isaac has assigned him; however early some particular colonies of Canaanites, or Phœnicians, a sea-faring people always intent upon discovering unknown countries, might have settled in the western parts of Africa. However, we are far from insisting upon what is here advanced as true, but only beg leave to submit it, with all possible deference, to the judgment of our learned and impartial readers [P].

Virgil and Trogus countenance his opinion.

THE sentiment we would here recommend to the consideration of the learned is also countenanced by Virgil and Trogus Pompeius, who hint the following remarkable particulars relating to it: 1. About nine hundred years before the commencement of the christian æra, Libya was independent on Egypt, since the eastern, if not the western part of it, was governed by a king of its own, named Iarbas. This tallies extremely well with what Sir Isaac has observed of the fall of the Egyptian empire, founded by Ammon and Sesac; for, according to him, that empire was broke to pieces about the year before Christ 940, by the civil wars in the reign of Amenophis, which, in a great measure, occasioned the revolt of the nations upon the coasts of the Mediterranean and Euxine seas. 2. The Libyans much nearer Egypt, a polite and civilized kingdom, than those bordering on the Atlantic Ocean, had only a few villages, consisting of small huts, probably the same as the modern Dashkras, mentioned by Dr. Shaw, when Dido arrived in Africa; though possibly Utica, built and inhabited by Phœnicians, might then have made a better figure. Tingis likewise, as it appears to lay claim to a more antient founder than Antæus, being on the sea-coast, was perhaps a town of some note before the time we are now upon. Nay, as we have obſerved from Procopius, ſome parties of Canaanites might erect a caſtle there, though before that time, if any traces of a town were in being, it could only have been an incoſiderable Daſhkra, or perhaps little better than a collection of thickets and caves of the earth. 3. The Libyans, even in and near the territory of Carthage, were a ſort of barbarians at Dido's arrival there, living, in a manner, like wild beaſts, and ſtanding in need of Dido's Phœnician followers to poliſh and civilize them. Theſe, and ſome other inferences, that might be drawn from the above-mentioned authors, add no ſmall weight to what Sir Iſaac has advanced with regard to Atlas or Antæus, as well as the riſe and fall of the Egyptian empire; but this we muſt ſuperſede, as not ſo properly belonging to that branch of antient hiſtory, to which we are obliged at preſent to confine our ſelves[q].

Nothing farther remarkable till the Roman times.

WE find nothing worth relating recorded of the Mauritanians from the defeat of Antæus to the Roman times. Livy only tells us that Syphax's kingdom bordered upon the Mauri, which is nothing more than an implication, that ſuch a nation did then exiſt. Juſtin indeed from Trogus, intimates, that, in ſome of the earlieſt ages of Carthage, the Mauri were neighbours to the Carthaginians, and had ſome diſputes with them; but he gives us no particulars of moment concerning that people. Diodorus Siculus likewiſe ſays, that, in the interval between the overthrow the Carthaginians received from Gelon, and the firſt Punic war, they had frequently Mauritanian mercenaries in their armies, without hinting any thing farther relative to the nation we are now upon. Nor ought this to be wondered at, ſince we are informed by Salluſt, that nothing of the Mauri, beſides their name, was known to the Romans, ſo late as the Jugurthine war; and the moſt antient Greek writers ſcarce ever conſidered them as a particular nation, but only as a branch of the Libyans. How Bocchar, king of Mauritania, lent Maſiniſſa a body of troops to eſcort him to his dominions, and what was conſequent thereupon, our readers will find related at large in the Numidian hiſtory[r].

PLUTARCH inſinuates, that the elder Juba pretended to be lineally deſcended from Hercules; but that biographer ſeems not to give overmuch credit to ſuch a pretenſion. However, 'tis

'tis natural enough to ſuppoſe, that the perſon who obtained this country, upon the diſſolution of the Egyptian empire, founded a family that might continue for many generations. Poſſibly Bocchar, and Bocchus father-in-law to Jugurtha, were of his family; ſince the affinity of names, and the country they governed, ſufficiently intimate them to have been of the ſame family, and of the blood royal of Mauritania. Be that as it will, Bocchus, from the account Salluſt gives us of him, ſeems to have been a perfidious prince. After two defeats; the Romans menaced and cajoled him into an infamous action, i. e. to deliver (N) his ſon-in-law Jugurtha into their hands, after the moſt ſolemn engagements to ſupport him, and even a promiſe made to put Sylla into his power. Jugurtha indeed was a prince not only capable, but even guilty, of the moſt enormous crimes; but this will not vindicate, nor even palliate, the conduct of (O) Bocchus. What is here hinted at

(N) Oroſius intimates that Bocchus did not enter into an alliance with Jugurtha till after Marius had taken Capſa; which contradicts Salluſt and Plutarch. He alſo deſcribes the firſt general action betwixt the two African princes and Marius, which he affirms to have happened near Cirta, as the moſt bloody and dubious one the Romans were ever concerned in. The Romans, ſays he, after having been extremely haraſſed by the enemies parties, were attacked by their whole army, wherein was a body of ſixty thouſand Mauritanian and Numidian cavalry, whoſe horſes raiſed ſuch clouds of duſt, that the heavens were thereby obſcured; which, together with the ſhower of darts thrown on this occaſion, turned the day into night. The battle was fought with ſuch obſtinacy, that it continued three days; neither had the Romans at laſt won it, being reduced to the laſt extremity by thirſt, occaſioned by the intolerable heat of the climate and ſeaſon, had there not fallen a moſt ſeaſonable ſhower of rain, which greatly refreſhed them, rendered the handles of the Africans darts ſo ſlippery, that they could not throw them, and made their ſhields, covered with dried elephants ſkins, that imbibed all the water, ſo ponderous, that they could not uſe them; which of courſe determined victory to declare againſt Bocchus and Jugurtha. But, as this relation, in many particulars, runs counter to Salluſt and Plutarch, or rather ſeems to be a confuſed account of ſeveral actions mentioned by them, we ſhall leave our readers to give what credit to it they pleaſe (13).

(O) Either this prince, or another of the ſame name, undertook an expedition againſt the weſtern or Heſperian Ethiopians, as we learn from Strabo. According to that author, Bocchus found, may be found related at large in ſome former parts of this work [s].

What happened to Bogud.

HISTORY is ſilent as to any farther particulars of the Mauritanian affairs, till the time of Bogud (P), who was cotemporary with Julius Cæſar, and his adopted ſon Octavius. Bogud, in conjunction with Publius Sittius, not a little contributed to Cæſar's great ſucceſs in Africa, as has been already obſerved. In Spain likewiſe he enabled Cæſar to gain the ever-memorable victory at Munda, which gave the finiſhing ſtroke to the Roman republic. After that emperor's death he ſided with Antony againſt Octavius; and endeavoured to make a diverſion in favour of the former, in Spain. But whilſt he was employed in this expedition, the Tingitanians revolted from him, and, being ſupported by a body of Spaniards in the intereſt of Octavius, and ſome of Bocchus's troops, defeated him upon his return into Africa; which put Bocchus in poſſeſſion of Tingitania. Octavius, or Auguſtus, afterwards confirmed this acquiſition to him, and honoured the inhabitants of Tingis with the privileges of Roman citizens. Bogud was at laſt killed by Agrippa at Methona, as our readers will elſewhere find; and after Bocchus's (Q) in the country of theſe Ethiopians, ſome reeds of ſuch an enormous ſize, that the largeſt joint of them would contain eight chænixes of corn; which, together with ſome aſparagus equally large, he ſent as curioſities to his wife. What ſucceſs attended this expedition, we neither find in Strabo, nor any other author (14).

(P) Suetonius informs us, that Julius Cæſar fell in love with Bogud's queen Eune, or Eunoe, a Mauritanian lady. As he made both her and her huſband preſents of an immenſe value on this account 'tis not improbable, that he enjoyed her by her huſband's conſent (15).

(Q) Pliny relates, that one king Bocchus, having faſtened thirty men to ſtakes, in order to their being deſtroyed by the ſame number of elephants, ordered certain perſons to iritate thoſe animals; but that, notwithſtanding all their efforts, they found it impoſſible to make them ſubſervient to that prince's cruelty. The ſame author likewiſe mentions an African hiſtorian of this name; but whether or no he was of royal extraction, he tells us not (16).

Auguſtus gives the younger Juba the Mauritaniæ, and part of Gætulia.

AUGUSTUS gave the younger Juba, a prince extremely in his favour, the two Mauritaniæ, together with part of Gætulia, ſome time after his marriage with the younger Cleopatra, inſtead of his father's kingdom, i. e. Numidia, which ſtill remained a Roman province. 'Tis true, Strabo, as has been obſerved by Mr. Bayle, affirms, that Auguſtus reſtored Juba to the kingdom of his father, and moreover granted him the Mauritaniæ; but this geographer limits the Roman province, and the kingdom of Juba, in ſuch a manner, as ſhews that Numidia belonged to the Romans. We muſt not omit obſerving here, that the tranſlator of Dio has committed an egregious blunder, in his Latin verſion, which ſeems to have proceeded purely from inattention: "Cæſar, ſays he, gave Ju-"ba, &c. IT, (i. e. Egypt) and his father's kingdom;" whereas Dio there affirms, "that Cæſar gave (R) Juba HER, (i. e. "Cleopatra)

(R) Juba had a noble education beſtowed upon him at Rome, where he imbibed ſuch a variety of knowledge, as afterwards equalled him to the moſt learned Græcians. He did not leave that city, till he went to take poſſeſſion of his father's dominions. By the lenity of his government he ſo won the hearts of all his ſubjects, who ever retained the moſt grateful ſenſe of the felicity they enjoyed under him, that they ranked him among the gods, and, according to Pauſanias, erected a ſtatue in his honour. He was extremely well verſed in the Aſſyrian, Arabic, Greek, Punic, African, and Latin hiſtories, as well as thoſe of other nations. He wrote the hiſtory of Arabia; the antiquities of the Aſſyrians and Romans; the hiſtory of theatres, of painting, and painters; of grammar; of the nature and properties of different animals; a particular treatiſe upon the herb Euphorbia, which he ſo called from his phyſician, who firſt diſcovered the many excellences of it, in which he greatly celebrates it's ſingular virtues; a piece concerning the ſource of the Nile; beſides many other works aſcribed to him by Suidas, Ammianus Marcellinus, Pliny, Athenæus, &c. a few fragments only of which are now extant. Pliny intimates, that his learning rendered him more illuſtrious than his crown; and frequently cites him, as aſſerting or confirming the moſt curious particulars. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, Juba, from ſome Punic authors, affirmed the Nile to

" Cleopatra) and his father's kingdom." That this obſervation, made firſt by Mr. Bayle, is indiſputably true, appears ſufficiently from hence, that this Juba was never king of Egypt. Suidas relates, that the younger Juba was whipped publicly when led in triumph; but this ſeems highly improbable, and has not the countenance of any other author to ſupport it. Ptolemy (S), his ſon by Cleopatra, daughter to Antony and Cleopatra, ſurnamed Selene, ſucceeded him. How this prince was afterwards cut off by Caius, either thro' a principle of avarice or jealouſy, we may learn from Suetonius and Dio, as well as a former part of this hiſtory [u].

The abbé Sevin has favoured the world with a ſhort diſſertation on the life and writings of the younger Juba, wherein he has inſerted a catalogue of all his works. That he died in the year of Rome 776, or 777, may be inferred from Strabo and Tacitus (17).

TACFARINAS, a native of Numidia, who had ſerved among the Roman auxiliaries, a little before the third conſulate of Tiberius, occaſioned freſh troubles in Africa. At firſt he aſſembled a great number of barbarians, inured to robberies, and all kinds of rapine, by the allurement of plunder; out of which he formed a conſiderable army, and diſciplined it after the Roman manner. The groſs of the army conſiſted of Muſulanians, a powerful nation bordering upon the Sahara, ſtill wild, and without towns, of whom Tacfarinas declared himſelf general. Theſe were joined by a large body of Mauritanians, commanded by their general Mazippa, whom Tacfarinas had found means to draw into the war. The Cinithians likewiſe, a nation by no means deſpicable, he forced to come into his meaſures. With the regular forces he encamped, and detached Mazippa to make excurſions, and haraſs the Romans by perpetual alarms, with the irregular troops. Furius Camillus, the Roman commander, advanced againſt the Africans with only a ſingle legion, and what troops the allies could ſpare him. This he did in order to draw them to a general action, ſince they ſeemed willing to decline an engagement, it being their intereſt to protract the war. Though Camillus's troops were but an handful, in compariſon of the barbarians, he drew them up in order of battle, poſting the legion in the centre, and the light cohorts, with two wings of horſe, on the right and left. He had no ſooner made this diſpoſition than the barbarians attacked him, but were quickly routed with great ſlaughter. However, the next year Tacfarinas renewed the war, making dreadful incurſions into the very heart of the country, and doing irreparable damage where-ever he moved. He poſted from place to place with ſuch celerity, that none of the Roman detachments could come up with him. After he had committed many devaſtations, he ſurrounded a Roman cohort, commanded by one Decrius, an officer of diſtinguiſhed merit, in a fort near the banks of the Pagida. The Romans behaved with great bravery; but their commandant being killed, they were obliged to abandon the fort to the enemy, and betake themſelves to flight. Lucius Apronius, Camillus's ſucceſſor, cauſed this ignominious cohort to be decimated, and every tenth man, drawn by lot, in conformity to the antient cuſtom, to be executed with a club. This rigour had ſuch an effect, that Tacfarinas's army was routed, and forced to raiſe the ſiege of Thala, by a ſquadron of five hundred veterans only. This defeat determined Tacfarinas to reſolve never for the future to attempt a ſiege, but to carry on the war in a deſultory manner, manner, flying when attacked, and, upon a retreat, aſſaulting the rear. As long as the African obſerved this method, he eluded all the efforts of the Romans; but withdrawing to the maritime places, and being, by the proſpect of an immenſe booty, confined to his camp, he was attacked by Apronius Cæſianus with a body of cavalry, auxiliary cohorts, and a detachment of legionary foot. The diſpute was neither long nor bloody; for the barbarians were ſoon overthrown, many of them ſlain, and the reſt obliged to diſperſe themſelves in the Sahara. However, Tacfarinas, though often repulſed, ſtill repaired his forces, and arrived at ſuch a pitch of arrogance, as to ſend embaſſadors to Tiberius, threatening him with eternal war, if he and his army had not a proper ſettlement aſſigned them. Tiberius incenſed to the laſt degree at ſuch unparallelled impudence, ordered Blæſus who commanded the Roman forces in Africa, to offer a general indemnity to the Africans, and to endeavour, by all means poſſible, to get Tacfarinas into his hands. Blæſus, in order to put an end to this war, made the following diſpoſition of his forces: he detached Scipio, his lieutenant, to a poſt from whence Tacfarinas committed his depredations upon the citizens of Leptis, and then retreated amonſt the Garamantes; his ſon he ſent to protect the territory of the Cirteſii; and between both he marched himſelf with the flower of his army, erecting forts and redoubts in proper places as he advanced. Theſe meaſures, with ſome others equally good, had the deſired effect; for Tacfarinas's forces were diſperſed, his brother taken, and he obliged to hide himſelf in the deſert. Notwithſtanding which, a great body of Mauritanians, through Ptolemy's indolence, having joined him, as likewiſe a ſtrong reinforcement from the king of the Garamantes (T), he once more made head againſt the Romans. But Dolabella, having fortified the proper poſts, and executed the chiefs of the

(T) Tacitus intimates, that Tacfarinas drew together at this time a powerful army of Africans, by giving out, that the Romans were ſo embroiled with other nations, that they would be obliged gradually to abandon Africa; and that therefore, would the friends to liberty unite, they might ſoon cut off all that remained there. The ſame hiſtorian alſo informs us, that before the general action here mentioned, Dolabella forced Tacfarinas to raiſe the ſiege of Thubuſcum, which he abandoned at his approach (19).

the Muſulani, who were meditating a revolt, advanced againſt the enemy, who, he was informed, had taken poſt near the caſtle of Auzea. After a forced march he came up with them, and entirely defeated them, putting to the ſword Tacfarinas himſelf, with a vaſt number of his followers. A body of Mauritanians, king Ptolemy ſent to aſſiſt Dolabella, did not a little contribute to this victory, which, for ſome time, ſettled peace in the Roman provinces, Mauritania, and Gætulia [w].

Mauritania reduced to a Roman province.

PTOLEMY having been cut off by Caius, as related above, Ædemon, one of his freedmen, in order to revenge his death, aſſembled a body of forces in Mauritania. Caius being ſoon after aſſaſſinated, his ſucceſſor Claudius, in order to diſperſe this corps, ſent thither a Roman army, which was the firſt that ever appeared in that country. Though they performed no great exploits the firſt campaign, yet, as the enemy retired before them, the ſenate perſuaded Claudius, to accept of triumphal honours for the ſucceſs of his arms in Mauritania. The following year, Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman general, defeated the enemy, ravaged all the country as far as mount Atlas, and penetrated into Gætulia. Sidius Geta, who ſucceeded Paulinus in the command of the Roman army in Africa, gave Salabus, the Mauritanian general, two overthrows, and purſued him into the Sahara. Having been ſupplied here with water in a wonderful manner, when his troops were upon the point of periſhing, Geta concluded a peace with Salabus upon his own terms. 'Tis probable, that, by this treaty, Mauritania was delivered up entirely into the hands of the Romans; ſince we find it ſoon after divided into two provinces, the one called Tingitania, or Mauritania Tingitana, from the city Tingis, and the other Mauritania Cæſarienſis, from Cæſar, a ſurname Claudius had in common with the other Roman emperors. That prince appointed two Roman knights to preſide over theſe provinces. Soon after, the Romans routed a body of Gætulians that infeſted ſome parts of Numidia, and thereby reſtored tranquillity to all their African dominions. 'Tis obſervable, that Auguſtus ſettled nine colonies, and Claudius three only, here; which, in a region of ſo vaſt an extent, could neither have ſufficient power thoroughly to ſubjugate the natives, nor influence to conciliate their affections to the Romans [x].

The Hiſtory of the Gætulians.

AS the limits of Gætulia have not been ſettled, either by Ptolemy, or any of the other antient geographers, 'tis impoſſible for us to define them. From ſeveral authors it may however be inferred, that they were not always the ſame. In Pliny's time the Gætulians poſſeſſed a conſiderable part, at leaſt, of Tingitania; the Mauruſii having been ſo extremely weakened by long and bloody wars, that they could not make head againſt them. Virgil affirms this people to have extended themſelves from the Regio Syrtica to the Atlantic ocean; and Feſtus Avienus ſeems to have fixed their eaſtern boundary not far from the weſtern confines of Marmarica. However, nothing certain concerning the extent and ſituation of their country can be drawn either from thoſe authors or Strabo, who only intimates the Gætulians to have been a large nation, taking up a conſiderable part of Libya Interior, and poſſeſſing ſome territories in the neighbourhood of the Syrtes. Pliny ſays, that Gætulia was terminated on the ſouth by the river Nigris, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Nigir, which, according to him, ſeparated it from Ethiopia. But notwithſtanding the indefinite terms in which the antients have laid down this region, by comparing their ſeveral accounts and deſcriptions, we ſhall find the northern limits thereof contiguous to, and frequently coinciding with, the ſouthern parts of Numidia and the Mauritaniæ; and, by conſulting the beſt obſervations of the moderns, that it could not have reached to any great diſtance in the Sahara. Dr. Shaw (A), in one place, ſeems to inſinuate, that the proper Gætulia did not extend farther to the eaſt than the meridian of Siga, i. e. about 0′ 10 E of London, provided Tackumbreet be the antient Siga, as he imagines; ſince he there tells us, that the Melanogætuli and Garamantes occupied the tract behind

(A) Dr. Shaw alſo tells us, that Gætulia extended into the deſert or Sahara; which ſuppoſes, that nothing but deſert muſt be left to the direct ſouthward of it. Therefore Melanogætulia, and the country of the Garamantes, in conformity to the ſituation aſſigned them by the antients, muſt have lain E. S. E. of Gætulia, and conſequently have begun in an eaſtern direction from it (1).

(1) Shaw ubi ſup. p. 136.

behind Numidia, Africa Propria, and the Regio Syrtica, from that meridian to Cyrenaica: whereas in another place he fixes ſome Gætulian tribes in the remoteſt part of the diſtrict of Zaab, and meridian of Conſtantina, above ſix degrees more to the eaſtward than Siga. Whether or no either of theſe ſeemingly jarring accounts be true, or which of them is ſo, we ſhall not take upon us to determine; but only obſerve, that Guzula, or Gezula, a province of the kingdom of Morocco, at the foot of mount Atlas, ſeems to have preſerved ſome traces of the antient Gætulia. Could we lay any great ſtreſs upon an affinity of names, this province was a principal part of Gætulia; in which caſe Dr. Shaw's firſt notion would have probability on its ſide. But, as the concurrent teſtimony of the antients favours the latter, we know not what to ſay. However, the aſcertaining the bounds of this rude and barbarous region is not a matter of ſuch importance, as to deſerve any great regard. We ſhall therefore leave our geographical readers to chuſe which of theſe notions they pleaſe, or to reject both of them, if they think proper [a].

It's towns, rivers, mountains, &c.

As the Gætulians, before the time of Jugurtha, led their flocks from paſture to paſture, living, for the moſt part, in tents, without any fixed habitation, our readers will not expect to find many towns in this country. Some however Virgil inſinuates there to have been, though his commentator Servius appears to be of a different opinion. Philoſtratus makes the Gætulians to have inhabited the interior part of mount Abinna, or Abyla, and conſequently, by intermixing them with the Mauruſii, allows ſome of them to have dwelt in towns. Pliny alſo intimates, that the Gætulians in his time were maſters of a good part of Maſæſylia; and Apuleius aſſigns them ſome diſtricts, at leaſt, of Numidia Propria; which teſtimonies, if admitted, evince the ſame thing. But Pliny and Ptolemy render it indiſputable, when they mention the cities Autolala, Talubath, &c. as appertaining to the Gætulians. The principal tribes of proper Gætulia were the Baniuræ, Darræ, and Autololes (B), according to the laſt-mentioned

(B) Pliny ſays, that the Veſuni, or, according to ſome MSS. the

mentioned geographers. 'Tis probable, that the Baniuræ bordered upon Tingitania, as the Darræ did upon the Ethiopians called Perorſi and the Pharuſii. The Autololes ſeem to have been by much the moſt powerful, and to have ſpread themſelves over that part of Tingitania bordering on the coaſt of the Atlantic ocean. Their capital city Autolala, from which they derived their name, we know nothing farther of, than that it ſtood betwixt the Subus and the Salathus, the only two rivers of note, except the Gir and the Nigir, that watered Gætulia. Of Talubath nothing has been tranſmitted down to us by the antients, but the bare name. As the Sahara began not far from the ſouthern foot of mount Atlas, this country was undoubtedly, for the moſt part, ſandy and deſert; however, it was interſperſed with ſeveral fruitful ſpots. Mount Sagapola, eminent for nothing but its being the limit of Gætulia on the ſide of the Melanogætuli, and containing the ſources of the Subus and Salathus above-mentioned, ſeems to have been the only mountain of any note in the region we are now upon. As for the promontories, &c. we meet with none meriting any attention; though from Pliny it may be inferred, that the Promontorium Solis, and ſome ports already mentioned, might have been in a territory afterwards annexed to the proper Gætulia. The only curioſity here, deſerving a place in hiſtory, was the vaſt quantity of the purple-fiſh produced in that part of the Atlantic ocean waſhing the Gætulian ſhore, with which the rocks on this coaſt were frequently covered. The Teladuſii, Soræ, Dryitæ, Elulii, Mazices, Nacmuſii, and other obſcure nations, inhabiting either Numidia, or the confines of that country and Gætulia, in the time of Ptolemy, deſerve ſo little regard, that our readers will ſcarce expect a bare enumeration of their names. However, we muſt not omit obſerving, that as Ptolemy places the Pharuſii to the north of mount Sagapola, they may be conſidered as a clan or canton of the Gætulians; eſpecially ſince Pliny affirms their diſtrict to have ſtretched itſelf out as far as the Atlantic ocean, and Mela makes them to have attended Hercules in his expedition againſt the Heſperides. 'Tis not therefore probable, that mount Phruræſius, the Neſuni, were a branch of the Autololes, who ſeparating from their brethren, ſettled upon the borders of Ethiopia, and afterwards formed a diſtinct nation. Oroſius informs us, that the Autololes, or, as the MSS. falſly have it, Auloles, were called, in his time, Galaules (2).

ræſius, near four degrees eaſt of the Mulucha, ſhould have been ſo denominated from the Pharuſii; except we will ſuppoſe this ridge of mountains to have been the eaſtern limit of that nation, and that they were ſo numerous and powerful as to have ſpread themſelves over a tract extending from thence to the Atlantic ocean. In ſuch a caſe we might, with Dr. Shaw, allow, that the inhabitants of mount Phruræſius were part of the Pharuſii. Perhaps this notion may be countenanced by Mela and Pliny, when they intimate the Pharuſii to have been an opulent people in antient times, and to have bordered upon the Nigritæ, in the neighbourhood of the river Niger, which, with Ptolemy, they make one of the boundaries of the Gætulians. The vicinity of the Nigritæ and Pharuſii is likewiſe taken notice of by Dionyſius Afer and Strabo [b].

ACCORDING to Joſephus and St. Jerom, Chavilah, or Havilah, the ſon of Cuſh, was the father of the Gætulians; for which reaſon we find them called Evilæi, or Havilæi. As it is well known, that Havilah, or Chavilah, ſettled in Arabia Felix, and that from him his deſcendents there aſſumed the name of Chaulotæi and Chaulaſii, the ſame words with Evilæi, it cannot well be doubted, but that Gætulia was firſt peopled from Arabia Felix, as has been already hinted. This likewiſe renders probable the authority of the antients, who aſſert, that the Gætulians intermixed themſelves with the Perſians, and that the Pharuſii, in particular, were of Perſic extraction; ſince Perſia and Arabia being in a manner contiguous regions, many Perſians probably attended ſome of the Arabian colonies paſſing into Africa, or at leaſt followed Seſac and Hercules in their Libyan expeditions. We find no obſcure traces of the Darræ, a Gætulian tribe above-mentioned, in Leo and Marmol, who deſcribe a province, bounded on the weſt by thoſe of Gezula and Sus, called Dara, correſponding nearly with the tract aſſigned that people by Pliny; and 'tis well known, that the Darrhæ are a nation of Arabia Felix, taken notice of by Stephanus, Ptolemy, and Pliny; which may ſerve as an additional argument in favour of an early migration of Arabians into Gætulia. To which we may farther add, in ſupport of that migration, that, conſidering how remote

Gætulia

[b] Saluſt, in Jugurth. Virg. & Serv. ubi ſup. Apul. in apol. Plin. & Philoſtrat. ubi ſup. Mel. l. iii. c. 10. Ptol. ubi ſup. Dionyſ. Af. v. 215. Priſcian. v. 200. Strab. ubi ſup. p. 135.

Gætulia was from Arabia Felix, what a ſeries of ages had paſſed from the firſt plantations of colonies there to the moſt early occurrences of that country tranſmitted down to poſterity by the Greeks and Romans, what other nations were intermixed with the firſt migrating Arabs, viz. the Perſians, Indians, &c. the word Gætulia, or Chetulia, is no very ſtrange corruption of Chavilah, Chevilah, Chavilath, Chevilath, Chavilat, or Chevilat. Both Pliny and Ptolemy have remembered the river, Daras, or Darat, which they ſay produced great numbers of crocodiles. If our readers ſhould be diſpoſed to allow the modern Darodus, or Darodt, to be that river, as 'tis not improbable ſome of them may, they would be convinced, that Ptolemy had not only placed his Darat, or Daradus, vaſtly too much to the ſouthward, but likewiſe made his Mauritania Tingitania to comprehend a great part of Gætulia, if not the whole country. 'Tis certain, that the names and ſituation of the provinces of Gezula and Dara render this not a little probable. The word Dara ſeems to ſignify a generation or habitation of ſheperds, and is therefore very applicable to a tribe of Gætulians, who, as well as the modern Darans and Gezulians, had ſcarce any other poſſeſſions than their flocks. Both the name therefore and manner of life of this people plainly pointed out the nation from whence they deduced their origin. Some antient authors related, that the Tyrians had, in very early ages, many cities here, and in the neighbouring parts of Libya Interior, which were deſtroyed by the Nigrites and Pharuſii; but this notion is rejected as fabulous by Strabo [c].

Their government &c.

THE firſt Gætulians, according to the Punic hiſtorians, were ſome of the moſt antient inhabitants of Africa, extremely rude and barbarous, without any form of government, laws, or manners, eſpecially ſuch as ever prevailed in a civilized ſtate. They lived upon the fleſh of wild beaſts, eating upon the ground, after the manner of cattle. They roved about the country, taking up their lodging where-ever the night ſurpriſed them. Some of the Pharuſii, or Phauruſii, at firſt, if any credit may be given to Strabo, lived in caves like the Troglodytes. But this ſtate of of barbarity, Salluſt tells us, continued only till Hercules came amongſt them; which is a farther proof of what Sir Iſaac Newton has advanced with regard to the age of that hero; ſince, as we have lately obſerved, the Gætulians were far from being perfectly civilized in the time of Jugurtha, and therefore Hercules did not probably precede that age ſo long as the generality of the antient chronologers ſuppoſed. It is believed by ſome good authors, to whoſe ſentiments we pay great deference, that the Gætulians, however rude and barbarous, at leaſt towards the Roman times, were under the direction of certain (C) phylarchs, or heads of Kabyles, as their ſucceſſors at this day are. However, if they had then any fixed or ſtated laws, we are now entirely ignorant of them. If they had any (D) cuſtoms likewiſe, different from thoſe of their neighbours the Numidians and Mauritanians, the knowledge of them has not reached us. As all the authors mentioning them are utterly ſilent as to any particulars relating to their religion, we muſt ſuppoſe it to have been the ſame with that of their neighbours already taken notice of, or with that of their progenitors the antient Arabs, which will hereafter be briefly deſcribed. Leo relates, that many of the antient Africans erected magnificent temples in honour of the Sun and Fire, which they worſhipped, wherein they had a perpetual fire; though others of them adored another planet. Probably the Gætulians were ſome of the former, as being partly deſcended from the Perſians, who profeſſed

(C) Strabo calls theſe phylarchs kings and tells us, that they ſo delighted in horſes, that amongſt them they brought up yearly an hundred thouſand colts. He likewiſe informs us, that theſe horſes, as well as the Gætulian larger cattle, had hoofs longer than thoſe of any other nation (3).

(D) One cuſtom, however, we muſt not paſs over here. Lucan ſeems to obſerve, that the Gætulians were mixed with their cattle in their mapalia, as Dr. Shaw relates of the Bedoweens in the kingdoms of Algiers and Tunis at this day. The former author alſo inſinuates, that many of the Gætulians were carried about the country, with their Penates, in carts or waggons, after the manner of the antient Scythians (4).

profeſſed the Magian religion. Their language muſt undoubtedly have borne a near reſemblance to the antient Arabic, and the other Oriental tongues. This does not only appear from what has been already advanced, but likewiſe from the Showiahan vocabulary given us by Dr. Shaw, moſt, if not all, of whoſe words are eaſily deducible from the Arabic, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac. Our readers will not expect to meet with any arts or erudition in ſuch a country as Gætulia, and therefore will not ſuppoſe, that we have any thing to offer on that head here [d].

A brief account of the Gætulians till the time of Veſpaſian.

WITH regard to the tranſactions of this nation, we have not much to ſay. Herodotus and Scylax take no notice of the Gætulians, which renders it probable, that, when thoſe writers lived, they were very obſcure. The firſt authors that mentioned them were probably ſome of thoſe old hiſtorians from whom Livy extracted the materials for his work; ſince he gives us to underſtand, that a corps of them ſerved under Hannibal in the ſecond Punic war. That general, according to him, having taken and razed Acerræ, formed a deſign upon Caſilinum, and ſent a body of Gætulians, under the command of their general Iſalca, to attack it. Iſalca ſoon took poſt before the town, when, finding every-where a profound ſilence, and not obſerving a creature to appear, he imagined, that the garriſon kept themſelves ſtill within the town through fear; which encouraged him to attempt forcing open the gates: but he was repulſed by two Prænestine cohorts; who, ſallying out upon him, cut many of the Gætulians to pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire, with great precipitation, to the Carthaginian army, which was advancing to ſupport them. Whether or no Maſiniſſa, who ſo greatly extended his conqueſts in Africa, ever ſubdued them, hiſtory informs us not; but we are aſſured by Salluſt, that his grandſon Jugurtha taught them to keep their ranks, and inſtructed them in military diſcipline. However, they ſerved that prince more by plundering the allies of the Romans, than by their bravery in time of action; for the army he had raiſed and diſciplined in Gætulia was eaſily routed by Marius near Cirta. That part of Gætulia under the dominion of Juba, for it does not appear that the whole country was ever ſubject to him, revolted to Julius Cæſar; but, that with with Numidia it was reduced into a Roman province, we cannot poſitively affirm; eſpecially, ſince Auguſtus gave a part of Gætulia, probably this, with the Mauritaniæ, to the younger Juba, as an equivalent for Numidia, his father's kingdom, which, ſays Dio, had before put on the form of a province. Be that as it will, it was ravaged by Sittius, as has been already obſerved, when Juba had drawn all his forces out of it, in order to join the Pompeians; which might poſſibly occaſion the aforeſaid revolt. About the year of Rome 759, the Gætulians rebelled againſt king Juba, maſſacring all the Romans ſettled in his dominions, and committing moſt dreadful ravages in all the provinces ſubject to him. Dio aſcribes this defection to the reſentment of the Gætulians, who were extremely incenſed againſt the Romans for impoſing a prince upon them, and not permitting them to live under their government. But however this may be, Cornelius Coſſus gave them ſo complete an overthrow, that they were obliged to ſubmit upon the terms he thought fit to preſcribe. This was looked upon at Rome as ſo conſiderable an exploit, that he had triumphal honours decreed him, and was permitted to aſſume the cognomen Gætulicus. Notwithſtanding which, this people ſo recovered themſelves, that in the elder Pliny's time they had ſettlements in Numidia and Tingitania, as may be inferred from that author and Philoſtratus [e].

CHAP. IV.

The hiſtory of the Melanogætuli, Nigritæ, and Garamantes.

PTOLEMY places the Melanogætuli, or black Gætulians, between the mountains Sagapola and Uſargala, in a diſtrict ſouth-eaſt of Gætulia Propria, to which it is contiguous, and north of the river Niger. They were a nation undoubtedly different from the Gætulians, and conſider- The Melanogætuli, or Nigritæ.

ed in that view by Ptolemy, though Cellarius inſinuates them to have been a tribe of that people. Their complexion not only evinces this, but likewiſe, that their progenitors were different from thoſe of the Gætulians. Of courſe therefore the Daræ ought not, as Cellarius imagines, to be looked upon as a clan of the Melanogætuli; nor does the ſituation of Leo's Dara above-mentioned quadrate with ſuch a ſuppoſition. Mount Uſargala is called by Leo Guargala, and by Dr. Shaw Huergla. The former of thoſe authors informs us, that near the foot of this ridge of mountains there were, in his time, ſome caſtles, and a great number of villages, whoſe inhabitants were very rich, as being adjacent to the Agades, an opulent trading nation, and all of them perfectly black. Ptolemy ſays, that the Bagrada derives its ſtreams from ſome fountains on mount Uſargala; but the lateſt obſervations demonſtrate this to be a miſtake. The modern diſtrict of Wad-reag in the province of Conſtantina, containing a collection of twenty-five villages, ranged in a N. E. and S. W. direction, ſeems to correſpond with a part of the country of the Melanogætuli, according to Dr. Shaw. Ma-jyre, the neareſt of theſe villages to Zaab, a territoy anſwering, as ſhould ſeem to the ſouth-eaſtern part of Gætulia, is ten leagues to the S. of El-Fythe, the laſt village of Zaab. Tum-marnah, the next place of note, is ſix leagues to the weſtward of Ma-jyre, and twelve to the N. E. of Tuggurt, the capital of Wad-reag, and the Tegort of Leo. Tuggurt ſtands in a plain, without any river running by it; the inhabitants, as well as thoſe of the other villages of Wad-reag, being ſupplied with water by wells, dug an hundred, and ſometimes two hundred, fathom deep. This method they are obliged to have recourſe to, their territory being in a manner deſtitute both of rivulets and fountains. They dig through different layers of ſand and gravel, till they come to a fleaky kind of ſtone like unto ſlate, which is known to lie immediately above the abyſs, called by them "The ſea below-ground." This ſtone is no ſooner broken through, than a flux of water aſcends ſo ſuddenly, and in ſuch abundance, that the perſon let down to perform the operation has ſometimes been overtaken and ſuffocated by it, though raiſed up with the greateſt dexterity. The country likewiſe of the Beni Mezzab, ſituated thirty-five leagues to the S. of the mountains of the Ammer, ſuppoſed to be a part of the Mons Phruræſus of Ptolemy, the large village of En-gouſah, thirty leagues leagues to the S. W. by W. of Tuggurt, and the populous city of Wurglah, with their dependencies, even to the banks of the Nigir, our learned and ingenious traveller believes might have been included in Melanogætulia. As Ptolemy places the Melanogætuli next to the Pharuſii in a ſouthern direction, fixing his Nigritian Ethiopians in a tract lying to the N. of the Nigir; and as Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, ſeem to give the Nigritæ exactly the ſame ſituation with regard to the Pharuſii and the Nigir, but are quite ſilent as to the Melanogætuli; we cannot help thinking the Melanogætuli and Nigritæ one and the ſame people. If this be admitted, it will appear extremely probable, that their territories extended to the Nigir, and that they had ſome places of note in thoſe parts; ſince, according to Ptolemy, many towns ſtood not far from that river, of which the principal were Peſſide, Saluce, Nigira, Thige, Cuphe, Thamondicana, and Vellegia. The moſt noted rivers of this country were the Gir and the Nigir. The Gir, or, as it is now called in our beſt maps, Ghir, had its fountains on mount Phruræſus, or according to Dr. Shaw, the mountains of the Ammer. It took its courſe through part of the Sahara, in a S. E. direction, ſome degrees to the ſouthward of the tropic of Cancer. The ingenious traveller juſt mentioned believes the modern Wed Adge-dee to be the Gir of Ptolemy, Agathemerus, and Claudian. But the principal river of Nigritia, and one of the moſt famous in the world, is that called by Ptolemy the Nigir, by the Nigritians Wed, or Huid Nijar, i. e. The black river, and by the Europeans the Nigir. This river, according to the beſt modern geographers, has its ſource near a ridge of mountains in the kingdom of Gorhan, not far from the confines of Abyſſia, or upper Ethiopia. It croſſes the whole region of Nigritia in a weſtern direction, and, after being ſwelled by the acceſſion of ſeveral rivers in its march, at laſt diſcharges itſelf into the Atlantic ocean. The Negroes likewiſe call it the river of Senegal, and the Arabs the Nile of the Nigritians; this laſt nation conſidering it as a branch of the Nile or rather the Nile and the Niger as two branches of the ſame river. According to Pliny and Leo, it overflows the adjacent territories in the ſame manner as the Nile; which, if true, may be another reaſon for the Arabic appellation. If any credit may be given to Leo, and the African hiſtorians, Sabtecha, the ſon of Cuſh, firſt peopled the Sahara betwixt the mountains of Atlas and Nigritia, and therefore probaly Nigritia itself, or at least part of it. From the same author it appears, that the various Nigritian dialects bear an affinity to the Chaldee, Arabic, and Egyptian tongues; to which we may add, and consequently to the Ethiopic, which does not differ widely from them. As for the customs, &c. of the people we are now upon, they must be reserved for that branch of the modern history to which they most properly belong. Our readers may likewise there expect to find an accurate geographical description, and natural history, of this country from the best observations that have been made; since it would be absurd to insert them here, as the antients were so little acquainted with it. The Carthaginians, however, had undoubtedly some knowledge of the Nigritæ, since it appears probable from Frontinus (A), that one part of their armies consisted of Nigritian troops. They used scythed chariots in their wars, and

(A) From the passage of Frontinus here referred to it is evident, that the Carthaginians had Melanogætulian or Nigritian troops in their service before the time of Gelon, and consequently that they had some knowledge of the Blacks above five hundred years before the birth of Christ. This will enable us to account for a strange phænomenon in antiquity, i. e. several antique coins with a Negro's or Nigritian's head upon them. One of these coins is to be found in the earl of Pembroke's invaluable cabinet, and another in that of the reverend and learned Mr. Wise, custos archivorum, and fellow of Trinity-college, in the university of Oxford. That of my lord Pembroke, being well preserved, is a most noble curiosity. Mr. Wise received his from one of the authors of this history, who had it from Mr. Beswick, whose brother was for some time the British consul at Tripoly, near which city it was found. As the Carthaginians had a communication with Nigritia, 'tis probable, that they sent some of their artificers upon certain occasions thither; and since they coined money in a very elegant manner, as above observed, we may conclude, that upon some extraordinary event, either in Nigritia, or their own dominions, they struck those pieces. This will receive a farther accession of strength from the country wherein Mr. Wise's was dug up, which was subject to the Carthaginians; that nation being in possession of all the maritime territories extending from their capital city to the borders of Cyrenaica (1).

(1) Frontin. strat. l. i. c. 11, ex. 18. Univ. hist. Vol. xvii. p. 4, 5. &c. note. (C).

and were armed after the manner of the weſtern Ethiopians, i. e. with bows and arrows of the ſame make, as we learn from Strabo. According to the ſame author, the Pharuſii, and therefore, probably, the Nigritæ, adjacent to them, travelled in caravans through the deſerts to Cirta, and kept open a communication with the Mauruſii, carrying with them bottles filled with water, tied to their horſes bellies, leſt they ſhould die of thirſt in the vaſt deſerts they were obliged to traverſe. From this paſſage it is undeniably clear, that theſe Pharuſian and Nigritian merchants muſt have lived at a vaſt diſtance from Cirta, and thoſe places of Mauritania to which they reſorted; a point that evinces the Negroes, or Blacks, to have held an early correſpondence with the antient Mauritanians, Numidians, and Carthaginians [a].

THE Garamantes were ſituated to the S. E. of Gætulia, and E. of the Nigritæ. The limits of their country we cannot take upon us to aſcertain (B); though, from what the antients have delivered in general concerning it, we may preſume, that it extended to the borders of the (C) proper Ethiopia. That it conſiſted of many large territories, may likewiſe The Garamantes.

(B) That the Miſulani, Miſulami, or Muſulani, were ſeated near the country of the Garamantes, or at leaſt not at a very great diſtance from it, appears from Tacitus. But we can neither preciſely determine the ſituation of this Numidian tribe, tho' at the foot of Mount Andus, nor that of many others, viz. the Naſabutes, Mucuni, Tulenſii, Machuſii, Taladuſii, &c (2).

(C) Virgil joins the Garamantes with the Indians, only to denote, that they were both very remote nations, and that the Roman empire was to extend, or rather did extend, to the fartheſt parts; for they were not contiguous to each other, Ethiopia, Arabia. Perſia, &c. lying between them. So Horace, when likewiſe be inferred (D) from Herodotus, Virgil, Feſtus Avienus, and others. However, it was not of any very conſiderable breadth, according to Strabo. Dr. Shaw believes, that part of the antient Garamantes ſpread themſelves over that tract comprehending the diſtricts of Gad-demz, Fezzan, and ſome of the more diſtant cities and villages of the kingdom of Tripoli. Be that as it will, the region we are now upon abounded with wild beaſts, and its moſt antient inhabitants were ſo ſavage, that they fled at the ſight of a perſon belonging to any other nation. They were at the ſame time entirely deſtitute of arms, and had not the courage to defend themſelves, if attacked; from which circumſtances 'tis apparent, that they induſtriouſly avoided all kind of correſpondence with other nations. However, in proceſs of time they built towns, or rather daſhkras, the principal of which were Garama, the metropolis, near mount Girgiris, and the ſource of the Cinyphus, Debris, and Matelgæ. They likewiſe aſſociated with the Marmaridæ, a neighbouring people; and carried on a trade with the Carthaginians, Arabs, Perſians, and Ethiopians. This could ſcarce be avoided, if one branch of the Carthaginian commerce extended to thoſe remote countries by means of Caravans, paſſing to Carthage from thence through the ſandy deſerts of the Garamantes; which we cannot think improbable.

where he is not to be underſtood as intending preciſely the Indians, but any nation at a vaſt diſtance from Rome. Servius and others confirm what we here ſuggeſt (3).

(D) We might here give our readers a catalogue of the names of towns and clans, ſaid to have appertained to the Garamantes by Pliny and Ptolemy; but as the ſituation of none of them can be defined, and nothing but their names has been tranſmitted down to us by thoſe authors, we think an inſertion of it entirely ſuperfluous. No rivers of note, belonging to the country of the Garamantes, except the Cinyps, or Cinipus, and the Gir, are taken notice of by the antients; nor do they mention any mountains in it except thoſe called by Ptolemy Girgiris and Vallis Garamantica (4).

(3) Virg. ecl. viii. & Æn. vi. Serv. in loc. Hor. l. i. ep. i.

improbable. Though ſeveral arguments might be offered in ſupport of this opinion, we ſhall content ourſelves here with obſerving, as a ſtrong preſumption of its truth, that, according to ſeveral authors, the Garamantes, Perſians, and Ethiopians, ſupplied the Carthaginians with vaſt numbers of gems, which were almoſt invaluable. Notwithſtanding the cowardice of the moſt antient Garamantes mentioned by Herodotus, yet, in after-ages, their poſterity ſeem to have been of another diſpoſition, as may be collected from Pliny, Tacitus, and Feſtus Avienus. Some of them roved about the deſerts of Libya in the ſame manner as their ſucceſſors the modern Bedoweens do at this day; whilſt others inhabited the (E) daſhkras ſcattered up and down theſe parched and unfruitful plains. The former lived very frugally in their Mapalia, and ſupported themſelves by hunting, which ſometimes they continued to the winter ſolſtice; the wild beaſts being refreſhed by the copious rains which fell at that time, and affording them then excellent diverſion. Nay, according to Herodotus, they hunted the Troglodytes themſelves, a barbarous nation living in caves under-ground, in vehicles drawn by two pair of horſes, made for that purpoſe. Nigritia, and the country of the Garamantes, ſeem, for the moſt part, to have been peopled at firſt from Egypt and Ethiopia, and conſequently to have been the deſcendents of Miſraim and Cuſh, though we doubt not but ſome colonies of Arabs likewiſe ſettled here. It appears from ſome of the moſt perfect Egyptian mummies now remaining, that the features of the antient Egyptians much reſembled thoſe of the preſent Negroes; which is a proof, that the latter muſt have been originally nearly related to the former. The language, or languages, therefore ſpoken in theſe regions, bore a great affinity at firſt to the Egyptian, Arabic, and Ethiopic; and may at this time, probably, be impure dialects of them. We have no farther particulars of moment

(E) Herodotus informs us, that in the country of the Garamantes there was a pillar, or rather mountain of ſalt, with a fountain iſſuing from the ſummit of it, and palm-trees covering the adjacent lands; that the natives firſt laid freſh earth upon the ſalt, and then ſowed their corn there; and that they bordered upon the Lotophagi, whom we ſhall preſently have occaſion to mention (5).

ment relating to the religion of the Garamantes, than that they, in common with the Arabs, Indians, and Ethiopians (F), worſhipped Jupiter Ammon (G), repreſenting him, for the moſt part, with a ram's head, or, at leaſt, with ram's horns, and had a famous temple ſacred to him. Pliny mentions a ſurpriſing fountain near Debris, whoſe waters, from noon to midnight, grow extremely warm, but from thence to the ſun's next approach to the meridian were ſo cold as to be congealed. Matrimony did not prevail amongſt the Garamantes, the men making uſe of the women juſt as they fell in their way. At firſt they were governed by heads of tribes, or phylarchs, as the Gætulians, Arabs, &c. but afterwards monarchy ſeems to have taken place amongſt them, as we learn from Tacitus. Pliny mentions a king of the Garamantes, who was brought back from exile by two hundred dogs, that reſiſted all who oppoſed them. Though Ptolemy aſſerts them to have been a large and powerful nation,

(F) The great veneration in which the nations here mentioned had Jupiter Ammon, as well as the form under which he was exhibited to public view in this temple, appears from the following lines of Lucan:

" Ventum erat ad templum, Libycis quod gentibus unum
" Inculti Garamantes habent: ſtat corniger illic
" Jupiter, ut memorant, ſed non aut fulmina vibrans,
" Aut ſimilis noſtro, ſed tortis cornibus, Ammon.
" Non illic Libycæ poſſuerunt ditia gentes
" Templa, nec Eois ſplendent donaria gemmis,
" Quamvis Æthiopum populis, Arabumque beatis
" Gentibus, atq; Indis unus ſit Jupiter Ammon.

Herodotus ſays, that Ammon was repreſented by an image with a ram's head, becauſe Hercules ſaw his ſtatue covered with the ſkin of a ram; and Diodorus, becauſe Jupiter, in all his wars, wore a helmet reſembling the head of that animal. But this repreſentation ſeems to have been rather an alluſion to the great numbers of ſheep produced in Libya (6).

(G) 'Tis intimated by Virgil and Silius, that Iarbas, cotemporary with Dido, was a deſcendent of Ammon, and that he reigned over this country. But the authors, from whom they extracted this notion, are now loſt (7).

tion, extending themſelves from mount Uſargala to the lake or moraſs Nuba, yet we find ſcarce any of their affairs recorded in hiſtory. Maſiniſſa took refuge amongſt them, after he had been driven out of his dominions by Syphax. As the roads to their country from Mauritania were rendered impracticable by robbers, the Romans knew little of them till after the expiration of the republic. Lucius Cornelius Balba entirely ſubdued them, for which he had a triumph granted him by Auguſtus. However, by ſome means or other, they afterwards ſhook off the Roman yoke; ſince we are informed by Florus, that, ſome years after, Coſſus detached Curinius with a body of troops againſt them and the Marmaridæ; and by Tacitus, that the king of the Garamantes joined Tacfarinas, in the reign of Tiberius, againſt the Romans. After the laſt defeat and death of Tacfarinas, they ſent embaſſadors to Rome to appeaſe the reſentment of Tiberius; which we ſuppoſe was done by an abſolute ſubmiſſion to him, ſince it appears probable, that the Roman empire extended on that ſide almoſt, if not entirely, to the northern bank of the Nigir [b].

As for the Nubæ, Perorſi, Tarualtæ, Mimaci, Aſtacuſi, Aroncæ, Dermones, Matites, Gongalæ, Nabathræ, and many other obſcure nations inhabiting that part of Lybia Interior called by the antients the weſtern Ethiopia, and extending from the Nigir to the Line, we have nothing to ſay of them; the old geographers having handed down to us only their bare names. However, it will be proper to obſerve, that the vaſt tract occupied by them comprehended the upper or proper Guinea, together with the kingdoms of Gago, Guber, Bito, Temian, Ouangara, Dauma, Biafara, Mujac, Medra, and ſome diſtricts of that of Gorhan. Hence it appears, that the antient Nigritia was but a part of the modern Negroland; and that in early times the Nigritæ, or Negroes, went by the general name of Ethiopians. As we find likewiſe the promontory Soloës, Soloës, or Soloentia, situated in the country we are now upon, and several places to the south of it, taken notice of by Hanno in his periplus, we may conclude from hence, that the Carthaginians had a knowledge of the Blacks some hundred years before the destruction of their state by the Romans. That the Greeks also were not ignorant of them in the age of Scylax, may be inferred from that author; but as both he and Hanno stuffed their journals with fables, scarce any thing probable relating to them can be drawn from thence. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus have given us faint descriptions of the customs and dispositions of some few of their clans, which will hereafter be touched upon. Pliny and Ptolemy were greatly in the dark with regard to all particulars of moment concerning the western Ethiopians; and Strabo only intimates, that, as scarce any intercourse had ever been kept up between them and the Roman empire, the accounts published of them in his age, were little better than downright fictions. To insert therefore a collection of such idle tales, would be unbecoming an historian; since it could neither afford instruction, nor give any real entertainment, to the rational part of his readers [c].

The history of the Libyans and Greeks inhabiting the tract between the borders of Egypt and the river Triton, comprehending Marmarica, Cyrenaica, and the Regio Syrtica.

SECT. I.

The History of the Libyans of Marmarica.

The Libyans of Marmarica.

MARMARICA, according to Scylax, Pliny, and Agathemerus, with whom Strabo and Ptolemy agree in the main, was bounded on the east and west by Egypt and Cyrenaica; on the south by the Sahara, or deserts of Libya Interior;

Interior; and on the north by the Mediterranean. After paſſing the Glaucum Promontorium, cape Deris, the port Leucaſpis, and other inconſiderable promontories and harbours, juſt mentioned by the antient geographers, we come to Parætonium, called Ammonia by Strabo, a city of conſiderable note. Florus ſtyles this city and Peluſium the two horns of Egypt; from whence it appears, that he looked upon Marmarica as part of Egypt, and Parætonium as a fortreſs of great ſtrength. The laſt article is confirmed by Hirtius, who ſeems to intimate, that he received ſome annoyance from it, though the garriſon could not hinder him from ſupplying himſelf with water. We learn from Procopius, that it remained for a long time diſmantled, but at laſt had its fortifications repaired by the emperor Juſtinian. At ſome diſtance from Parætonium towards the frontiers of Cyrenaica, ſtood Apis, a town ſo denominated from the Egyptian Deity of that name. Pliny relates, that it was famous on account of certain ſacred myſteries celebrated in it; which, in conjunction with the name, inſinuates vaſt numbers of the Egyptians and Marmaridæ to have reſorted hither, in order to pay their devotions to Apis. Triſarchis, Zagylis, and other places on the ſea-coaſts, enumerated by Ptolemy, are ſo obſcure, that they merit no regard. The principal Libyan nations inhabiting this region were the Adyrmachidæ and Ammonii, as appears from Scylax and Herodotus. As for the Zygriæ, ſeated near the Greater Catabathmus, and the Buzes, lying more to the ſouth, they are rarely mentioned by the antients. However, it may not be improper to obſerve, that the chief towns of the former were Azicis, Tuccitora, and Tachorſa; and the capital of the latter Thanuthis. Pliny mentions the Mareotæ as a people ſeated near the Adyrmachidæ. Some authors ſeem to make the Marmaridæ a nation inhabiting a particular territory contiguous to the greater Catabathmus; but we are inclined to believe, that Marmaridæ was a name common to all the Libyans of Marmarica. If ſo, all theſe Libyans drank chiefly beer brewed at Alexandria; tho' ſometimes they uſed Libyan wine. The Adyrmachidæ, according to Silius, fought with an enſis falcatus, or ſcymetar; and, if Scylax may be credited, were ſeated not far from the Canopic mouth of the Nile. Ptolemy, on the contrary, places them, in his nome of Libya, more remote from the ſea. It was a common cuſtom with their wives to wear a chain of braſs on each leg; to take great pains in dreſſing their hair, and if they happened to find a louſe, to kill it with their teeth, in revenge of the bite they received, and then to ſpit it out again.

again. Their virgins, before marriage, were brought into the king's presence, that if any one of them pleased him above the rest, he might lie with her. We learn nothing farther concerning them, except that they wore the Libyan habit, from whence probably they derived their name, Addermuch in Arabic denoting a particular kind of garment, and agreed almost in all points with the Egyptians, which tallies with what has been already observed. The (A) Ammonii, so called from Jupiter Ammon, or Ammun, their chief deity, lay nearer Cyrenaica, and about ten days journey from Thebes in the upper Egypt. Ptolemy mentions a place named Alexander's camp, and the city of Ammon, as appertaining to this nation. Arrian, on the other hand, will not allow Ammon to have been a city; but says, that it was only the spot of ground on which the temple of Ammon stood. It seems probable from Herodotus, that the Ammonii were a pretty populous nation, had a king of their own, and made war upon their neighbours; though part of their territories could be considered only as a barren sandy desert. Pliny makes the temple of Ammon fifteen days journey from Memphis, and mentions the Ammoniac nome of Egypt. Diodorus Siculus relates, that though the aforesaid (B) temple was surrounded by a sandy desert, yet

(A) Herodotus affirms the Ammonii to have been originally a colony of Egyptians and Ethiopians; and that they spoke a language composed of words taken from both those nations (1).

(B) Diodorus Siculus tells us, that this district was fifty stadia square, and that the inhabitants there enjoyed a perpetual spring. He likewise intimates, that within the first wall of the castle stood the palace of the antient kings of Ammonia; within the second the Gynæceum, containing the apartments of the royal family; and within the third, places for the houshold troops to lodge in. He farther relates, that at a small distance from the walls, there was another temple of Ammon, shaded with fruit-trees, and having a fountain close by it, called Fons Solis, from the surprising effects of the Sun upon its water. The image of Ammon, according to him, was adorned with emeralds and other precious stones of great value, and gave responses to those who came to consult the oracle in a singular and unusual way; being carried about in a golden ship by eighty priests, who advanced to the place whither the god, by a nod, directed them, great multitudes of matrons and virgins at the same time celebrating his praises in songs composed after the manner of their country.

Diodorus

yet its proper diſtrict abounded with trees bearing great plenty of fruit, and was beautified with fountains; that it had ſeveral ſtreets or villages in the neighbourhood of the temple, a caſtle fortified with a triple wall, and near it a holy fountain, called the fountain of the Sun, ſince the qualities of the water varied wonderfully every twenty-four hours. Pedonia, Pnigeus, Climax, and other inconſiderable mediterranean towns, deſerve not the leaſt attention; nor are the ſmall iſlands on the coaſt, Pedonia, Phocuſæ, Æneſipaſta, Ædonis, or Ædonia, important enough to be deſcribed. We learn from Herodotus, that Cambyſes, having advanced to Thebes, in his way to Ethiopia, detached from thence a body of fifty thouſand men, to lay waſte the country of the Ammonii, and burn the temple of Jupiter Ammon. But after ſeveral days march over the deſerts, a ſtrong and impetuous wind beginning to blow from the ſouth, at the time of their dinner, raiſed the ſands to ſuch a degree, and brought in ſuch a torrent upon them, that the whole corps was overwhelmed thereby, and periſhed. Alexander the Great, near two hundred years after, met with better ſucceſs in his journey to the temple aforeſaid. Authors are not entirely agreed whether the Marmaridæ are to be looked upon as Libyans or Egyptians;

Diodorus alſo gives us to underſtand, that when Alexander the Great was introduced into the temple of Ammon, the ſenior vates addreſſed himſelf to him in the following terms: "God ſave "thee, MY SON, and aſſume to thyſelf this title which AMMON "confers upon thee." To whom, according to the ſame author, that prince replied: "I accept it, father; and, provided you'll "enable me to conquer the world, I ſhall ever eſteem it as the "greateſt honour to be called your ſon." Upon which the prieſt approached the altar; and when the perſons lifting up the image, according to cuſtom, upon a ſignal given, moved forwards, the prieſt anſwered, "That the god had granted his requeſt. He then enquired "whether any of his father's murderers had "eſcaped juſtice? To which the oracle cried out: "Expreſs "thy ſelf better, ſince no mortal can kill thy father; but all "the murderers of PHILIP have been brought to condign puniſhment." The pretended deity afterwards told him, "That "the uninterrupted courſe of ſucceſs he had met with, was a full "proof of his divine origin; and that he ſhould, for the fu-"ture, ever continue to be victorious." In this manner did the artful prieſts of Ammon ſooth Alexander's vanity, and draw from him many valuable preſents; after which he returned with his army to the confines of Egypt(2).

(2) Diod. Sic. l. xvii.

Egyptians; but the greateſt part rank them amongſt the former. Father Calmet, in particular, thinks, that Marmarica was firſt peopled by the deſcendents of Lehabim, the ſon of Miſraim, mentioned by Moſes. However, he believes, that the limits of the Lehabim, or Lubim, are not known, and conſequently, that they might have reached much farther than the borders of Cyrenaica; eſpecially, ſince almoſt the whole continent of Africa is ſometimes called Libya. If then the Marmaridæ were Libyans, what has been already delivered concerning the origin, religion, cuſtoms, &c. of the Numidian and Libyan Nomades, &c. will, in a great meaſure, hold true of them. Be that as it will, Herodotus aſſures us, that there was a great affinity betwixt them and the Egyptians, in moſt points of moment. Though therefore, in compliance with the general opinion, we have here detached Marmarica from Egypt, yet, as from very remote antiquity it was ſubject to the kings of Egypt, and conſequently ought to be conſidered as appertaining to that monarchy, for an account of the tranſactions of which it was the theatre, we muſt beg leave to refer our readers to the hiſtory of Egypt, as well as thoſe of the Perſians, Macedonians, and Romans, who ſucceſſively ſubdued this kingdom [a].

SECT. II.

The hiſtory of Cyrenaica.

Limits of Cyrenaica.

CYRENAICA was bounded on the eaſt by Marmarica, on the weſt by the Regio Syrtica, on the north by the Mediterranean, and on the ſouth by the Sahara. In the geography of Cyrenaica, we find none of the antients inconſiſtent with themſelves but Strabo, who, almoſt in the ſame breath, aſſerts it to have extended as far as Egypt, and maintains that Marmarica lay betwixt thoſe two regions. The maritime towns Darnis, Cherſis, Phycus, Aptungis, &c. were of no great repute, and therefore we ſhall paſs them by; as likewiſe likewiſe the promontories Phycus and Zephyrium, the ports Parætonius, Nauſtathmus, &c. with ſeveral other places of leſs note. The principal towns in this tract were Cyrene the metropolis, Arſinoe or Teuchira, Berenice, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia, from whence the beſt part of it was named Pentapolis. Adriane or Hadrianopolis, ſo denominated from the emperor Adrian, could not vye with the others in point of antiquity, though it was no deſpicable place. The caſtle Diacherſis, Tower of Hercules, port Diarrhœa, promontory Boreum, near the Greater Syrtis, deſerve little attention; nor is any thing further to be ſaid of Automala, or Automalax, than that it was a fortreſs of conſiderable ſtrength upon the frontiers of the Regio Syrtica [b].

City of Cyrene.

THE city of Cyrene, now called Cairoan, or Corene, ſtood at ſome diſtance from the ſea, upon a ſpot of ground in figure reſembling a table, according to Strabo. It was large and populous, abounding with all the elegancies, as well as neceſſaries, of life. Its territory produced vaſt numbers of excellent horſes, which probably made the Cyreneans, whether Libyans or Greeks, apply themſelves to the ſtudy and practice of every thing relating to thoſe animals more than moſt other nations. Berenice, Teuchira, Ptolemais, Apollonia, and Adriane, ſtood along the coaſt of the Mediterranean; and their inhabitants carried on a conſiderable trade. Cyrene derived its name from the fountain (C) Cyre, near which it was ſituated. Bochart deduces Cyre from the Phœnician קור kur, the radix of מקור makur, fons; which, conſidering that the Carthaginians aſſiſted the Greeks in ſettling themſelves here, and were acquainted with the country long before their arrival, is by no means improbable. We ſhall paſs by here the religion, language, cuſtoms, &c. of the proper Cyreneans; ſince whatever has been ſaid of their Greek anceſtors, on each each of these heads, is equally applicable to them [c] (D).

Nature of the soil, &c. of Cyrenaica.

THOUGH a great part of Cyrenaica and the Regio Syrtica was a perfect desert, yet there were some fruitful plains in both those countries. The inhabitants were very subject to fevers, which some have attributed to the insalubriety of the air. Except the Lathon, we find no considerable river of Cyrenaica taken notice of by the antients, and some of them have even fixed this in Mauritania. The Montes Velpi and Anagombri are the only mountains that seem to claim any relation to the country we are now upon; as the Palus Paliuri is the only fountain or lake. Some authors have placed the gardens of the Hesperides here, but others in Mauritania. The latter opinion appears to us the most probable, since it better corresponds with the word Hesperides, which imports a western situation; and therefore we have already taken notice of those gardens in the history of Mauritania. Some parts of Cyrenaica and the Regio Syrtica were famous for the production of the silphium, a plant or shrub greatly celebrated by the antients. The Libyans looked upon the stalk, juice, leaves, fruit, and every thing belonging to this plant, as most precious; and consequently esteemed it infinitely above all other vegetable productions. Strabo intimates, that the Libyan barbarians had destroyed almost all the roots of the silphium, in their excursions before his time, which is confirmed by Scribonius Largus. Pliny relates it to have been so scarce in his age, that a stalk of it was presented to Nero as a singular curiosity; and yet, that the laser, a gum proceeding from the silphium, or laserpitium, as we find it sometimes called, was not difficult to be met with in the reign of Severus, may be inferred from Galen. Aristotle, Aristophanes's scholiast, Tzetzes,

(D) It may not, however, be improper to take notice of one particular custom of the Cyreneans, which seems to have been peculiar to them. When any person of distinction amongst them was invited to an entertainment, he brought a great number of friends, chariots, &c. with him (4).

Tzetzes, Heſychius, and Suidas, inſinuate the figure of the ſilphium to have been ſtruck on the Cyrenean coins; which is confirmed by many of them, that are ſtill to be found in the cabinets of the curious. The Carthaginians carried vaſt quantities of the laſer and ſilphium from Charax, a city near the confines of Cyrenaica, into their dominions, for which they ſupplied the Cyreneans with wine. This vegetable the Cyreneans offered to their firſt king Battus, whom they deified, looking upon it as the moſt valuable produce of their country; for which reaſon we find it on the reverſes of ſeveral of that prince's coins. That Cyrenaica likewiſe abounded with a moſt rich and uncommon oil, we are informed by Theophraſtus. Athenæus relates, that the roſes, violets, and all other flowers growing in this country, except the ſaffron, were famous for the fragrant odours they emitted; and that in the time of Berenice a moſt charming ointment was made of the Cyrenean roſes. As for the ſilphium, great quantities of it were imported into Greece, and many other countries. The antients prepared it various ways, both for food and phyſic, as appears from Athenæus and Hippocrates, to omit many other authors [d].

THE principal nations of this tract, or at leaſt contiguous to it, were the Barcæi, the Pſylli, and the Naſamones; the Aſbyſtæ, Macatutæ, &c. being too obſcure to merit any regard. Barce or Barca, the capital of the Barcæi, we find mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Scylax, and Ptolemy; the two former of which make it to have occupied the ſame ſpot that Ptolemais afterwards did, but the two latter are of a different opinion. It ſeems to have ſtood to the weſt of Cyrene, and had a port near the Greater Syrtis. As Ptolemais was a maritime city, it is moſt probable, that it ſtood by the port of the Barcæi, and not where Barce did; eſpecially, ſince that capital was an hundred ſtadia from the ſea, according to Scylax. Herodotus affirms Barca to have been built by the brothers of Arceſilaus III. king of Cyrene, above a genera- Principal nations of this tract.

tion before the beginning of Cyrus's reign; but we rather think, that it was of Phœnician, if not Egyptian, or Libyan extraction; for Barcha was a Phœnician name, well known in theſe parts of Africa, as appears from Silius Italicus and others. Servius intimates the citizens of it to have come originally from Carthage, which would tempt one to believe, that Barca, Dido's brother, who attended her into Africa, with ſome of his countrymen, ſettled here. It is evident from Virgil and Silius, that the Barcæi ſpread themſelves over ſeveral conſiderable parts of Libya; and from Servius, that their metropolis made the greateſt figure of any city in the region we are now upon, except Cyrene. St. Jerom confirms the laſt authorities, when he aſſerts this town to have been ſituated in a deſert, and its inhabitants, or at leaſt their deſcendents, to have diſperſed themſelves over ſeveral diſtricts lying as far to the weſtward as Mauritania, and the eaſtward as India. The Barcæi learned, ſays Stephanus, the art of managing horſes from Neptune, and of driving chariots from Minerva; which evidently points out their high antiquity. They agreed, in moſt particulars, with the other Libyan Nomades already mentioned. The modern kingdom and deſert of Barca, extending from Egypt to the confines of the kingdom of Tripoli, correſpond with the antient Marmarica and Cyrenaica; though they undoubtedly received their name from the Barcæi. This may be looked upon as an additional proof of the rank this people formerly held amongſt the various nations of Libya [e].

The Pſylli and Naſamones, according to Pliny, Silius, and Lucan, muſt have been ſeated near the Greater Syrtis; or behind the Regio Syrtica and Cyrenaica, if we chuſe to follow Strabo. The Pſylli, as Herodotus informs us, having once had all their reſervoirs of water dried up by the ſouth wind, advanced into the Sahara, in order to make war upon that wind; but it blowing with extreme violence, they were overwhelmed with torrents of ſand, and all periſhed. After which tragical event, their neighbours the Naſamones annexed the territories they poſſeſſed to their own dominions. Herodotus repreſents the Naſamones as a powerful nation in his time, and remarkable for ſome ſingular cuſtoms then prevailing ing amongſt them. During the ſummer-ſeaſon, they left their cattle on the coaſt, and diſperſed themſelves over the plains of Ægila, in order to get the fruit of the palm-trees, with which that place abounded. Here likewiſe they found an immenſe quantity of graſhoppers, which, having dried in the ſun, they pulverized, and infuſed them in milk. The liquor compoſed of theſe two ingredients was highly eſteemed by them, as a moſt pleaſant and rich kind of drink. They had many wives, which they uſed in public, like the Maſſagetæ, after having erected a ſtaff for a mark. The bride, amongſt them, lay the firſt night with all the gueſts invited to the wedding; and received from each of them the next morning a preſent, which he had brought with him for that purpoſe. When they took an oath, they laid their hands on the ſepulchres of thoſe who were generally eſteemed to have been the moſt juſt and excellent perſons amongſt them. At their divinations, they went to the tombs of their anceſtors; where, after certain prayers, they fell aſleep, and grounded their predictions upon the dreams that then happened to them. In pledging their faith to each other, they mutually preſented a cup of liquor; and if they had none, the parties took up ſome duſt from the ground, which they put into their mouths. From ſome authors it appears, that the Naſamones were looked upon by the antients as little better than a great gang of robbers; ſince they made frequent incurſions upon the territories of their neighbours, which they plundered and ravaged in a dreadful manner. We learn from Philoſtratus, that a people of the ſame name was ſeated in Ethiopia. The Libyan nations here mentioned poſſeſſed the countries they inhabited long before the Greeks built Cyrene [f].

Tranſactions of Cyrenaica till ſubject to the Romans.

BATTUS the Theræan, according to Herodotus, with a colony of his countrymen, ſettled firſt in Platæa, an iſland on the coaſt of Libya. From thence they removed to that part of the continent oppoſite to this iſland, and ſeated themſelves in a delightful province, ſurrounded with agreeable hills, and watered by two rivers running on each ſide, called Aziriſtus. After ſix years reſidence here, the Libyans conducted them to Iraſa, a moſt charming country to the weſt of Aziriſtus. In this region, near a fountain ſacred to Apollo, they fixed their habitations, and built Cyrene, about the third year of the thirty-ſeventh olympiad, according to Euſebius. We find nothing farther remarkable related of Battus the firſt, except that he loſt the ſtammering in his ſpeech by the following accident. Being one day wandering alone in a deſert place, he was ſurpriſed by a lion, which, unexpectedly ruſhing upon him, ſtruck him with ſuch terror, that he lifted up his voice in an extraordinary manner. This, according to ſome authors, ſo frightened the lion, that he immediately fled, and at the ſame time delivered Battus from the impediment he before laboured under. His ſon Arceſilaus the firſt probably made no great figure, ſince hiſtory is entirely ſilent as to any particulars of his reign. Battus II. ſon to Arceſilaus, built the city of Zoa, and reigned forty years, and his ſon Arceſilaus II. ſixteen; which is all that we know of them. Battus III. ſon to Arceſilaus II. ſurnamed The happy, being ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of a vaſt number of Greeks, who came to live under his government, defeated Aprics, king of Egypt, in a great battle, near the fountain Theſtis in Iraſa. The victory was ſo complete that ſcarce any of the Egyptian troops returned home; ſo that Adicran, a neighbouring Libyan prince, who had drawn Aprics upon Battus, could not afterwards make head againſt the Cyreneans, nor conſequently give them any obſtruction in the poſſeſſion of thoſe territories they had before wreſted from him. Arceſilaus III. the ſon of Battus III. ſucceeded him; whoſe brothers, on account of ſome diſputes they had with him in the beginning of his reign, retired out of his dominions, and, as Herodotus will have it, built Barca. Before that city was finiſhed, they found means to excite Arceſilaus's Libyan ſubjects to a revolt. However, he marched againſt them with an army, and purſued them into the eaſtern parts of Libya. But having there aſſembled a powerful body of forces, they came to a reſolution to give him battle; which ſoon after they did, and totally routed him, cutting ſeven thouſand of his men in pieces. Arceſilaus, in a ſhort time after this diſaſter, was diſpatched by his brother Aliarchus, who, in his turn, was put to death by that prince's wife Eryxo. Battus IV. Arceſilaus's ſon, ſurnamed The lame, mounted the throne after his father's death. In his reign Demonax, a Mantinean legiſlator, arrived at Cyrene; and, at the king's deſire, introduced ſeveral alterations into the preceding form of government. Arceſilaus IV. ſon to the former prince, endeavouring to put the Cyrenean conſtitution upon its former footing, was driven by his ſubjects to Samos; his mother Pheretima at the ſame time eſcaping to Salamis in the iſland of Cyprus. Euelthon, who then reigned there, made her many magnificent preſents, but found means to evade ſending an army to reinſtate ſtate her ſon in the poſſeſſion of his dominions. Arceſilaus afterwards retired to Barca, having married the daughter of Alazar, king of the Barcæi; but was aſſaſſinated there, together with his father-in-law, as he was walking in the market-place. In the mean time Pheretima eſtabliſhed her authority at Cyrene; and, after her ſon's death, applied to Aryandes, the Perſian governor of Egypt, for aſſiſtance, to revenge Arceſilaus's death, who, ſhe pretended, was murdered for his cloſe attachment to the Medes. She had ſome grounds for ſuch an application, ſince her ſon had put himſelf under the protection of Cambyſes, and acknowledged himſelf a tributary to him. Aryandes firſt ſent a herald to Barca, to demand whether the Barcæi had been guilty of the aſſaſſination of Arceſilaus; and, upon their acknowledging it, he ſent a land-army, commanded by Amaſis, and a fleet, under the conduct of Badres, to take vengeance of the aſſaſſins. The Perſians ſoon inveſted the city of Barca, and carried on the ſiege ineffectually for the ſpace of nine months. However, (E) at laſt they

(E) Herodotus relates, that when the Perſians endeavoured to ſap the foundations of Barca, an artificer in braſs diſcovered their ſubterraneous approaches in the following manner: He carried a brazen ſhield round the city within the walls, and, applying it to the ground, heard no noiſe where the earth was ſolid; but when he came to the parts which were undermined, the ſhield rung. Upon which diſcovery, the beſieged fell to countermining, killed all the Perſians they found in the mines, and diſmounted all the enemies engines of battery. Amaſis therefore, finding he could not take the city by force, had recourſe to the following ſtratagem: He opened a large trench in the night, which he covered with ſlight planks of wood, and threw a proper quantity of earth upon them; which rendered that part like the adjacent ground. Early the next morning, after a conference with the beſieged, he concluded a treaty with them upon the ſpot that was undermined, the terms of which were to the following effect: "That the agreement ſhould continue in force as long as the "earth on which they ſtood ſhould remain in the preſent con-"dition; that the Barcæi ſhould pay a competent tribute to the "king of Perſia; and that the Perſians ſhould introduce no in-"novations into Barca." The Barcæi then opened their gates to Amaſis, upon the faith of this treaty. That general, finding himſelf maſter of the town, in order to free himſelf from the oath he had juſt taken, ordered the covering of the trench to be broken down, and afterwards treated the inhabitants in the manner here related (5).

(5) Herodot. l. iv. ſub fin.

made themselves masters of it by treachery. Amasis, after the reduction of Barca, put the city into the hands of Pheretima; who caused all the men concerned in the murder of Arcesilaus to be impaled round the walls, and affixed near them the breasts of their wives, which she ordered to be cut off for that purpose. The place, by her consent, the Persian general gave up to his soldiers to be plundered; though he spared those persons who had been averse to the assassination of Arcesilaus, and permitted Pheretima to put Barca into their hands. Badres, the Persian admiral, had a strong desire, before his return to Egypt, to plunder Cyrene; but was prevented by Amasis: The Libyans extremely harrassed the Persians in their march, cutting in pieces all the stragglers they met with, which must have been many, since they attended the enemy to the borders of Egypt. All the prisoners were sent to Darius Hystaspis, in whose reign those transactions happened, who settled them in a district of Bactria, which was from them denominated Barca. Pheretima is said afterwards to have been devoured alive by worms, which the historian looks upon as a punishment inflicted upon her by Providence for her enormous cruelty. From this time the Cyreneans, and Libyans with whom they were intermixed, till the conquest of the Persian empire, are not very remarkable in history. Aristotle gives us to understand, that in his time Cyrene was a republic; which seems to imply, that, upon the extinction of Battus's line, Demonax's form of government took place; tho' the Cyreneans might have been tributary to, or at least under the protection of, the Persians. It appears from Sallust, that the people of Cyrene were free, when the contention happened betwixt them and the Carthaginians about a regulation of limits; and that they were governed by their own laws, till the Macedonians subdued Egypt, we find asserted by Strabo. Towards the beginning of the ninety-fifth olympiad, one Ariston seized upon Cyrene, put five hundred of the principal citizens to death, and obliged all the others to abandon the city: but matters were soon after composed, and all former acts of hostility buried in oblivion. Alexander had not been long dead, when Thimbro invaded Cyrenaica, overthrew the Cyreneans, and obliged them to buy a peace with five thousand talents of silver, and half of their armed chariots. However, Mnasiclus a Cretan, one of his officers, afterwards spirited them up against him, forced him to abandon the port of Cyrene, and obtained several considerable advantages over him. Notwithſtanding which, Thimbro, bringing them to another general action, entirely defeated them, though he was ſoon after overthrown by Ophellas, and taken priſoner. This victory rendered that general maſter of Cyrenaica, and he delivered it into the hands of Ptolemy. However, it ſeems probable, from what we have obſerved in the hiſtory of the Carthaginians, that Ophellas by ſome means or other, obtained the ſovereignty of this country. Magas, the brother of Ptolemy Lagus, whoſe daughter Ptolemy Philadelphus married, reigned at Cyrene fifty years, as we learn from Agatharchides. That this prince was a man of genius, appears from Polyænus, who has tranſmitted to us an account of one of his ſtratagems. Plutarch intimates, that Nicocrates, tyrant of Cyrene, being in love with Aretaphila, the wife of one Phædimus, or, as Polyænus will have it, Melanippus the prieſt of Apollo killed her huſband in order to enjoy her; and that ſhe diſſembled her reſentment, till ſhe found an opportunity of deſtroying him; which ſhe at laſt did, and thereby delivered her country from ſervitude. But whether this laſt event happened before the time of Magas, or afterwards, we are not given to underſtand. Be that as it will, it remained under the kings of Egypt, till Ptolemy Phyſcon made it over to his baſtard ſon ſurnamed Apion, who, in the year of Rome 658, left it by will to the Romans. The ſenate, inſtead of accepting it, permitted all the cities to be governed by their own laws; which immediately filled the country with tyrants, thoſe who were moſt potent in every diſtrict endeavouring to make themſelves ſovereigns of it. This threw the kingdom of Cyrenaica into great confuſion; but Lucullus in a good meaſure reſtored the public tranquillity, on his coming thither during the firſt Mithridatic war. The deſcendents of the (E) Jews, ſettled here by the firſt Ptolemy, are ſaid to have greatly contributed to the diſturbances juſt hinted at. Be that as it will, all troubles could not be finally removed, till this country was reduced to the form of a Roman province, which happened about twenty years after the death of Apion, and ſeventy-ſix before

(E) Amongſt the deſcendents of theſe Cyrenean Jews may be ranked Jaſon, who wrote the hiſtory of the Maccabees in five books, of which the ſecond book of Maccabees, ſtill extant, is an abridgment; Simon, who carried our ſaviour's croſs; and others mentioned in the acts of the apoſtles (5).

before the birth of Christ. Strabo tells us, that in his time Crete and Cyrenaica formed one Roman province. Upon a revolt Cyrene was ruined by the Romans; but they afterwards rebuilt it. In process of time it fell to the Arabs, and at last to the Turks, who are the present possessors of it [g]. For some of the principal learned men it produced, we shall refer our readers to the following note (F).

(F) This country produced several persons who made an illustrious figure in the republic of letters, amongst the principal of whom may be ranked the following:

1. Aristippus, a disciple of Socrates, and the chief of the Cyrenaic sect. He lived about the ninety-sixth olympiad, and the year of Rome 360. He was the first that took money of his scholars for teaching them philosophy. He once sent his master Socrates twenty minas; but that philosopher refused it, saying, "God would not permit him to receive it." Xenophon was an enemy to him; on which account he wrote a treatise against pleasure, in order to expose him. Theodorus and Plato likewise were very severe upon him. He could adapt himself to all persons, places, and times, and, without difficulty, act any part: which rendered him agreeable to Dionysius. He went frequently to court, kept several mistresses, and, amongst the rest, the famous Lais, and fared deliciously, in conformity to the principles of his philosophy. When he was censured by an acquaintance for living too luxuriously, he said, "That if it were not a "good thing to feast and eat well, people would not practice it "on their holy festivals." He was extremely quick at repartees, as appears from Diogenes Laertius. He asked a certain person, who reproached him for having had a sumptuous entertainment, "Whether he would not have lived in as elegant a manner, if he "could have done it for three oboli?" To which the other replied, he would. "Then," said he, "I find you are fond of mo-"ney, and not I of pleasure." One time a fellow pursuing him with opprobious and scurrilous language, and asking him, "Why "he made such haste away?" "Because" said he "thou art ac-"customed to give foul language, and I am not accustomed to hear "it."

SECT. III.

The Hiſtory of the Regio Syrtica.

THE Regio Syrtica, ſo called becauſe the two Syrtes were the northern extremities of its eaſtern and weſtern limits, was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean; on the ſouth by the country of the Naſamones and the Sahara; Deſcription of the regio Syrtica.

" it." Dionyſius had once three harlots to wait upon Ariſtippus, out of whom he ordered that philſopher to chuſe one; but he carried them all three off, ſaying, " That Paris had greatly ſuffered by " preferring one goddeſs to another." One deſired to know of him what he would have for educating his ſon; to whom he anſwered, " Five hundred drachmas. I can buy a ſlave, an- " ſwered the other, for that ſum. Do ſo, replied Ariſtippus, and " then you will have two." He wrote three books of the hiſtory of Libya, which he dedicated to Dionyſius; and a volume conſiſting of twenty-five dialogues, compoſed partly in the Attic, and partly in the Doric, dialect. The principles of his philoſophy were theſe: The ſoul has two particular motions, or ſenſations, viz. pain and pleaſure; all pleaſures are alike; virtue is only ſo far to be eſteemed, as it conduces to ſenſuality. For all the other particulars of his life, we muſt refer our readers to Diogenes Laertius. His name ſeems to confirm what ſeveral authors have ſuggeſted of the Cyreneans, viz. that they were famous for being good horſemen.

2. Areta, daughter to Ariſtippus, who preſided over the Cyrenaic ſchool after the death of her father.

3. Ariſtippus the younger, ſon to Areta, by whoſe inſtructions he became a famous philoſopher, and from thence was ſtyled Metrodidactos.

4. Anniceris, who reformed the Cyrenaic ſect, or rather founded another that was called the Annicerian.

5. Callimachus, a celebrated poet and hiſtorian, the ſon of Battus and Meſatma, and diſciple of Hermocrates the grammarian. He married the daughter of Euphrates Syracuſanus, and lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, being then the royal librarian. Several pieces we find aſcribed to him, tho' he was no voluminous author, it being a trite obſervation with him, " That a great book was a great evil." The principal of theſe were: 1. A ſatirical poem upon his adverſary, whom he called Ibis. 2. Thoſe hymns which are ſtill extant. 3. Αἰτία, or a treatiſe upon the origin and cauſes of ſacred things, taken notice of by Martial. 4. A poem intituled de coma Berenices. Suidas mentions another Callimachus, nephew to this, as a tolerable poet; but 'tis generally agreed, that he did not make any great figure in the learned world.

hara; on the eaſt by Cyrenaica; and on the weſt by Africa Propria. The tower of Euphrantas, and the town of Charax

6. Eratoſthenes, the ſon of one Aglaus, or, according to others, Ambroſius, a celebrated philoſopher and mathematician, in great favour at the Egyptian court. He was the ſcholar of Ariſto the Chian, Lyſanias the grammarian, and the poet Callimachus. He flouriſhed in the hundred twenty-ſixth olympiad, being about that time librarian to the king of Egypt. He firſt aſſerted the ambit or circumference of the earth to be two hundred and fifty-two thouſand ſtadia; on which account we find him ſtyled the meaſurer of the earth. Beſides his philoſophical pieces, he wrote ſome poems, ſeveral hiſtorical and aſtronomical tracts, a collection of dialogues, and ſome obſervations relating to comedy. He died at eighty-one years of age.

7. Carneades, the ſon of Epicomus, or Philocomus, and founder of the third academy, which differed but little from the ſecond founded by Arceſilaus. He pretended to diſcover an uncertainty in the moſt evident notions, and was a grand ſtickler againſt the Stoics, attempting vigorouſly to confute Chryſippus one of their principal pillars. Carneades did not much apply himſelf to phyſic and natural philoſophy, but cultivated morals with particular diligence. His ſurpriſing eloquence made him feared by the Roman ſenate, during his reſidence at Rome with two other embaſſadors. Whilſt he was there, he is ſaid to have diſputed admirably well for juſtice one day, and the next againſt it. He gave himſelf up ſo entirely to ſtudy, that he neglected frequently all other things; inſomuch that he ſometimes ſat at table, and forgot to eat, till rouſed from his thoughtfulneſs by his maid Maliſſa. According to Diogenes Laertius, he died in the eighty-fifth year of his age, about the fourth year of the clxiid olympiad, though Cicero ſtretched his life to ninety; which makes it difficult to determine preciſely the time of his death. The former author ſays, that when Carneades underſtood, that Antipater had poiſoned himſelf, he did the like; he likewiſe makes an eclipſe of the moon to have then happened. He is ſaid to have written many letters to Ariarathes king of Armenia. For a fuller account of him we muſt beg leave to refer our readers to Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, Aulus Gellius, Valerius Maximus, and others.

rax above-mentioned, were the principal maritime places in the neighbourhood of Cyrenaica, as Auxiqua, Leptis Magna, Garapha, Abrotonum, Sabrata, and Tacape, were on the ſea-coaſt betwixt the rivers Cinyps and Triton. As for Geriſa, Iſcina, Amuncla, Sicapha, Muſta, Butta, and ſeveral other obſcure mediterranean towns mentioned by Ptolemy and the Itinerary, we ſcarce ever find them taken notice of by any antient hiſtorian. The Cinyps of Scylax, however, ſeems to have been a city of ſome repute. Pliny and Herodotus intimate, that there was in this region a fruitful diſtrict called Cinyphe, which, as well as the city above-mentioned, might have been ſo denominated from the river of the ſame name. To paſs by the Samamycii, Damenſii, Nigbeni, Nycpii, Nigintimi, Muchthuſii, and many other inconſiderable tribes recited by Pliny and Ptolemy, the only nations of this country deſerving any regard were the Cinethii, Gindanes, Macæ, and Lotophagi. The Cinethii, or Cinithii, mentioned by Ptolemy, ſituated behind the Machyni, about the Leſſer Syrtis, were a reſpectable nation, as we learn from Tacitus. The Gindanes, according to Herodotus, were ſeated not far from the Cinyps; their wives wore as many borders on their gowns as they had lovers, and ſhe who had the greateſt number was the moſt eſteemed. The Macæ bordered upon the Garamantes, and were a pretty potent nation. They ſhaved their heads all over, except the middle of the crown, where they permitted a lock of hair to grow. When they made war upon any of their neighbours, they wore the ſkins of oſtriches inſtead of armour. In the winter they drove their flocks to the ſea-ſide and in ſummer to the inland places near ſome fountain or river, for the ſake of water, according to Scylax. They are called likewiſe by the antients Macæ Cinyphii, and Macæ Syritæ, from their vicinity to the Cinyps and the Greater Syrtis. But the Lotophagi were the moſt famous people of the tract we are now upon. If we may believe Scylax, they extended themſelves almoſt from the Greater to the Leſſer Syrtis. That author calls them Libyes Lotophagi, and tells us, that the lotus ſerved them both for meat and drink; from which which circumstance they derived their name. Pliny says, that some authors called them Alachroæ, and that many of them were found about the Philænorum Aræ. Strabo likewise affirms the country of the Lotophagi to have extended from the Lesser Syrtis, which he calls Lotophagitis Syrtis, to the confines of Cyrenaica; and that this people were not sensible of the want of water in the burning sandy region they inhabited, since the root, stalks, &c. of the lotus supplied them with rich liquor as well as delicious food. Homer relates, that in his time the island Meninx, on the coast of Byzacium, abounded with the lotus, and was the chief seat of the Lotophagi; as also, that Ulysses touched here in his return to Ithaca. A good part of the Regio Syrtica was a perfect desert; but the other part productive of corn, oil, fruit, and particularly both the tree and plant of the lotus. Herodotus tells us, that the fruit of the tree was of the same size with that of the lentiscus, but exceedingly sweet like the date; as also that the Lotophagi made wine of it. Pliny says, that the lotus was transplanted to Italy, but that its qualities were pretty much altered by that transplantation. He likewise asserts its fruit to have been of the size of a bean, and of the colour of saffron, when ripe; tho' he allows this to have been different, according to the different degrees of maturity at which it arrived. In Africa it resembled that of a myrtle. The best species of this tree produced a fruit without any kernel; but that of the other had a kernel in it as hard as a stone. The wine expressed from it tasted like mead, being extremely sweet; which quality it derived from the fruit itself, but would not keep above ten days. The berries, bruised and mixed with wheat, the Libyans laid up in large vessels, which served them for food. Theophrastus and Dioscorides make the plant lotus to have resembled a lily, and represent it both as physic and food. Some of the moderns think one species of it to have been the same as the colocasia, or faba Ægyptia, and the other as the nymphæa Nilotica. But though it might agree with these plants in many particulars, yet that it differed considerably from them, is evident from the figure of it, which we find on the reverses of many antient Egyptian coins. Several of these coins, struck in the times of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius, exhibit the leaves, stalk, and fruit of the plant lotus, and consequently give us a tolerable idea of it; however, the moderns can come to no certain conclusions concerning either the plant or the tree. The principal river of this this tract was the Cinyps, which derived its ſtream from a fountain, or a hill, called Zuchabari, in the country of the Macæ, and emptied itſelf into the Sinus Syrticus. The word Zuchabari in Punic, Phænician, or Libyan, ſignified the hill of the Graces as we find it called by Herodotus. The river Cinyps, according to Bochart, derived its name from the great number of porcupines produced in the country adjacent to it. The chief mountains of the Regio Syrtica were Gigius and Thizibi, of which yet we find nothing related but the bare names. The promontories Hippus and Cephalæ ſcarce deſerve to be mentioned. Of the iſlands appertaining to this country the moſt noted were Meninx and Cercina; Ptolemy's Gaia, Pontia, and Miſynus, being quite obſcure. The iſland Myrmex more properly belonged to Cyrenaica, as it was not far diſtant from the port of the Barcæi. Pliny makes Meninx (F), near the Leſſer Syrtis, to be twenty-five miles long, and twenty-two broad; and further obſerves, that it had two towns, viz. Meninx facing the coaſt of Africa, and Thoar oppoſite to the Leſſer Syrtis. We find it named Lotophagitis, not only by the authors above-mentioned, but likewiſe by Polybius and Eratoſthenes. As for Cercina, it lay N. E. of Meninx, was twenty-five miles in length, about twelve in breadth, had a tolerable good town of the ſame name, and two moſt commodious harbours. Thus ſtands the geography of the Regio Syrtica, with which tract the northern part of the kingdom of Tripoli ſeems at preſent to correſpond [h].

Its inhabitants subject to the Egyptians, Carthaginians, Cyrenæans, Numidians, and Romans.

As the inhabitants of this region agreed in all points of moment with the other Libyan Nomades, whose history has already been given, we can say nothing of their antiquity, government, laws, religions, language, &c. (G) without being guilty of a repetition. The transactions they were concerned in, before they became subject to Carthage, could not, we apprehend, have been very considerable. However, we believe them to have been subdued by the founder of the Egyptian empire, whom Josephus and Sir Isaac Newton take to be the same prince with Sesac. How long they remained subject to the Egyptians, history informs us not; but 'tis probable a corps of them formed part of Zerah's numerous army, for the reasons already offered. Part of the Regio Syrtica seems to have been under the dominion of the Cyreneans till the regulation of limits agreed upon between that people and the Carthaginians mentioned by Sallust; but when this happened, cannot be precisely determined. After that regulation it continued in the hands of the Carthaginians till it was wrested out of them by Masiniſſa; for that it was wrested out of them by that prince, appears clearly from Appian. In after-ages it met with the same fate as the rest of his dominions, an ample account of which has been already exhibited to our readers in the history of the Numidians [i].

Some particulars relating to Libya hitherto omitted.

Thus have we gone through the history of all the principal Libyan nations, which, we may venture to assure our readers, has not been done by any other author. Some few particulars, however relating to them, hitherto omitted, we must not pass over in silence. Herodotus observes, that the Libyans in general went by the name of Atlantes or Atlantides, though at the same time he remarks that appellation to have been applied to one particular nation; who, he

(G) From Egypt to the lake Tritonis the Libyans were breders of cattle; ate flesh, and drank milk; but abstained from beef and pork, as well as the Egyptians. The women of Cyrene accounted it a crime to strike a cow. For the customs, manners, and religion of the Libyans inhabiting the country to the west of the Triton, we must refer our readers to Herodotus (7).

he tells us, curſed the Sun every day, as he advanced towards the meridian, purſuing him with the bittereſt invectives, becauſe he conſumed both them, and their country, with his burning rays. From that author and Diodorus it likewiſe appears, that the Atlantides were ſeated upon, and in the neighbourhood of, mount Atlas, which from its height, the Libyans ſtyled the pillar of heaven, i. e. the high or lofty pillar; which evinces the Libyan language or languages to have been related to the oriental tongues. Herodotus alſo intimates, that no one of this nation did either eat fleſh, or was ever diſturbed in his ſleep by dreams; the laſt of which properties was probably the conſequence of the firſt. In the territories of the Atlantides, as well as the neighbouring countries, the inhabitants reaped conſiderable advantages from ſeveral mines of ſalt, which was of two colours, viz. white and purple. Herodotus farther ſays, that many of the Libyans built houſes of this ſalt, which, as no rain ever fell in thoſe parts, were very durable. To what has been already offered with regard to the Nigritæ, we muſt beg leave to add, that they were known to the Egyptians, Ammonii, and Cyreneans, before the time of Herodotus. For that author, when in Egypt, learned from ſome Cyreneans, who had the relation from Etearchus king of the Ammonii, that five bold Naſamonian youths, ſent to make new diſcoveries thro' the deſerts of Libya, at laſt came to a city inhabited by men of a low ſtature, by which ran a great river abounding with crocodiles, that Etearchus judged to be the Nile. This relation tallies extremely well with Marmol, who aſſures us, that the people ſeated on the northern bank of the Nigir are perfect dwarfs (H); and alſo ſeems to add ſome weight to the authority of the Arabian geographers, who make the Nile and the Nigir different branches of the ſame river, and aſſert the ſource of this river to be in Ethiopia. From hence we may deduce the probability of the Negroes being deſcended from the Ethiopians,

(H) From the ſituation of the Naſamones, it is evident, that theſe youths muſt have approached the northern bank of the river, which the dwarfs here mentioned are ſaid to have inhabited. Now Marmol aſſures us, that on the ſouthern bank of the Senegal the inhabitants are large and luſty, but on the oppoſite ſide ſmall and puny; which laſt article, agreeing ſo well with Herodotus, almoſt demonſtrates the river here hinted at to have been the Nigir (8).

(8) Marm.

Ethiopians, and likewiſe the region of Nigritia's being peopled very early, as Leo ſuggeſts. For the Ethiopians on the banks, or near the ſource, of the great river above-mentioned, obſerving how the adjacent grounds were fertilized by its inundations, as they encreaſed, might follow it weſtward, every one ſtriving to be the firſt poſſeſſor of a great quantity of ſuch excellent ſoil, and therefore advance forward till the Atlantic ocean put a ſtop to any farther progreſs. If this be admitted, it will follow, that the Blacks are not ſo different from all the reſt of mankind as ſome are willing to ſuppoſe; that their deſcent from Adam is eaſy and natural, in oppoſition to what our modern infidels pretend; and that their colour is only an accidental conſideration. But theſe points will be fully diſcuſſed in that branch of the modern hiſtory which they will naturally fall under. The word Libya may be deduced either from the proper names Lehabim, Lubim, &c. above-mentioned, or from the Hebrew laab, with which the Arabic lub correſponds, ſignifying dry, parched, &c. or rather a dry parched country, &c. Such an appellation agrees extremely well with what the antients have related of Libya, and particularly the tract betwixt Tripolis and Pentapolis, which went by the names of Xerolibya and Libya Propria. Dr. Hyde, however, thinks that this word may be more naturally deduced from labi, a lion, or rather a yellow, flame-coloured lion, with which ſpecies of animals Libya was known to abound; or elſe from lahab, a flame, ſince the burning ſands of Libya, by the continual reflexion of a vaſt quantity of the ſolar rays, appeared, at ſome diſtance, to travellers like a flame. As theſe ſands were frequently ſo heated as to be almoſt in a ſtate of inflammation, we muſt own ſome regard due to ſuch an etymon. As for the word Africa, or, as the Arabs pronounce it, Afrikia, which ſeems to have been unknown to Herodotus, Ariſtotle, Strabo, and the other moſt antient Greek authors, Dr. Hyde takes it to be the ſame with the Phœnician or Punic הברקא Habarca, Havarca, Havreca, &c. or אברקא Avreca, i. e. "The BARCA, or the "country of BARCA." This, our readers will allow extremely probable, eſpecially ſince Barca was a moſt remarkable part of Africa, as above obſerved; and the Romans, who firſt brought the name of Africa into Europe, might not pronounce it exactly in the ſame manner as the Carthaginians and Phœnicians, from whom they received it. The principal difficulty in this etymon will vaniſh, when we conſider, that the orientals for the moſt part pronounced the ſecond letter letter of their alphabet like a V, and that nothing was more uſual with them than to add a letter to, or take one from, the beginning of a word, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner neceſſary. We muſt not omit obſerving here, that the firſt diviſion of the world was into two parts only, viz. Aſia and Europe, or the eaſtern and weſtern part, Europe comprehending both the continent now going under that name, and Africa; which diviſion ſtill prevails amongſt many of the orientals. This may not only be inferred from a variety of authors, but likewiſe from the words Europe and Aſia themſelves, the former importing occidental or weſtern, and the latter half. When that vaſt region now called Africa was firſt conſidered as a diſtinct part of the world, we cannot take upon us to determine; nor whether Europe and Africa were ever joined together by an iſthmus uniting Spain and Mauritania, as ſome authors ſuggeſt; nor laſtly, if this ſhould be admitted, when, or by what means, ſuch an iſthmus came to be deſtroyed, the Nubian geographer declaring this to have been effected by labour and art, and Averroes by an earthquake. The iſland Cerne, taken notice of by Hanno and Scylax, ſeems to have been ſomewhere on the coaſt of Libya Interior; but in what part of the ocean it lay, cannot be diſcovered from the antients, who differ widely amongſt themſelves with regard to its ſituation; which probably induced Strabo to deny the very being of it. We muſt own ourſelves likewiſe as much in the dark in relation to Plato's iſland Atlantis, which he makes of a larger extent than Aſia and Africa together. Some of the moderns are diſpoſed to think, from ſeveral circumſtances, that it was that vaſt continent called now America; others, that it lay nearer the pillars of Hercules; and laſtly, others, that every thing related of it is to be conſidered as a downright fiction. Much may be ſaid in defence of each opinion; however, the firſt appears to us the moſt probable. For Ammianus Marcellinus affirms Plato on this occaſion not to have written fable, but a true hiſtory; and Proclus cites Marcellus an Ethiopic hiſtorian in defence of what that philoſopher has advanced concerning this iſland. Crantor alſo, Plato's firſt interpreter, takes this relation to be a true hiſtory. That the iſland here under conſideration was not ſo near the Streights as ſome modern authors ſuppoſe, ſeems probable from Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the Phœnicians in early times ſailed beyond Hercules's Pillars, along the African coaſt, and, there meeting with ſtorms and tempeſts, were carried to the remoteſt parts of the ocean, and, after many days, came to a vaſt iſland at a great diſtance from Libya, and lying very far weſt. This place continues the ſame author, had a fruitful ſoil, navigable rivers, &c. and, from the Phœnicians, the Carthaginians came to the knowlege of it. And in the ſame place he ſays, that the Carthaginians would not permit any other nation to ſettle in this new region, but reſerved it for themſelves, that, if ever they ſhould be driven from their native ſoil, they might have a place to retire to. Ælian brings Silenus expreſly aſſerting to Midas, that there was a vaſt continent beyond Europe, Aſia, and Africa, which ought to be conſidered as iſlands ſurrounded by the ocean. Theſe, and other paſſages, that might be extracted from the antients, induced the learned Perizonius to conclude, that the inhabitants of the old world had ſome faint knowledge of America, derived to them either from the Egyptian and Carthaginian traditions, or from the figure of the earth, which was not unknown to them[k].

CHAP. VI.

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Ethiopia.

The proper Ethiopia where ſituated.

SEVERAL of the antients gave the name of Ethiopians to all perſons either perfectly black, or of a very ſwarthy complexion. The Arabs therefore, and other Aſiatics, atics, as well as a great number of Africans, came under this denomination. The Africans we find divided into the weſtern or Heſperian Ethiopians, and the Ethiopians above Egypt, ſituated to the E. of the former. The Heſperian Ethiopians inhabited that vaſt tract called Libya Interior, the hiſtory of whoſe principal nations we have already gone through. The eaſtern African Ethiopians, for ſo thoſe above Egypt may be properly ſtyled, were much better known to the antients than the others, by reaſon of their commerce with the Egyptians, and looked upon by them as the proper Ethiopians. Theſe are the people, whoſe tranſactions, from the earlieſt accounts of time, we are now to relate; which we hope to do in ſuch a manner as will prove ſatisfactory to all, at leaſt the moſt candid part of, our readers [a].

Limits and extent of Ethiopia.

ETHIOPIA then, or rather Ethiopia Propia, was limited on the north by Egypt, on which ſide it extended to the Leſſer Cataract, and the iſland Elephantine; on the weſt by Libya Interior; on the eaſt by the Red Sea; and on the ſouth by a part of Africa unknown to the antients, but probably that including the modern kingdoms of Gingiro, Alaba, Machida, and part of Adel or Zeila. However, as the proper Ethiopia might be of a different extent at different times, particularly on the ſides of Libya Interior and Libya incognita, we cannot pretend to fix, with any preciſion, its frontiers. Nevertheleſs it ſeems, for many ages at leaſt, to have been the ſame tract which at this day comprehends the kingdoms of Dongola, Sennar, and Abaſſia, with part of Adel or Zeila; and conſequently to have taken up ſeventeen degrees of longitude, and to have reached from the tropic of Cancer to within ſix degrees of the Line. Ludolphus intimates, that the modern geographers, depending upon the authority of Paulus Jovius, have extended the ſouthern limits of Abaſſia much farther; but at the ſame time that author rightly obſerves them to be guilty of a miſtake. It is of no great conſequence to our readers how this point ſtands, and therefore we ſhall not dwell any longer upon it [b].

Different names of Ethiopia.

THE proper Ethiopia had various names given it by the antients. Sometimes they called it India, and its inhabitants Indians;

Indians; which appellation they applied to many of the remoteſt nations, as we have obſerved in the hiſtory of the Garamantes (A). This country was likewiſe denominated Atlantia and Æetheria, according to Pliny and Strabo, or, as

(A) Bochart thinks, that the Garamantes were a colony of the Amantes or Hammanientes of Pliny and Solinus, ſeated to the W. of the greater Syrtis. This notion he grounds not only upon the neighbouring ſituation of thoſe nations, but likewiſe upon the affinity of their names. For as גר gar ſignifies in Hebrew to inhabit, Gar-Amante might originally have denoted The habitation or dwelling of the Amantes; or rather גר ger, from the aforeſaid verb, may be naturally ſuppoſed to have ſignified colonus, advena, &c. and then Gar-Amante will be equivalent to One belonging to a colony of the Amantes. The laſt nation that ingenious author likewiſe believes to have been the ſame with the Ammonii or Amonii, whoſe name, by an eaſy tranſpoſition of letters, entirely agrees with that of Moſes's Anamim or Anamæi. Several things, according to him, concur to render this conjecture probable: 1. The Anamim in all likelihood deduced their name from the word ענם Anam, which might have denoted a ſheep in the Egyptian language, as a word compoſed of the ſame letters did in Arabic. 2. According to ſome authors, the idol of Jupiter, in the territory of the Ammonii, was called Ammon from the ram that pointed out the ſpot of ground his temple was erected upon; and it is well known, that the Ammonii, in the opinion of the antients, were ſo denominated from Ammon or Ammûn, a name the Egyptians gave Jupiter. 3. That part of Libya, where Moſes ſeems to place the Anamim, abounded with ſheep, which ſupplied the natives not only with food but cloaths, and agreed very well in ſituation with the country of the Ammonii. 4. The idol of Jupiter Ammon had either ram's horns, or a ram's head upon it; which ſeemed to point at the origin of the word Anamim. If we admit what Bochart has advanced on this occaſion, the etymon of the name Naſamones, or Naſamon, applied to a neighbouring people, may eaſily be diſcovered. For Naſamon, on this ſuppoſition, muſt be apparently the ſame as נשׁי אמון Naſe-Amon, i. e. Homines Ammon or Ammonii; and conſequently the Naſamones as well as the Garamantes, were a branch of the Anamim. That the Garamantes in their own tongue, were ſtyled Gar-Amane, Ger-Amane, or, by contraction, Gar-Ame, Ger-Ame, &c. appears from the name of their metropolis Garama, or, as the Nubian geographer intimates it to have been denominated in his time, Germa. This obſervation will go a good way towards confirming thoſe ingenious conjectures which we have here inſerted from

as Heſychius will have it, Aeria. It alſo went, in very early ages, under the name of Cephenia. But we apprehend it to have been moſt uſually called Abaſene, a word approaching very near, both in ſound and ſignification, to the modern Hobaſh, Habeſh, or Abaſſia; the true etymology of which will be exhibited to our readers, when we come to the hiſtory of Arabia [c].

On the other hand, we find Chaldæa, Aſſyria, Perſia, &c. ſtyled Ethiopia by ſome very good authors; nay, it muſt be allowed, that the antients called all thoſe countries, extending themſelves beyond each ſide of the Red Sea, indifferently India or Ethiopia. The eaſtern people at this day ſometimes name that kingdom India, which the Europeans call Abaſſia, particularly the Perſians, who for the moſt part give the appellation of Siah Hindou or Hindi, to an Abaſſine or modern Ethiopian. It appears from ſeveral authors, that the Red Sea itſelf went formerly under the name of the Indian Sea; and Ludolphus obſerves, that the antients denominated all thoſe nations under the Torrid Zone, whoſe names they were ſignorant of, Indians [d].

According to the Jews, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and other verſions (B), Cuſh, when taken for a country in ſcripture, Called in ſcripture Cuſh.

ſcripture, is always to be underſtood of the proper Ethiopia. This notion is ſupported by Philo, Joſephus, Eupolemus in Euſebius, Euſtathius, the author of the Alexandrian chronicon, and the concurrent teſtimony of the Greek and Latin fathers. Notwithſtanding which, Bochart, depending upon the authority of Jonathan's Targum, and ſeveral plauſible arguments, affirms the land of Cuſh to have been ſituated in Arabia;

rians derive the word Habaſchah, which ſignifies Ethiopia, from Habouſcha, which denotes a people raiſed from a mixture of different nations, originally of different countries. According to D' Herbelot and others, the Abyſſinians, Nubians, and Fungi, are all comprehended under the word Habaſch. The inſpired writers are ſilent as to Cuſh the ſon of Canaan, and his ſon Habaſchi. We find mention made there only of Cuſh the ſon of Ham, and his ſons Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha, and Nimrod. It is ſaid, that Arabia Felix went formerly under the name of Ethiopia, becauſe the Abyſſinians, who conquered it, poſſeſſed it for a long time. Dhou-Iren king of Yaman drove them from thence with the aſſiſtance of the Perſians. Some authors believe, that by Cuſh upon the river Gihon is meant only the antient country of the Scythians upon the Araxes. Herodotus intimates, that the firſt habitation this people had was upon the Araxes; and that, being forced from thence by the Maſſagetæ, they paſſed this river, and retired into the country of the Cimmerians. Juſtin makes the Phaſis and Araxes to be, as it were, the limits of the Scythians on the ſouth ſide. Diodorus Siculus ſays, that the Scythians who were near Media abode at firſt upon the Araxes, and that the Sacæ and Maſſagetæ are different branches of the Scythians. The words Cuthæi and Cutha, whence ſome have deduced Scythæ or Scuthæ, are the ſame as Cuſh. The Chaldees generally put the Tau where the Hebrews uſe Schin, and therefore ſay Cut or Cuth inſtead of Cuſh. The Cuthæans, who came to and inhabited the country of Samaria, did originally belong to that part of Media which bordered upon the Caſpian ſea, and therefore muſt have appertained to the Cuſh we are ſpeaking of. There are very ſenſible footſteps of this name to be met with in various parts round about this country, as the diſtrict of Cotacene; the cities of Citamum, Cotomana, Cyta, Cotaca, Cotamba, Cotæa; the Cotyi, Coſſæi; river of Ciſſa, &c. (2).

Arabia; and conſequently maintains, that Cuſh never in ſcripture denotes the proper Ethiopia. But neither of theſe opinions ought to be looked upon as ſtrictly true: for Cuſh is ſometimes in ſcripture undoubtedly to be taken for the proper Ethiopia, as may be evinced not only by the great authorities above-mentioned, but ſeveral circumſtances likewiſe which evidently point at that country; and, on the other hand, it muſt be allowed, that ſome of the ſacred writers give the name of Cuſh to the whole peninſula of Arabia, or a part of it bordering upon the Red Sea, or both. When the prophet Jeremiah aſks his countrymen, Whether the Cuſhite can change his ſkin? he muſt be conſidered as having in his eye a proper Ethiopian. For the nation there pointed at was black, differing greatly in colour from the Jews; the prophet's queſtion being proverbial, of the ſame import with that common adage of prophane writers, "to waſh the E-"thiopian or Blackmoor white." Now this cannot be underſtood of the Arabs, who were of much the ſame complexion with the Jews, as Bochart himſelf not only allows, but proves; but the Abaſſines or proper Ethiopians, might eaſily and naturally have given occaſion to ſuch a proverb. In the book of Iſaiah we find Egypt, Pathros, and Cuſh, joined together, and conſequently Cuſh taken for Ethiopia. For it appears from various authors, and even Bochart himſelf, that the land of Pathros was either the upper Egypt, or a part of that country near the confines of Ethiopia; and therefore Cuſh, in this paſſage, muſt naturally refer to Ethiopia, ſince the region here denoted by that word was S. of the upper Egypt, and contiguous to it. In defence of our ſecond aſſertion, ſeveral paſſages of ſcripture may likewiſe be produced. When the LORD threatened Egypt with utter deſolation, he declared, That HE would lay it waſte from the tower of Syene to the border of Cuſh (C). Now that the "border of CUSH and the tower of SYENE" are intended here

(C) Our readers will obſerve, that, out of complaiſance to a great number of learned men, we have here given this text the moſt received interpretation; though we muſt own ourſelves by no means inclinable to come into it. The words in the original are, ממגדל סונה ועד גבול כוש i. e. From MIGDOL to SYENE and the border of CUSH; or From MIGDOL and SYENE, and to the border of CUSH. If we admit the firſt of theſe tranſlations, we muſt ſuppoſe an ellipſis of the prepoſition עד betwixt ממגדל and סונה, than which nothing here to repreſent two oppoſite limits of Egypt, cannot be denied; and that Syene was the Egyptian frontier on the ſide of Ethiopia, appears from Pliny and Strabo: therefore Cuſh evidently denotes Arabia, or at leaſt that part of it adjacent to Egypt, which was diametrically oppoſite to the tower of Syene, and not Ethiopia, whoſe border extended to that tower. Moſes's wife Zippora was a native of Cuſh, and at the ſame time a Midianite; the prophet Habakkuk makes the territories nothing is more frequent in the Hebrew Scripture; as may be inferred from Deut. c. xxxiii. ver. 17. Mich. c. vii. ver. 12. and many other paſſages enumerated by Noldius. If we prefer the latter, we muſt admit a ſuppreſſion of the copulative ו before סְוֵנֵה, which is likewiſe extremely common in the original of the Old Teſtament, as appears from Gen. c. xxvii. ver. 33. Cant. c. viii. ver. 6. Jud. c. ix. ver. 2. and an infinite number of other inſtances produced by the ſame Noldius. Now Migdol is the proper name of a town about twelve miles from Peluſium on the Nile near the coaſt of the Mediterranean, and diametrically oppoſite to Syene; and of courſe, in conjunction with Syene, denotes the whole breadth of the land of Egypt, agreeably to the prophet's intention. This city we find mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah, c. xliv. ver. 1. and c. xlvi. ver. 14. who joins it with Tahpanhes, or as the Greeks called it, Daphne, and Daphnæ Peluſiæ, another city in the neighbourhood of Peluſium. This circumſtance, in conjunction with the Septuagint, which has there ἐν Μαγδώλῳ, at Migdol, and εἰς Μαγδώλον in Migdol, renders extremely probable the verſion of this paſſage, which we would propoſe to the conſideration of our learned readers. In the mean time we cannot but own ourſelves greatly ſurpriſed at Cellarius, who has with ſo much boldneſs inſinuated, or rather affirmed, that the Greek interpreters have, in agreement with the Vulgate, tranſlated the text at preſent under conſideration ἀπὸ πύργου Συήνης καὶ ἕως ὁρίων Αἰθιόπων. Whereas both the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. of the Septuagint have it ἀπὸ Μαγδώλου καὶ Συήνης καὶ ἕως ὁρίων Αἰθιόπων. Which, together with the Arabic verſion expreſſing it From MIGDOL and ASUAN to the borders of ETHIOPIA, ſeems to render indiſputable what is here advanced; and conſequently, to evince, that this famous paſſage is ſo far from proving Cuſh to point out Arabia, that, on the contrary, it evidently demonſtrates that word ſometimes to denote the proper Ethiopia (3).

tories of Cuſhan or Cuſh, and Midian or Madian, to have been the ſame; Joſephus, Ptolemy, and St. Jerom, mention a city of Arabia on the coaſt of the Red Sea, called Madian; from all which we may infer, that part of Arabia at leaſt goes ſometimes in ſcripture under the name of Cuſh. Job intimates, that Cuſh was famous for the excellent topazes it produced: now none of the antients have taken notice of the Ethiopian topaz; whereas Pliny relates, that the beſt topazes came from the Arabic iſland Chitis or Chutis, whoſe name ſeems to have been the ſame with Cuſh or Cuth; and Agatharchides Cnidius, Diodorus, and Strabo, have likewiſe mentioned this iſland; therefore ſome of the ſacred writers denominated at leaſt part of Arabia Cuſh. In that day, ſays the LORD, ſhall meſſengers go from me in ſhips, to make the careleſs Cuſhites afraid, &c. which menace may be ſuppoſed more properly to point at the Arabs, whom the Egyptians and others viſited in ſhips on the Red Sea, than the Ethiopians, with whom they had a communication by land. But, to omit other paſſages that occur, both the Arabs and Ethiopians might have very properly been ſtyled Cuſhites, ſince the deſcendents of Cuſh formed a great part of both nations. Nay, that the Arabs themſelves had the appellation of Ethiopians, and Aſiatic Ethiopians, clearly follows from what has been advanced by Xenophon and Herodotus. However we cannot help thinking, that the antient Hebrews rightly looked upon the Ethiopians as the proper Cuſhites. For Zerah's moſt formidable army conſiſted chiefly of Cuſhites, neighbours to the Libyans, i. e. the Ethiopians, of which people only he is called king by the ſacred hiſtorian; though from Sir Iſaac Newton, and what we have already obſerved, it may be proved, that he was in poſſeſſion of all the dominions of Seſac, i. e. Egypt, Libya, Troglodytica, Arabia, &c. The extremely numerous hoſt he commanded adds great weight to this notion. Pliny intimates, that theEthiopians, whom he diſtinguiſhes from the Arabians, were maſters of Egypt not long before the deſtruction of Troy; which, conſidering that this period falls in with the time of Zerah, brings no ſmall acceſſion of ſtrength to what is here advanced [e],

We

We cannot therefore allow, that Ludim is the only name given in ſcripture to the Ethiopians, as M. Bochart undertakes to prove. Moſt of the arguments he offers to evince this point are extremely frivolous, as our readers will find upon an examination of them, and the others not of any conſiderable force. But, ſuppoſing them to prove, that the word Ludim, in all places of ſcripture he cites on this occaſion, is to be underſtood of the Ethiopians, which is the utmoſt that he could ever have pretended to; yet it will not follow from hence, that Ethiopia is never called Cuſh by any of the ſacred writers. Such an aſſertion cannot be maintained, though it ſhould be granted, as we are willing to do, that part of the Ludim took up their habitations in Ethiopia. And yet ſeveral learned men have come into Bochart's opinion [f].

Different nations of Ethiopia.

The antients believed the blackneſs of the Abaſſines or Abyſſinians to be occaſioned by the intenſe heat of the climate, and therefore called them Ethiopians. We find them likewiſe called Æthereii and Aerii by Heſychius, Pliny, and Strabo. Pliny relates, that the Blemmyes, an Ethiopian nation ſeated near the borders of Egypt, had no heads, their mouths and eyes being fixed on their breaſts. This ought undoubtedly to be looked upon as fabulous, and might probably proceed from their having very ſhort necks; however, that ſome Blemmyan captives exhibited an extremely odd appearance at Rome, we learn from Vopiſcus. The Nobatæ inhabited one of the banks of the Nile, near the iſland Elephantine, having been removed thither from Oaſis, in order to have a watchful eye upon, and repreſs the courſes, of the Blemmyes. Some authors refer the Troglodytes to Egypt, and others to Ethiopia; be that as it will, they were a very ſavage nation, living in caves, according to Strabo, feeding upon ſerpents, lizards, &c. and having a language conſiſting of no articulate ſounds, but reſembling the ſhrieking of bats, according to Herodotus. The Nubians we find juſt mentioned by the antients as a people of of Ethiopia, but nothing particular related of them. Some authors aſſert the Pygmies to have been a canton of the Troglodytes, and others one of the Nubians; but 'tis generally agreed, that they had their ſituation not far from the Ethiopic ſhore of the Red Sea. Nonnoſus in Photius tells us, that they were extremely ſhort, black, and hairy all over. Moſt of theſe nations are repreſented by Strabo as inconſiderable, and little better than ſo many gangs of robbers. Bochart thinks, that the Troglodytes, including the Pygmies or Pygmæi, were ſtyled by the Hebrews סֻכִּיִּים, i. e. Succhæi, from סֻכָּה ſucchah, a den; for that word ſignifies as well a cave or den, as a tent. Hence it is natural to ſuppoſe the Troglodytic town Succha, on the coaſt of the Red Sea, mentioned by Pliny, the modern Suaquem, the ſeat of a Turkiſh Baſhaw, deduced its name. In ſupport of this notion it may be obſerved, that the Septuagint and Vulgate verſions render סֻכִּיִּים Τρωγλοδύται, Troglodytæ, a word derived apparently from τρώγλη, i. e. a cave den, paſſage, &c. and rank this people among the Cuſhites, Libyans, and other nations, that formed the numerous army of Seſac. The Aualitæ or Abalitæ were ſeated near the Abalitic gulf, which is all that we have to ſay of them. Agatharchides, Diodorus, Strabo, Ptolemy, and Agathemerus, inform us, that the Struthophagi, who lived upon oſtriches as big as ſtags, were ſeated immediately to the ſouth of the Memnones. The Acridophagi, Chelonophagi, Ichthyophagi, Cynamolgi, Elephantophagi, Rhizophagi, Spermatophagi, Hylophagi, Ophiophagi, &c. derived their names from the locuſts, tortoiſes, fiſh, bitches milk, elephants, &c. they fed upon. The Acridophagi were very ſmall, ſwift, black, and ſhort-lived, the oldeſt of them not exceeding forty years of age. They uſed locuſts for food, with which they were plentifully ſupplied by certain winds that covered their country with them, as we learn from Diodorus and Strabo. As for the Chelonophagi, they covered their houſes with the ſhells of tortoiſes, and lived upon their fleſh. The Ichthyophagi occupied a maritime part of Ethiopia, bordering on the Red Sea, and not far from the frontiers of Egypt. As they lived upon all kinds of fiſh, large as well as ſmall, Aben-Ezra takes them to be the תַּנִּינִים Tziim of the Pſalmiſt, to whom God gave the heads of Leviathan, under which name, according to that author, Moſes comprehends all fiſh of a vaſt ſize, for meat. This notion ſeems to receive ſome acceſſion of ſtrength from ſeveral circumſtances hinted at in the paſſage referred to. For the Troglodytes made their very bread of the fleſh of fiſhes dried in the ſun; the Pſalmiſt is there ſpeaking

ing of Pharaoh, and the Egyptians, who were drowned in the Red Sea, and afterwards thrown upon the Troglodytic ſhore; Tziim properly imports a nation inhabiting a barren dry country, ſuch as was that of the Troglodytes; and other texts of ſcripture, compared with this, not a little favour ſuch an opinion. They built their houſes of whalebones, and ſhells of fiſhes. The ribs ſerved for rafters, and the jaws for portals. They fed their very cattle with fiſh. Some of them inhabited caves in mountains, formed by vaſt quantities of ſea-weed from time to time thrown on ſhore, and conſolidated by the force of the tide beating upon it, and perpetually bringing a freſh acceſſion of matter to it, together with the heat of the ſun. From this, as well as from what has been advanced by ſeveral authors, it appears, that the Red Sea was exceeding ſhallow at certain times; that it was covered with an immenſe quantity of this ſea-weed, which gave it a very green colour; and that from hence the Hebrews denominated it סוף ים, yam ſuph, i. e. "The ſea of the "weed." The Cynamolgi kept great numbers of dogs, in order to hunt wild beaſts, and ſometimes fed upon bitches milk. Pliny fabulouſly relates, that they had dogs deads. The Elephantophagi ſeem to have had their ſituation in the ſouthern parts of Ethiopia, and deſtroyed elephants in a very dextrous manner, as will be related elſewhere. The Rhizophagi were ſeated not far from the conflux of the Aſtaboras, Aſtapus, and the Nile. Their territory abounded with moraſſes that produced a great number of canes, whoſe roots ſerved them for food. The Spermatophagi and Hylophagi formed two neighbouring cantons; the firſt of which fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees in ſummer, but the reſt of the year upon a ſweet plant with a ſtalk ſomething reſembling that of a turnep; and the latter, with their wives and children, upon the buds and tender ſhoots of trees. The Hylogones, neighbours to the Elephantophagi, lived for the moſt part in the woods, and generally ſlept on trees. Their curious method of killing lions, leopards, and other wild beaſts, we ſhall hereafter deſcribe. The Pamphagi uſed every thing indiſcriminately for food; and the Agriophagi fed upon the fleſh of wild beaſts. The Ophiophagi or Serpent-eaters inhabited a very fertile tract, as we learn from Pliny. The Ethiopian Anthrophagi or Man-eaters, mentioned by Marcianus and Ptolemy, ſeem to have been the Cafres, and not a people of proper Ethiopia. As for the Gapachi, Ptoemphanes, Catadupi, Pechini, Catadræ, and other obſcure Ethiopic tribes, we know nothing of them but the bare names. The number of nations inhabiting antient Ethiopia will not ſurpriſe us, when we have ſeen Ludolphus's deſcription of the kingdom of Abyſſinia [g] (D).

THIS region did not abound in cities and towns of any conſiderable note. Auxume, Auxumis, or Axome, the metropolis of Ethiopia, according to Arrian and Nonnoſus in Photius, undoubtedly was the ſame city as the modern Axuma, or, as the Abaſſines call it, Aſcum. The noble palace, beautiful ſtructures, &c. this city was formerly ſo famous for, ſufficiently appear from the preſent remains of it. It ſtands about forty-five Portugueſe leagues from the Red Sea, and in 14° 30′ N. lat. It looks now like a village, being almoſt totally ruined, and ſcarcely affording ſhelter to an hundred inhabitants. Some authors relate, that there may be ſeen here the remains of a magnificent temple, which have ſupported themſelves againſt the injuries of time. The Portugueſe, who firſt viſited this country, called Axuma corruptly Chaxumo or Caſſumo. Behind the temple above-mentioned, which was an hundred and ten feet in length, had two wings on each ſide, and a double porch, with an aſcent of twelve ſteps, ſtand ſeveral obeliſks of different ſizes, and others have been thrown down by the Turks. Amongſt the rubbiſh is a great ſquare ſtone, on which appears ſome part of an antient inſcription, ſo effaced by time, that it is not legible, and nothing nothing can be distinguished except some Greek and Latin letters, and the word Basilius. When the Abassine monarchs were formerly crowned here, they sat on a throne of stone in the inner porch of the aforesaid temple. Pselchis or Pselca, and Premnis, through which Petronius marched in his Ethiopic expedition, stood upon the western bank of the Nile, but their true situation cannot be discovered. Napata, where Candace queen of Ethiopia resided, was on the opposite bank, but in what direction it is to be sought for, we cannot precisely inform our readers. Ptolemy mentions two towns called Premis or Primis, one of which might possibly have been the Premnis of Strabo. The emporia or marts of Malis, Mondus, Abalis, Mosylon, Cloe, and Opone, probably made a good figure in antient times, though we have no particulars of moment handed down to us concerning them. Petronius reduced Pselcha, Premnis, and Napata, in the above-mentioned expedition, razing Napata, and leaving a garrison of four hundred men in Premnis, with provisions for two years. Pliny mentions a city of the Nubians upon the Nile called Tenupsis, with which possibly either Couxa, Nuvâla, Galva, Duncâla, or Ielâc, all placed by the Nubian geographer near the conflux of the Nile and the Astaboras, may correspond. Duncâla, the Dumcâla of Jacutus, the Dungâla of Leo, and the present Dongola, the capital of the Nubians, all whose cities are seated upon the Nile, seems to bid the fairest for it. None of the other towns taken notice of by the old geographers deserve the least attention [h].

Mountains. ETHIOPIA, as appears from the best modern geographical descriptions of Abassia, as well as the antients, was extremely mountainous; though we find no mountains of note taken notice of by the antients except the mounts Garbata, and Elephas or Phalangis. Whether or no the mountains of Tigre, the highest of which is Lamalmon, beginning about two days journey from the Red Sea, answer to either of these, we shall not presume to assert; though that they did, by the situation assigned them, seems not improbable. Be that as it will, the path over Lamalmon, whose ascent is vastly steep and dangerous, is so narrow, that the person

perſon who gives way to another there falls headlong into an abyſs, and is irrecoverably loſt. Several provinces of Abaſſia, viz. Bagemdra or Bagemeder, Gojam, Waleka, Shewa, &c. are but one continued chain of mountains, the principal of which are thoſe of Amhara and Samen. The Aorni, as the Abaſſines call them, are rugged rocks of ſuch an incredible height, that the Alps and Pyrenees are but low hills in compariſon of them. Curtius relates, that the Indians called a famous rock in their country Aornos, as being above the flight of a bird; but that author miſtakes the etymology, ſince the word, from what has been here obſerved, cannot be looked upon as of Greek extraction. Amongſt the mountains, and even frequently in the plains of Abaſſia, ariſe ſteep and craggy rocks of various forms, ſome reſembling towers, others pyramids, &c. ſo even on the ſides, that they ſeem to be the effect of labour and art; inſomuch that men, cattle, &c. are craned up by the help of ladders and ropes. And yet the tops of theſe rocks are covered with woods, meadows, fountains, fiſh-ponds, &c. which very copiouſly ſupply the animals ſeated thereon with all the conveniencies of life. The moſt remarkable of theſe rocks is Geſhen or Amba-Geſhen, on the confines of Amhara, towards Shewa, prodigiouſly ſteep, in the form of a caſtle built of free-ſtone, and almoſt impregnable. Its ſummit is about half a Portugueſe league in breadth, and its circumference at the bottom near half a day's journey. The aſcent at firſt is eaſy, but afterwards ſo ſteep and rugged, that the Abaſſine oxen, which will otherwiſe clamber like goats, muſt be craned up and let down with ropes. Here the princes of the blood were formerly confined, in low cottages amongſt ſhrubs and wild cedars, with an allowance barely ſufficient to keep them alive. There is, according to Kircher, in the province of Gojam, a rock ſo curiouſly hollowed by nature, that at a diſtance it reſembles a looking-glaſs; and oppoſite to this another, on the top of which nothing can be ſo ſoftly whiſpered but that it may be heard a great way off. Between many of theſe rocks and mountains are vaſt profundities or abyſſes, which appear moſt dreadful to the eye. The natives call every one of the rocks above-mentioned Amba, as Amba-Salam, Amba-Geſhen, Amba-Dorho, Amba-damo, Amba-Samet, &c.

In ſo mountainous a region as Ethiopia, the air cannot be always alike, and perhaps there is no country in the world where ſo many different ſeaſons may be found in ſo ſmall a compaſs. The Ethiopic, as well as the oppoſite coaſt of the Red Sea, together with thoſe low open places called by the modern Abaſſines Kolla, and the iſlands of this ſea, are intolerably ſcorched by the ſolar rays in the ſummer-ſeaſon; inſomuch that Gregory the Abaſſine related the heat in the iſland of Suaquema or Suaquena to be ſo intenſe as to excoriate any part of the body, melt hard Indian wax in a cabinet, and ſear a garment like red-hot iron. However, the air is much more temperate in the mountainous parts; nay, according to Tellezius, the ſummer heats are milder in ſeveral diſtricts of Abaſſia than in Portugal; and even in Samen the cold is more dreaded than the heat. In ſome provinces of Ethiopia the winter is extremely ſevere, in others as warm as the ſummer in ſeveral parts of Europe. The Ethiopians have little or no ſnow, but only a ſmall ſort of hail that ſometimes covers the ground, and at a diſtance looks like ſnow. Frequent and dreadful thunders, however, they have, attended with tempeſts that terrify both man and beaſt, which proceed from the exceſſive variety of air. [i] Ludolphus thinks, that Gregory's four ſeaſons, Matzau, Tzadai, Hagai, and Cramt, are in reality but three, i. e. the ſpring, which begins on the twenty-fifth day of September; the ſummer, conſiſting of two parts, the firſt called Tzadai, beginning upon the twenty-fifth of December, and the ſecond denominated Hagai in the Abaſſine tongue, commencing on the twenty-fifth of June; and laſtly, Cramt, or winter, which concludes the Ethiopic year. The climate here in general is ſo healthy, that tis no uncommon thing for the natives to arrive at an hundred years of age; however, towards the beginning of the ſpring, that is to ſay, in the months of September and October, an epidemic fever ſometimes makes great havock amongſt the inhabitants of Tigre [k].

THE days and nights in Ethiopia, as lying betwixt the tropic of Cancer and the line, are for the moſt part nearly equal. The winds that blow on the mountains are generally ſpeaking ſalubrious and pleaſant; but the atmoſphere over the plains, for want of them, ſtagnates, and becomes unwholeſome. The wind Sendo, however, is far from being beneficial to the Abaſſines. It is a whirlwind ſo impetuouſly violent, that it throws down all before it, and therefore in ſome ſome reſpect may ſeem to anſwer its name, which in the Amharic dialect ſignifies a ſerpent or ſnake. Gregory told Ludolphus, that it might be ſeen, and repreſented an immenſe ſerpent, whoſe head moved on the ground, and the body erected itſelf in curls and windings up to the ſky. The ſoil in thoſe parts capable of cultivation is extremely fertile, and produces vaſt quantities of grain, pulſe, and fruit. Metals likewiſe, particularly gold, minerals, vegetables, and a ſurpriſing variety of animals, it abounds with; but theſe our readers will expect a deſcription of in another place. We find it aſſerted by the beſt authors, that the Abaſſines have ſometimes two, and ſometimes three harveſts in a year. They neither ſow nor mow for the ſake of their cattle, the perpetual heat and continual diſtillation of moiſture from the mountains, producing graſs in great abundance, and covering the fields with a moſt beautiful verdure thro' all the different ſeaſons of the year. Though they have moſt delicious grapes, and honey is very cheap amongſt them, yet they almoſt entirely confine themſelves to malt liquor, which is not very unlike that brewed in ſome parts of Europe [1] (D).

Rivers. The Nile.

Of all the rivers, that water Ethiopia, the moſt famous is the Nile, which has its ſource in that country. Many of the antient geographers, and in particular Ptolemy, placed the fountains of this river beyond the Line, on ſome mountains which they call the mountains of the moon. But the moderns, particularly the Portugueſe, have diſcovered this to be a miſtake. What they have advanced on this head has been in a great meaſure confirmed by Gregory the Abaſſine in a letter to M. Ludolphus. According to that curious perſon, the ſpring-head of the Nile firſt appears in a tract called Secut, upon the top of Dengla, near the frontiers of Gojam, to the W. of Bagemdra, Dara, the lake of Tzana, and Bada. From thence it takes its courſe towards Amhara, leaving Gojam on the right, and

(D) This appears from what the young Abaſſian told the learned gentleman hereafter mentioned at Jeruſalem, and receives ſome acceſſion of ſtrength from Diodorus and Strabo. Thoſe authors affirm this liquor to have been extracted from Millet, as well as barley, and in flavour and excellency to have equalled wine (5).

Bagemdra on the left. Having paſſed the limits of Amhara, and in ſuch a manner ſurrounded the kingdom of Gojam as always to leave it on the right, it waſhes the confines of Waleka, and then approaches the fartheſt bounds of Mugara and Shewa. Then, running between Bizama and Gonga, it comes into the country of the Chankalas; from whence, winding to the right and gradually leaving the weſtern climate on the left, it advances towards the kingdom of Sennar. But before its arrival there, it is greatly encreaſed by the acceſſion of two large rivers from the eaſt, viz. the Tacaza falling out of Tigre, and the Guangua deſcending from Dambea. After taking a view of the kingdom of Sennar, it moves to the borders of Dongola, and ſo to the kingdom of Nubia (E); from hence, turning to the right, it reaches at laſt a region called Abrim, where its ſtream becomes unnavigable by reaſon of the cliffs and rocks, and ſoon afterwards enters Egypt. The travellers therefore from Sennar and Abaſſia, after having croſſed Nubia, leave the Nile to the E. and croſs upon camels a deſert of fifteen days journey, where neither tree, water, nor any thing elſe but ſand, is to be ſeen. From Abrim it continues its courſe to Rif or Upper Egypt, where the above-mentioned travellers again come up with it; and, after having traverſed the kingdom of Egypt in a northern direction, empties itſelf into the Mediterranean near Alexandria.

(E) 'Tis obſervable, that Gregory here diſtinguiſhes the kingdom of Sennar from that of Nubia, though at preſent they are looked upon to be the ſame. However, in our opinion Gregory's authority is ſuperior to that of Pomet and the miſſionaries, upon which that of the modern geographers depends. We find no mention of Sennar in any of that numerous tribe of oriental and other authors cited by the excellent Golius in his incomparable notes upon Alfraganus, though they take notice both of Nuba or Nubia, and the country of the Fungi; therefore it ſhould ſeem probable, that Sennar is only a part of Nubia, or elſe a kingdom different from it. The Nubian geographer intimates, that in his time the city of Somnaj, probaby Sennar, was an inconſiderable place, and its diſtrict or territory diſtinct from the kingdom of Nuba or Nubia. Ludolphus makes the modern kingdom of Sennar to be the ſame with the country of the Fungi, and a part of the antient Nubia (5).

andria. Father Payz, who viewed the fountains of the Nile himſelf, adds, that the ſource of this river conſiſts of two round ſpring-heads, very deep, upon an eminence, the ground about which is quaggy and marſhy; that, however, the water does not iſſue out from thence, but from the foot of the hill, about a muſquet-ſhot from whence, towards the eaſt, the river begins to flow; that, winding then to the north about the fourth part of a Portugueſe league, it receives another river, and a little farther two more from the eaſt, ſoon after which it enlarges itſelf with the addition of ſeveral other ſtreams; and laſtly, that about a day's journey farther it ſwallows up the river Jema, and, after flowing twenty Portugueſe leagues in a weſtern direction, turns to the eaſt, and plunges itſelf into a vaſt lake (F). 'Tis remarkable, that all the rivers of Ethiopia, at any conſiderable diſtance from the ocean, except the Hanazo riſing in Hangota or Angote, and the Hawaſh or Aoaxe running through the kingdoms of Dawara and Fatagara or Fategur, flow into the Nile. The Eteſian winds contribute little or nothing to the inundations of the Nile, though ſome authors have falſly imagined the contrary, nor the ſnow melted from the Ethiopian mountains, according to others, as Seneca and Ludolphus have fully evinced. But the prodigious maſs of waters flowing from all parts, and proceeding from the immoderate ſhowers with which the countries under the Torrid Zone are waſhed, when the ſun returns into the winter ſigns, undoubtedly occaſions them. Juba makes the Nile to have had its ſource in Mauritania, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus; which runs counter to fact, as well as moſt other authors who have treated of this river. Perhaps he might extend the

(F) This is probably the lake of Tzana, through which the Nile paſſes, ſtill preſerving the colour of its own water. From hence, turning to the ſouth, it waſhes on the left hand the principal kingdoms of Abaſſia, viz. Bagemdra, Amhara, Waleka, Shewa, Damota, &c. and takes along the rivers of thoſe countries, viz. the Baſhlo, Tzohha, Kecem, Jema, Roma, and Wonzit. Then on the right hand ſurrounding Gojam, and ſwelled with the Muga, Abaja, Aſwari, Temei, Gult, and Tzul, all rivers of that region, it bends again towards the weſt, leaves Abaſſia upon the right, and runs in a northern direction through ſeveral thirſty nations, and ſandy deſerts, in order to fertilize Egypt with its inundations (6).

(6) Greg. Abaſ. apud Ludolph. l. i. c. 8. Ludolph. comment. ad hiſt. Æthiop. p. 122, 123, & ſeq.

ſouthern parts of Mauritania as far as the Niger, which agreed almoſt in all points with the Nile, as juſt obſerved; and therefore miſtake the latter for the former, which he might falſly imagine had its riſe in Mauritania, becauſe it ran by the borders of that region. Strabo countenances this opinion, when he intimates, that the rivers in the ſouthern parts of Mauritania abounded with animals and vegetables like thoſe produced in and about the Nile (G). The modern Abaſſines, tho' they are not ignorant of the fountains from which the Nile deduces its ſource, are far from being perfectly acquainted with the courſe of that river after it leaves them. However, the conſtant and antient tradition amongſt them is, that near a certain mountain, at ſome diſtance from the city of Sennar, it divides itſelf into two ſtreams, one of which runs to the weſtward, and forms the river Niger, and the other in a northern direction takes its courſe through Egypt. This we learn from the Nubian geographer, who at the ſame time intimates, that the channel running to the eaſt of this mountain, watering Nubia and the land of Egypt, is divided in the Lower Egypt into four parts, three of which fall into the Syrian ſea, and the other diſcharges itſelf into a ſalt lake near Alexandria. 'Tis probable, that the ſeparation of theſe two ſtreams is cauſed by ſome rocky mountain meeting the river above-mentioned, and ſplitting it into two channels. Leo Africanus adds great weight to the authority of the Nubian geographer, when he aſſures us, that the Nile flows through the region of the Nigritæ. The Abaſſines, according to Gregory above-mentioned, ſay that the Niger ſeparates from the Nile in the country of Dongola; that the greateſt flow of water paſſes into Egypt; and that the other ſtream, deſcending towards the region of Elway, at laſt throws itſelf into the Atlantic ocean. All which ſeems to be confirmed by what we have lately obſerved from Herodotus, and by Pliny, when he aſſures us, that the Nile and the Niger agree in colour and taſte of water, produce the ſame ſort of reed, the ſame ſort of paper, the ſame ſort of animals, and encreaſe, as

(G) 'Tis not improbable, that the Segelmeſſa was one of theſe rivers mentioned by Strabo; ſince, according to the Nubian geographer, it nearly reſembled the Nile, in almoſt all particulars: nay, we are told, that the river Sus at preſent fertilizes all the adjacent country by its inundations, as the Nile does Egypt; which adds no ſmall weight to the authority of Strabo (7).

as well as overflow, at the ſame ſeaſons. If the above-mentioned particulars be admitted, it ſeems poſſible for the king of Abaſſia either ſo to ſtop up the fountains of the Nile, or ſo to divert the courſe of the river proceeding immediately from thence, that Egypt ſhould not be overflowed; which would prove the total ruin of that kingdom. This receives ſome acceſſion of ſtrength from Elmacinus, who relates, that the khalif Muſtanſir ſent Michael the patriarch with magnificent preſents to the Abaſſine monarch, to prevail upon him to open the channel that conveyed water to Egypt, which for ſome time had been ſtopped. His petition that prince immediately granted. The conſequence of which was, that the Nile, which had before greatly failed, roſe three yards in one night, and rendered the land of Egypt as capable of cultivation as ever. This has induced ſome authors to aſſert, that the grand ſignior pays an annual tribute to the king of Abaſſia, that his Egyptian ſubjects may enjoy all the advantages of the Nile's inundations which their anceſtors have done. Gregory, cited above, intimated to Ludolphus, that he had heard from ſome Abaſſines of undoubted veracity, that near the Cataracts of the Nile the land to the eaſt was a perfect plain; and that, by only opening a paſſage through one mountain for that river, it would flow rather that way than into the Mediterranean through (H) Egypt. However, we muſt own ourſelves far from being certain as to this point; though a gentleman of moſt profound erudition, and unexceptionable authority, has informed us, that he met with a young Abaſſinian at Jeruſalem, who intimated to him, that ſuch a kind of notion ſtill prevailed amongſt his countrymen. The preſent

(H) It is obſervable, that the kings of Abaſſia are ſtill perſuaded, that the keys of the Nile are in their hands, and that they can, when they pleaſe, change its courſe, as the king Teklimanout threatened the baſhaw of Cairo towards the beginning of this century, that is, about the year 1706. That prince, being greatly incenſed at the aſſaſſination of the ſieur Du Roule a Frenchman at Sennar, threatened the baſhaw with his reſentment, in caſe an immediate ſtop was not put to ſuch flagrant violations of the law of nations; telling him, that he could make the Nile the inſtrument of his vengeance, ſince god, by placing in his hands the fountains, paſſage, and encreaſe, of that river, had put it in his power to make it do either good or harm (8).

Ethiopians call their part of this river Abawi, though in the old Ethiopic language we find it ſtyled Gejon or Gewon, probably by an antient miſtake from the Greek word Γεὼν, Geon, or Hebrew Gihon, Gen. ii. 13. ſince ſome authors have imagined that river to be the Nile. The prophets Jeremiah and Iſaiah give the river we are now upon the name of Sihor or Sichor, i. e. The black river, from the colour of its water, as the Greeks did that of Melas, and the Latins Melo, for the ſame reaſon. And, agreeably to this notion, Virgil ſays:

" Et diverſa ruens ſeptem diſcurrit in ora
" Uſque coloratis amnis devexus ab Indis."

Virg. Georg. l. iv. v. 291---294.

Dionyſius Afer and Stephanus Byzantinus ſay, that the Ethiopians denominated that part of this river running through their territories Siris, which is evidently the ſame as Sihor; but that, as ſoon as it reached Syene, it received the name of (I) Nile. Beſides the Nile, the antient geographers mention

(I) To what has been ſaid of the Nile we ſhall beg leave to add the account of the rivers flowing into it, given us by the patriarch Alphonſo Mendez. " The Nile," ſays he, " receives ſeveral ri-

" which divides the kingdoms of Bagemeder or Bagemdra and
" Amhara; the Gulcem, which bounds the ſame kingdom of

" Bizamo, the Gafates, and the Gongas. The Tacaza, called " by the antients Aſtaboras, hath three different ſources near the " mountains, which ſeparate the two kingdoms of Angote or
" Angota and Bagameder; it runs towards the weſt thro' the de-
" ſert of Oldeba; then, entering Dambar, falls into a large bed
" of ſands; and afterwards having croſſed part of the kingdom " of Decan, diſcharges itſelf into the Nile. 'Tis ſaid, that be-
" ſides crocodiles and river-horſes, there are in this river abun" dance of torpedoes, which immediately benumb the arm of " any man that touches them. The Mareb, riſing two leagues
" from Debaroa, falls, after a long courſe, from a rock thirty
" cubits in height, and ſinks under-ground; but in the winter it " runs through many other provinces, and by the monaſtery of " Alleluja, and then loſes itſelf. The army, when they invaded tion two other rivers called Aſtaboras and Aſtapus, meeting near the iſland or peninſula Meroe, and joining the Nile ſoon after. As theſe rivers had their ſources to the eaſt of the Nile, the firſt deducing its ſtreams from the lake Coloe in the diſtrict of Amaza, and the other from ſome fountains betwixt the mounts Garbata and Elephas not far from the Aualitic gulph, we muſt ſubmit it to our readers, whether the modern Tacaza and Mareb, conſidering the ſituation and direction aſſigned them by the modern geographers, do not entirely correſpond with them. Pliny, Heliodorus, and Strabo, mention a third conſiderable river falling into the Nile, whoſe name they do not entirely agree in; but as it has been omitted

" good water and excellent fiſh." To which we ſhall beg leave to ſubjoin a ſhort deſcription of the courſe of the Nile, as delivered to us by the beſt modern geographers ſince the time of Gregory and Ludolphus. It ariſes in the kingdom of Gojam, and proceeds from thence in a N. E. direction to the lake of Dambea or Tzana; afterwards it moves S. E. to the kingdom of Bagemeder, or, as Gregory calls it, Bagemdra; then, ſtill running S. E. it approaches the kingdom of Amhara; from whence continuing it's motion S. E. it advances to the kingdom of Oleca, betwixt which and Amhara it receives a conſiderable river, as it did before the Bachilo on the confines of Amhara and Bagemdra. From the kingdom of Oleca it moves to that of Choa in the ſame direction, and from thence by Debra through Galla, and the kingdom of the Cafates, to that of Gonga. Afterwards it viſits the country of the Changalas, N. E. of Gonga. From thence in a northern direction it flows to the city and kingdom of Sennar; and then to Corte or Corti in Nubia, through the deſert of Bahiouda N. W. from Sennar. Betwixt Sennar and Corti it paſſes by Barbar, near which is a cataract N. E. of the former place, from whence it turns to the W. and reaches Corte. Kaniſe W. of Corte next receives a viſit from it; and then Dongola N. of Kaniſe. Continuing its courſe N. E. it arrives at the Greater Cataract; and afterwards takes its leave of Nubia near the Leſſer Cataract. Laſtly, having traverſed Egypt in a northern direction, it diſcharges itſelf by ſeveral mouths into the Mediteranean. We could not diſpenſe with being thus particular, in relation to the ſource and courſe of a river the moſt celebrated of all others taken notice of by antiquity, on account of the vaſt advantages accruing from its inundations to the countries through which it paſſed; eſpecially ſince the antients ſought after the cauſes of theſe inundations, and the head of this river, in vain (9).

omitted by ſeveral of the antient geographers, and eſpecially by Ptolemy, who had the beſt means of informing himſelf as to the truth of every particular relating to it, we ſhall ſuperſede all farther accounts of it, and conclude here what we have to ſay of the rivers of Ethiopia [m] (K).

Lakes, promontories, ports, &c.

We find no remarkable fountains and lakes in Ethiopia beſides the ſources of the rivers above-mentioned, except the lake of Pſeboa above Meroe, that of Tzana being, as far as we can collect from the old geography, unknown to the antients. The principal promontories were, Baſium, Mnemium, Aſpis, Saturni promontorium, Moſylon, Dire, Zengiſa, Noti Cornu, Praſum, and Raptum, the laſt of which was inhabited by Cannibals or Anthropophagi. But the three laſt capes ſeem rather to have belonged to the Cafres or African barbarians than the proper Ethiopians. The chief ports and empories of Ethiopia, were thoſe of Adulis, Mondus, Opone, Moſylon, and the principal city of the Aulitæ, ſeated upon the Red Sea. From their country into theſe places the Arabs imported fruit, corn, wine, cloaths, &c. and exported from thence to Ocelis and

(K) We muſt not omit obſerving, that as the advantages afforded the fields in other countries by the rains are derived from the rivers in Ethiopia, the places perfectly dry in winter are overflowed in ſummer. Several of theſe rivers do not empty themſelves into the ſea, as in other regions, but are ſucked up in the ſand; ſo that it is more difficult to diſcover their mouths than the ſources of other ſtreams (10).

and Muſa, oppoſite harbours in Arabia, ſpices, caſſia, perfumes, ivory, myrrh, and ſeveral other (L) commodities. To which we may add the haven and fortreſs of Sabid, probably the Sabat of Ptolemy, now in a ruinous condition. The moſt noted iſlands appertaining to Ethiopia were Meroe, if that ſhould not rather be deemed a peninſula, the Sporades of Agatharchides, Aſtratæ, Ara Palladis, Gythitis, Myronis, Daphnine, Magi, Acanthine, Iſis, Mondus, and Menuthias (M). Meroe contained a large tract, together with a very conſiderable city, its metropolis, of the ſame name. Joſephus informs us, that its original name was Saba, but that Cambyſes, from his ſiſter, afterwards called it Meroe; which ſeems to be confirmed by Strabo, tho' it does not appear from Herodotus, that this prince penetrated ſo far into Ethiopia. Timoſthenes, Ptolemy Philadelphus's admiral, related, that the city of Meroe was ſixty days journey from Syene. Eratoſthenes made this diſtance ſix hundred and twenty-five miles; Hipparchus in Strabo five thouſand ſtadia, which agrees with Eratoſthenes; Artemidorus ſix hundred miles; and Seboſus computed ſixteen hundred miles from the fartheſt or moſt northern part of Egypt to this famous town. But, according to Pliny (N), the road

(L) 'Tis remarkable, that moſt of theſe commodities have for a long time failed in Ethiopia, as the lotus and ſilphium in Egypt and Cyrenaica; but Arabia and India ſufficiently ſupply the European merchants with them (11).

(M) To which we may add the iſland in the great lake of Pſeboa, ſometimes occupied by the Libyans, and at other times by the Ethiopians, juſt as ſucceſs attended their reſpective arms, according to Strabo. From the ſituation that author aſſigns this lake, in conjunction with what we ſhall offer concerning Meroe in note (N), our readers may poſſibly be induced to believe, that the preſent lake of Txana or Dambea is the Pſeboa of the antients (12).

(N) The computation we find in Pliny is as follows: From Syene to Hiera fifty-four miles; from thence to Tama ſeventy-five miles; from thence to the borders of the Ethiopians called Euonymites an hundred-and-twenty miles; from thence to Acina fifty-four miles; from thence to Pitara twenty-five miles; from thence to Tergedus an hundred and ſix miles; from thence to Napata eighty miles; and laſtly, from Napata to the city of Meroe three hundred and ſixty miles.

What part of Sennar or Abaſſia anſwers to Meroe, we ſhall not take upon us to determine. The Jeſuits have pitched upon the kingdom of Gojam, as being almoſt encompaſſed by the Nile, and road between Meroe and Syene was diſcovered in the reign of Nero to be eight hundred and ſeventy-four Roman miles long. The Nubian geographer does not differ greatly from ſome of theſe computations; for he intimates, that travellers are generally above two months in traverſing Nubia, or that vaſt tract lying betwixt the confines of Egypt and Abaſſia. We find, that when Ethiopia was in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate, the city of Meroe made a prodigious figure, inſomuch that, if ſome of the antients may be credited, it could ſend into the field an army of two hundred and fifty thouſand men, and contained four hundred thouſand artificers, though in Pliny's time it was but a ſmall town. Several queens of this part of Ethiopia, and conſequently a peninſula, as Meroe was thought to have been by ſome of the antients. But M. Ludolphus has entirely overthrown this notion, by proving, amongſt other things, that nothing related of Meroe by Diodorus, Strabo, and Pliny, is applicable to Gojam; Meroe being nearer Egypt. Beſides, as that learned author obſerves, had Meroe been Gojam, and the antients had known that country, they muſt cónſequently have known the ſource of the Nile; which we find they did not. Voſſius believes the city Baroo or Baroa, ſituated in 16°. 22'. N. lat. where the Bahrnagaſh generally reſides, to correſpond with the capital of Meroe. As this opinion depends upon the ſuppoſition, that the preſent Mareb or Moraba is the Aſtaboras of the antients, which muſt be admitted, it ſeems to have ſome appearance of truth. Mr. Senex's map of this country, which to us appears the moſt accurate of any that has been hitherto publiſhed, ſeems to point out the tract anſwering to the antient Meroe. We find there a ſort of peninſula with many of the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics of Meroe handed down to us by the antients. This peninſula is formed by the Rahd, the Nile, the Goze, the Mareb or Moraba, the Takezel or Tacaza, and a river compoſed of theſe three laſt, which unites its ſtream with that of the Nile in near 18°. N. lat. The chief places ſeated on the Nile in this peninſula are Chanedi, Ghenedetoul, Garri, Helfaia, Cotragne, Nogue, and Habkharas; upon the Rahd Enbulbul and Geſen; and upon the conflux of the Moraba and Tacaza the city of Derkin or Dequin: which we mention in order to give our readers a better idea of the tract we have in view. Now the peninſula of Meroe reſembled a ſhield, and was three thouſand ſtadia long, and one thouſand broad, according to Strabo; it was likewiſe ſurrounded on the weſt by the Nile, and on the eaſt by the rivers flowing into it. Solinus ſays, that Meroe was formed by the Nile, and ſix hundred miles from the ſea; and Mela, as corrected by Salmaſius, pretty nearly agrees with him. Pauſanias intimates, that

pia, called Candace, that having for a conſiderable number of years been a ſort of ſurname to them, held their reſidence here. Strabo makes it to have been ten thouſand ſtadia from Alexandria, and the capital of Ethiopia. As the other iſlands are in a manner obſcure, they merit no regard; only it may be proper to obſerve, that Hardouin, Bochart, and Salmaſius, believe Madagaſcar to be the antient Menuthias, though Iſaac Voſſius takes it to have been the ſame with that iſland which the moderns call Zanzibar. How far either of theſe notions may be true, we cannot take upon us to ſay; neither is it of any conſequence to our readers which of them, or whether either of them is ſo [n].

the Nile entered a great lake beyond Meroe, which it paſſed through, and traverſed the whole country of Ethiopia. The rivers Aſtapus and Aſtaboras, i. e. the Tacaza and Moraba, joined the Nile above Meroe, i. e. the city of Meroe. All which particulars, as well as ſeveral others ſuggeſted by Pliny, Timoſthenes, Seboſus, Eratoſthenes, and the Nubian geogragher, in the paſſages here referred to, conſidering the many turnings and windings of the Nile, are more applicable to the peninſula at preſent under conſideration, than any other part of Sennar or Abaſſia that can be aſſigned for this purpoſe. From the ſame chart, and the authors it is deduced from, we muſt allow it probable, that Mr. Senex's river Rahd, ariſing out of Dambea eaſt of the Nile, is the Guangua of Gregory; as alſo that the Goze, Mareb or Moraba, and Takezel or Tacaza, may be reputed the Aſtoſabas or Aſtuſapes, Aſtaboras, aud Aſtapus, of the antients. Some modern writers ſeem inclined to believe, that the Mareb of the preſent Abaſſines anſwers to the Aſtuſapes of the antients, though we have here ſuppoſed the Goze to be that river (13).

SECT. II.

Antiquity of the Ethiopians.

IT appears from what has been advanced in the former ſection, that the ſacred writers did not always apply the name of (P) Cuſh to one particular country. They ſometimes underſtood by it that region watered by the Araxes, which was the ſeat of the antient Scythians or Cuthites; and ſometimes that country on the eaſtern ſhore of the Red Sea, contiguous to Egypt. In ſome paſſages likewiſe they ſeem to have had in view the whole peninſula of the Arabs, or at leaſt the greateſt part of that peninſula. But, notwithſtanding what has

[o] Strab. l. xvii. Plin. apud Ludolph. ut & ipſe Ludolph. l. i. c. 6, 7.

(O) To theſe curioſities we may add the gold mines near the coaſt of the Red Sea mentioned by Agatharchides, which, according to that author, alſo produced the fineſt and whiteſt marble in the world (14).

(P) Sometimes in ſcripture the word Cuſh comprehends both Arabia aud the proper Ethiopia, as in Ezek. c. xxxviii. v. 5. Perſia, Cuſh, and Libya with them; all of them with ſhield and helmet; i. e. Perſia, Arabia, Ethiopia, Libya, &c. Compare alſo Ezek. c. xxx. v. 5. with Jer. c. xxv. v. 20, 24.

has been offered to the contrary by many perſons of vaſt erudition, we cannot help believing, that it moſt uſually and properly denoted the tract ſituated above the Upper Egypt, comprehending the modern kingdoms of Dongola, Sennar, and Abaſſia. In order to evince the probability of ſuch a notion, we ſhall not only beg leave to refer our readers to the remarkable paſſages already cited on this occaſion, but likewiſe obſerve, that the prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, make the Cuſhites neighbours to the Libyans; which can only hold true of the proper Ethiopians. The Pſalmiſt alſo foretold, that Cuſh ſhould ſtretch out her hands to GOD; and the prophet Zephaniah, that the ſuppliants of the LORD, from beyond the rivers of Cuſh, even the daughters of his diſperſed, ſhould bring HIS offering: both of which predictions ſeem clearly to point at the eunuch baptized by Philip, who came to worſhip at Jeruſalem; ſince, as he was treaſurer to queen Candace, it can ſcarce be doubted but that he and his retinue brought a valuable offering or donation with them; and ſince Candace was queen of the proper Ethiopia, or at leaſt the peninſula of Meroe, a conſiderable part of it, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. The words Cuſh and Αἰθίοπες therefore, in the texts here referred to, muſt be underſtood of the territories and people of the proper Ethiopia. Ezekiel propheſied, that the Egyptians from Migdol to Syene ſhould fall by the ſword; which not a little ſupports the interpretation of a famous text already given in favour of our preſent opinion. King Ahaſuerus in Eſther reigned from the Indies to Cuſh, that is to ſay, as far as the modern Abaſſia; ſince Scythia or Arabia cannot be there meant as being contiguous to Perſia, and Herodotus intimates Darius Hyſtaſpis to have received tribute from the nations bordering upon proper Ethiopia. Nebuchadnezzar in Judith ſent embaſſadors to Geſem, and as far as the frontiers of Ethiopia: probably the kingdom ſo called to the ſouth of Egypt. In fine, many of the moſt remarkable paſſages of ſcripture, underſtood, for above a century paſt, of Arabia or part of it, may well enough be interpreted of the proper Ethiopia, as is acknowledged by Calmet himſelf. It is therefore but reaſonable to conclude, that Cuſh the eldeſt ſon of Ham was the great progenitor of the Ethiopians [P].

HOWEVER, moſt authors are agreed, that many of the early deſcendents of Cuſh ſettled firſt in the land bordering on the eaſt ſide of the Red Sea, moving gradually from thence to the ſouthern extremity of Arabia; and afterwards, by means of the eaſy paſſage over the ſtreights of Bab-al-Mandab, tranſplanted themſelves into Ethiopia. According to Euſebius, this migration happened whilſt the Iſraelites were in Egypt; but Syncellus places it in the time of the judges. The Arabian Cuſhites were antiently called Abaſeni, and made up a great part of the Saboeans or Homerites, as may be inferred from ſeveral authors. The Ethiopians went under the ſame name, agreed in many points with the Arabian Cuſhites, and were believed by moſt of the Aſiatic nations in Joſephus's time to have had the ſame origin. Diodorus Siculus, it muſt be allowed, maintains, that they never came from any other country, and that they never were corrupted by foreign cuſtoms; though he aſſerts, that in ſeveral things they correſponded with the Egyptians. However, notwithſtanding what is advanced by that hiſtorian, our readers will naturally conclude, from what has been already ſuggeſted, that part of Cuſh's poſterity moved gradually along the weſtern ſhore of the Red Sea into Ethiopia, which, by this means, was tolerably well peopled, when the Arabian Cuſhites firſt found their way into it. The great difference of atleaſt a conſiderable body of the Abaſſines from the Arabs, as well as other nations, the ſituation of the kingdom of Midian, where ſome of the earlieſt Cuſhites probably ſeated themſelves, and the concurrent voice of antiquity, both ſacred and prophane, tend to evince the juſtneſs of ſuch a concluſion. Bochart believes ſome traces of Obal, or, as the Arabians pronounce it, Aubal, one of Joktan's ſons, to be diſcernable in the empory Abalites, the Abalitic gulf, &c. and conſequently, that ſome of the children of Eber, after having inſinuated themſelves into Arabia Felix, migrated into Ethiopia. Some of the Ludim likewiſe might find a paſſage into this country, though undoubtedly the bulk of them moved towards the Atlantic ocean; ſince, as Moſes intimates them to have been the firſt branch of Miſraim's iſſue, they in all likelihood puſhed forwards towards the main land of Africa. The Ethiopians therefore might very well vye with the Egyptians, and even be deemed ſuperior to them, in point of antiquity, ſince Cuſh their great anceſtor was the eldeſt ſon of Ham. They might likewiſe have been eſteemed of equal antiquity with the Arabians, ſince from the kingdom of Midian the Cuſhites penetrated both into the ſouthern parts of the peninſula of the Arabs and Ethiopia. The communication betwixt

Egypt

Egypt and Ethiopia, as well as the proximity of blood of Cuſh and Miſraim, introduced that ſimilitude of manners obſervable amongſt their reſpective inhabitants, which we ſhall ſoon have occaſion to take notice of [q].

Government of the Ethiopians.

PLINY relates, that Ethiopia was antiently divided into forty-five kingdoms, of which he inſinuates that of Meroe to have been the moſt powerful and flouriſhing. But whether theſe were independent on one another, or under one ſupreme head, he no-where informs us. Be that as it will, as all the old oriental governments were abſolute, and the Abaſſine princes known to the Europeans ſince their firſt intercourſe with Abaſſia have been deſpotic, there is no reaſon to doubt but that the kings of Ethiopia always ruled with an (Q) uncontroulable ſway. If we admit the Ethiopian tradition, that a long ſeries of princes deſcended from Solomon reigned in the country we are now upon, it can ſcarce be denied, that their authority was unlimited, as that of the Hebrew monarch knew no bounds. It appears from Strabo and Pliny, that ſome Ethiopic nations were governed always by queens, whoſe common name was Candace, as that of the Egyptian kings was Pharaoh, Ptolemy, &c. Diodorus Siculus gives us to underſtand, that a good part of Ethiopia was compoſed of ſeveral elective

(Q) This ſeems likewiſe in ſome meaſure to appear from the conſtitution of the preſent kingdom of Abaſſia. The king's authority there is ſo unlimited, that no man can in this country be called with juſtice proprietor of any thing, nor doth any man, when he ſows his field, know that he ſhall reap it; for the king may beſtow the fruits upon whom he pleaſes, and all the ſatisfaction the former poſſeſſor can hope for, is, that ſome man may be appointed to bring in the eſtimate of the expences he had been at in cultivating it, in order to his reimburſement. But the arbitrator is always favourable to the preſent owner, whom he preſumes to have more intereſt than the perſon diſpoſſeſſed (16).

elective monarchies (R), the heads of which were chosen out of their priests; and that all these princes made the laws of their respective kingdoms the basis of their government. However, as the same author remarks, that every new king, immediately after his election, was worshipped as a god, and considered as invested with the supreme authority by Divine Providence, though he had a particular regard to the laws and customs of his country through the whole course of his administration, we may look upon them all as arbitrary monarchs. The extraordinary honours paid them leave no room to doubt, that they were the interpreters of these laws, and consequently made them subservient to their will; neither does this interfere with their conferring rewards, and inflicting punishments, according to the laws, that is, the political decisions and determinations, of their ancestors, since some of the most arbitrary governments in the world now do the like. But after all, the Greeks knew very little of the Ethiopians; and therefore from their authors we can form no adequate idea of any thing relating to them. Sesostris and Zerah must undoubtedly be considered as princes bearing an absolute sway over the dominions they governed, of which the proper Ethiopia was a part. The surprising conquests made by the one, and the prodigious army commanded by the other, in order to the reduction of a powerful neighbour, seem to set this point beyond dispute [r].

Laws. ACCORDING to Diodorus Siculus, the laws of Ethiopia agreed in substance with those of Egypt. This, continues the

(R) Though the present kingdom of Abassia be so far hereditary, that only one family can sit on the throne, yet the reigning prince has the power of chusing out of the royal family whom he pleases for his successor, which, if he omits it, is done by the grandees of the kingdom, who elect him for their king, whom they judge most capable of so high an office. If this was the custom formerly, as does not appear improbable, it might easily have given occasion to this account of Diodorus, who cannot be supposed to have received an exact information of the customs, laws, and constitution of Ethiopia (17).

(17) Idem ibid.

the ſame author, the Ethiopians accounted for by aſſerting, that Egypt was firſt peopled by colonies drawn out of their country. In order to evince that point, they maintained the land of Egypt to have been at firſt, for a conſiderable period, entirely covered with water, and afterwards raiſed gradually, ſo as to become inhabitable, by the freſh acceſſion of mud the Nile brought every year out of Ethiopia. This is likewiſe confirmed by Herodotus, who affirms Egypt to be the gift of the Nile, and that the whole region, except the territory of Thebes, in the time of Menes, was one continued moraſs. However, he makes the Ethiopians to have been civilized by the Egyptians, and to have learned the cuſtoms and manners of that people, ſo late as the reign of Pſammiticus I. which, conſidering what has been already advanced, will not eaſily be admitted for truth. Yet ſome cuſtoms and manners, as well as laws, the former nation might poſſibly have received from the latter about that time, though in many particulars they agreed long before. We cannot pretend to give our readers a complete enumeration of the particular laws, or political maxims, that prevailed antiently in Ethiopia; but the following ſeem to have been ſome of the principal of them. 1. Several tribes of Ethiopians looked upon it as a fundamental law to elect their princes out of the different orders of their prieſts. 2. No public executioner ever made his appearance in many parts of Ethiopia, the malefactors there being obliged by a particular law to fall by their own hands. 3. According to the eſtabliſhed order of ſucceſſion amongſt the Ethiopic nations, upon the death of a king, his ſiſter's ſon (S) mounted the throne; and in caſe the female branches of the royal family failed of iſſue, they choſe the moſt beautiful and valiant perſon amongſt them for king. 4. It was eſteemed a moſt enormous crime in any perſon capitally convicted to attempt making his eſcape into a foreign country. Diodorus relates, that a criminal condemned to die having once meditated a flight out of Ethiopia, after the ſign of death had been ſent him by the king, was detected by his mother, who thereupon ſtrangled him with a garter, he not offering the leaſt reſiſtance, leſt an indelible ſtain ſhould thereby be fixed upon his family. 5. The king of this region was obliged to diſpatch (T) himſelf, whenever he received a meſſage from the prieſts of Meroe, the moſt revered of any in Ethiopia, with an intimation, that the gods commanded him, for the good of his ſubjects to do ſo. 6. If the king became maimed or wounded by any accident, his domeſtics were forced to wound and maim themſelves juſt in the ſame manner. 7. At the king's death all his houſhold ſervants, either in compliance with the laws, or an indiſpenſable cuſtom, killed themſelves, this being looked upon as the ſtrongeſt teſtimony of their ſincere attachment to him. 8. Some of the Ethiopic clans above Meroe on both ſides the Nile, the preceding laws being chiefly confined to that peninſula, and the parts of Ethiopia nearer Egypt, elected the moſt induſtrious ſhepherds to preſide over them; others beſtowed the kingdom upon the moſt opulent perſons they could find, imagining them the moſt capable of ſupplying with their riches the wants and neceſſities of the people [s].

(S) We are informed by Plutarch, that a certain Ethiopian nation always elected a dog for their king, and paid him divine honours. The ſame author, however, judiciouſly obſerves, that all the high poſts were filled with men. Poſſibly the modern kingdom of Zendero, governed always by an elected monarch, who is ſaid to reſemble an ape, or rather to be an ape, may correſpond with this nation. 'Tis certain Diodorus Siculus and Pliny ſtyle the animal now called a baboon cynocephalus, from the reſemblance its head bears to that of a dog; which renders it not improbable, that the creature denominated cyon or dog by Plutarch was an ape or baboon; eſpecially ſince the cynocephalus was produced only in Ethiopia. However, this we can only propoſe to our readers as a conjecture (18).

Religion. JUPITER AMMON, according to the Greek and Latin authors, ſeems to have been the principal object of religious worſhip in Ethiopia, though the natives (U) paid likewiſe divine

(T) This vaſt power the prieſts enjoyed till the time of Ergamenes king of Ethiopia, cotemporary with Ptolemy Philadelphus, who, being a martial prince, advanced to the golden temple of Æſculapius, where they reſided, with a body of troops, and put them all to the ſword. After this he made ſeveral regulations, and in a manner new-modelled the public worſhip of the Ethiopians, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus (19).

divine honours to Iſis, Pan, Hercules, Æſculapius, and others, whom they conſidered as the greateſt benefactors to mankind. In ſhort, if theſe authors may be credited, their religion differed not much from that of the Egyptians, which is not to be wondered at, conſidering their vicinity to, and intercourſe with, that people. However, Diodorus aſſures us, that ſome of them were atheiſts, who looked upon the ſun, by reaſon of his ſcorching rays, as their implacable enemy. Could we depend upon a tradition of the modern Abaſſines, the Ethiopians, or at leaſt a conſiderable part of them, adhered zealouſly to the law of Moſes from the time of Solomon to their converſion to chriſtianity. According to this tradition, the queen of Sheba, whom our Saviour calls the queen of the ſouth, and who ruled over at leaſt a powerful nation of Ethiopia, had a ſon by Solomon named Menilehec, who was educated at that prince's court, and inſtructed there in the law of GOD through the great care of his father. Being afterwards anointed king of Ethiopia, and ſent home to take poſſeſſion of his kingdom, at the deſire of ſeveral eminent Iſraelites, and doctors of the law, that attended him, he introduced there his father's religion, which continued amongſt his ſubjects and their poſterity till the time of St. Athanaſius. What regard is to be paid to this tradition, we ſhall not take upon us to determine; ſince the learned are not a little divided in their ſentiments concerning the ſituation of the kingdom of Sheba, whoſe queen had an interview with Solomon at his own court. St. Cyprian, Epiphanius, St. Cyril of Alexandria, eſtabliſhment. They believed, that for this reaſon, adds he, their ſacrifices were more acceptable to the gods than thoſe offered by any other people. Which notion, continues Diodorus, Homer himſelf ſeems to countenance, when he introduces Jupiter, attended by the other gods, as preſent at an anniverſary ſacrifice, or grand entertainment, prepared for him by the Ethiopians. In order to reward their tranſcendent piety, according to the ſame author, the gods never ſuffered them to be conquered by any foreign prince, Cambyſes, Semiramis, &c. failing in their attempts upon them. But in this, as well as in many other points, he was egregiouſly miſtaken, as will appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory (20).

cardinal Baronius, Suarez, Lorinus, Pineda, Bochart, and the Arabs in general, fix her residence in Arabia Felix. The last call her Belkis, and affirm her to have been the daughter of Hod-Had king of the Homerites. On the other hand, the Abassine nation, Josephus, Origen, St. Austin, the learned Hugo Grotius, the patriarch Alphonso Mendez, the fathers Balthasar Tellez, and Joan Dos-Santos, have placed this celebrated princess in Ethiopia. We have not room to insert here the arguments offered on both sides in defence of their respective opinions; but shall, however, observe, that the kingdom of Abassia seems to answer better the queen of Sheba's country, according to our Saviour's description of it, as being more to the south of, and more remote from, Judæa, than Arabia. To which we may add, that it appears from Scripture, that some persons of distinction amongst the proper Ethiopians were of the same religion with the Jews, or nearly so, in the apostolical age, since queen Candace's treasurer (W), baptized by Philip, went with

(W) Father Calmet and others suppose this eunuch to have been one of those proselytes which the Jews call "a proselyte "of the gate," already by us described. But we must own, that this notion seems to us not a little improbable, since those were only confined to an observance of the seven fundamental laws of natural religion enjoined by Noah to his posterity immediately after the flood, according to the opinion of the Jews, whereas we find this man perusing, and consequently not unacquainted with, the writings of the Old Testament peculiar to the natural Jews. Besides, that a treasurer or prime minister of the queen of Ethiopia should take so long a journey as that from Meroe to Jerusalem purely to worship God, and offer an oblation to him, there, seems very strange, if he was such a mungrel-convert "as the proselytes of the gate were," who, for the most part, if not always, resided in Judæa. It is therefore much more probable, especially as scarce any instance can be produced of so eminent a personage's being ever found amongst the residing proselytes above-mentioned, who were, generally speaking, people of no figure, much less of one who exposed himself to the various dangers of so long a journey purely to worship God at Jerusalem, that this Ethiopian had been trained up in a religion not very different from that of the Jews. Nay, as he was a person of such power and authority at the Ethiopian court, it can by no means be deemed unlikely, that the established religion of Meroe at that time pretty nearly resembled with an offering to Jeruſalem to worſhip God there, and was not unacquainted with the writers of the Old Teſtament; which cannot, we apprehend, be ſaid with ſo much propriety of the Arabians. This ſeems to us a ſort of proof, that the Moſaic law was held to be of divine inſtitution in Meroe, and the other parts of Ethiopia dependent on it, even a conſiderable time before the birth of our Saviour, if not as early as the age of Solomon; and conſequently adds ſome weight to the arguments of thoſe writers, who have aſſerted, that the queen of Sheba came out of Ethiopia. It likewiſe renders the authority of Joſephus preferable to that of Diodorus Siculus and Stephanus, notwithſtanding what M. Bochart has advanced. For, if any regard was paid to the law of Moſes in Meroe, before chriſtianity made its appearance in the world, we cannot account for this better than by allowing, with the Abaſſines and authors above-mentioned, that this peninſula was the queen of Sheba's country, that her ſon introduced ſome knowledge of the public worſhip of the Hebrews there, and conſequently that its metropolis was called Sheba or Seba before Cambyſes's reign, as Joſephus aſſerts, and not built by that prince, as Diodorus Siculus and Stephanus will have it. Be that as it will, this appears to have been a prevailing notion amongſt ſome of the Jews and Greeks in Joſephus's time, and Herodotus was then cited to ſupport it, however his text, or that of Joſephus, may be now corrupted; ſince the latter hiſtorian cannot fairly be ſuppoſed ſo profligate and abandoned a writer as to impoſe a known falſhood and forgery upon the world, as Bochart aſſerts reſembled the Jewiſh. This appears to be in ſome ſort confirmed by the prophet Zephaniah, who ſeems evidently to predict the converſion of the eunuch here under conſideration, and even to inſinuate, that he came to Jeruſalem with an offering from queen Candace herſelf, ſince nothing is more likely, than that ſhe was the daughter of his diſperſed beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, that ſhould bring his offering; which, if admitted, muſt be allowed no mean proof of what we would here ſuggeſt; but this, as well as every thing dependent upon it, muſt be left to the determination of our learned and judicious readers (21).

him to have done. However, it must be owned, that Strabo suggests the people of Meroe in his time to have adored Hercules, Pan, and Isis, with another foreign god. But Strabo's authority in this point cannot overturn what is insinuated by Scripture: nay, he seems to be a little inconsistent with himself, since in the same breath he assures us, that the Ethiopians in general acknowledged an immortal God, whom they considered as the first principle of all things, and a mortal god, who had no name. Such a notion might easily be formed by remote nations, who knew very little of the Ethiopians, upon supposition that some of them for a certain period worshipped the true God, and held the memory of Moses in the highest veneration. Far more absurd things than these the Greek and Latin writers related of the Jews, with whom they had a more immediate communication; and therefore we ought not to be surprised at their transmitting to us so imperfect an account of the religious tenets of the Ethiopians; tho' it should be acknowledged, that, during a certain interval, they agreed in the main with those of the Jews. The author last cited likewise informs us, that the Ethiopians ranked in the number of their deities all their most eminent benefactors, and those who were distinguished by their birth. The sun, according to him, the people under consideration in the most early times so highly adored, that they reputed those to be atheists who cursed him at his rising, as some such there were inhabiting the Torrid Zone, because he forced them to shelter themselves from his intense heat in moist and marshy places. For this reason the Greeks and Romans gave the Sun the name of the Ethiopian Jupiter. The Ethiopians themselves called him Assabin or Assabinus, as we learn from Pliny. They consecrated likewise to him the cinamon-tree, an odoriferous shrub, which grew in their country. The priests only were allowed to gather that harvest, which they always ushered in with sacrifices of forty-four oxen, goats, and sheep, beginning the work that followed before sun-rising, and finishing it before his setting. The crop being gathered, they divided it into three parts with a spear, which was never used but on that occasion. They carried away two portions of it, and left on the same place that which fell to the sun; and forthwith, say Pliny, Solinus, and Theophrastus, if the division had been performed with equity, the sun's portion took fire fire of itſelf, and was conſumed (X). This ceremony ſeems to have been common to both the Ethiopians above Egypt, and the Sabæans ſeated in Arabia Felix. Banier believes the Ethiopians to have had gods natural, and gods animated, as well as the Egyptians; that they worſhipped the moon under the name of Iſis, and univerſal nature under that of Pan. We doubt not but this may be true; eſpecially, ſince they, in all likelihood, at firſt worſhipped the planets, or ſome of them, in common with the Egyptians and Arabians, and likewiſe paid divine honours to their deceaſed kings, as did thoſe nations together with the Mauritanians. Among thoſe princes deified by this laſt people were the famous Juba, and Verſotina, who was probably either one of their queens, or ſome other woman of the firſt diſtinction ſignalized by her glorious actions. The Ethiopians of Meroe, according to Herodotus, in his time, worſhipped Jupiter and Bacchus, and had an oracle of Jupiter. Some Ethiopian nations offered ſacrifies to the day, which they eſteemed as a god, according to Lucian. An antient tradition prevails amongſt the Abaſſines, that the firſt Ethiopians adored a monſtrous ſerpent called in their language Arwe-midre; but this ſavours ſo much of fable, that our readers will probably think it deſerves little regard [t].

(X) For our part we are apt to believe, that the prieſts ſecretly conveyed ſome coals under the heap that was allotted to the Sun; and that thoſe coals kindled ſome moments after, preciſely at the time of their retiring. Such pious frauds have been,

Language. In a country of ſo vaſt an extent as Ethiopia, inhabited by various nations, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that no ſmall variety of languages, at leaſt of dialects, muſt have prevailed. The moſt antient of theſe was undoubtedly that called by the learned the Ethiopic, into which the holy Scripture was formerly tranſlated, and in which all the books of the Abaſſines, both ſacred and profane, are written. Some authors have informed us, that this language nearly reſembles the Chaldee; but, according to Ludolphus, who ſpent above ſixty years in the ſtudy of it, it bears as great an affinity to the Hebrew and Syriac, and approaches nearer ſtill to the Arabic, from which to him it ſeems immediately to be derived. In ſhort, there is ſo perfect an agreement betwixt them, that whoever underſtands the one, may, without any difficulty, if we will credit him, make himſelf maſter of the other; nay, he aſſerts, that a competent knowledge of the Hebrew, or any other of the oriental tongues, will enable a ſtudent ſoon to make a very laudable progreſs in the Ethiopic. As many Hebrew (Y) roots, and genuine ſignifications of Hebrew words, are ſtill preſerved been, and ſtill are, uſed in countries whoſe religion utterly diſclaims frauds and impoſtures of any kind whatſoever, in order to ſerve ſuch a turn as theſe prieſts of the Sun had in view: witneſs the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius at Naples, &c.

(Y) Of this we ſhall beg leave here to produce two inſtances: 1. The Hebrew lexicographers derive the Hebrew and Phœnician word Adamah, earth, from אדם red, pretending the earth to be of a red colour, from whence it receives that denomination. But Kimchi takes no notice of this derivation in his collection of Hebrew roots; and how ſmall a part of the earth, in compariſon of the whole, is red, no naturaliſt ſtands in need of being informed. This etymon therefore is at beſt mal-à-propos. But the Ethiopic language ſuggeſts to us a much more proper one, when it propoſes to our view the word Adamah ſignifying "beautiful, elegant, pleaſant, &c" from whence if we deduce the Hebrew and Phœnician Adamah, Earth, it will not be remote from the κόσμος of the Greeks, though that ſeems to have had a more extenſive ſignification. Upon this ſuppoſition, Adam derived his name not from a certain fictitious redneſs, but from the beauty and perfection of his nature, being, as it were, the maſter-piece of the creation. And agreeably hereto the Ethiopians to the word preſerved in the Ethiopic, which would be ſought for in vain either in their own or any other language except this, it certainly merits the eſteem of all who diligently apply themſelves to the ſtudy of the Scriptures. Beſides, 'tis impoſſible to come at a thorough knowledge of the Abaſſine affairs, this being the language in which all their hiſtories, and other treatiſes, are penned, without being tolerably well acquainted with it. The pureſt dialect of this tongue was that uſed in the kingdom of Tigre, where Axuma, the reſidence of the old Ethiopian kings, was ſeated. Here it continued till the failure of the Zagean line; after which, a Sewan prince aſcending the throne, the Amharic dialect was introduced at court, and gradually diffuſed itſelf over the whole empire. However, the language ſpoken in Tigre at preſent comes the neareſt to the old Ethiopic; which ſtill retains its priſtine dignity not only in their books, but alſo in their divine worſhip, as alſo in their kings letters patents, commiſſions, and all other publick acts whatſoever. Father Tellez informs us, that in his time there were as many languages as kingdoms and provinces in Abaſſia: nay, that there were different dialects in one and the ſame kingdom.

word Adam always annex the idea of ſomething perfect and beautiful. Nor is it improbable, that the city Admah or Adamah, before it was deſtroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah, ſeated upon the banks of the Jordan, compared to "the garden of the LORD," was ſo denominated from the pleaſantneſs of its ſituation. 2. The word מלאך Malach, an Angel or Meſſenger, is not to be deduced from the Arabic Malaka, poſſedit, dominatus eſt, &c. for that is not ſufficiently appoſite, but from the Ethiopic Layka, miſit, legavit, &c. Nay, ſometimes the roots of Arabic words themſelves are to be ſought for in the Ethiopic: ſo in the Alcoran the apoſtles are called Hhawwâri, whoſe origin cannot be diſcovered in the Arabic lexicons, ſince it certainly comes from the Ethiopic Hawyra, ivit, inceſſit, &c. than which nothing can be more ſuitable to the office of an apoſtle. Our readers will find this point more fully diſcuſſed by the learned Ludolphus, to whom, for their further ſatisfaction, we muſt beg leave to refer them. (23).

kingdom. As the language of Tigre is at preſent deeply tinged with the antient Ethiopic, ſo thoſe of moſt of the other kingdoms partake greatly of the Amharic; though they conſiderably differ one from another. The people of Bagemdra or Bagemeder uſe a dialect peculiar to themſelves; thoſe of Hangota, Ifata, Gojam, and Shewa, one common to them all; the Gafatas have many Amharic words, but their tongue is extremely difficult to be underſtood by any of the other Abaſſines; in the kingdom of Dambea a language is ſpoken very different from both the Amharic and Ethiopic; the dialect of Gonga agrees with that of Enarea, though it does not bear a near reſemblance to any of the others in Ethiopia. But we ſhall entertain our readers with a more particular account of all theſe, as well as thoſe of the Gallans, Agawi, Chankalas, &c. when we come to the modern hiſtory of Abaſſia [u].

As it will be expected, that we ſhould ſay ſomething of the letters, or (Z) alphabetic characters, of the nation we are

(Z) We are informed by Diodorus Siculus, that the Ethiopians had antiently hieroglyphic characters as well as the Egyptians. Thus amongſt them a hawk ſignified any thing that made a quick diſpatch, that bird in ſwiftneſs exceeding moſt others; the crocodile denoted malice; the eye the maintainer of juſtice, and the guard of the body; the right-hand, open, repreſented plenty; and the left, cloſed, a ſecure poſſeſſion of property, &c. But whether the Egyptians or Ethiopians firſt in reality hit upon this way of writing, cannot certainly be known, though Diodorus attributes the invention of it to the latter. 'Tis not improbable, that the people of all nations at firſt recorded their conceptions by tracing out the images of things in a coarſe manner, which was gradually improved into hieroglyphics, as in ſome meaſure appears from the rude picture-writing of the Mexicans, the antient character of the Chineſe, and from what we find related of the Scythians by Clemens Alexandrinus, Euſtathius, and Herodotus.

Theſe hieroglyphic characters, according to the ſame Diodorus, were not only underſtood by the prieſts, as amongſt the Egyptians,

Egytians, but likewiſe by all the people, as well as the alphabet here mentioned. However, it does not appear from that author, as M. Fourmont ſeems to aſſert, that the Ethiopic alphabet was made up of theſe hieroglyphic characters; nor indeed can this be allowed very probable, the letters of an alphabet being eſſentially different from even the characteriſtic marks deduced from hieroglyphics. The laſt repreſent things, ideas, or even whole conceptions, in the ſame manner as the antient and modern characters of the Chineſe, whereas the former are expreſſive of ſounds. In ſhort, though we ſhould allow it an eaſy tranſition from the rude picture-writing of the Mexicans to the Egyptian hieroglyphics, as well as from the Egyptian hieroglyphics to the characteriſtic marks of the Chineſe, which Du Halde demonſtrates to be perfectly hieroglyphic, yet we cannot ſee how the invention of an alphabet muſt as naturally ſucceed theſe marks. There is, it muſt be owned, a ſufficient reſemblance between the American and Egyptian hieroglyphics and the Chineſe characters; but theſe all ſeem entirely foreign to alphabetic letters, and in reality do not bear the leaſt relation to them. As an affinity between all theſe is the point neceſſary to be proved, in order to evince a gradual and eaſy deſcent from picture-writing to letters, ſome better argument ought to be offered in ſupport of it, than a ſuppoſition extremely precarious, if not plainly falſe, and which, if true, would be little to the purpoſe. Now, that the notion of the Ethiopic alphabet's being made up of hieroglyphics is ſuch a ſuppoſition, evidently appears from what we have juſt hinted, as well as from the antient alphabet of that nation exhibited by Ludolphus; and yet the very learned and ingenious Mr. Warburton has in fact offered only this hypotheſis, on M. Fourmont's authority, to prove the connection between an alphabet and hieroglyphics. How far, therefore, all novel opinions, founded upon the truth of ſuch a connection, are to be depended upon, we leave our readers to judge. Diodorus indeed, in the ſame place, intimates, that the forms of the Ethiopic letters (τύπους) reſembled various animals, parts of human bodies, artificers tools, &c. But that this is not to be underſtood of alphabetic letters, but hieroglyphics, follows from what he immediately ſubjoins: "For their "writing (ἡ γραμματικὴ) is expreſſive of the ſubject, not by "a compoſition of ſyllables, but by the ſignification of certain "images delineated, and a metaphorical application of it im-"preſſed on the memory by exerciſe. For, they write (γράφουσι) "a hawk, a crocodile, a ſerpent, a part of the human body, as "an eye, a hand, the face, &c. A hawk ſignifies with them "diſpatch readers will not be diſpleaſed to find here the antient Ethiopic alphabet, as given us by the learned Job Ludolphus in his excellent hiſtory of Ethiopia.

From comparing theſe letters with the old oriental alphabets taken from antique coins, inſcriptions, &c. by Lœſcher, and

" diſpatch, becauſe this bird in celerity exceeds almoſt all o" thers, &c." Nay, he here expreſly aſſerts, that the Ethiopic letters were the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and conſequently allows, that they could not be alphabetic characters : this paſſage, therefore, which ſeems to have miſled M. Fourmont, is ſo far from proving the Ethiopian alphabet to have conſiſted of hieroglyphic characters, that it ſtrongly intimates the contrary.

Heliodorus ſays, that the Ethiopians had two ſorts of letters, the one called regal, the other vulgar ; and that the regal reſembled the ſacerdotal characters of the Egyptians. Diogenes Laertius, from Thraſyllus, alſo informs us, that Democritus wrote two books, the one of the ſacred letters of the Babylonians, the other of the ſacred letters of the city of Meroe. M. Fourmont believes, that moſt of the eaſtern nations likewiſe had a ſacerdotal alphabet (24.)

and conſulting what we have already obſerved in our account of the Carthaginian, it may perhaps not ſeem abſolutely improbable, that ſome of them were derived from the old Aſſyrian, Phœnician, Samaritan, Syriac, &c. characters. The number of the letters likewiſe in this alphabet, and the names of ſeveral of them, tend to evince the ſame thing, though Ludolphus believes them to have been invented by the Axumites or Ethiopians themſelves, and to be much older than even the Cuphic character of the Arabs. 'Tis remarkable, that the Abaſſines have no grammar; and, that when Gregory was ſhewn the uſe of one, he could not forbear breaking out into a ſort of exclamation, crying out, "Thanks to GOD!" as though ſome ſecret of great importance had been diſcovered to him. We muſt not forget obſerving, that the Ethiopians both wrote and read from the left-hand to the right, contrary to the cuſtom of the Orientals; which looks like an indication, that their alphabet was not of the ſame extraction with that of the Arabs. But for a farther account of the antient Ethiopic letters, as well as language, we muſt beg leave to refer the curious and inquiſitive part of our readers to Ludolphus's Ethiopic hiſtory, commentaries, and grammar, which are generally allowed to be the beſt pieces of their kind extant [w].

THE Ethiopians, as has been already obſerved, agreed in ſeveral points with the Egyptians, though they had many cuſtoms peculiar to themſelves, ſome of which were very ſingular and uncommon. As we have not time at preſent to expatiate upon all ſuch cuſtoms to be met with in hiſtory, we muſt content ourſelves with touching upon ſome of the principal of them. 1. The Ethiopian Ichthyophagi differed from other nations in ſeveral particulars. By ſtopping up the paſſages of certain caverns on the coaſt of the Red Sea with ſtones, they incloſed vaſt numbers of large and ſmall fiſhes, which, upon the reflux of the tide, were left there as in a net, and ſerved them for food. The women and children employed themſelves in throwing on ſhore thoſe of a leſſer ſize, whilſt the men ſecured the ſharks, ſea-calves, con- Cuſtoms. gers.

gers, monſtrous lobſters, &c. with which the aforeſaid ſea abounded, killing them with ſharp goat-horns, and rough ſtones broken off the rocks. Theſe they expoſed to the ſolar rays in ſtone pots turned towards the ſouth, where the fleſh was ſoon ſeparated from the bones by the intenſe heat. The latter they applied to the uſe already mentioned, and boiled up the former with the ſeed of paliurus. The maſs formed by theſe two ingredients was at firſt liquid, and of a reddiſh colour; but being ſpread upon tiles, and dried, or rather baked, by the ſun, it became hard and ſavoury. This they commonly fed upon; but when any inundations happened, that they could not for ſeveral days together approach the ſhore, they were conſtrained to eat ſhell-fiſh, ſome of which were ſo large, that they weighed four minas. If theſe at any time failed, they found themſelves obliged to have recourſe to the bones, though deſtined for another uſe, which preſerved them till the ſea ſent them their uſual ſupplies. They drank water only every fifth day, but that in ſuch immoderate quantities, that they were ſcarce able to breathe. They ſeemed not to utter any articulate ſounds, and conſequently to be void of a language. Some of them, according to Agatharchides, never drank at all, living only upon raw fiſh. Theſe, continues the ſame author, might have been deemed perfect ſtoics, as being never ruffled or diſcompoſed by the violence of any prevailing paſſion. However barbarous their neighbours might take them to be, they had the art of teaching the phocæ or ſea-calves, produced by the neighbouring gulph, to aſſiſt them in catching other fiſh. Several clans of them lived in ſuch caves as we have deſcribed in the former ſection; others erected huts of fir-trees, which grew there in great abundance, bearing fruit like a cheſnut, of the boughs and leaves of which they formed a ſort of canopy, whereby, together with the pleaſant breezes coming from off the ſea, they were ſheltered from the ſcorching rays of the ſun; and laſtly, others fixed their habitations in certain inacceſſible hollows ſurrounded with high precipices and the ſea. The Ichthyophagi for the moſt part enjoyed an uninterrupted ſtate of health, but few of them attained to old age, as above obſerved. They carried their dead to the ſea-ſhore, where they lay expoſed till the return of the tide, which carried them off; ſo that, as they fed upon fiſh in their life-time, they after their death in return afforded thoſe animals a repaſt. 2. The Chelonophagi above-mentioned did not only uſe the fleſh of tortoiſes for food, but likewiſe covered their huts or cottages with the ſhells of thoſe animals. As both in ſize and figure theſe ſhells reſembled a ſmall fiſhing-veſſel, the Chelonophagi alſo uſed them as boats on ſome occaſions. They had a particular manner of ſurpriſing this fiſh, which we find deſcribed from Agatharchides by Diodorus Siculus. 3. Another Ethiopic canton lived upon fiſh of the cetaceous kind, which they found thrown upon the ſhore by chance. When they were preſſed by famine, they devoured the bones of thoſe creatures, whoſe fleſh at other times ſuſtained them. 4. The Ethiopian Rhizophagi, after they had waſhed the roots of the canes growing in marſhy ground, bruiſed them, and prepared them by the heat of the ſun, fared deliciouſly upon them. This canton was greatly infeſted by lions, which came out of the deſerts in vaſt numbers, and had quite depopulated the country they inhabited, had not a prodigious multitude of gnats of an enormous ſize annually expelled them from thence. At the ſame time the Rhizophagi, in order to avoid theſe gnats, retired towards the moraſſes, which greatly contributed to their preſervation. 5. The Hylophagi were people of ſuch ſurpriſing activity, that they ſkipped from one tree to another like birds. They always went naked, lived upon the young ſhoots of trees, had their wives in common, and frequently quarrelled about their reſpective habitations. On theſe occaſions they fought with clubs, after the manner of the Libyans, which ſometimes did great execution. 6. One tribe of Ethiopians, watching an opportunity, killed leopards, buffaloes, &c. after they had drank ſo copiouſly, that they were ready to burſt, with clubs burnt at one end, ſtones, darts, &c. in the manner deſcribed by Agatharchides and Diodorus Siculus. They trained up their children in throwing the dart, and would not ſuffer them to eat till they had hit the mark. 7. Another Ethiopic nation had two very particular ways of taking elephants, hinted at by us above, for a full deſcription of which our readers muſt have recourſe to the authors laſt mentioned. 8. The Struthophagi had ſeveral arts and devices to take oſtriches, on which they fed. That animal defended itſelf againſt them with ſtones, which it threw out of its feet, in this reſpect reſembling a ſling, with great violence. The Struthophagi of the ſkins of theſe oſtriches made both garments and coverlets for their beds. 9. The Acridophagi phagi had a deep valley in their country, of many furlongs extent, which they took care to fill with wood, and other combuſtible materials; and, when the ſouth wind drove vaſt numbers of locuſts thither, ſet them on fire, the ſmoak ſuffocating all thoſe animals. Such infinite numbers of locuſts were deſtroyed on theſe occaſions, that the ground for ſome leagues was covered with their bodies, which the people under conſideration ſeaſoned with ſalt, produced moſt copiouſly in their territories, and lived upon for the following year. But they were probably very unwholſome food; for the Acridophagi (Z) did not exceed the age of forty years, and at laſt died in a miſerable manner. They were devoured by winged inſects of different ſpecies, of a ſtrange and ugly form, expiring for the moſt part in exquiſite torture. Poſſibly the air itſelf as well as the locuſts, might have greatly contributed to ſo uncommon and fatal a malady. 10. The Cynamolgi, ſeated in the ſouthern parts of Ethiopia, wore long beards, and kept dogs extremely fierce, in order to hunt (A) Indian oxen, prodigious herds of which came every year amongſt them. 11. The nations placed ſtill more to the ſouth, according to Agatharchides and Diodorus, lived the life of ſavages, if not that of the worſt of brutes. From hence we are inclined to believe, that the Cafres were not unknown to the antients, and conſequently that they had ſeen more of the ſouthern parts of Africa than the moderns imagine. 12. The above-mentioned authors inform us, that the greateſt part of the Troglodytes (B) in their manner of life nearly reſembled the

(Z) Plutarch mentions a tribe of Ethiopians that were very ſhort-lived, the oldeſt among them ſcarce ever exceeding the age of thirty years. Theſe were probably the Acridophagi of Agatharchides Cnidius, Diodorus Siculus, and Pliny (25).

(A) The antients ſometimes included the weſtern and proper Ethiopia, as well as Arabia, under the name of India.

(B) We are informed by Strabo, that all the different ſpecies of cattle theſe Ethiopians took with them from place to place were extremely ſmall. Their dogs were likewiſe very little, but vaſtly fierce. Some of theſe Ethiopians, or at leaſt the neighbouring cantons, lived chiefly upon barley and millet; which ſerved them both for meat and drink. They alſo uſed butter and fat inſtead of oil. Their kings had divine honours paid them, and never appeared in public, in order the more greatly to attract the veneration of their ſubjects (26).

(25) Plut. de placit. philoſophor. (26) Strab. l. xvii. p. 565. ed. 1587.

the Libyan Nomades, that they were divided into tribes, and that all of theſe were under one ſupreme head. This confirms what we have elſewhere obſerved of the form of government antiently prevailing in Numidia and Mauritania. 13. The Troglodytes, during the time of the Eteſian winds, drank a liquor compoſed of blood and milk boiled up together. In the ſummer months they lived about the moraſſes with their flocks, where they frequently fought for convenient paſtures. The old and infirm cattle always ſupplied them with food, for which reaſon they called the males their fathers, and the females their mothers, never giving thoſe denominations to their natural parents. They had no other garments than a few beaſts ſkins, with which they covered only their loins. 14. They held all their old women in the higheſt veneration, inſomuch that, in their moſt bloody conteſts, if any of them appeared, they threw down their arms. When the men were worn out with age, they tied themſelves by the neck to an ox's tail, and were dragged about till they expired; and, if upon admonition from a friend they refuſed to do this, they might be ſtrangled without any crime. As it was deemed an unpardonable offence to deſire life when a perſon was incapable of contributing to the welfare of the public, if any one amongſt them was ſeized with an incurable diſtemper, or maimed by accident, it was not only lawful, but meritorious, to diſpatch him. Their dead they carried to the top of ſome hill, where they firſt covered them with ſtones, and then fixed a goat's horn upon them. So void were they of a ſenſe of compaſſion, that the ceremony of burying the deceaſed in this manner was one of their moſt celebrated diverſions. 15. The Ethiopians made uſe of bows and arrows, darts, lances, and ſeveral other weapons (C), in their wars, which they managed with great ſtrength and dexterity. 16. Circumciſion (D) was a rite obſerved amongſt them, as well as

(C) The Megabari, a canton, as ſhould ſeem, of the Troglodytes, fought with clubs, and carried before them round ſhields made of raw ox-hides; many of their neighbours, however, were armed with bows and arrows (27).

(D) We have obſerved in a former note, that Herodotus is not entirely conſiſtent with himſelf in what he ſays of circumciſion, as a rite practiſed in Egypt and Ethiopia; which muſt undoubtedly not a little contribute towards invalidating his authority in this

(27) Diod. Sic. l. iii. Strab. l. xvi. p. 776.

the Egyptians, from very early antiquity, though which of these

this particular. But, waving this conſideration, when he aſſerts circumciſion to have prevailed ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning, amongſt the Egyptians, Colchi, and Ethiopians, he cannot be ſuppoſed to mean, that they received it from their firſt anceſtors. For in ſuch a caſe it muſt have paſſed from him to the Philiſtines, who were likewiſe his deſcendents; which all, who pay the leaſt regard to ſcripture, will allow to be falſe. That expreſſion, therefore, muſt either import indefinitely, that it had been obſerved in Egypt from time immemorial, or from ſome period near the beginning of the great Egyptian empire formed by Ammenemes and Seſac, about the reign of Solomon, one of the greateſt and moſt powerful princes of his age, and in alliance with Egypt, between five and ſix hundred years before Herodotus wrote his hiſtory. And here in fact ſeveral learned men have placed the introduction of this inſtitution into Egypt. Beſides, what has been advanced by Herodotus, in the point before us, ſeems to be founded on a miſtake, as may be inferred from Diodorus and Strabo. Thoſe authors, who probably followed him, believed, or at leaſt pretended to believe, the Hebrews to have derived the rite of circumciſion from Egypt, becauſe they were originally a colony of the Egyptians, and conſequently agreed with them in all their cuſtoms and manners, in both their ſacred and civil inſtitutions. But, as nothing can be more falſe than ſuch a notion, not the leaſt regard is due to what they have advanced upon a ſuppoſition of its truth. That the Samaritans or Cuthœans, whom Herodotus calls Syrians of Paleſtine, ſhould declare to him, that they received circumciſion from the Egyptians, muſt be attributed to their hatred of the Jews. As for Herodotus, he was frequently impoſed upon moſt egregiouſly by the Egyptians, eſpecially in points relating either to the antiquity of their monarchy, or thoſe cuſtoms they had in common with other nations. Their exceſſive vanity would not permit them to ſpeak the truth, when they imagined it would reflect the leaſt honour or glory upon any of the neighbouring ſtates. For which reaſon, as well as others that might be offered, and particularly becauſe it ſeems to us diametrically oppoſite to ſcripture, we cannot pay any regard to the ſentiments of thoſe authors, who either deduced circumciſion originally out of Egypt, or make the Hebrews to have borrowed it of the Egyptians (28).

theſe nations firſt received it, cannnot certainly be known. 17. The Ethiopian ſoldiers tied their arrows round their (E) heads, the feathered part of which touched their foreheads, temples, &c. and the other projected out like ſo many rays, which formed a kind of crown. Theſe arrows were extremely ſhort, pointed with ſharp ſtones inſtead of iron, and dipped in the virus of dragons, or ſome other lethiferous poiſon, inſomuch that all the wounds given by them were attended with immediate death. The bows from which they ſhot theſe arrows were four cubits long, and required ſo much ſtrength to manage them, that no nation could make uſe of them but the Ethiopians. According to ſeveral authors, when they came to a general action with an enemy, they darkened the air with clouds or ſhowers of thoſe arrows. Many tribes of the people now under conſideration, particularly the Blemmyes, had wonderful ſkill in uſing the weapons here mentioned, taking aim ſo well, and hitting the mark ſo exactly, that ſome of the antients imagined every individual of them to have had four eyes. The Ethiopians retreated fighting in the ſame manner as the Parthians, diſcharging vollies of arrows with ſuch dexterity and addreſs whilſt they were retiring full ſpeed, that they terribly galled the enemy. It appears from Scylax, Horace, and Ælian, that the Mauritanians and Blacks, or weſtern Ethiopians, were likewiſe very expert archers, and ſhot poiſoned arrows; and the ſame thing has been obſerved of their poſterity by the epitomizer of Edriſi, or, as he is more uſually called, the Nubian geographer. 18. Their lances or darts were of an immenſe ſize, which may be deemed a farther proof of their vaſt bodily ſtrength. 19. The Macrobian or long-lived Ethiopians fed for the moſt part upon roaſted fleſh, drank milk, and frequently attained to the age of one hundred and twenty years. 'Tis ſaid, that this longevity was principally owing to a rich and fragrant fountain rendering their bodies ſmooth as if anointed with oil, and perfuming them with the odour of violets, wherein they frequently bathed themſelves. 20. Theſe Ethiopians looked upon braſs as the moſt valuable of metals, and had gold in

(E) Before they took any arrows from their heads, in order to begin a general action, they had a particular kind of dance, as we learn from Lucian. But how ſuch a cuſtom came firſt to be introduced amongſt them, or what they intended by it, has not not been intimated by any antient author (29).

ſuch little eſteem, that they fettered their priſoners with golden chains. 21. They dried the bodies (F) of their anceſtors, and laid thereon a covering of white plaiſter, on which they drew a picture as nearly reſembling the deceaſed as poſſible, and incloſed the whole in a caſe of cryſtal, according to Herodotus. Diodorus alſo affirms, that they kept the bodies of their friends and relations in their houſes within caſes of glaſs, not thinking it right, that the knowlege of the features and the likeneſs of their dead relations, ſhould be concealed from their ſurviving kindred, or that they ſhould be forgotten by their poſterity. Herodotus adds, that the dead were clearly ſeen through the cryſtal above-mentioned, emitting no ill ſcent, nor being at all diſagreeable to the eye, ſince they perfectly reſembled the perſons when alive. They were kept, continues the ſame author, a whole year in the houſes of their neareſt relations, who, during that term, honoured their manes with ſacrifices, and firſt-fruits of all kinds: after which they carried them out, and placed them upright round the parts adjoining to their cities. 22. Other Ethiopic cantons buried their dead in earthen coffins about their temples, and ſwore by their manes, as has been before related of the Naſamones; and laſtly, others threw them into the river, looking upon this as the beſt ſort of burial that could poſſibly be allotted them. 23. Some of the Ethiopians had no regular meals, or ſtated times of eating, but always refreſhed themſelves when hunger and thirſt prompted them thereto. 24. The Ethiopian Anthropophagi lived upon human fleſh, as we learn from Philoſtratus, Pliny, Solinus, and Ptolemy. This ſeems fully to evince, that the Cafres, and conſequently the territories they inhabited,

(F) In another place the ſame Diodorus obſerves, that when the corſe came from the embalmer's, the very eye-laſhes, brows, and features, were ſo well preſerved, that the whole form of the body was invariably retained, and the original effigies or likeneſs known. Wherefore, continues he, many of the Egyptians kept the bodies of their anceſtors within magnificent repoſitories, in order to behold the complete images of thoſe who had been dead perhaps many ages before they themſelves had been born. There they not only ſaw the lineaments of their faces, but alſo the make of their bodies; all which they contemplated with great delight (30).

Arts, &c.

As the Ethiopians agreed with the Egyptians in moſt of their laws, their ſplendid funerals, the (H) deification of their princes, the ſeveral colleges of prieſts, circumciſion, and in fine moſt of their ſacred and civil inſtitutions, 'tis highly probable, that the ſame arts, ſciences, and learning, as well as religion, prevailed amongſt both nations. Nay, this ſeems to be expreſly aſſerted by Diodorus Siculus, when he informs us, that not only the ſame kind of ſtatues, but likewiſe the ſame hieroglyphic figures and characters, were uſed in Egypt and Ethiopia; ſince it is generally allowed, that thoſe were the repoſitories of the Egyptian wiſdom and literature. It muſt be owned, that an ingenious modern writer roundly affirms, that no nation beſides the Egyptians continued to write with marks after the invention of letters; all others immediately dropping their hieroglyphics on the diſcovery of that more commodious method, becauſe the Egyptian hieroglyphics only contained any wiſdom or learning. But theſe ſeem to be aſſertions not only arbitrary and precarious, but plainly

Nay, according to him, the Egyptians derived ſtatuary, and even their letters themſelves from the ſame ſource. This author alſo obſerves, that the Egyptian and Ethiopian prieſts, as well as kings, wore caps wreathed round with ſerpents called aſps; by which was intimated, that every perſon guilty of treaſon would as certainly ſuffer death, as if he had been bit by that poiſonous animal (32).

falſe, as appearing both incapable of proof, and diametrically oppoſite to what Diodorus Siculus has advanced from the beſt authors who had written before his time of the nation we are now upon. Nay, that they had perſons amongſt them eminent for their wiſdom, may be inferred from a writer cited by Photius; and that there was a great affinity betwixt them and the Ægyptians, in moſt points of importance, ſeems to have been the general ſentiment of the Romans as well as the Greeks, as is implied by Feſtus, when he calls them Egyptini. Homer alſo celebrates both their wiſdom and religion, when he makes Jupiter, and the reſt of the gods, to attend their entertainments. That they even were inſtructed in ſeveral branches of literature by Moſes himſelf, who was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians, may be collected from Artapanus in Euſebius, Joſephus, and others. But, waving all other proofs and authorities that might be offered in favour of the point here inſiſted upon, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that a nation ſo near Egypt, the centre of learning and politeneſs in very early ages, with which the Ethiopians always kept open a communication, and ſo potent as this appears from hiſtory in moſt times to have been, could not avoid arriving at a very laudable degree of (I) knowledge both in the liberal arts and ſciences, and thoſe termed mechanical [y].

THE Ethiopians were naturally bold and intrepid, but violent in their temper. They likewiſe ſurpaſſed moſt other nations in beauty, and largeneſs of ſize, to which a proportionable

(I) Lucian makes the Ethiopians to have excelled all other nations in wiſdom and literature. According to him, they invented aſtronomy and aſtrology, and communicated thoſe ſciences, as well as many other branches of learning to the Egyptians. As their country was very fit for making celeſtial obſervations, ſuch a notion ſeems not entirely groundleſs; though ſcarce any particulars of their knowledge have reached us (33).

tionable degree of ſtrength was generally annexed. For which reaſon Herodotus intimates, that the Macrobii conferred the royal dignity upon the moſt beautiful, large, and ſtrongeſt perſon they could find amongſt them. Both they and the Arabians had an invincible averſion to mice, as we learn from Plutarch. If the modern Abaſſines reſemble their anceſtors, they were well-ſhaped, of a generous diſpoſition, and exceeding quick parts. Upon the ſame ſuppoſition, ſome of them muſt have been free, chearful, humane, forgivers of injuries, and great lovers of (K) juſtice. According to various authors, the proper antient Ethiopians were, for the moſt part, perfectly black, as we find their poſterity at this day, tho' ſome particular cantons were white, called, by Pliny, white Ethiopians. 'Tis probable they were pleaſed with their natural colour, and preferred it to thoſe of other nations. Some writers affirm, that the children of the preſent Abaſſines are terrified at the ſight of an European, as much as ours are at that of a Negro; and that they paint the devil white, in order to ridicule all complexions of, or bordering upon, that colour. Others relate, that in ſome provinces of Abaſſia the people are of an olive-colour; that in general they are born white, with a black ſpot upon their navel, which in a ſhort time after their birth ſpreads over their whole body; and that, being tranſported into Europe, they become white at the ſecond or third generation. Gregory the Abaſſine informed Ludolphus, that his countrymen came into the world of a reddiſh hue, but in a ſhort time turned black. Their women are ſtrong and luſty, and bring forth with little pain, as uſually happens in the warmer climates. When they are in labour they kneel down upon their knees, as the Hebrew women did, and are delivered without the help of a midwife.

Many

(K) Pauſanias, when he diſtinguiſhes the proper Ethiopians from thoſe bordering upon the Mauri and Naſamones, remarks, that the people of Meroe, as well as the other neighbouring Ethiopians, were eminent for their love of juſtice. This obſervation was probably truer than what he ſubjoins to it, viz. that the Ethiopians had no other river but the Nile; though as all other rivers join the Nile, this is no unpardonable miſtake. However, the accounts he had received of the country inhabited by that people were not over-accurate; as we may collect from his confounding the Ethiopian ox or bull with the rhinoceros, and other inſtances that might be produced (34).

(34) Pauſan. in Bœotic. & in Attic. p. 62, 63.

Many, if not all, of these particulars undoubtedly held equally true of the antient Ethiopians, who, from what is observable in their posterity, seem to have been likewise very patient of labour, capable of bearing the greatest fatigues, and endued with uncommon vivacity. Lastly, from Herodotus compared with the relations of some modern authors, 'tis not unlikely, that they died purely of old-age, a few only excepted, who either fell by the sword, or were devoured by wild beasts, as Sallust has observed of the antient Africans [z].

CHAP. VII.

The history of the Ethiopians, to the usurpation of the Zagæan family, which commenced about the year of Christ 960.

Where the first kingdom of Cush was situated uncertain.

WE have already observed, that not only the vast tract stretching from the southern limits of Egypt to Libya Incognita, and the peninsula of Arabia, as well as one part of it on the coast of the Red Sea, contiguous to Egypt, but likewise Susiana, called by the Orientals Khuzestân, and the country watered by the Araxes, the seat of the antient Scythians, went under the denomination of Cush amongst the Asiatic nations, and Ethiopia amongst the Greeks. Where Cush himself settled immediately after the dispersion, authors are far from being agreed; some placing him in Susiana or Khuzestân, others in Arabia Felix, and others in that district near the confines of Egypt, called in Scripture the land of Midian or Madian. Possibly some of his descendents might contribute towards peopling all the different regions here mentioned; but 'tis probable, that the greatest body of them advanced towards Arabia and Egypt, since the posterity of Elam the son of Shem replenished, niſhed, in all likelihood, moſt of the provinces of Perſia, and particularly Elymais contiguous to Suſiana or Khuzeſtân. Be that as it will, 'tis certain, the land of Midian went by the name of Cuſh before the age of Moſes, when, 'tis natural to ſuppoſe, the country waſhed by the Araxes was but thinly peopled, and even ſcarce known. That the children of Cuſh ſhould have migrated in the moſt numerous parties into Arabia, and particularly that part of Yaman bordering upon the ſtreights of Bab al Mandab, as well as the country afterwards called the land of Midian, has the greateſt appearance of truth, ſince theſe ſeem to be the moſt commodious ſituations for throwing large colonies of Cuſhites into the proper Ethiopia, as well as the inland parts of Africa. To ſupport farther the conjecture offered to the conſideration of our readers here, it may be obſerved from various authors, that a good part of the upper Egypt was poſſeſſed by the Cuſhites in the moſt early ages, and that the city of Coſs, Kûs, or Kûſh, ſituated upon the Nile in that country, confounded by ſome with the famous Thebes, took its name from Cuſh the father of the Ethiopians. The Arabs call Ethiopia not only Habaſh, from Habaſh the ſuppoſed ſon of Cuſh, but likewiſe Cuſh or Couſch, in like manner as the Hebrews. The firſt kings of this country we have no account of, that deſerves the leaſt regard. 'Tis probable, that ſeveral princes reigned here at the ſame time, before any of the great empires were formed as in Egypt. Some of the modern Abaſſines pretend, that one Arwe was the firſt king of Ethiopia, but relate nothing memorable of him, only that he was aſſaſſinated by one Arigab, who afterwards aſcended the throne, and was ſucceeded by Sabanut, Gedur, &c. As for the catalogue annexed to the fabulous hiſtory of Tzagaxus, and what we find on this head in Jerome Vecchietti, not the leaſt degree of credit is due to them. The preſent king of Ethiopia, or emperor of Abaſſia, is ſtyled by his ſubjects Negus, i. e. king; but, as the governors of provinces are ſometimes honoured with that appellation, his proper title is Neguſa Nagaſt Zaitiopia, i. e. king of the kings of Ethiopia [a].

It

Moſes conquers Ethiopia.

It may be inferred from ſome authors, that the Ethiopians poſſeſſed Thebais before Moſes's time, and conſequently that they were a powerful nation from the remoteſt antiquity. According to theſe authors, they made an irruption into the Lower Egypt whilſt Moſes was there, and penetrated as far as Memphis. Having defeated the Egyptians in a pitched battle, they threatened them with immediate deſtruction. Whereupon the Egyptian gods, being conſulted, ordered their votaries to put an Hebrew at the head of their forces, and then march againſt the enemy. The king, in purſuance of this order, prevailed upon Moſes to accept the command of his army, and to take an oath of fidelity to him. Moſes, being veſted with an unlimited power to act as he ſhould thing proper for the good of his maſter's ſervice, immediately advanced at the head of his troops into the heart of the enemy's country. As he did not judge it expedient to march along the banks of the Nile, in conformity to their expectations, but to puſh through ſome mediterranean provinces, greatly infeſted with ſerpents of an enormous ſize, towards Meroe the capital of Ethiopia, he was obliged to have recourſe to the following ſtratagem, in order to ſave his men: He filled many cheſts or paniers, made of the Egyptian plant papyrus, with vaſt numbers of the ibis, an Egyptian bird, that had a natural antipathy to ſerpents of all kinds and made great havock of them. When he approached the tract abounding with thoſe animals, he let out his birds, which deſtroyed all of them they met with, and opened a paſſage for the Egyptian forces. Moſes, therefore, without any difficulty, ſurpriſed the Ethiopians, gave them a total defeat, and at laſt ſhut them up in Meroe. But this place was rendered in a manner impregnable by the Nile, the Aſtapus, and the Aſtaboras, which ſo ſurrounded it, that it was almoſt impoſſible for an army to approach it. However, Moſes's good fortune interpoſing, he found means to make himſelf maſter of it. The king of Ethiopia's daughter, obſerving from the walls Moſes's bravery in repulſing ſeveral ſeveral ſallies of the beſieged, and being charmed with his ſucceſs, fell deſperately in love with him, and, by the aſſiſtance of ſome friends ſhe could confide in, offered to deliver up the place to him, provided he would ſwear to marry her. This overture, continue the ſame authors, Moſes complied with, was thereupon admitted into the town, and married her. However, he treated the citizens with great rigour and ſeverity, firſt plundering them, and then putting moſt of them to the ſword. In fine, having ravaged the whole country, razed or diſmantled all the places of ſtrength, and conſequently rendered the Ethiopians for a long time incapable of making head againſt the Egyptians, he returned home with great glory. Cedrenus intimates, that this war laſted ten years [b].

THE Abaſſines are firmly perſuaded, that the celebrated queen (A) of Sheba, who had an interview with Solomon, reigned over the proper Ethiopia. They have an hiſtory of her written at large, but interſperſed with various fables. The ſubſtance of it is as follows: Makeda, for according to them that was her name, receiving an account, from Tamerin an Ethiopian merchant, of the ſurpriſing power and wiſdom of Solomon, took a journey to Jeruſalem to know the truth of this report. She was attended by a great train of her prime nobility, and carried with her a variety of moſt magnificent preſents. After ſhe had been inſtructed at Jeruſalem in the worſhip of the true God, ſhe returned home, and within the ſpace of a year brought forth a ſon begotten by Solomon, who named him David; but he was called by his mother and her ſubjects Menelech, or Menilchech, that is, another ſelf. He received his education at Solomon's court and was accompanied home by many doctors of the law, and Iſraelites of diſtinction, and particularly Azariah the ſon of Zadoc the high prieſt. By the

(A) Joſephus ſays, that the queen of Sheba governed Egypt as well as Ethiopia; but as this notion runs counter to the whole ſtream both of ſacred and profane antiquity, we ſhall not ſcruple to reject it (1).

the aſſiſtance of theſe Hebrew attendants he eſtabliſhed the religion, profeſſed by his father, in Ethiopia, where it continued till that kingdom embraced chriſtianity. The Arabs and Abaſſines have given the princeſs above-mentioned ſeveral names, as Makeda, Belkis, Balkis, or Bulkis, Negheſta Azeb, i. e. queen of the ſouth, as we find her ſtyled by our Saviour, and the Ethiopic verſion, &c. The Abaſſines pretend, that their kings are deſcended in a right line from Menelech, and even moſt of the noble families in Abaſſia at this day trace their reſpective predigrees up to Solomon [c].

This tradition clogged with ſome abſurdities, though not to be deemed entirely falſe.

THAT this tradition is clogged with ſome abſurdities, will appear to any one who conſiders it with the leaſt attention, though at the ſame time it muſt be allowed, as hinted above, that part of it is not void of an appearance of truth. Ethiopia is more to the ſouth of Judæa than the territory or kingdom of Saba in Arabia Felix, and conſequently ſeems to bid fairer than that country for the dominions of that princeſs whom our Saviour calls the queen of the ſouth. Ethiopia is ſtyled the remoteſt part of the habitable world by Herodotus and Strabo, and therefore better agrees with what our Saviour has ſaid of the queen of Sheba, viz. that ſhe came from the uttermoſt parts of the earth, than Arabia poſſibly can do. Nor can it be deemed a ſufficient reply to this argument, that Arabia Felix was the uttermoſt part of the earth in reſpect of Judæa, ſince it was bounded by the Red Sea; for that not only Egypt, but even Ethiopia, regions beyond that ſea, were known to, and even had a communication with, the Jews, both before and in our Saviour's time, is indiſputably clear. Laſtly, from what has been ſuggeſted above, it appears no improbable conjecture, that Judaiſm was not only known in a part at leaſt of Ethiopia, but likewiſe nearly related to the eſtabliſhed religion there at the beginning of the apoſtolical age, if not much earlier. However, we would not be underſtood as pretending to determine the reſidence of the queen of the ſouth; eſpecially ſince ſo much may be ſaid for Arabia, as well as the country we are now upon. After all, theſe two opinions, ſo contrary in appearance, may be made conſiſtent ſiſtent without great difficulty; ſince 'tis agreed, that Arabia and Ethiopia have antiently borne the ſame name, been included, during certain intervals, in one empire, and governed by one prince. Part of the Arabs and Ethiopians had the ſame origin, and very conſiderable numbers of the Abaſeni tranſplanted themſelves from Arabia Felix into Ethiopia, as already obſerved; which ſeems ſufficient to make appear the intercourſe that has formerly ſubſiſted between the Cuſhites or Ethiopians of Aſia and Africa [d].

Ethiopia reduced by Seſac.

But whether our readers will think proper to fix the queen of Sheba in Arabia or Ethiopia, whether they will admit or reject the hiſtory of that princeſs and her ſon given us by the Abaſſines, it ſeems clear from ſcripture, that the Ethiopians were ſubject to Seſac, either in Solomon's time, or ſoon after his death. For, that the Cuſhites mentioned in the paſſage here referred to, were the proper Ethiopians, appears from their being joined with the Lubim or Libyans, who likewiſe ſerved in the army of that prince. This, it muſt be owned, is a ſtrong proof, that Seſoſtris and Seſac were the ſame perſon, in conformity to what Joſephus aſſerts, ſince we read not in ſcripture of any Egyptian but Seſac that was maſter of Ethiopia, and ſince Herodotus poſitively aſſerts, that Seſoſtris alone, of all the Egyptian monarchs, enjoyed the empire of that country. But further, as the ſcripture takes no notice of any great conqueror that was king of Egypt before Seſac, it is in the higheſt degree probable, that he was the firſt who extended his conqueſts in ſo wonderful a manner as we find the antients have related of Seſoſtris; ſince, had ſuch great atchievements been performed ſooner, the ſacred hiſtory would undoubtedly have given us ſome hint of them, eſpecially as the Hebrews had ſuch an intercourſe with the Egyptians almoſt from the remoteſt antiquity. The ſilence therefore of ſcripture in this particular is an argument of no ſmall force in favour of what Joſephus has advanced relating to the identity of Seſoſtris and Seſac. Nay, we will venture to affirm, that it tends ſtrongly to evince the Egyptian empire, founded by Ammenemes and Seſac, to have been the firſt great empire that ever was formed. For the high, and even incredible, antiquity quity of the Aſſyrian empire depends only upon the authority of Cteſias, not the leaſt hint in ſupport of ſuch antiquity being viſible in ſcripture; on the contrary, it plainly appearing from thence, that it was founded by Pul, about two hundred years after the taking of Jeruſalem by Seſac. Notwithſtanding, therefore, the ineffectual labours of ſo many learned men to vindicate the notorious falſhoods of Cteſias, or, which is the ſame thing, of the antient Greek and Latin authors who copied from him, no one, who has the leaſt regard for ſcripture, can poſſiby imagine any Egyptian monarch of great note to have flouriſhed before Seſac, or Aſſyrian before Pul. This notion has been ſet in the ſtrongeſt light by Sir Iſaac Newton, but oppoſed by many ingenious and learned men. However, as theſe learned men ſeem not to have duly attended to what Sir Iſaac has advanced, and as it has been that illuſtrious author's misfortune to have his works at firſt miſunderſtood, though they have afterwards ſhone out with a double luſtre, we ſhall beg leave to make a general remark upon the moſt conſiderable writers, who have endeavoured to overthrow his ſyſtem of chronology, which to us ſeems nearer the truth than any other. We do not pretend to adopt every particular ſentiment advanced in this noble piece, and therefore ſhall not offer an anſwer to all the objections urged againſt it; nor indeed, were we ſo diſpoſed, would the nature of the work we are at preſent engaged in render this practicable[e].

Sir Iſaac Newton miſrepreſented.

Sir Iſaac allows, that before the time of Ammon or Ammenemes the father of Seſac, there were ſeveral kings in Egypt, and even adopts what Manetho has written of the kings of the Lower Egypt; only he contends, that the Upper and Lower Egypt were not united under one prince before the reign of Ammon. And how does this contradict ſcripture, which takes notice only of the kings of Miſraim, or that part of the Lower Egypt bordering upon Arabia and Paleſtine? Nay, does he not ſuppoſe the truth of the moſt early Scripture-accounts of Egypt, by referring to the book of Geneſis on ſeveral occaſions, by deducing from thence ſeveral facts corroboratory of his ſyſtem? Does he not intimate, that the lower part of Egypt was governed by a ſeries of kings from the remoteſt antiquity, even from the firſt invention of corn-there, to Joſhua's invaſion of Canaan; that the people of this country worſhipped the prince at the head of this ſeries, who taught them to make bread, after his death, in the ox or calf, for this benefaction? And can any thing better tally with Scripture, or rather be more firmly founded upon it, as well as conſonant to all profane antiquity, than this obſervation? Nay, does he not offer it as his opinion, that this prince reigned in the Lower Egypt as early as the firſt plantation of it, and therefore might, for ought that appears to the contrary from him, or rather as he ſtrongly inſinuates, be Miſraim? To what purpoſe then have we been troubled with ſo much empty jangling, and outcries againſt him, as though he had attacked the authority of Scripture, by denying the being of that antient kingdom in the Lower Egypt ſo frequently mentioned by the ſacred hiſtorian? In ſhort, moſt of thoſe perſons, who have ſo groſly miſrepreſented Sir Iſaac in this particular, have been either profeſſed infidels, or ſuch as ſecretly favoured infidelity; or laſtly, ſuch as have implicitly ſwallowed the abſurdities of Cteſias. But from theſe our great author is neither to expect candour nor impartiality. He has ſo effectually overthrown that romantic antiquity of the Egyptian empire, which the Egyptian prieſts endeavoured to palm upon the world, and which ſo long has been one of the laſt reſources of infidelity, that all our modern deiſts, as well as their ſecret abettors, muſt of courſe declare againſt him: and thoſe perſons, who are ſo hardy as to attempt in earneſt the reconciliation of Cteſias with Scripture, are, in our opinion, not only capable of oppoſing what Sir Iſaac has offered in defence of his ſyſtem, but all the mathematical demonſtration that ever appeared in the world [f].

Some of the principal objections againſt him conſidered.

BUT it is ſaid, that Sir Iſaac makes Seſoſtris or Seſac to have introduced inſtruments of war, the exact diſtribution of property, &c. amongſt the Egyptians; which is not only contrary to Scripture, but likewiſe to what we have juſt advanced. And was there then no other country called Egypt but the land of Miſraim mentioned by Moſes in the firſt book of the pentateuch, or rather did that kingdom include all the tract the Greeks called Egypt? No, this cannot be maintained; ſince that country is known not to have contained all the Lower Egypt, much leſs the Lower and Upper Egypt united; and it may be as well known, by peruſing Sir Iſaac with a proper proper attention, that both theſe united were the Egypt governed by Seſac. That prince, therefore, might have introduced the things enumerated by our great chronologer, for ſo we ſhall not ſcruple to call him, notwithſtanding the cavils of his adverſaries, into ſome parts of the Upper Egypt, or ſeveral ſavage diſtricts not far from the weſtern coaſt of the Red Sea, and civilized the inhabitants, though a kingdom had ſubſiſted in the Lower Egypt, whoſe members had been tolerably poliſhed before the reign of Seſac, from the age of Miſraim. Theſe points are by no means incompatible, and therefore nothing to the prejudice of Sir Iſaac's ſyſtem of chronology can be inferred from the ſuppoſed diſagreement of them. On the contrary, as the Troglodytes, appertaining partly to Egypt, and partly to Ethiopia, remained in a ſtate of barbarity many ages after Seſac, 'tis no ſuch improbable notion, that before his time ſeveral other tribes inhabiting the Upper Egypt might be as rude and barbarous as ſome of the antients repreſented them. But it is farther urged, that Sir Iſaac makes Ammon and Seſac to have been the great gods of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, known amongſt the Greeks and Romans by the names Zeus, Jupiter, Dionyſius, Bacchus, &c. which runs counter to the whole ſtream of antiquity, and withal contradicts Scripture; ſince Apis, Serapis, i. e. Jupiter, was worſhipped by the Egyptians before the exodus of the Iſraelites, the golden calf being ſet up by that nation in the wilderneſs in imitation of the Egyptian Apis. Now, that the firſt king of that very antient monarchy in the Lower Egypt, ſo frequently mentioned by Moſes, was deified for the reaſon already aſſigned, and worſhipped in the ox or calf, is expreſly aſſerted by Sir Iſaac; and therefore we may moſt rationally account for the Iſraelites paying divine honours to the golden calf from him, without having recourſe to the worſhip of Apis. For although this worſhip, in ſeveral particulars, reſembled that of a more antient deity, even the firſt king of the land of Miſraim, it does not from thence follow, that this deified prince was the Egyptian Apis. One ſtrong preſumption, that theſe two pagan divinities were really different, is, that the god Mnevis ſeems more properly to correſpond with the founder of the kingdom of Miſraim than Apis. For Mnevis (B) was kept

(B) That Mnevis and Apis were different deities, or rather repreſentatives of different deities, appears from hence, that the Egyptians held the latter in much higher veneration than the former. The worſhip of Apis ſeems to have been not only univerſal in kept at Heliopolis, and conſequently held in the higheſt veneration there, whereas Apis reſided at Memphis. Now Heliopolis was much more antient than Memphis, being the city On, whoſe prieſt's daughter Joſeph married, as appears clearly from the Septuagint. It was likewiſe nearer the confines of Paleſtine and Arabia than Memphis, nay, it ſeems to have been in the very land of Goſhen or Geſen, where the Iſraelites dwelt immediately before the exodus; on which accounts the principal deity there muſt bid fairer for the moſt antient deified prince above-mentioned, and that repreſented by the Iſraelitiſh golden calf, than any other. Which ſingle obſervation, excluſive of many others that might be offered, ought to be deemed a full refutation of the point ſo confidently advanced in this objection. Again, we are told, that Sir Iſaac Newton invalidates the authority of Scripture, when he intimates alphabetic letters not to have been received in Egypt before the time of Ammon the father of Seſac, that is, in ſome part of David's reign. But how does this appear? Does the Scripture ſay any thing of the alphabetic characters of Egypt before that period, either directly or by implication? And if not, how can ſuch a notion in any manner affect Scripture? We cannot, therefore, but own ourſelves greatly ſurpriſed at the conduct of a very learned and ingenious author, who charges this opinion with being contrary to Scripture, and, in ſupport of that charge, quotes the following paſſage---- "As to the "preciſe time of the invention of Egyptian letters, IT CAN "NEVER BE SO MUCH AS GUESSED AT." ---- "How-in Egypt, but likewiſe common to moſt of the nations of Arabia, India, and Ethiopia; whereas the chief divine honours paid Mnevis did not extend much farther than the diſtrict of Heliopolis, if they were not abſolutely confined to that place. Now this is eaſy to be conceived, nay, perfectly rational, upon Sir Iſaac Newton's principles; for he ſuppoſes, that Seſoſtris or Seſac was the firſt prince in poſſeſſion both of the Upper and Lower Egypt, Ethiopia, &c. and that he civilized ſeveral nations; whereas he believes the antient kingdom of Miſraim, or the Scripture Egypt, to have been of no larger an extent than we have already hinted. Ammianus Marcellinus ſeems plainly to give Mnevis the preference to Apis in point of antiquity; and the notion he appears to eſpouſe will be rendered probable, not only by what we here advance, but likewiſe by a careful and diligent compariſon of the authors here referred to with one another (2).

"ever, that letters (in Egypt) were very early, we have "clearly ſhewn above, as well from other circumſtances as "from this, that the invention of them was given to their "gods." Now 'tis remarkable, that theſe circumſtances nowhere appear; and that the other paſſage referred to, in order to ſupport what is here advanced, only takes notice of writing, which, it is well known, in the earlieſt times always conſiſted of hieroglyphic characters. As for the origin of arts and ſciences in the land of Miſraim, or the Scripture Egypt, all that we can ſay of it is, that it preceded the age of Moſes, who, as St. Stephen himſelf, under the actual influence of the Holy Ghoſt, informs us, was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians. But what a progreſs literature had then made there, we cannot pretend to ſay. 'Tis not improbable, that the art of onirocritic, or interpretation of dreams, aſtrology, including ſo much of the ſimple elements of aſtronomy as contained the knowledge of the true ſyſtem of the world, ſome maxims of civil policy, with certain theological notions, made up the greateſt part of it. But we cannot collect from hence, that they knew even ſo much of the principles of aſtronomy and geometry, as to underſtand the art of navigation before the time Sir Iſaac mentions; nor that any of the arts or ſciences, which he intimates began to flouriſh amongſt the Egyptians about the reigns of Ammon and Seſac, were cultivated there to any great purpoſe before that period. But admitting, that the Egyptians of the land of Miſraim, before the reigns of the princes above-mentioned, were as learned and polite as Sir Iſaac's adverſaries would inſinuate, which yet is utterly improbable, it will not follow, that the Upper Egypt, Libya, &c. had then any great pretenſions to learning and politeneſs; and therefore every thing advanced upon that ſuppoſition, which is almoſt the ſum of what has been offered againſt Sir Iſaac's ſyſtem of chronology, deſerves not the leaſt attention. In fine, moſt of thoſe gentlemen, who have oppoſed this excellent piece, ſeem to have confounded the kingdom of Miſraim with that Egyptian empire which arrived at its laſt perfection in the days of Seſac, if not with Libya, Troglodytica, and other barbarous countries over-run and civilized by that prince. And not only ſo, but they have conſidered ſome of his notions as detached from others, with which, in reality, they have a cloſe connection; have attacked ſeveral points without informing their readers what he has urged in defence of them; have attempted an anſwer to ſome of his weaker arguments without touching upon thoſe of greater ſtrength; laſtly, have never taken a full ſurvey of the ſyſtem, but only fallen upon ſome of thoſe parts they thought the moſt liable to exception, and, from a ſuppoſed refutation of them, collected the falſity of the whole. However, 'tis not our buſineſs here to enter into a nice diſcuſſion of all the particulars relating to this controverſy, nor to examine every cavil levelled at a work, the main part of which, we believe, will, ſooner or later, meet with a general good reception from the learned world. For, with regard to ſome particular ſentiments in it, learned men will always think differently of them, as has been the fate of ſeveral parts of the moſt excellent productions of all ages. As ſuch a digreſſion merited a place in ſome part of this work, and comes in naturally enough here, we hope it will be pardoned, if not favourably received by our readers.---- But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory [f]:

Hiſtory of Ethiopia, to the ſecond expulſion of the ſhepheids.

WE have already obſerved, that Seſac ſubdued and reigned over Ethiopia. After his death a civil war ſeems to have broke out in Egypt, which Sir Iſaac Newton believes to have been invaded at this juncture by the Libyans, and defended by the Ethiopians. But about ten years afterwards, continues the ſame illuſtrious author, the Ethiopians drowned Seſac's ſucceſſor in the Nile, and ſeized upon Egypt. With that kingdom, Libya alſo fell into their hands, which will enable us to account for the numerous hoſt with which Zerah the Ethiopian advanced againſt Aſa king of Judah. However, Aſa overthrew that army, conſiſting of a million of men, in the fifteenth year of his reign, and diſperſed it in ſuch a manner, that Zerah could never afterwards rally his ſcattered forces. Upon which, the people of the Lower Egypt revolted from the Ethiopians, and, being ſuſtained by a body of two hundred thouſand Jewiſh or Canaanitiſh auxiliaries, forced Memnon or Amenophis, king of that nation, to retire to Memphis. 'Tis probable, that the Egyptians, under the conduct of their chief prieſt Uſorthon, Oſorchon, Oſarchor, or Oſarſiphus, followed their blow; ſince, after Memnon had turned the courſe of the (C) Nile, built a bridge over that river, and fortified the paſs there, he retreated with great precipitation into Ethiopia. However, about thirteen years after this diſgrace, he and his young ſon Rameſſes returned at the head of a powerful army, and drove the above-mentioned Jews or Phœnicians out of the Lower Egypt; which action the Egyptian writers called the ſecond expulſion of the ſhepherds, as we learn from the aforeſaid illuſtrious author, in conjunction with Manetho [g].

A deluge in Ethiopia.

WE are told by Cedrenus, a writer of good authority, that, about fifty years after Cecrops the firſt king of Athens began to reign, there happened a deluge in Ethiopia; but what damage the inhabitants of that country ſuſtained on this occaſion, he informs us not. However, it is probable, that the effects of it were ſufficiently felt, ſince otherwiſe it would not have merited the notice of any hiſtorian. As Cedrenus follows the technical chronology of Eratoſthenes, he places this event too high; but this in no manner affects us, who are not diſpoſed to pay any great regard to that chronology. From what writer he extracted this article, we cannot take upon us ſo much as to conjecture [h].

Continued to the time of Sabacon.

FROM ſeveral hiſtorical facts, Sir Iſaac renders it extremely probable, that Menes, Memnon, and Amenophis, were the ſame perſon; that the Ethiopian prince, who went by theſe names, was the ſon of Zerah; and that he died in a very advanced age (D), about ninety years after the death of Solomon. According to the ſame incomparable writer, the city of Memphis, called in Scripture Moph and Noph, as likewiſe Menoph or Menuf by the Arabian hiſtorians, derived its name were nearly related to one another, and conſequently a permutation of them frequent; and that the letter ה, in ſome words, had not formerly ſo much as the force even of a note of aſpiration, is evinced by Bochart. Νεῖλος and Nilus, therefore, are only נהל with a Greek and Latin termination (3).

(D) That this prince attained to an extreme old age is intimated by Philoſtratus, when he affirms Memnon to have reigned five ages or generations in Ethiopia. He alſo gives us to underſtand, that name from that of this prince, who either built it, or firſt fortified it, to prevent Oſarſiphus from entering Ethiopia. The Argonautic expedition happened in the reign of Amenophis, according to the principles of the ſyſtem we have at preſent in view. Some Greek authors relate, that he aſſiſted king Priamus with a body of Ethiopian troops. After his deceaſe, his ſon Rameſſes aſcended the throne of Ethiopia, who built the northern portico of the temple of Vulcan at Memphis. Mæris, his ſucceſſor, adorned Memphis, and fixed his reſidence there, near two generations after the Trojan war, upon the ſame principles. Cheops, Cephren, and Mycerinus, were the three next kings, the laſt of which was ſucceeded by his ſiſter Nitocris. Then came Aſychis, in whoſe reign both Aſſyria and Ethiopia revolted from Egypt; which thereupon was again divided into ſeveral ſmall kingdoms. Gnephactus governed one of theſe, and reſided at Memphis; but his ſon Bocchoris was ſlain by So or Sabacon the Ethiopian, who made himſelf maſter of Egypt. As all the principal atchievements of theſe monarchs, tranſmitted down to us by ſacred and profane antiquity, have already been taken notice of in the hiſtory of Egypt, we have almoſt entirely paſſed them over here. However, we muſt not omit informing our readers, that, in the twenty-ſecond year of Bocchoris's reign, Africanus has fixed the commencement of the æra of Nabonaſſar [i].

that the Ethiopians, ſome of them he means, were longer-lived than any other nation; which ſeems to agree with Herodotus. But when he relates, that the proper Ethiopians were originally of India, and expelled that country for an aſſaſſination of one king Ganges, he deſerves not the leaſt credit (4).

ceſsful, a period was put to the kingdom of Iſrael by Shalmaneſer, in the twenty-fourth year of the æra of Nabonaſſar. According to Herodotus, Sabacon, after a reign of fifty years, voluntarily relinquiſhed Egypt, and retired into Ethiopia. But, according to Africanus, he reigned only eight years in Egypt, and died in the ninth year of Hezekiah, or twenty-ninth of Nabonaſſar. The former author likewiſe informs us, that Sethon, whom ſome take to be the Sevechus of Manetho, his ſucceſſor, advanced to Peluſium, with a powerful army, againſt Sennacherib king of Aſſyria, whom he was enabled to defeat by a vaſt number of mice, which devoured the ſhield-ſtraps and bow-ſtrings of the Aſſyrians; and that, to perpetuate the memory of ſo ſurpriſing an event, the ſtatue of Sethon, which he ſaw, had a mouſe in its hand. As a mouſe was the Egyptian and Ethiopian ſymbol of deſtruction, this ſeems to intimate, that he overthrew the Aſſyrians with a great deſtruction. Sir Iſaac Newton therefore believes, that Sethon, in conjunction with Tirhakah, either king of the Arabian Cuſhites, or a relation of Sethon, and his viceroy in the Proper Ethiopia, ſurpriſed and defeated Sennacherib betwixt Libnah and Peluſium, making as great a ſlaughter amongſt his troops, as if their bow-ſtrings had been eaten by mice. This may be rendered conſiſtent enough with the Scripture-account of the blow received by Sennacherib, as we have elſewhere obſerved. The Egyptian prieſts computed three hundred and forty-one generations, or eleven thouſand three hundred and forty years, from the beginning of their monarchy and prieſthood, to the time when Sethon aſcended the throne of Egypt. The prieſts, during that period, as they pretended, had ſucceeded one another, without interruption, under the name of Piromis, an Egyptian word, ſignifying a good and virtuous man. Herodotus intimates, that Sennacherib was king of Arabia, as well as Aſſyria; which, if admitted, will prove, that Tirhakah preſided over the Proper Ethiopia, and not Arabia, as ſome learned men have ſuppoſed. If this be allowed, it will ſtrengthen, in ſome ſort, the conjecture we have already propoſed to the conſideration of the learned, viz. that Tirhakah was no other than Sabacon, who had before confined himſelf to Ethiopia, and left the Egyptian crown to Sethon. However, as this notion muſt be owned to be clogged with ſome difficulties, and even abſurd, upon the principles of thoſe, who who make Tirhakah ſucceſſor to Sethon, we ſhall leave our readers to believe as much or as little of it as they pleaſe [i].

FROM this time, to the ſeventy-eighth year of Nabonaſſar, we hear little of the kingdom of Ethiopia, which was then ſubjugated by Eſar-haddon king of Aſſyria. Many enormous cruelties he committed both there and in Egypt, as had been predicted by the prophet Iſaiah; and governed both thoſe countries three years, that is, till the time of his death, which happened in the year of Nabonaſſar 81. But then the Ethiopians, revolting from the Aſſyrians, aſſerted their independency, which they maintained, though a monarchy diſtinct from Egypt, till the days of Cyrus, who, from Xenophon, ſeems to have been maſter of Ethiopia, or at leaſt a conſiderable part of it. However, ſoon after the deceaſe of that prince, they withdrew themſelves from their ſubjection to the Perſians, ſince we find his ſon Cambyſes engaged in a fruitleſs expedition againſt them. Herodotus ſays, that, before he undertook this expedition, he ſent an embaſſy made up of the Ichthyophagi, as underſtanding the language of that nation, to the king of the Macrobii, or long-lived Ethiopians. The true end of this embaſſy was not ſo much to cultivate a good underſtanding with that prince, as to learn the ſtrength and condition of his kingdom; though, in order to conceal his deſign, he ſent him a purple robe, bracelets of gold, an alabaſter box of rich ointment, a veſſel of palm-wine, and other magnificent preſents. But the Ethiopian was too acute not to penetrate the Perſian monarch's views on this occaſion, and therefore frankly told the Ichthyophagi, that he was no ſtranger to their errand, and that, if Cambyſes entertained any ſentiments of equity, he would never deſire another prince's territories, nor to reduce to a ſtate of ſervitude a people, who had never injured him. "However," added he, "give him this bow from me, and tell "him, that he may think of invading the country of the Ma- "crobian Ethiopians, when his ſubjects can thus eaſily "draw it; and that, in the mean time, he ought to "thank

" thank the gods, that they never inſpired the Ethiopians " with a deſire of extending their dominions beyond the " limits of their own country." Then, unbending the bow, he gave it to the embaſſadors: after which, taking up the royal garment, he demanded of them, What it was, and how made? And being ſatisfied in both theſe particulars, he could not forbear obſerving, " That the robe was " a proper emblem and repreſentation of the deceitful prince " who wore it." All the other preſents likewiſe, except the wine, he deſpiſed, preferring the iron chains of the Ethiopians, which, he ſaid, were far ſtronger, to the golden bracelets, &c. of the Perſians. However, he owned, that the wine excelled any liquor produced in Ethiopia, and intimated, that the Perſians, ſhort-lived as they were, owed moſt of their days to ſo noble a cordial. When he heard, that a good part of their food was bread, he ſaid, He was not at all ſurpriſed, that a people, who fed upon dung, did not attain to the longevity of the Macrobian Ethiopians. As for what Herodotus relates of the table of the ſun in this country, it ſavours ſo much of fable, that we cannot help thinking it beneath the dignity of hiſtory to take notice of it. Cambyſes, being extremely incenſed at the anſwer brought by the Ichthyophagi from the Ethiopian, in a mad irrational humour, immediately began his march towards his frontiers, though he wanted all manner of proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of his troops. This at laſt introduced ſuch a famine amongſt them, that the ſoldiers were obliged to eat one another; ſo that, not being able to traverſe the vaſt ſandy deſerts of Ethiopia, he found himſelf conſtrained to return, firſt to Thebes, and afterwards to Memphis, with the loſs of a great part of his army. But, could he have penetrated to the centre of this region, it is probable he would have met there with a warm reception, ſince, by the acceſſion of a large body of Egyptians in the reign of Pſammitichus, the Ethiopians muſt have been very formidable; for we learn from Herodotus, that two hundred and forty thouſand Egyptians, poſted in different places by that prince, to guard the (E) frontiers on the ſides of Arabia,

(E) Herodotus, in the paſſage here referred to, makes Elephantis or Elephantine, and Daphnæ Peluſiæ, oppoſite boundaries or frontiers of Egypt, and places both of them on the borders of Ethiopia. This ſeems to point out the true tranſlation of Arabia, Aſſyria, Libya, and Ethiopia, having not been relieved within the ſpace of three years, deſerted to the king of Ethiopia, who placed them in a country diſaffected to him, with orders to expel the inhabitants, and take poſſeſſion of their lands. He alſo informs us, that, in the Egyptian language, they were called Aſmak, i. e. "thoſe who ſtand "on the left hand of the king;" as likewiſe, that they civilized the Ethiopians. But the laſt article we can ſcarce give any credit to, ſince, from this very hiſtorian himſelf, and Africanus, it appears, that the Ethiopians were maſters of Egypt at leaſt eighty years before the time of Pſammitichus; and therefore might have learnt every thing the Egyptians could teach them before, if they were not, from the earlieſt ages, in all particulars as wiſe as that people. Sir Iſaac Newton inſinuates, that Cambyſes conquered Ethiopia, as well as Egypt, about the year of Nabonaſſar, 223, or 224. But this, as far as we can recollect, can neither be inferred from Herodotus, nor any other good author. Poſſibly Ethiopia, like Egypt, might have had ſeveral collateral princes, whom the antients, through miſtake, placed in continual ſucceſſion; which could not but occaſion many blunders and errors in the hiſtory of that kingdom. However, Herodotus aſſerts, that Cambyſes reduced ſome of the provinces of Ethiopia contiguous to Egypt in the unfortunate expedition above-mentioned; and that they, together with the Troglodytes, ſent an annual preſent to the

of a text in Ezekiel, rendered in our verſion — I will make the land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from the tower of Syene, even unto the border of Ethiopia; which ought to be tranſlated, either as we have formerly done it, or in the following terms; I will make the land of Egypt utterly waſte and deſolate, from Migdol to Syene, even to the border of Ethiopia: for if we ſuppoſe Migdol and Syene, or, as Herodotus aſſerts, Elephantine and Daphnæ Peluſiæ, to be oppoſite frontiers of Egypt, and both on the confines of Ethiopia, then we may look upon the words from Migdol to Syene as a parentheſis, and equivalent to the following words, to the border of Ethiopia. Such a tranſlation will render the paſſage exceeding obvious and clear, and is ſupported by a vaſt number of ſuch parentheſes to be met with in the old teſtament (5).

the Perſian monarch, conſiſting of two chænixes of unrefined gold, two hundred bundles of ebony, five Ethiopian boys, and twenty elephants teeth of the largeſt ſize, even to his time. But though the Perſians ſubdued not only theſe provinces, but likewiſe that part of Libya bordering upon the weſtern confines of Egypt, and carried their arms as far as the city of Cyrene, yet, that they brought under their dominion all that vaſt tract, comprehending the kingdoms of Sennar, Abaſſia, and other countries, anſwering to the proper Ethiopia of the antients, we cannot help thinking at leaſt very improbable [k].

Xerxes has a body of eaſtern and weſtern Ethiopians, Libyans, &c. in his army.

AMONGST the various nations that compoſed the numerous army, with which (F) Xerxes invaded Greece, Herodotus ranks the Ethiopians. He mentions on this occaſion two ſorts of that people; the eaſtern, who had their abode in

(F) Herodotus informs us, that Xerxes had not only eaſtern and weſtern, or Aſiatic and African, Ethiopians in his army, but likewiſe Libyans. The eaſtern or Aſiatic Ethiopians, he tells us, anointed one part of their bodies with a ſpecies of gypſum or plaſter, and another with minium or red-lead, immediately before they came to a general action. The Libyans, from his account of them, ſeem to have been negroes, who by Diodorus Siculus are called Ethiopians. That author gives us the following deſcription of them: "They are," ſays he, "flat-faced, exceeding fierce and cruel, in their manners "reſembling beaſts, extremely wicked, and have frizzled hair. "Their bodies are naſty and loathſome, their voice ſhrill, and "their diſpoſition ſuch as renders them incapable of being ci-"vilized. Some of them carry ſhields made of the raw hide "of an ox, and ſhort lances, in their wars; others uſe darts "forked at the ends, together with bows four cubits long, "out of which they diſcharge their arrows by the help of "their feet. When their ſhafts are ſpent, they fall on with "clubs. Their women likwiſe, till they arrive at a certain "age, take on in the ſervice; and many of them hang a braſs "ring at their lips. Some go always naked, ſheltering them-"ſelves from the ſcorching rays of the ſun with whatever falls "in their way. Several cover their pudenda with ſheep-tails; "and in Aſia, and were looked upon as Indians, from whom they differed only in their hair and language, and the weſtern or African Ethiopians. The former carried the ſame arms as the Indians, wore for helmets the ſkins of horſes heads, the ears and manes whereof ſerved them for tufts and plumes of feathers, bore before them the ſkins of cranes for ſhields, and had long hair. The Africans were armed with darts lighted at one end, covered with leather, and had black frizzled hair. Their commander was Maſanges, the ſon of Aorizus, a perſon doubtleſs of great diſtinction amongſt them. Nothing remarkable of the nation we are now upon occurs from this period to the diſſolution of the Perſian empire, though it is probable matters, with reſpect to them, all along remained in the ſame ſituation; that is to ſay, the Ethiopian provinces contiguous to Egypt were ſubject to the Perſians, and the others in a ſtate of independency, either ſo little known, or made ſo inconſiderable a figure,

" and others apply beaſt-ſkins to that uſe. Laſtly, it is not " uncommon amongſt this people to wear a garment about their " loins made of human hair, the ſheep in this country carrying
" no fleeces at all. They feed, for the moſt part, upon the " tender ſhoots of trees, the roots of canes, the lotus and ſeſa-
" mus, together with another ſpecies of fruit produced in mar-
" ſhy places. Many alſo live upon fowl, which, being excel" lent archers, they kill in vaſt numbers; but moſt of them uſe
" fleſh, milk, and cheeſe, for their ſuſtenance." As Diodorus intimates many of theſe to have been ſeated in the heart of Africa, as well as on both ſides the Nile, and expreſly calls them Blacks, we doubt not but he had the negroes here in view, as well as ſome of the proper Ethiopians; nay, as he ſeems to join together " the heart of Africa and both ſides of the Nile," and the deſcription he gives of the Blacks on both ſides the Nile agrees, in moſt particulars, with the preſent Blacks, poſſibly ſeveral of our readers may be induced to infer from hence, that, in the age of Diodorus, the Niger and the Nile were believed to have been branches of the ſame river. Be that as it will, the paſſage here referred to by no means diſcountenances ſuch a notion; which adds ſome weight to what has been already advanced in the hiſtory of the Melanogætuli and Nigritæ, as our readers will find, by conſulting it (6).

It does not appear, that Alexander the Great ever undertook an expedition against the Ethiopians, though, when he consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, one of the first enquiries he made was after the sources of the Nile, and, having afterwards encamped at the head of the river Indus, which he imagined to be that of the Nile, was overjoyed at his success. But Ptolemy Euergetes, one of his successors in Egypt, having a passionate desire, in common with some of the greatest men of antiquity, to discover the fountains of the Nile, with this view carried his arms into Ethiopia. The particulars of this enterprize we find nowhere related in history, though that he penetrated to the farthest parts of this region, and subdued most, if not all, the powerful nations seated in it, appears from an inscription (G) preserved down to us by Cosmas Ægyptius

[1] Herodot. l. vii. c. 69, 70, 71. Univers. hist. vol. ii. p. 56.

(G) Eleshaan, king of the Axumites or Ethiopians, ordered Asbas, governor of Adule, to send him a copy of this inscription. This happened about the beginning of Justin's reign, just before Eleshaan undertook the expedition against the Homerites, which will be hereafter mentioned, and twenty-five years before our author wrote the piece here referred to. Asbas employed Cosmas, and one Menas, a merchant, who afterwards became a religious at Raithus, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rhaptus, possibly the Rauso of Cosmas, to take him an exact copy of it, and therefore we may depend upon the relation the former has given us: "At the entrance," says he, "into the western part of "the city, facing the road to Axuma, stood a chair of white "marble, consisting of a square base, a small thin column at "each angle of this base, with a larger wreathed one in the "middle, a seat or throne upon these, a back, and two sides. "Behind this chair there was a large stone three cubits high, "which had suffered considerable injury from time." This stone, and the chair, contained a Greek inscription, part of which imported, "that Ptolemy Euergetes had penetrated to "the farthest parts of Ethiopia; that he subdued Gaza, Agame, "Sigue, Ava, Tiamo or Tziamo, Gambela, Zingabene, Angabe, "Tiama, Athagaos, Calaa, Semene, Lasine, Zaa, Gabala, "Atalmo, Bega, the Tangaitæ, Anine, Metine, Sesea, Rauso, "Solate, the territory of Rouso, and several other kingdoms; "that tius (H), or, as ſome call him, Coſmas Indicopleuſtes, which he copied upon the ſpot in the time of the emperor

" that amongſt the nations he reduced were ſome inhabiting " mountains always covered with a deep ſnow; and others " ſeated upon ridges of hills, from whence iſſued boiling " ſtreams, and craggy precipices, who all therefore ſeemed in- " acceſſible; that having finally, after all theſe conqueſts, aſ- " ſembled his whole army at Adule, and ſacrificed to Mars, " Neptune, and Jupiter, for his great ſucceſs, he had dedicat- " ed this chair or throne to Mars." It may not be improper to remark here, that Gaza ſeems to correſpond with Gheeza, a name of the kingdom of Abaſſia, in uſe amongſt the natives at this day; that Agame and Ava ſeem to be the ſame with Agamia and Afa, two prefectures of the preſent kingdom of Tigre; that Tiamo or Tzamo, and Tiama, anſwer to Tzama in the kingdom of Tigre, and Tzama in that of Bagemeder; that Athagaos muſt agree with one of the two regions called Agao; and that Semene is undoubtedly the country now denominated Samen, or Semen. This, to omit other proofs, that might be offered, is no contemptible argument in favour of the authority of Coſmas Indicopleuſtes. For a full account of every thing relating to this inſcription, publiſhed firſt by Leo Allatius, and afterwards by Berkelius, Spon, and Monsfaucon, we muſt refer our readers to the learned Dr. Chiſhul (7).

(H) Coſmas informs us, that from Alexandria to the Cataracts were thirty ſtations; from the Cataracts to Axuma thirty more; and from thence to the fartheſt part of Ethiopia producing frankincenſe, and contiguous to the ocean, called Barbaria, fifty ſtations. Near Barbaria lay the country known by the name of Saſus, according to the ſame author, which was likewiſe reputed one of the remoteſt regions in Ethiopia.

The Barbarians, ſays Coſmas, imported various ſorts of ſauces, frankincenſe, caſſia, and other commodities, the produce of their territory, into the country of the Homerites, ſeparated from them by the ſtreights of Babal Mandab. They ſupplied likewiſe the Perſians and Indians with the ſame commodities. The ſea beyond Barbaria our author calls the Zingian ocean, and intimates, that Saſus abounded with gold-mines. Every other year the king of Axuma ſent ſeveral perſons of diſtinction

tion to Agau, to traffick with the natives for gold; and other merchants, to the number of five hundred, attended them. They brought with them cattle, ſalt, and iron, to barter for the gold. Upon their arrival there, they fixed themſelves on a certain ſpot of ground, killed and cut in pieces ſeveral oxen, which they expoſed, together with the ſalt and iron, to the view of the natives. Some of theſe then approaching with ſmall ingots of gold, which they called Tancharas, laid down one or more of them, as they pleaſed, upon the piece of the ox, ſalt, or iron, they had a mind to purchaſe, and then retired to a place at ſome diſtance. The proprietor, ſeeing this, took the gold, if he thought it ſufficient, and went away; and the perſon who had left it, came and carried off the commodity he had pitched upon. If the gold was not deemed enough, the Axumite or Ethiopian, who owned the commodity to which it was affixed, let it remain; which the other obſerving, either made an addition to what he had before depoſited, or departed with it. This manner of trading they found neceſſary, as being ſtrangers to each others language; and it was generally finiſhed in five days. This journey the Axumites commonly performed in ſix months time, and were longer in going than returning, by reaſon of their cattle. They were obliged to travel armed, ſince ſeveral gangs of robbers ſometimes attacked them upon the road, eſpecially in their return, when they were loaded with gold. As the fountains of the Nile were in this diſtrict, and as the rivers they found themſelves obliged to paſs were greatly ſwelled by the violent rains that fell in the winter, they took care to be at home before that ſeaſon could intercept them. By the violence of thoſe rains, continuing three months, many ſmall torrents became rivers, that emptied themſelves into the Nile. This method of trading is ſtill uſed in various parts of Africa, as appears from ſeveral modern relations, which it is needleſs here to produce. We muſt not omit obſerving, that the diſtrict of Agau, mentioned by Coſmas, is undoubtedly the country of the Agaus taken notice of by father Pays, the name of both theſe provinces being the ſame, and the ſource of the Nile being placed in both of them by theſe authors (8), pians in the writings of the antients, till the days of Auguſtus [m].

ABOUT the year of Rome 732, when Ælius Gallus had drawn moſt of the Roman forces out of Egypt, in order to invade Arabia, Candace queen of Ethiopia, or rather of the kingdom of Meroe, made an irruption into the province of Thebais with a numerous army. According to Dio, Candace herſelf headed her troops in this expedition; which ſeems to be confirmed by Strabo, when he intimates, that ſhe was a lady of uncommon bravery and reſolution. At firſt ſhe met with great ſucceſs, ravaged all the country as ſhe advanced, took Syene, Elephantine, and Philæ, the Egyptian frontiers on the ſide of Ethiopia, without oppoſition, and made three Roman cohorts, garriſoned therein, priſoners of war. But receiving intelligence, that Petronius, the governor of Egypt, was in full march to attack her, ſhe retired into her own dominions. The Roman general purſued the Ethiopians as far as Pſelcha, from whence he ſent a deputation to the queen, to know the reaſon of the late hoſtilities, and to demand all the priſoners, as well as a reſtitution of all the effects, particularly the ſtatues of Auguſtus, carried off from the cities above-mentioned. But Candace not ſending a ſatisfactory anſwer, and ſeeking only to gain time, Petronius immediately attacked the Ethiopian army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, tho' his ſcarce amounted to ten thouſand, in the neighbourhood of Pſelcha. As the Ethiopians were, for the moſt part, only armed with poles, hatchets, &c. and entirely undiſciplined, he gained an eaſy victory over them. Some fled into the town, others diſperſed in the adjacent deſerts, and others ſwam to a neighbouring iſland of the Nile, few crocodiles infeſting that part of the river, by reaſon of the rapidity of the torrent. Soon after this victory, Pſelcha ſurrendered to him; and one of his detachments brought off the corps, that had eſcaped to the aforeſaid iſland, in which were ſeveral of queen Candace's general officers. At Pſelcha he reviewed his forces, and, finding them in good condition, advanced to Premnis, a fortreſs of great ſtrength, which he made himſelf maſter of. Flushed with this ſucceſs, the Roman general neral marched to Napata, where Candace held her residence, which he took, and destroyed. Her son however found means to make his escape. The queen herself had retired to one of her castles at some distance from Napata, where, receiving advice of what had happened, and finding herself not in a condition to make head against the Romans, she thought proper to make overtures for an accommodation. But Petronius, by reason of the excessive heats, and a want of provisions, soon finding himself obliged to return to Alexandria, the conferences were broke off. After the departure of Petronius, Candace besieged Premnis, where the Romans had left a garrison of four hundred men; but, being soon forced to raise the siege, she dispatched embassadors a second time to treat of a peace with the Roman general, who sent them with an escort to Augustus. That prince, whom they found at Samos, gave them a most gracious reception, and granted their mistress a peace upon her own terms. This unexpected condescension may be attributed to the rich presents those ministers carried with them. Pliny intimates, that the kingdom of Meroe had been governed by queens for several preceding generations, who all went under the name of Candace [n].

History of Ethiopia continued to the ascension of our blessed Saviour.

THOUGH Augustus restored all the towns taken by Petronius, and remitted the tribute, which that general either did, or would have exacted from Candace, yet the Romans now looked upon themselves as masters of Ethiopia. They complimented Augustus on the great glory he had acquired, in subduing a country unknown even to his great predecessor, which finished the reduction of Africa. Hence we find, on the reverse of one of that prince's medals struck this very year 732, three globes, denoting undoubtedly the complete conquest of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the three large continents or parts of the antient world. However, this ought to be considered as nothing more than an instance of the Roman vanity, since not only the Ethiopians, but several other nations, had hitherto preserved their liberties. No material alteration in the civil affairs of the kingdom of Meroe, which seems to have been the Ethiopia known to the Romans, happened either during the remainder of Augustus's reign, or that of his successor Tiberius, queens still ſtill continuing to govern there, as we learn from Scripture. But that the chriſtian religion was introduced into Meroe about the nineteenth or twentieth year of Tiberius's reign, has been believed by ſome writers of good authority. Theſe writers make the eunuch baptized by Philip the deacon to have converted his royal miſtreſs, after his return home, to the chriſtian faith. St. Luke calls that princeſs Candace; from whence ſome have inferred, that ſhe was the ſame queen of Ethiopia mentioned by Pliny and Strabo. But as the interval betwixt the invaſion of Ethiopia by Petronius, and the converſion of the aforeſaid eunuch, was a term much longer than kings uſually reign, and as the former author remarks Candace to have been an appellation common to the ſovereigns of Meroe, we are, by no means, inclinable to come into ſuch an opinion. Several of the fathers thought, that the eunuch's name was Candace; which muſt certainly be deemed a miſtake: for that this word either ſignified ſovereign authority, or at leaſt was a title peculiar to the royal family of Meroe; the teſtimony already produced ſeems to put beyond all doubt [o].

And from thence to the reign of Dioclesian.

LITTLE after this period, for above two hundred years, occurs concerning the Ethiopians. Ælius Spartianus relates, that the emperor Heliogabalus frequently confined his moſt intimate friends for whole nights together with little old Ethiopian women, by way of diverſion, ſaying, that theſe women were the moſt beautiful of all others. From hence we may infer, that, in his reign, about the year of Chriſt 220, there was an intercourſe betwixt the Roman empire and the Ethiopians. Probus, above fifty years afterwards, undertook an expedition againſt the Blemmyes, a nation, or rather gang of banditti, bordering upon the frontiers of Thebais, vanquiſhed them, and ſent many of them priſoners to Rome. What occaſioned this expedition, is not told us by any author; but that the Blemmyan captives graced Probus's triumph, and exhibited ſuch an odd appearance, as greatly aſtoniſhed the Romans, we learn from Vopiſcus. Towards the cloſe of the third century, that nation and the

Nobatæ, a people inhabiting the banks of the Nile near the Upper Egypt, committing great depredations upon the Roman territories, and the adjacent part of Thebais being, probably on this account, but thinly peopled, the emperor Diocleſian found his revenue in thoſe parts ſcarce ſufficient to maintain the garriſons placed there to repreſs the courſes of the Ethiopians. He therefore aſſigned the Nobatæ lands in the Roman dominions, and gave both them and the Blemmyes a conſiderable annual ſum, to deſiſt from their former practices; but, notwithſtanding their ſolemn aſſurances to the contrary, they continued pillaging the Roman ſubjects to the time of Juſtinian, according to Procopius. That prince did not treat them with ſuch lenity as they had met with from Diocleſian. For this laſt emperor did not only grant them the favour above-mentioned, but likewiſe tranſplanted ſome of them to an iſland in the Nile near Elephantine, gave them the uſe of the (I) temples there in common with the Romans, and ordered prieſts to be ſelected from them all to officiate therein, thinking this would produce a perfect and perpetual harmony betwixt them. But Juſtinian ordered Narſes, the commandant of the garriſon in Philæ, to demoliſh the temples of the barbarians, impriſon their prieſts, and ſend all the images of their gods to Byzantium; which he did accordingly. That Diocleſian built the fortreſs of Philæ, and gave it that name, from the friendſhip and union, which, he imagined, the meaſures he had taken would occaſion betwixt the Romans, Egyptians, and Ethiopians ſettled there, as we find advanced by Procopius, can by no means be allowed, ſince this very fortreſs was in being, and called by the ſame name, in the days of Strabo. Procopius, in agreement with Coſmas Indicopleuſtes, aſſerts Elephantine to have been thirty days journey from Axuma, or, as he calls it, Auxomis. The ſame author alſo affirms, that, before the reign of Diocleſian, the frontiers of the Roman empire on that ſide extended ſo far into Ethiopia, that they were not above

(I) Procopius ſays, that the barbarians worſhipped the Sun, Iſis, Oſiris, Priapus, and other pagan deities. It likewiſe appears from him, that they offered human ſacrifices to their idols. Their religion was probably the ſame, or nearly ſo, with that of the Romans; which, had the Nobatæ and Blemmyes been people of any principles, might have greatly contributed to the keeping up a good correſpondence between them (9).

We find nothing worthy of observation recorded of the Ethiopians, from the reign of Diocletian, to the time of their conversion to christianity, which was but a short interval, by the Greek and Latin historians. The modern Abassines inform us, that our Saviour was born in the eighteenth year of Bazen, a prince of the Solomonean line, and the twenty-fourth from Menilehec, surnamed El Hakim, i. e. the wise, or son of the wise above-mentioned. They likewise enumerate thirteen kings, who reigned three hundred and twenty-seven years, betwixt him and Abreha and Atzbeha, or Abra and Asba, who sat upon the throne when Frumentius carried the light of the gospel into Abassia. Frumentius, according to some, found his work facilitated by the labours of St. Matthew, who had applied himself to the conversion of the Nubians, a nation before disposed for the reception of christianity by the eunuch of Candace, who had already sown in their minds the first seeds of that religion. These St. Matthew, continue the same authors, took care to cultivate, and raise to fruit, tho' he could not reach Abassia. The planting of the christian faith in that country was reserved for the age of St. Athanasius patriarch of Alexandria; of which great event Rufinus and others have given us the following relation [p].

Nothing material to be met with in history concerning the Ethiopians from the reign of Diocletian to the time of St. Athanasius.

Meropius the philosopher, a native of Tyre, took a resolution to travel, either that he might enjoy the conversation of other philosophers, or for the sake of traffick, which was not thought inconsistent with the profession of philosophy. This man, after having wandered over all India, determined at length to return home, with two young men nearly related to him, the companions of his travels, and, touching at an island in the Red Sea, was either cut to pieces by the natives, or died a natural death. Frumentius and Ædesius, or, as the Abassines will have it, Fremonatus and Sidracus, (for so were his kinsmen called) falling into the hands of the barbarians, were brought before the king, who gave them a kind reception, placed them near to his person, and advanced them. Their talents and industry procured them such distinguishing marks of this prince's favour. Finding in Frumentius a greater capacity, he made him his treasurer, and Ædesius his butler; ler; in which posts they behaved themselves with so much applause, that, upon the king's death, which followed some time after, the queen, who had been appointed guardian to her son, would not grant either of them permission to leave the kingdom, as they desired. On the contrary, she left the management of public affairs entirely to Frumentius, who made use of this new authority to bring the people under his inspection to the knowlege of JESUS CHRIST. Contracting an acquaintance with some christian merchants, either trading to or settled in Abassia, who sometimes came to that island, he granted them great privileges, and places to assemble in for public worship. This first excited in the Abassines a desire to be instructed in the principles of christianity; which induced Frumentius, after having got the queen's leave, to take a journey to Alexandria, in order to inform St. Athanasius of the disposition of that people. The patriarch hereupon consecrated him bishop of Axuma, and about the year of our Lord 335, sent him to propagate the christian religion in Ethiopia. Soon after his arrival there, he baptized vast numbers of the Abassines, ordained deacons and presbyters, built churches, and in short gained an assent to the divine truths of the gospel in almost every part of that vast region. The Ethiopic book at Axuma, held in the highest veneration by the Abyssines, agreeing in the main with this relation, as well as several Greek and Latin authors of good repute, it must deserve the greatest regard. That Adad or Aidog, therefore, king of the Axumites, first introduced christianity into Ethiopia about the fifteenth year of the emperor Justinian, after an unparallelled defeat given the king of the Homerites, in consequence of a vow made before the engagement, as some have not scrupled to assert, cannot be allowed. However, either the nation in general, or at least the court and nobless, afterwards relapsed into paganism, according to an oriental author of some note; and embraced again the christian religion, at the command of Aidog, about the fourth year of the emperor Justin, an. Ch. 521, for the reason just assigned. A full and minute account of this memorable transaction may be drawn from the extracts of several Syriac writers, to be met with in the learned M. Assemanus's bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana [q].

Ethiopians or Abassines converted by Frumentius.

ABRA and Aſba, who jointly ſwayed the ſceptre, are greatly celebrated by the Ethiopian hiſtorians. The harmony that reigned betwixt them was ſo ſingular and uncommon, that it almoſt became a proverb in Ethiopia. Conſtantius the emperor made uſe of many expedients to introduce Arianiſm into the country we are now upon, but without effect. He ſent embaſſadors to thoſe kings, in order to prevail upon them to put Frementius the biſhop of Axuma into the hands of George the Arian biſhop of Alexandria, ſubſtituted in the place of Athanaſius, who was forced to quit that ſee, and retire to a place of obſcurity. But they refuſed to deliver up that prelate, and adhered to his doctrines as well as perſon with an unſhaken reſolution, notwithſtanding Philoſtorgius falſly affirms an Arian biſhop to have been ſettled at Axuma. So mild and amiable was his conduct among them, that they called him Abba Salamah, the pacific father. The Copts and Abaſſines have a notion, that one Tacalhaïmanout, a ſaint or Abaſſine monk, deſcended from Sadok the high prieſt in the days of David and Solomon, attended Abba Salama into Ethiopia, to demonſtrate to the people there the neceſſity of baptiſm, they having till that time practiſed (K) circumciſion.

Abra and Asba refuſe to admit Arianiſm.

(K) Authors are divided in their ſentiments in relation to the origin of circumciſion amongſt the Abaſſines. Some maintain, that this inſtitution was introduced amongſt them by Moſes; others, that they received it from Menilehech the ſon of Solomon. Which of theſe opinions is true, or whether either of them be ſo, we ſhall not pretend to determine. That it was not in uſe amongſt the Arabian Cuſhites before the time of Moſes, appears from Scripture. One ſtrong preſumption againſt Herodotus's notion, that the Egyptians firſt practiſed circumciſion, is, that this author has not told us how, or when, that nation came firſt to admit ſo painful a rite; whereas the ſcripture is expreſs in both thoſe particulars, with regard to the origin of it amongſt the Hebrews. Grotius has evinced, from a multitude of different authors, that God, in commanding Abraham to uſe the rite of circumciſion, meant it a mark of covenant between his poſterity and the Creator; and that every other nation, practiſing it, learned it either from him or his deſcendents. The firm perſuaſion of the Abaſſines is, that they derived it from the Hebrews. We may perhaps ſay ſomething of the circumciſion of women when we come to the modern hiſtory of Abaſſia (10).

The twenty-fourth day of the month Meſri, correſponding with that of Auguſt in the Julian calendar, is celebrated as the feſtival of this ſaint by the Copts. The word Tacalhaïmanout is Ethiopic, and, according to M. D'Herbelot, ſignifies the paradiſe of the Trinity. But Ludolphus gives us to underſtand, that this Tacalhaïmanout, or, as he calls him, Tecla Haimanout, that is, according to his interpretation of thoſe words, the plant of faith, reſtored the monaſtic way of life in Ethiopia about the year of Chriſt 600, and lived till A. D. 630. The Abaſſines believe, that he ſpoke in his cradle, and wrought ſeveral miracles in his infancy; as alſo, that he was ordained deacon in the fifteenth year of his age by Cyril metropolitan of Ethiopia, cotemporary with Benjamin patriarch of Alexandria, of the Jacobite ſect. Gonzales relates, that he firſt converted the Ethiopians to chriſtianity, by deſtroying a ſerpent before worſhipped amongſt them; which, if admitted, will bring him to the age M. D'Herbelot aſſigns him. Be that as it will, next to Gabra-Menfes-Keddus (L), i. e. the ſervant of the Holy Ghoſt, in honour of whom they kept one holy-day every month, he was the moſt celebrated ſaint in Ethiopia. D'Herbelot farther informs us, that Claudius king of the Abaſſines ſent the life of this ſaint written in Ethiopic to Gabriel the ninety-fifth patriarch of Alexandria, which is at this day to be ſeen in the royal library at Paris, num. 796, under the title of Saïrat Al Ab Al Thaoubani Tacalhaïmanout [r].

HISTORY ſcarce ſupplies us with any memoirs relating to Ethiopia from the reign of Conſtantius to the time of the famous Eleſbas or Eleſbaan king of Ethiopia, called Caleb by the Abaſſines, who ſeems to have been the ſame prince with Adad or Aidog above-mentioned. This conqueror, having made up matters with Xenodon or Axenodon, an Indian prince, with whom, according to Simeon Beth-Arſamenſis, he had been at variance, put a period to the kingdom of the Homerites or Sabœans in Arabia Felix, after having vanquiſhed in battle the impious Dunawas, Dunaan, or Dhu Nowas, the laſt king of that people, who was of the Jewiſh religion. Eleſbaan had ſome time before declared war againſt the king of the Homerites, for maſſacring certain merchants, and vowed moſt ſolemnly to become a chriſtian, in caſe he proved victorious over him. Having, therefore, overthrown him, and ſtripped him of his dominions, he embraced the faith of Chriſt, in purſuance of the vow already made, and placed a chriſtian prince upon the throne of the Homerites; after whoſe death, which happened in winter, when the Ethiopians could not tranſport (M) a body of forces into Arabia, Dunaan found means to ſeize upon the crown. He began his reign with a violent perſecution of the chriſtians, upon whom he exerciſed unheard of cruelties, a detail of which has been given us by various authors. St. Aretas, in particular, and many others, he cauſed to be burnt in the city of Nagra. This induced the Alexandrian patriarch to invite, by letters, Eleſbaan to carry his arms into Arabia, in defence of the chriſtians, who had been put to death in great numbers with the moſt exquiſite tortures

The Ethiopians conquer the Homerites.

(M) One of the moſt noted ports of the Ethiopians on the Red Sea was Adule or Adulis, twenty ſtadia from the city of that name, and twelve days journey from Auxomis or Axuma the capital of Ethiopia. The Greek writers of the later ages denominated the Ethiopians in general Axumites from the name of this city, as we learn from Nonnoſus, Procopius, and others. Adule was the great mart for the commodities of Egypt, Arabia, &c. to which the merchants of thoſe countries conſtantly reſorted. Beſides the wares already mentioned, thoſe merchants exported from thence vaſt numbers of Ethiopian ſlaves, who, by this means, were diſperſed over a great part of the world (12).

Eleſbaan embraced the occaſion, and was favoured by God with an entire victory (†), which gave the Abaſſines (O) the poſſeſſion of Arabia Felix till the time of Abd al Motalleb grandfather of Mohammed. Abrahah Ebn al Sabah al Aſhram was the governor of Yaman, under the king of Abaſſia, whoſe puniſhment we find mentioned in the tenth chapter of the Koran. He brought, ſays the author of that book, an army with a great number of elephants to the ſiege of Mecca; upon which came a cloud of birds, with the rage of thunder,

(N) It appears from Simeon Metaphraſtes, Theophanes, Simeon Beth-Arſamenſis, Alphonſus Mendeſius, and others, that this Caleb or Eleſbaan was a prince of great ſanctity, and as ſuch the church of Rome has honoured him with canonization. M. Ludolphus informs us, that father Tellez obſerved a ſurpriſing agreement betwixt the Ethiopic and Latin writers, with regard to the life and actions of Eleſbaan. To which we may add, that M. Aſſemanus has likewiſe exhibited to our view the harmony betwixt Metaphraſtes and Beth-Arſamenſis, in relation to the conduct and great atchievements of the ſame prince. But we ſhall be more particular and explicit on this head, in the hiſtory of the antient Arabs, whoſe country was the theatre of thoſe atchievements (12).

(†) This happened in the reign of the emperor Juſtin, probably about the ſeventh or eighth year of it, A. C. 524, or 525, and not, as Theophanes and Cedrenus ſeem to intimate, 522, or 523. (13).

(O) Procopius attributes this famous exploit to Helleſtæus, Eleſbaan's ſon, whom he calls king of the Axumites, and is followed herein by cardinal Baronius. But as this notion has been overthrown by Ludolphus, as ſo noble an action ſeems more agreeable to the high encomia paſſed upon Eleſbaan, than the reign of his ſon, of whom the Abaſſine hiſtorians ſay but little, and as Metaphraſtes and Beth-Arſemenſis poſitively affirm Eleſbaan (that prince who embraced chriſtianity after the victory obtained over a former king of the Homerites) to have taken vengeance on Dunaan, we cannot but declare ourſelves of another opinion (14).

der, upon him. Each of theſe birds had a ſtone in its beak, which it dropped with ſuch violence upon the elephants, that they were pierced through; nor did the vengeance end here, but, according to ſome, purſued the viceroy into his maſter's dominions, where one of theſe fowls let its ſtone fall upon his head, and killed him [s].

That Atzham king of Ethiopia embraced Mohammedaniſm not probable.

THE Mohammedan writers generally agree, that Atzham, or Aſhamah Ebn Abhar, the Najâſhi, or king of Ethiopia, during Mohammed's miſſion, did not only take under his protection a conſiderable number of Mahommed's friends, who were driven out of Hejaz by the Koreiſh, but likewiſe became a convert to the new religion of that impoſtor. This converſion, according to Mohammed Ebn Abdo'l Bâki, happened in the ſecond year of the Hejra; though it is placed ten years higher by Abulfeda and Al Jannabius. Some learned men have, without any difficulty, admitted the truth of this relation, particularly Selden and Colomeſius. But the abſurdities with which Abdo'l Bakides's narration, which by a very able Oriental critic ſeems to have been judged more accurate and better than any other, is ſtuffed, and the abſolute ſilence of the Ethiopians, as well as thoſe authors who have written the hiſtories of the patriarchs of Alexandria and the Saracens, on this head, will not permit us to come into ſuch an opinion. That Atzham, all his biſhops, preſbyters, monks, &c. ſhould allow, that our Saviour foretold another great prophet to come after him, and that Mohammed was this prophet; that the Abaſſine biſhops and preſbyters, by citing it to the Najâſhi in favour of Mohammed, ſhould admit for genuine a paſſage of the New Teſtament not to be found there; and, to omit other points carrying with them the like air of probability, that, uponthefight of the twenty-ninth andthirtieth chapters of the Koran, they ſhould all burſt out into a flood of tears, and be in the ſoreſt affliction; in ſhort, that they ſhould be converted to Moſlemiſm by the Goſpel itſelf; theſe, we ſay, are ſuch glaring abſurdities, as can be ſwallowed by none but a moſt bigotted Mohammedan. And ſuch a train of remarkable effects ſects muſt have followed a king of Ethiopia's embracing Moſlemiſm, that the above-mentioned hiſtorians could not have omitted taking notice of it; nay, the Mohammedan writers themſelves would undoubtedly have recorded many tranſactions, the neceſſary conſequences of ſuch an event, which we find they have not ſo much as touched upon, had their prophet converted the king of Ethiopia, even before the Arabs themſelves. It is to us, therefore, matter of great ſurprize, that the very learned M. Ludolphus ſhould run himſelf into difficulties and errors, in order to evade the authority of Abdo'l Bakides and Abulfeda with regard to the introduction of Moſlemiſm into Ethiopia. The ſpirit with which the Koran was written, that is, a lying ſpirit; the genius of the Mohammedan writers, not only with the worſt kind of enthuſiaſm and ſuperſtition, but likewiſe addicted to romance and fiction in points abſtracted from religion; theſe, we ſay, in conjunction with what has been juſt offered, amount to little leſs than a demonſtration, that this ſtory was invented by the Moſlems, purely with a deſign to do honour to Mohammed and the Koran. For which reaſon we ſhall make no ſcruple to reject it entirely, with father Marracci [t].

Their hiſtory to the uſurpation of the Zagæan family extremely ſhort.

GEBRA-MESKEL, ſucceſſor to Eleſbaan, according to the Ethiopian poet ſo often cited by Ludolphus, was a prince who greatly extended the limits of his dominions; though we have no particulars of his conqueſts. His ſubjects, however, enjoyed the ſweets of peace a good part of his reign, which proceeded chiefly from the terror of his arms, all the neighbouring nations being kept in awe by him. Procopius gives us to underſtand, that the emperor Juſtinian entered into an alliance with him; but what hereupon enſued, we no-where find. The ſame author alſo relates, that even in Gebra-Meſkel's time the Axumites or Ethiopians were ſo little acquainted with the art of navigation, that they croſſed the ſtreights of Bal al Mandab in rude veſſels, conſiſting of nothing but planks or boards faſtened together with ropes. This ſeems to have been chiefly owing to their want of proper materials for ſhipping, their maritime provinces affording them ſcarce any thing of this kind, and the the Romans being obliged, by a particular law, not to tranſport any naval ſtores into Ethiopia. Next to this pious king, for as ſuch he is deſcribed by the Abaſſines, one Conſtantine aſcended the throne, and after him one Freſenna, whoſe name imports good fruit. During the (P) interval between Freſenna and Delnoad, who reigned about the year of the chriſtian æra 960, the Ethiopian hiſtory is ſo barren, as not to ſupply us with one article meriting any great regard. About this time the uſurpation of the Zagæan family commenced, the cauſe of which will hereafter be fully explained [u].

(P) We are told, that about A. D. 836, Ethiopia groaned under the complicated miſeries of war, peſtilence, and famine; that their armies were routed and put to flight, whenever they came in ſight of the enemy. The Abaſſines, continues this author, attributed theſe evils to the violence and indignities offered John the metropolitan ſent them by James the fiftieth patriarch of Alexandria. A knot of the nobility had before caballed againſt this prelate, and, after bringing others over to their party, driven him out of the country. Under the influence, therefore, of the above-mentioned perſuaſion, he was recalled and re-eſtabliſhed. But the queen, who at that time held the reins of government, raiſed new perſecutions againſt the Abuna, and left him only the choice of being circumciſed, or leaving the kingdom. John choſe to undergo circumciſion, and, being ſtripped in order to the operation, had upon him, by a ſingular miracle, ſay the Copts and Abaſſines, evident tokens that he had been circumciſed on the eighth day. We muſt here obſerve, that as the church of Abaſſia acknowledges that of Alexandria as its mother, it is ſubject to it in a particular manner, not having the liberty of electing its own biſhop. This ſubjection is as antient as the converſion of the Abaſſines to chriſtianity, and confirmed by that book of canons which they held in equal eſteem with the ſacred writings. The particular canon here hinted at will be inſerted when we come to the modern hiſtory of Abaſſia (15).

CHAP. VIII.

The history of the Arabs, and their antient state, to Mohammed.

SECT. I.

Description of Arabia.

Many authors have taken great pains to give an accurate geographical description of Arabia.

THE independency most of the Arabs maintained to the downfal of the Roman empire, and the surprising conquests they made under Mohammed and his successors, rendered their country so famous, that 'tis no wonder many authors should have taken such pains to give an accurate description of it. Ptolemy seems to have laboured this point more than any other: Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pliny, with many more of the antients, in their accounts of Arabia, are likewise pretty prolix. But the Arab writers themselves have been indefatigable on this head. They are very particular and minute, both in their historical and geographical relations; which would have met with a more general esteem, had not the Arab genius, so strongly tinctured with enthusiasm and superstition, and consequently inclined to fable and romance, so eminently displayed itself through almost every part of those compositions [a].

Whence Arabia so called.

ARABIA, or at least the most considerable part of it, was, from remote antiquity, called by the natives Arabah; which name it still retains. However, we find it frequently styled by their historians Gjazîrah or Jeazîrat al Arab, the peninsula of the Arabs, Belad al Arab, the region of the Arabs, Diyar al Arab, the provinces of the Arabs; and, by many of the Orientals, Arabistân. Amongst some of the Syriac writers it seems to have gone under the apellation of Cushatha, and sometimes in Scripture that of Cush, as we have already observed in the history of the Ethiopians. 'Al-Motarezzi, in the book Mogreb, derives the name

name Arabah from Arbah, a diſtrict of Tehâma, where Iſhmael dwelt, or, according to Safioddin, a town in the neighbourhood of Mecca; and 'Ebn Saïd 'Al-Magrebî, in 'Abu'l-Fedah, from Ya'rab, the ſon of Kahtân or Joktan, and grandſon of Eber. But thoſe bid the faireſt for truth, who deduce it from an Hebrew original; the word arab of ereb having ſeveral ſignifications very favourable to ſuch a conjecture. For it imports, the weſt, a mixture, and merchandize, or traffick. Now, that the weſtern part of Arabia was at firſt called ארץ ארב eretz arab or (A) ereb, the weſtern country, may be deemed highly probable from hence, that its eaſtern provinces are denominated in Scripture ארץ קדם eretz kedem, the land of the eaſt. Which if we admit, from א רב arab naturally and eaſily flows Arabah. This notion ſeems the leſs liable to exception as Moſes himſelf ſtyles the weſtern Arabia Arabah; which goes a good way towards evincing, that, from its ſituation, it firſt received that name. Afterward the Iſhmaelites, who were poſſeſſed of it, gradually reducing the other parts, carried the word Arabah along with them, and applied it to the whole peninſula. Some, however, think, that this tract might have aſſumed the name we are now conſidering, from that mixture of different tribes, which, they pretend, formed the Arab nation. In ſupport of this opinion it is alledged, that in Scripture the Arabs are termed a mingled people, and that the antients enumerate many nations inhabiting Arabia. But, as the paſſage of Scripture here hinted at does not appear neceſſarily to denote the Arabs, as the various names given by the antients to the different clans of this region do not abſolutely imply, that all thoſe clans had a different original, and as the beſt Arabian hiſtorians aſſert all their countrymen to be ſprung from two ſtocks only, perhaps our readers will allow a greater degree of probability to the former etymon. Laſtly, others deduce the name Arabah from the third ſignification

(A) From hence, by the inſertion of an epenthetic N, comes the word Erembi, the name of a nation mentioned by Homer and Strabo. Homer's ſcholiaſt and Bochart intimate, that the Erembi were the ſame people with the Troglodytes; though they likewiſe allow, that they might have been a branch of the Arabians. For a more ample diſcuſſion of this point, we muſt refer our readers to Bochart (1).

(1) Hom. Odyſſ. Δ. v. 85. & ſchol. in loc. Strab. l. i. Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 2 & c. 29.

fication of ערב above-mentioned, because the Arabs in very early ages took their principal delight in merchandize or traffick; the gold, frankincense, myrrh, jewels, spices, and many other valuable commodities, either the natural produce of their country, or brought thither from India, prompting them thereto. Now, though it cannot be denied, that this carries a good appearance of truth, and that the facts on which it is founded are clear and inconteſtable; yet, as the moſt antient names of places ſeem chiefly to have been taken, either from thoſe of the firſt planters of colonies, builders of cities, &c. or ſome circumſtances in the ſituation, we are inclined to adhere to the etymon ſuggeſted by the firſt ſignification of ארב arab. The ſacred hiſtorian calls the territory, where the deſcendents of Joktan ſettled, Kedem, the eaſt; which renders it probable, that in his time the name Arabah was not known there. This is ſufficient to invalidate what has been advanced in the point before us by 'Ebn Saïd 'Al-Magrebî, which depends only upon an Arabian tradition, that can by no means ſtand in competition with Scripture. Neither ought we to be cenſured for deducing the moſt noted name of Arabia from the Hebrew tongue: for, that Moſes uſes this very name, has been already obſerved; and that in early ages the Hebrew and Arabic languages were the ſame, ſeems to be acknowledged by the Arabs, when they make themſelves the deſcendents of Eber and Abraham, the two great anceſtors of the Hebrews [b].

The largeſt extent of Arabia.

ARABIA, taken in its largeſt extent, lies between the twelfth and thirty-fifth degrees of north latitude, and the fifty-third and ſeventy-eighth of longitude. The greateſt length, or a line drawn from a point on the coaſt of the Red Sea about 1° 25′ S. of the tropic of Cancer to the extremity of of cape Ras al Ghat, is above eleven hundred miles; and its greateſt breadth, that is to ſay, the diſtance from the northern extremity of the deſerts of 'Al-Jazira to the ſtreights of Bab al Mandab, between thirteen and fourteen hundred. It is bounded on the weſt by Paleſtine, part of Syria, the iſthmus of Suez, and the Red Sea, called by the Arabs the Sea 'Al-Kolzom; on the eaſt by the Euphrates, the Perſian gulph, and bay of Ormuz; on the north by part of Syria, Diyar-Becr, Irâk, and Khûzeſtân; and on the ſouth by the ſtreights of Bab al Mandab, and the Indian ocean. It grows narrower as we approach the frontiers of Syria and Diyar-Becr; and, by reaſon of the proximity of the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, may be looked upon as a peninſula, and that one of the largeſt in the world [c].

Its proper limits.

But the limits of the proper Arabia are much narrower, as reaching no farther northward than the iſthmus, which runs from Ailah to the head of the Perſian gulph, and the borders of the territory of Cûfa; which tract of land the Greeks nearly comprehended under the name of Arabia the happy. Here the Arabs have been ſettled almoſt ever ſince the flood. The eaſtern geographers make Arabia Petræa to belong partly to Egypt, and partly to Shâm or Syria; and Arabia Deſerta they call the deſerts of Syria. But as the Arabs have for many ages reduced theſe two provinces or kingdoms, either by ſettlements or continual incurſions, the Turks and Perſians at this day include them in Arabiſtân. The antients in like manner aſſigned different limits to this vaſt peninſula. Pliny extended it as far as the borders of Commagene, the north part of Syria, on account of the many Arabian colonies planted there by Tigranes; and Xenophon included in it the greateſt part of Meſopotamia. But Ptolemy, who gives us a more accurate deſcription of Arabia, determines its dimenſions differently from thoſe authors. According to him, the city of Phara, between the Elanitic and Heroopolitan gulphs, or rather a line drawn a little to the weſtward of this city near the diſtrict of Heroopolis, was its boundary on the ſide of Egypt. On the weſt it was terminated by Paleſtine, art of Syria, the confines of Egypt, and the Arabian gulph; on the north by the Euphrates, from the city of Thapſacus, cus, near the borders of Palmyrene, to the diſtrict of Idicara in Babylonia; on the eaſt by the Chaldæan mountains, and the Perſian gulph; and on the ſouth by the Erythræan ſea. The ſame ſituation and extent, or nearly ſo, are aſſigned it by Diodorus and Strabo. Conformably to the ſentiment of the Arabs, this region may be deemed a peninſula, whether we conſider it as anſwering to the name of Arabia in its moſt uſual ſenſe, or as it is variouſly deſcribed by the antients, or, laſtly, as comprehending all that large tract bounded almoſt entirely by the Euphrates, the Perſian gulph, the (B) Sindian, Indian, Red ſeas, and part of the Mediterranean [d].

The firſt diviſion of Arabia.

THE firſt diviſion of the peninſula of the Arabs was into Kedem and Arabah, as we learn from Scripture. Kedem, or the land of Kedem, comprehended the Arabia Felix and Arabia Deſerta of Ptolemy, whoſe limits and extent we ſhall ſoon define from that geographer. Arabah anſwered to that country called, from Petra its metropolis, Arabia Petræa by Ptolemy; Arabia Citerior, from its ſituation in reſpect of Italy, by Pliny; and Arabia Vetus by Stephanus and Procopius, according to Ortelius. Moſes ſeems to have determined the bounds of this kingdom with a preciſion worthy an accurate geographer, when he tells us, that on the ſouth it reached to the ſea of Suph, or the Red Sea; on the weſt to Paran and Tophel; on the north to Laban, Hatſeroth, and Dî-Zahab, that is, to the borders of Syria; and on the eaſt to Kadeſh-Barnea, eleven days

(B) Sind or Sindia is that large tract comprehending all thoſe countries between India, Carmania, and Sigiſtân. On the ſouth it is waſhed by the ſea, which from thence is called the Sindian ſea, contiguous to the bay of Ormuz and the Indian ocean. Its metropolis is known by the name of Manſoura, according to the eaſtern writers. The ſindon of the antients was ſo denominated from Sindia, where it was produced in vaſt quantities. The Arabs believe the people of this region to be the poſterity of Cham (z).

days journey from mount Horeb. As Arabah imports the weſt, ſo Kedem does the eaſt; and theſe ſignifications agree with the ſituations of thoſe regions. The Arabic verſion makes Kedem to extend as far as Rekem or Petra, which runs counter to ſome other authors. In one paſſage Moſes apparently comprehends Chaldæa under the name of Kedem; but this will not overturn what is here advanced. The firſt inhabitants of Arabah, or the weſtern Arabia, were the Caſlûhhim, deſcended from Miſraim, the Caphtorim, and the Horites, who occupied mount Seir, before they were expelled from thence by Eſau and his poſterity. Afterwards Iſhmael and his deſcendents ſettled here; and laſt of all the Edomites, or Idumæans. As for Kedem, or the eaſtern Arabia, it was firſt peopled by the ſons of Joktan, who are reputed the genuine Arabians; though in proceſs of time the Iſhmaelites ſpread themſelves over this country. That ſome of the Cuſhites alſo poſſeſſed themſelves of part of it in early times, has been already obſerved. The children of Abraham by his concubine Keturah likewiſe contributed towards repleniſhing it with inhabitants, as appears from the ſacred hiſtorian [e].

PTOLEMY ſeems to be the firſt who divided the peninſula we are now upon into three parts. Theſe he termed Arabia Petræa, Arabia Deſerta, and Arabia Felix; and ſince his time that diviſion has generally prevailed. In order therefore, to give our readers a ſuccinct idea of every one of theſe provinces, we ſhall purſue the method he has obſerved, and deſcribe them upon the plan he has laid down [f]. Ptolemy the firſt who divided it into three parts.

ARABIA Petræa on the eaſt was contiguous to Syria and Arabia Deſerta; on the weſt to Egypt, or rather that neck of land ſeparating Africa from Aſia, called at this day the iſthmus of Suez, and the (C) Heroopolitan gulph; on the Arabia Petræa.

(C) The Heroopolitan gulph received its name from the city of Heroopolis bordering upon it. This gulph, the weſtern arm of north to Paleſtine, the lake Aſphaltitis and Cæle-Syria; and on the ſouth to Arabia Felix. This tract was for the moſt part uncultivated, the greateſt part of it being covered with dry ſands, or riſing into rocks, interſperſed here-and-there with ſome fruitful ſpots. Petra, its metropolis, ſeems to

of the ſea Al-Kolzom, is the Yam Suph, or Yam Souph, The weedy ſea, of the Scripture. The ingenious Dr. Shaw ſuppoſes it to have been ſo called from the variety of algæ and fuci, that grow within its chanel, and, at low water particularly, are left in great quantities upon the ſea-ſhore. If this be admitted, the word סוף ſouph has not been rendered ſo properly flags by our tranſlators, Exod. c. 2. ver. 8. Iſa. c. xix. ver. 6. nor juncus or juncetum by Buxtorf. The ſame worthy gentleman relates, that whilſt the ſurface of the ſea is calm, ſuch a diverſity of madrepores, fuci, and other marine vegetables, preſented itſelf to the eye, that it is natural to take thoſe plants for a foreſt under water, agreeably to what we find obſerved by Pliny. It may not be improper farther to remark, that the Yam Souph was likewiſe denominated Yam Edom, or the ſea of Edom, by the antient inhabitants of the countries adjoining to it. For the ſons of Edom, having poſſeſſed themſelves of thoſe parts, from their father Edom, called the gulph we are now upon the ſea of Edom. But the Greeks, who took this name from the Phœnicians, rendered Yam Edom improperly ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα, The Red Sea, miſtaking the word Edom for an appellative. However, they ſeem to have been well appriſed, that this name was not derived from any redneſs peculiar to the territory bordering upon the ſea of Edom; ſince many of the Greek and Latin authors expreſly aſſert, that this ſea was ſo denominated from one king Erythrus, who could be no other than Eſau or Edom. Though there are ſeveral thickets of the arundinaceous plants, at ſome ſmall diſtances from the immediate banks of the Yam Souph, yet none are obſerved either upon them, or growing out of the ſea; which is an additional argument in favour of Dr. Shaw's notion. The caſtle and garriſon of Adjeroute are ſuppoſed to occupy at preſent the ſpot of ground on which the antient Heroopolis ſtood (3).

to have been denominated by the Hebrews Selah, both which words were of the ſame import in the Greek and Hebrew languages. St. Jerom intimates, that among the Syrians it went by the name of Rekem, and was the ſame town that we find in Scripture ſtyled Joktheel. Joſephus calls it Arke and Arakeme, which Bochart takes to be equivalent to Rekem, as being only that word with an article prefixed. Petra was the chief fortreſs of the Idumeans, Edomites, or Nabathæans, as already obſerved, and derived its name from its rocky ſituation. It was acceſſible only by one narrow path, wherein but few could go at once; which, with the ſteepneſs of the aſcent, rendered it almoſt impregnable. (D) Authors, however, differ with regard to its ſituation. It was ſeated in a plain

(D) It will be found difficult enough to determine the ſituation of Petra. Strabo places it three or four days journey from Jericho, and five days journey from the foreſt of Palm-trees, which was upon the Red Sea. Pliny makes it to be ſix hundred miles diſtant from Gaza, and an hundred twenty-five miles from the Perſian gulph. But Reland and Cellarius think, that the numbers have been changed, and that the true reading in the laſt author is an hundred twenty-five miles from Gaza, and ſix hundred miles from the Perſian gulph. Euſebius places Theman five miles from Petra, Carcaria a day's journey from the ſame city, and Elath or Ailah ten miles to the eaſt of it. Some geographers believe, that there were more than one Petra. St. Athanaſius diſtinguiſhes two, one in Paleſtine, and the other in Arabia. The paraphraſts Jonathan and Onkelos alſo repreſent Rekem and Petra as two different cities. Joſephus mentions Petra and Rekem in the country of the Amalekites, near which Aaron died, and Petra in the land of the Midianites, though he ſeems to confound thoſe two places. Petra, the capital of Arabia Petræa, is appropriated to Paleſtine by the author of the antient Notitia eccleſiaſtica, being the metropolis of what was called the Third Paleſtine. Euſebius and St. Jerom alſo extend Paleſtine as far as the Red Sea, to Elath; ſo that with them it comprehended Idumæa, and Arabia Petræa. But thoſe countries were looked upon as diſtinct from Paleſtine in all the ages preceding Euſebius. Laſtly, father Calmet ſuppoſes the Petra called Selah by Iſaiah, and the author of the book of kings, to have been ſeated in the land of Moab, or the eaſtern part of Idumæa, and afterwards named Joktheel; whereas the other, called Rekem, was, according to him, ſituated in the ſouth Idumæa, or Arabia Petræa, or the full of gardens, and watered with fountains, but ſurrounded with rocks, according to Strabo. Pliny ſpeaks of it almoſt in the ſame terms. He ſays, the Nabathæans inhabited the city of Petra, ſituated in a plain of about two thouſand paces over, watered by a river, and encompaſſed by inacceſſible mountains. But that it ſtood upon a ſteep rock, in a very dry and barren country, is intimated by Dio; with whom Herodian and the Nubian geographer in ſome ſort agree. For the former deſcribes the capital of the Agareni as ſtanding upon the point of a very high mountain; and the latter repreſents the city of Petra as conſiſting of houſes dug or cut out of a rock. As great a diverſity of opinions, in this particular, prevails amongſt the moderns. Some think, that the city of Karak, or Krak, lying on the confines of Arabia and Syria, inclining towards the north, is the antient Petra. According to them, this fortreſs, for that the word ſignifies in the Syriac and Chaldee tongues, anſwers to the Characha in the Maccabees, the Karkaa in the book of Joſhua, the Charac Moab or Charac Moba of Ptolemy, and the Charakmoba of Stephanus. Others make this city to be the ſame with Hagr or Hejr the capital of a diſtrict in the kingdom of Hejaz. And, laſtly, others believe Errakim, or Arrakeh, a town in a northerly direction from Hagr near Krak or Caracha, to correſpond with the Petra of the antients. None of theſe notions ſeems remote from truth; though, by the aſſiſtance of 'Al-Makrîſi, Bohadin, and the Nubian geographer, ſuch reaſons have been aſſigned for the laſt, as, we think, cannot eaſily be anſwered [g].

country of the Amalekites. The ſame author, together with M. Tillemont, alſo believes, that the Petra, ineffectully attacked by Trajan, which Dio had in view, appertained to Meſopotamia, and conſequently was different from the city we are now upon (4).

Towns in Arabia Petræa.

It cannot be ſuppoſed, that ſuch a barren region ſhould abound with large and populous cities; and therefore moſt of thoſe places, whoſe names have been tranſmitted down to us by Ptolemy, muſt be conſidered as inſignificant and obſcure. The principal towns appertaining to Arabia Petræa, taken notice of by Scripture, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were Paran, Duma, Diblathaim, Dibo, Nebo, Bethmeon, Karioth or Kirioth, Nemrim, and Pithom. Paran, the Phara of Ptolemy, that gave name to a famous deſert adjoining to it, was three days journey to the eaſt of Elath. Duma ſtood upon mount Seir, and, from what the prophet Iſaiah intimates, was probably a place of ſome conſideration. Diblathaim, Dibo, Nebo, Bethmeon, Kirioth, and Nemrim, from ſeveral paſſages in the old teſtament, appear alſo to have been places of ſome note, though their ſituation cannot from thence be aſcertained. Heroopolis, on the weſtern extremity of the Arabian gulf, is by ſome ſuppoſed to be Pithom, built by the Iſraelites for Pharoah, during their ſervitude in Egypt, and the Patumos or Patumon of Herodotus. Be that as it will, it is certain the Septuagint and Coptic verſions countenance ſuch a ſuppoſition, the one rendering Goſhen Heroopolis, and the other Pethom. The generality of the antient geographers have ranked this city amongſt thoſe belonging to Egypt; but Herodotus was of another opinion. Haura, Zathag or Zatha, and Zize, three modern places of this country, correſpond tolerably well with the Auara, Zanaatha, and Ziza of Ptolemy; but as for Lyſa, Gypſaria, Geraſa, and moſt, if not all, the other villages and towns enumerated by that geogra-

Nations of Arabia Petræa.

THE moſt conſiderable nations inhabiting this tract, in the earlier ages, were the Iſhmaelites, the Nabatæi or Nabathæans, the Cedrei or Kedareni, and the Agareni or Hagareni (E). Of theſe the Iſhmaelites were the moſt potent, if they did not comprehend all the reſt. The Nabathæans and Kedareni apparently deduced their names from Nebaioth and Kedar, the ſons of Iſhmael, and conſequently ought to be looked upon either as branches of the Iſhmaelites, or in all reſpects as the ſame nation with them. It is probable the deſcendents of Midian, one of Abraham's ſons by Keturah, ſeated themſelves in the neighbourhood of the Iſhmaelites; ſince we find the ſame people called in Scripture Iſhmaelites and Midianites. Amongſt the antient Greeks and Romans, the inhabitants of Arabia Petræa and Arabia Deſerta, at leaſt the bulk of them, for many ages, went by the names of Arabes, and Nabatæi, Nauatæi, or Nabatæ. They extended themſelves, according to St. Jerom, from the Red ſea to the Euphrates; and all the tract they inhabited was, from them, denominated Nabatena; nay, ſo numerous were the Nabathæans, that we find them mixed with the Reubenites, Gadites, and people of Moab. The Cedrei or Kedareni and Chanclei, ſeem to have been two tribes of them, the former of which Cellarius places near the northern confines of Arabia Felix. The Midianites made a ſettlement behind the Elanitic gulf, and incorporated themſelves with the Cuſhites. If the Hagareni did not correſpond entirely with the Iſhmaelites, they muſt have been nearly related to them. Kimchi inſinuates, that they were originally the children of Hagar by an Arab, after ſhe had left Abraham; but others rather apprehend they aſſumed

(E) To theſe we may add the inhabitants of the wilderneſs of Mahon, called in Scripture Mehunim, who bordered upon Gerar and Pharan, and conſequently were ſeated in the neighbourhood of Egypt. For a further account of this people, our readers may have recourſe to the firſt volume of the univerſal hiſtory (5).

ſumed their name from the ſtony region they inhabited. Cellarius thinks, that at firſt they muſt have been but an obſcure people, though neither Trajan nor Severus could reduce their metropolis, according to Dio. Their territory bordered upon the land of Moab, as may be inferred from Scripture. In after-ages, the names of all the nations here touched upon, were abſorbed in that of Saracens, which continued famous for ſeveral centuries over the eaſtern and weſtern parts of the world. It is obſervable, that the Jeruſalem Targum ſtyles the Iſhmaelites Saracens. That the Arraceni of Pliny were the Saraceni of Ptolemy and Dioſcorides, may be evinced by ſeveral arguments: 1. The ſame proper name has frequently an S and a vowel for its initial letters in different authors; as Ἁλμυδηνὸς and Σαλμυδηνὸς, Ἀνδράκοπα and Σανδράκοπα, Ἐξιτανία and Σεξιτανία, Ἀσιράτης and Σιασιράτης, Ἀρδιαῖοι and Σαρδιαῖοι, Elana and Selana, Samnitæ and Amnitæ, &c. 2. Ptolemy aſſigns the ſame ſituation to the Saraceni, that Pliny does to the Arraceni. 3. They had both the ſame origin, and deduced their names from that of the ſame city. This will more evidently appear from the account we ſhall give of the Saracens in the following ſection [i].

Some remarkable places of Arabia Petræa.

BEFORE we leave Arabia Petræa, our readers will expect us to touch upon the following remarkable places: 1. The town of Colzum or Kolzom, giving name to the ſea adjoining to it, the Clyſma, as may be ſuppoſed, of Ptolemy, which ſtood on the weſtern extremity of the Red ſea, near the ſpot where the preſent city of Suez was erected, and not far from the antient Heroopolis. Betwixt this place and Elath or Ailah was Eziongeber, a celebrated port in the reigns of Solomon and Jehoſaphat, called afterwards Berenice. 2. The promontory of Phara or Paran, betwixt the Heroopolitan and Elanitic gulfs, on which ſtood the town of the ſame name. 3. The wilderneſs of Sur, extending from Paleſtine to the Arabian

The wilderneſs of Sinai, which the ſame nation traverſed after the former. 6. That of Paran, terminated by Kadeſh-barnea, on the confines of the land of Canaan. 7. That of Zin, contiguous to the ſouth-weſtern part of Idumæa, and terminated by Kadeſh. This may poſſibly have been the wilderneſs or ſolitude of Kadeſh or Cades, mentioned by the Pſalmiſt. 8. The mounts Caſius and Sinai, both which were in Arabia, according to St. Paul, Pliny, and Strabo. 9. The ſeveral ſtations of the Iſraelites here, on their march to the land of Canaan from Egypt, viz. Zalmona, Phunun or Fenon, Oboth, Jim, Abarim, &c. 10. Adra, in the northern part of Arabia Petræa, an epiſcopal ſee, over which Proclus preſided at the council of Chalcedon, according to Lucas Holſtenius. 11. Eluſa, which, according to the Jeruſalem Targum, ſeems to have correſponded with Sur, and likewiſe the ſeat of a biſhop. 12. Boſtra, twenty-five miles from Adra, a town of this region greatly honoured by Trajan, and called alſo Philippopolis, from the emperor Philip, ſurnamed Arabs by Aurelius Victor. 13. Moca, a city taken notice of by a medal of Antoninus Pius as governed by its own laws. We ſhall paſs over in ſilence here every thing relating to the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites or Idumæans, Amalekites, and Midianites, though ſettled in Arabia Petræa, ſince they have been already treated of at large in the ſecond volume of this hiſtory [k].

(F) It appears from Strabo, that all the Arab tribes bordering on Arabia Petræa ; on the eaſt by Chaldæa and Babylonia, or more preciſely by a ridge of mountains dividing it from thoſe countries ; and on the ſouth by Arabia Felix, from whence it was likewiſe disjoined by ſeveral ranges of hills. The Cauchabeni, according to Ptolemy, inhabited that part of this province bordering upon the Euphrates, as the Batanæi did that upon the confines of Syria. The Agubeni and Rhaabeni were placed more ſoutherly, towards the frontiers of Arabia Felix ; and by the Perſian gulf the Orcheni. Under the Cauchabeni, near the borders of Babylonia, the Æſitæ had their habitation ; and above the Rhaabeni the Maſani. In the interior part the Agræi were ſeated ; and in the mountainous region, near Chaldæa, the Marteni or Martini. All theſe nations, or rather tribes, except the Æſitæ and Agræi, were very obſcure ; but theſe deſerving ſome regard, a word or two concerning them may not prove unacceptable to our readers [l].

The Æſitæ.

BOCHART ſuppoſes the Æſitæ to have inhabited that tract, where the holy and patient Job was ſeated. He believes, that Ptolemy wrote Αυσίται Auſitæ ; and that Uz the ſon of Nahor, ſettling here, gave name to the whole diſtrict. This notion, it muſt be owned, as well as the emendation that ſupports it, is not void of a good degree of probability ; for the ſeptuagint verſion renders in the land of Uz ἐν χώρᾳ Αὐσιτιδι, in the land of the Auſitæ ; and Haran or Charræ, where Terah's family reſided, was on the oppoſite bank of the Euphrates, and conſequently in the neighbourhood of this place. Add to this, that the Chaldæans and Sabæans are repreſented as Job's neighbours in Scripture ; which circumſtance agrees extremely well with the country of the Auſitæ or Æſitæ, as being contiguous to Chaldæa, and having, according to Ptolemy, a city called Sabe ſituate in it. Further, ther, Buz was Nahor's second son; and we find, adjoining to this territory, a district called Busitis, of which Elihu, one of Job's friends, was a native; and another of them came from Tema or Thema, a town of Arabia Deserta, not very remote from hence: which considerations, as well as several others that might be offered, render it not a little probable, that the land of Uz, and the territory of the Ausitæ or Æsitæ, were one and the same country[m].

The Agræi. THE Agræi lay more westerly, and even close upon the skirts of Arabia Petræa; which possibly may have induced some learned men to call them Agaræi, and make them the same people with the Hagareni above-mentioned, whom we have placed in Arabia Petræa. If this be admitted, they must have possessed a good part of Arabia, and been much more powerful than Cellarius is willing to allow them. Be that as it will, it is certain Pliny in the same passage takes notice of the Agræi and the city of Egra or Agra; that, in the cabinets of the curious, antique (G) coins have been discovered, with the words ΖΕΥΣ ΑΓΡΕΥΣ, Jupiter of Agra, or Jupiter the protector of Agra, upon them; and lastly, that the situation the Oriental geographers assign Hagr, a name not very remote from Agra, quadrates well enough with such a supposition. But as it is not a matter of any great moment whether the Agræi and Hagareni were the same people or not, whether their territories were extensive, or confined within narrow

(G) That the coins here mentioned belonged to this city, seems plain, not only from the legend they exhibit, but likewise from the workmanship, taste, and manner of them, since they agree entirely with those of the cities in the neighbourhood of Palestine. They prove therefore Pliny's text to have been corrupted, and that his present Egra was originally Agra. That Jupiter should have been honoured with such an appellation, will not appear strange, when we consider the Diana Ephesia, Apollo Delphicus, Apollo Clarius, &c. of the antients (7).

Some curious particulars relating to Arabia Deſerta.

It is very well known, that the antient Ituræans, Edomites, Nabathæans, people of Kedar, and other nations ſettled in Arabia Petræa and Arabia Deſerta, led, for the moſt part, a wandering life, like their poſterity the preſent Bedoweens, without houſes, towns, or any fixed habitations. By far the greateſt part of both theſe provinces or kingdoms was a loneſome, deſolate wilderneſs, no otherwiſe diverſified than by plains covered with ſand, or mountains conſiſting of naked rocks and precipices; neither were they ever, unleſs ſometimes at the equinoxes, refreſhed with rain. The few vegetables therefore, which they produced, muſt have been ſtunted by a perpetual drought, and the nouriſhment afforded them by the nocturnal dews ſufficiently impaired by the intenſe heat of the ſun in the day. Throughout the ſandy deſerts were found huge mountains of ſand, formed by the violence of the winds, that continually blew over them in the day-time, though they ceaſed in the night. As for wells and fountains, they were ſo very rare in theſe parts, that it is no wonder they ſhould have occaſioned ſo much ſtrife and contention. However, notwithſtanding the natural ſterility of the tract we are now upon, thoſe vaſt plains of ſand above-mentioned were here-and-there interſperſed with fruitful ſpots, which appeared like ſo many little iſlands ſurrounded by an immenſe ocean, as has been obſerved by Pliny. Theſe being rendered extremely delightful by fountains, rivulets, palm-trees, a variety of vegetables, and moſt excellent fruits, the Arabs, with their flocks, encamped upon ſome of them, and, having conſumed every thing there, retired to others, as is the cuſtom of the Bedoweens at this day. Such fruitful ſpots were likewiſe frequent in Libya, and by the Egyptians called Auaſes or Abaſes, as we learn from Strabo. The barren part of Arabia Felix, bordering upon the Red ſea, was, in like manner, interſperſed with ſuch Abaſes; which probably gave name to the Abaſeni, a nation ſettled there, and in the adjacent fertile region. A body of theſe, croſſing the ſtreights of Bab-al-Mandab, paſſed into Ethiopia, which from them received the denomination of

of Abaſſia. This, notwithſtanding what has been advanced to the contrary by M. Ludolphus, appears to us much more likely, than that either the Arabs or Ethiopians ſhould have been called Abaſſines, from we know not what mixture peculiar to the former nation; for the very notion of ſuch a mixture is repugnant to the whole ſtream of Oriental antiquity, and even to the ſacred writings themſelves, as our readers will eaſily collect from ſeveral paſſages of this hiſtory. It is certain the Nubians (H), a people inhabiting part of Libya Interior, abounding with Abaſes, and Ethiopia, went antiently under the appellation of Abaſeni; which adds no ſmall weight to our opinion. That even the fruitful part of Arabia Felix itſelf ſhould be called Abaſene, is not to be wondered at, ſince it might as well derive this name from Arabia Petræa, as it did from thence that of Arabah or Arabia; for that Arabia Petræa was ſtyled Abaſene, appears from Herodian and Dio, who have given an account of Severus's expedition into this country, in conjunction with a coin of that emperor, having on the reverſe the word ΑΒΑΣΗΝΩΝ, exhibited by Goltzius. And this takes off the whole force of the objection offered by M. Ludolphus againſt the etymon of Abaſene or Abaſſia here propoſed [o].

(H) That the Nubians were a branch of the antient Ethiopians, appears from Ariſtotle, Ptolemy, and others; and that the Ethiopians were nearly related to the Egyptians, after conſulting Herodotus, Diodorus, and Strabo, no one can doubt. The Ethiopic and Egyptian languages therefore, in early ages, muſt have been, in a manner, the ſame; which likewiſe may be immediately collected from the aforeſaid authors. Auaſes or Abaſes therefore was probably an Ethiopic as well as an Egyptian word. Now, that that Arabic tongue antiently agreed with the Ethiopic, Towns of Arabia Deſerta.

THOUGH Ptolemy has handed down to us a large liſt of the towns appertaining to Arabia Deſerta, our readers will be apt to conclude, from the foregoing obſervations, that few of them were places of any great repute. That geographer makes Thapſacus on the Euphrates, a city of ſome note on account of the bridge over which Alexander and Darius marched their reſpective armies, its frontier on the ſide of Meſopotamia; but Pliny and Stephanus think this town belonged to Syria. Near the mountains ſeparating Arabia from Chaldæa ſtood Themma, Thema, or Tema, ſo called from Thema or Tema the ſon of Iſhmael, and mentioned in various paſſages of Scripture; for the Iſhmaelites extended themſelves from the land of Havilah near the Euphrates to the confines of Egypt. Seba was upon the borders of Arabia Felix, and founded probably by Seba Abraham's grandſon; ſince all that patriarch's children by Keturah, according to Moſes, moved towards the eaſt. Gadirtha, Auzara, Audattha or Adittha, Balatæa, Pharga, Belgnæa, and the other antient cities ſituated along the banks of the Euphrates, have long ſince diſappeared; unleſs we will allow ſome traces of Audattha, or Adittha, and Balatæa, to be ſtill viſible in the modern Haditha and Balladoc. Ammæa, Idacara, and Jucara, towards the Perſian gulph, are equally obſcure; except the preſent Al-Kere ſhould be thought to bear ſome reſemblance to the two latter. Salma, Calathuſa, Arrade, Tedium, Odagena, Luma, Dumætha, &c. in the mediterranean parts; Artemita and Abæra on the ſkirts of Arabia Felix; Thauba, Erupa, Alata, Aurana, Choce, Barathena, &c. to the northward, never probably made any conſiderable figure. However, that ſome memory of Salma ſeems at this day to be preſerved in mount Salma, of Dumætha in Dawmat-al-Jandal, of cannot well be denied, ſo uncommon an affinity betwixt them remaining to this day; ſo that Auaſes or Abaſes may be conſidered likewiſe as a word uſed by the antient Arabs. Theſe points add great weight to the conjecture here propoſed (8).

Arabia Felix.

ARABIA FELIX was limited on the north by the two provinces or kingdoms juſt deſcribed; on the ſouth by the Erythræan ſea; on the eaſt and weſt by part of that ſea, together with the Arabian and Perſian gulphs. In ſhort, it pretty nearly anſwered to that tract, which is looked upon as the proper peninſula of the Arabs by the Oriental geographers. Strabo tells us, that in his time it was divided into five kingdoms, which well enough correſponds with the diviſion of the proper Arabia into five provinces by the eaſtern writers. Theſe provinces are Yaman, Hejaz, Tehâma, Najd, and Yamama; to which ſome add Bahrein, as a ſixth. But the more exact make this a part of Irâk, and therefore come nearer to an agreement with Strabo. However, others reduce them all to two, Yaman and Hejaz, the laſt including the three provinces of Tehâma, Najd, and Yamama. The principal nations taken notice of by the antients as ſettled here were the Sabæi, Gerræi, Minæi or Minnæi, Atramitæ, Maranitæ, Catabani, Aſcitæ, Homeritæ, Sapphoritæ, Omanitæ, Saraceni, Nabathæi, Thamydeni, Bizomenæ, &c. As the limits and ſituation of theſe nations cannot be determined with any manner of preciſion, we ſhall be as conciſe as poſſible in the particular geography of the Happy Arabia [q].

The Sabæi.

THE Sabæi ſeem to have poſſeſſed a very conſiderable territory in the ſouthern and beſt part of this peninſula. Their country was greatly celebrated amongſt the antients for the vaſt quantity of frankincenſe it produced. Saba or Sabæ, its metropolis, according to the antient geographers, ſtood upon a hill, at no very conſiderable diſtance from the Red Sea, being a large, opulent, and ſtrong city. It was defended by a caſtle, and, as has been ſuppoſed by many learned men, together with the Arab nation in general, the reſidence of the queen of Sheba. However, provided we allow the modern Mâreb, in the province of Hadramaut, to correſpond with the antient Saba, this laſt muſt have been ſeated more to the ſouth, ſouth, and near the coaſt of the Erythræan ſea, or, as it is now called, the Indian ocean. And that the modern Mâreb anſwers to Saba, muſt be admitted at leaſt extremely probable from Pliny, who, together with Strabo, mentions Mariaba or Meriaba, the ſame words apparently with Mâreb, as the capital of the Sabæi, but is entirely ſilent as to the city of Saba. According to the eaſtern geographers, the town of Mâreb or Mârab is ſomething above three days journey from Sanaa the capital of Yaman, in an eaſtern direction. From the ſame authors it alſo appears, that Saba was originally the name of a diſtrict, as well as a city, which could only be deemed a ſmall part of the kingdom of Yaman. But that this diſtrict ſhould have been always confined to the province of Hadramaut or Shibâm, if not a part of it, as they ſeem to inſinuate, cannot be allowed; ſince frankincenſe, for the production of which the territory of the Sabæi was ſo famous, is only found in the province of Shihr, different from that of Hadramaut. The Arabs aſſert both the town and diſtrict to have been ſo denominated from Saba the ſon of Jexhab, and grandſon of Joktan, whoſe name imports "to lead into captivity," becauſe he was the firſt who reduced men to a ſtate of ſervitude. Pliny makes the Perſian and Arabian gulphs the eaſtern and weſtern boundaries of this nation. The maritime towns were Marana, Marma, (I) Corolia, Sabatha, &c. and inland cities Naſcus, Cardaua, Carnus, &c. Rhegama or Rhegma, founded probably by Raamah the ſon of Cuſh, ſeated on the Perſian gulph, ſeems likewiſe to have appertained to the Sabæi [r].

(I) It is poſſible, that this town might be ſeated on ſome part of the Red Sea abounding with coral, eſpecially ſince that ſea was famous for the production of this marine vegetable; which if we admit, it may appear probable, that Corolia received its name from the coral in its neighbourhood. Notwithſtanding what has been advanced by Pliny, the word coral ſeems to be of Oriental extraction. For חרול חרל or חורל ſignifies a thorn, a nettle, a thiſtle, &c. which are vegetables, and conſequently bear ſome analogy to coral. Some may perhaps imagine, that coral was ſo denominated from the town we are here ſpeaking of (9).

The Gerræi and Minæi.

THE Gerræi and Minæi, according to Strabo, brought vaſt quantities of frankincenſe, and other kinds of perfumes, from the upper or ſouthern parts of Arabia Felix to the ſeaports; which is a ſtrong preſumption of their being two tribes or cantons of the Sabæi. We find the towns of Bilæna or Bilbana, Gera and Magindana, mentioned by Ptolemy as belonging to the Gerræi; and the Minæi, a powerful nation, joined with the Gerræi by Diodorus and Strabo. The laſt author calls the region of the Minæi Minæa or Meinæa, and makes its northern frontiers ſeventy days journey from Ailah. Its principal city was Carna or Carana, called, as ſhould ſeem, Carnus by Pliny, and placed by him in the country of the Sabæi; which brings no ſmall acceſſion of ſtrength to what we have juſt advanced. Some authors take notice of the Charmæi as a people contiguous to the Minæi and Gerræi, but deliver nothing of moment concerning them [s].

The Adramitæ.

As for the Atramitæ or Adramitæ, they undoubtedly inhabited part at leaſt of the province at this day named Hadramaut or Hadramuta, and conſequently were a tribe of the Sabæi. Their metropolis was called Sabota or Sabatha, as may be inferred from Pliny and Ptolemy; beſides which the port of Cane, at the ſouthern extremity of Arabia Felix, belonged to them. Xibân or Shibâm, and Tezim, are now the principal towns of Hadramaut, both of them about a day's journey from the Indian ocean. Shibâm ſtands upon a rough and rocky mountain of the ſame name, is fortified with a citadel of great ſtrength, and rendered almoſt impregnable by its ſituation. It goes likewiſe under the name of Hadramaut amongſt the Arabs, lies in about 13° 30′ N. latitude, and is ſeven days journey from Aden. The province was denominated Hadramaut from one of the ſons of Joktan, whoſe deſcendents firſt peopled it. Shibâm and Tezim were alſo the names of two tribes, who founded, and ſettled themſelves in, the cities ſo called, as we learn from the Arab hiſtorians. Ebiſma, Dama, Ægiſthæ, Trulla, Mœphath, and other places fixed by Ptolemy here, deſerve not the leaſt attention [t].

The Maranitæ.

THE Maranitæ or Maranenſes muſt have been in the neighbourhood of the two former cantons, though we cannot pretend to aſcertain their ſituation. The metropolis of this nation was probably the Mara or Amara of Ptolemy, and the Mara of ſome of the Oriental geographers [u]

CELLARIUS makes the Catabani a people of good confideration; which is confirmed by Pliny, who tells us, that the Larendani, Catabani, and Gebanitæ, had many towns, particularly Nagia, and Tamna that contained ſixty-five temples. Tamna muſt have been the ſeat of ſome Arab prince governing the Catabani, according to Strabo; from whence we may conclude, that they inhabited the province of Tehama ſtretching out as far to the ſouthward as the city of Aden. Golius ſays, that the word ſignifies a violent heat; and that the country was ſo denominated from its being greatly expoſed to the ſolar rays, whoſe heat there is very intenſe. But as many other places in Arabia were ſubject to the ſame inconvenience, our readers may poſſibly ſuppoſe it rather to have deduced its name from Tema the ſon of Iſhmael, whoſe poſterity in proceſs of time might ſettle themſelves in it. This ſeems to be confirmed by Almotarezzi, who ſays, that Iſmael himſelf reſided in Araba a diſtrict of Tehama. Tebala, the capital of Tehama, a town of conſiderable note, built by Tebala the ſon of Midian, ſtands in the road from Mecca to Sanaa the metropolis of Yaman [u]

The Catabani.

THE Aſcitæ poſſeſſed all that tract about the promontory Syagrus, the cape Ras al Ghat of the moderns, including, as ſhould ſeem, part of the provinces of Omân and Mahra. Nay, they muſt have ſpread themſelves much farther, if we ſuppoſe Hâſec, a maritime town on the coaſt of Hadramaut, to have been ſo denominated from them. Whether any traces of the Aſcitæ are ſtill viſible in Maſkat an Arab town on the bay of Ormuz, a little above a degree north of the extremity of cape Ras al Ghat, and almoſt under the tropic of Cancer, we muſt ſubmit to the judgment of our curious and inquiſitive readers [w].

The Aſcitæ.

PTOLEMY mentions the Homerites as a nation ſeated in the ſouthern part of Arabia Felix, and bounded on the eaſt by the Adramitæ, or province of Hadramaut. His Arabiæ Emporium he likewiſe places in their country, as Pliny does his Maſſala. Some authors make them the ſame people with the Sabæans, whilſt others conſider them in a different light. For our part, we look upon Sabæi and Homeritæ to have been different names of the ſame nation, and are countenanced herein by the Oriental hiſtorians. For theſe inform us, that the Sabæans were called Hamyarites from Hamyar the ſon of their great anceſtor Saba; and that they ruled over almoſt the whole country of Yaman. Though the kingdom of the Hamyarites, or Homerites, was at length tranſlated from the princes of Hamyar to the deſcendents of Cahlân his brother, yet they all retained the title of king of Hamyar. We find them ſtyled Immireni by Theodorus Lector, and Theophanes Byzantius gives them the name of Ethiopians, inſinuating them to be the Macrobii of Herodotus, which yet we are by no means diſpoſed to admit. They made a great figure amongſt the antient Arabs before the time of Mohammed, as will more fully appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory [x].

The Sapphoritæ.

THE Sapphoritæ of Ptolemy cannot be conſidered as a people diſtinct from the Homerites, notwithſtanding the authority of Ptolemy and Cellarius. They were only the citizens of Sapphar, or, as Pliny has it, Saphar, a city of note in the dominions of the Homerites. Ptolemy aſſigns this place a poſition nearly agreeing with that of the preſent Sanaa, which we cannot help looking upon as extremely probable, eſpecially as Saphar is affirmed to be the metropolis of this country by Pliny. The Arabs believe, that all the mountainous part of the region producing frankincenſe went, in the earlieſt times, by the name of Sephar; from whence the excellent Golius concludes this tract to have been the mount Sephar of Moſes. A ſtrong preſumption of the truth of which notion is, that Dhafâr, the ſame word with the modern Arabs as the antient Saphar, is the name of a town in Shihr, the only province of Arabia bearing frankincenſe, on the coaſt of the Indian ocean, five paraſangs from (K) Merbât, as we learn from Safioddin, who likewiſe informs us, that this thuriferous mountainous country of Dhafâr is about three days journey long, and of an equal breadth. Bochart therefore deſerves little regard, when he intimates, that the Meſha of Moſes was the Muza of Ptolemy, or the Mocha of the moderns, a celebrated port of the Red

(K) A paraſang is about three miles. Eight paraſangs, according to Abulfeda, or twenty-four miles, make a ſtation, or a day's journey. But the Nubian geographer ſays, that a ſtation conſiſts of thirty miles (10).

Red Sea, about four or five days journey from Dhafâr; ſince this is much too narrow an extent of territory to receive all the poſterity of the thirteen ſons of Joktan, as we are aſſured by Moſes the tract between Meſha and Sephar did. For which reaſon we cannot help preferring the ſentiment of R. Saadias and R. Abraham Zachutus, who aſſert Meſha to be Mecca; eſpecially ſince it is a point agreed upon by the Arabs, that Meſha was one of the moſt antient names of Mecca. Some authors believe, that in early times there ſtood a city called Dhafâr or Saphar, the Arabic letter ظ frequently anſwering to the Hebrew צ and Greek Σ, in the neighbourhood of Sanaa, and others that Sanaa itſelf went formerly by that name; which in a great meaſure confirms what we have juſt advanced [y].

The Omanitæ.

We find the Omanitæ taken notice of by Ptolemy, and Omanum their chief city repreſented by him as one of the moſt conſiderable places in Arabia. It cannot be doubted but the Omân of Alfraganus, and capital of the province of the ſame name, the common boundary of Yaman and Bahrein, is the Omanum of Ptolemy, and the country in which it is ſeated, the diſtrict of the antient Omanitæ. From whence it appears extremely probable, that they were under the juriſdiction of the Homerites, and conſequently ought to be looked upon as a clan of that people. The citadel of Omân is defended by a ſtrong garriſon of Arabs. Either the tract itſelf, or the metropolis, ſeems alſo to have been called antiently Sohâr; but at this day the former is denominated Omân, and the latter Sohâr. The province of Omân ſtretches itſelf out three hundred miles on the coaſt of the Perſian ſea, which is there called the ſea of Omân. In the time of Ptolemy, Omanum, or Sohâr, was a famous mart, but has been in a manner deſerted by merchants for ſeveral ages [z].

The Saracens.

The Saracens or Nabathæans poſſeſſed that part of Arabia Felix bordering upon Arabia Petræa and Arabia Deſerta; but what extent this territory was of, we no-where find. Contiguous to them the antients placed the Thamudeni, Thamuditæ, ditæ, or Thamydeni, a people alſo mentioned in the Koran. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the (L) Thamydeni inhabited part of the coaſt of the Arabian gulph; and Pliny intimates their principal city to have been named Badanatha. In fine, Golius believes them to have occupied a good part at leaſt of the province of Hejâz, and particularly that diſtrict wherein Hagr or Al Heir, the Egra or Agra of Stephanus and Ptolemy, is ſituated; which, as well as other conſiderations that might be offered, plainly evinces them to have been nearly related to the Saracens and Nabathæans, if not entirely the ſame people with them [a].

The Bnizomenæ.

DIODORUS SICULUS tells us, that in the neighbourhood of the Thamydeni were likewiſe ſeated the Bnizomenæ, who lived upon wild beaſts taken in hunting. In their country ſtood a temple held in the higheſt veneration amongſt all the Arabs. It is probable this temple was ſacred to Iſis, as Diodorus relates an iſland near the Bnizomenean coaſt to have been more immediately under her protection. Theſe likewiſe muſt have been ſettled in ſome of the maritime parts of Hejâz, but their ſituation for want of ſufficient light from antient hiſtory, cannot now be exactly determined. However, we doubt not but they appertained to the Nabathæans, as well as their neighbours the Thamydeni [b].

WE might here mention ſeveral other nations, or rather tribes, taken notice of by the antients as appertaining to Arabia Felix. But ſince theſe either coincide with ſome of the Ethiopic cantons already deſcribed, as the Troglodytes, &c. or may be conſidered as branches of the Saracens, Nabathæans, Sabæans, Homerites, &c. our readers will excuſe even a bare enumeration of them. The ſame may be ſaid of that large catalogue of obſcure and inſignificant towns and villages, belonging to theſe tribes, to be met with in Ptolemy, of which that geographer himſelf had no idea. However, they will not diſpenſe with an omiſſion of certain towns and ſeaports of Arabia hitherto paſſed over in ſilence, that were held in good repute by the old geographers and hiſtorians [c].

NYSA

[a] Plin. & Cellar. ubi ſup. Golii notæ ad Afraganum, p. 97. Gagn. ubi ſup. ſect. 9. [b] Diod. Sic. l. iii. [c] Vide Strab. Plin. Ptol. &c.

(L) The Thamydeni were the tribe of Thamûd, ſo famous amongſt the Arab writers, of whom we ſhall have occaſion hereafter frequently to ſpeak (11).

(11) Abulfed. Gol. Pocock. &c.

NYSA was a town of Arabia on the Red Sea, near the confines of Egypt, famous for the education of Bacchus, who from thence, and his father Jupiter, received the name of Dionyſius. Arga and Badeo, two maritime cities in a ſoutherly direction from Nyſa, had royal palaces in which the ſovereigns of the country ſometimes reſided. Pudni we find eſteemed by Ptolemy as one of the principal places of Arabia Felix. Muſa or Muza was a celebrated empory and harbour, to which theArab merchants reſorted with their frankincenſe, ſpices, and perfumes. The beſt authors take the modern Mocha or Mokha to correſpond with the antient Muſa; but in our opinion, Moſa, at preſent a ſmall but handſome town near ten leagues from Mokha, ſeems to bid the faireſt for that antient mart. This does not only appear from the very great affinity, or rather identity, of their names and ſituation, but likewiſe from hence, that Moſa is the rendezvous and thoroughfare of the fruits which come from the mountainous parts of Arabia, a circumſtance well enough ſuiting with what the antients have related of Muſa. Be that as it will, we cannot well deny, that ſome traces of Muſa are ſtill preſerved in Moſa; eſpecially as Pliny intimates the Arab merchants to have brought in his time vaſt quantities of the produce of their country to the former place. Ocelis, according to Pliny and Arrian, ſtood upon the ſhore of that narrow ſea called by the moderns the ſtreights of Bab al Mandab, and ſupplied the merchants with freſh water in their Indian voyages. Arabiæ Emporium has been already mentioned, and will be deſcribed when we come to ſpeak of the city of Aden, which is ſuppoſed to anſwer to it. The port of Moſcha our readers will probably place upon the ſpot occupied at this day by the city of Maſkat, which is all that we can ſay of it. As for the Itamas portus, the memory and ſituation of it ſtill remain in Càdhema, a town or village on the Perſian gulph, or bay of Baſra [d].

Remarkable places in Arabia Felix.

BEFORE we conclude this ſection, our readers will expect a ſketch of the Oriental geography of the peninſula of the Arabs. The beſt eaſtern writers, as has been already obſerved, divide this peninſula into five provinces or kingdoms, viz. Yaman, Hejaz, Tehama, Najd, and Yamama. This diviſion vision is of great antiquity, as appears from Strabo; which is not to be wondered at, since the Arab customs, names of towns, &c. are nearly the same now that they were above three thousand years ago [e].

Yaman. THE province of Yaman, so called either from its situation to the right-hand or south of the temple of Mecca, or else from the happiness and verdure of its soil, extends itself along the Indian ocean from the streights of Bab al Mandab to cape Rasalgat; part of the Red Sea bounds it on the west, as the towns of Najran, the Nagara Metropolis of Ptolemy, Haly or Haljo on the sea Al Kolzom, and Omân or Sohar, do on the north. It is subdivided into several lesser provinces, as Hadramaut, Shihr, Omân, Mahra, &c. of which Shihr alone produces the frankincense. The very learned Mr. Sale did not sufficiently attend to the Oriental geographers, when he limited Yaman on the north by Hejaz, and made Najran a province, neither of which particulars have any foundation in them [f].

Principal antient cities of Yaman. THIS country has been famous from all antiquity [g] for its fertility, riches, and happiness of its climate. The principal cities in it known to the antients are the following. 1. Mokha, if it was the Musa or Muza of Pliny, Ptolemy, and Arrian; which yet, we apprehend, will admit of a dispute. It is at present a port and town on the Red Sea of considerable trade; contains ten thousand inhabitants, Jews, Armenians, and Mohammedans; is surrounded with walls, after the antient manner; and has four gates without a ditch, though strengthened by four towers with a proper number of cannon [h] placed upon them. 2. Aden, a celebrated mart on the Indian ocean, not far from the streights of Bab al Mandab, so called, according to the Arabs, from its founder Aden the son of Saba, and grandson of Abraham. Some believe the name to be the same with Eden, the Hebrew word denoting Paradise, and that the town under consideration received this name from the delightful country in which it was situated. It stands at the foot of several high mountains, which surround it almost on all sides. The Arabs have erected five or six forts on the summits of these mountains, with curtains, and many other fortifications on their necks. A fair aqueduct conveys from thence the waters into a great canal or reservoir, built about three three quarters of a mile from the city, which ſupplies the inhabitants with very good water. Golius produces ſeveral reaſons to prove, that Aden is the Arabiæ Emporium of Ptolemy, which ſeem to carry conſiderable weight. It can ſcarce be doubted, but that Aden is the Adana which Stephanus mentions from Uranius [i]. 3. Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, a very antient city, greatly reſembling Damaſcus. It is ſeated in a mountainous territory, and bleſſed with a moſt delightful air; inſomuch that it enjoys a double ſummer, or rather a perpetual ſpring. It is about fifty leagues diſtant from Mokha on the borders of Hadramaut, and was denominated Ozâl from its founder the ſon of Joktan, as the Arabs pretend. They likewiſe make Sanaa the ſon of Ozâl to have communicated that name to it by which it goes at preſent. Some aſſert it to be the Saphar of Ptolemy, as above obſerved. Sanaa, towards the beginning of the laſt century, conſiſted of good houſes built with lime and ſtone, being as large as Briſtol. It ſtands in a barren and ſtony valley, ſurrounded at a ſmall diſtance with high hills, one of which overlooks the town to the northward. On this hill the Arabs have built a ſmall caſtle to keep off the neighbouring mountaineers, who ſometimes inſult the city. The inhabitants have no water but what they receive from wells, which are very deep. Wood is brought from far, and conſequently very dear. On the eaſt ſide ſtands the caſtle invironed with mud-walls, flanked with towers and redoubts, in which every night are poſted proper guards. The king of Yaman does not now reſide here, but at Muab, a town built by one of the laſt monarchs of this country, not a mile from Dhamâr, a little to the S. E. of Sanaa. About three quarters of a mile from this place, on a pretty high hill, the prince above-mentioned built a palace or pleaſure-houſe, to which he frequently retired, in order to divert himſelf; and, from the pleaſant country in which it was ſeated, ſtyled it Hiſn almawâheb [k], or the caſtle of delights. 4. Saba or Mâreb in the province of Hadramaut, of which an account has been given above. It is at preſent little better than a village, and ſtands above three days journey E. of Sanaa [l]. 5. Shibâm, Dhafâr, &c. towns of a very high antiquity, have been [m] already deſcribed. 6. Omân or Sohâr, the Omanum of of Ptolemy, was formerly frequented by merchants of various nations; but has for ſeveral ages been deſerted by them. This ſeems to have been occaſioned by the vicinity of a ſmall rocky iſland called Kîs, ſo low that it cannot be diſcovered at any diſtance, on which many ſhips were daſhed to pieces. Kîs lies a little to the eaſt of Charec, another ſmall iſland oppoſite to the coaſt of Omân, and famous for a pearl-fiſhery, according to Abulfeda. Jacûtus and the Nubian geographer make both theſe iſlands, now called the iſles of Sohâr, about half a day's ſail from the main land of Arabia; but authors are not agreed in this point. The heats in Omân are frequently ſo intenſe, that they have paſſed into a proverb amongſt the Orientals. The town of Sohâr muſt be in ſomething more than 24°. N. lat. though Ptolemy places his Omanum Emporium in 19°. 45′ N. lat. and Ebn Maruph, mathematician to ſultan Morad or Amurath II. aſſerts Omân or Sohâr to be in about 23°. N. lat. All other particulars of note relating to this place our readers will find in the authors here referred to [n].
